To report to the Senate a disagreement, and also to report the principal items of disagreement, so that the Senate may take action thereon.

Mr. VEST. After the Chair has decided the question raised by the Senator from New York, I ask that the resolution may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from New York will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the Senate, who are now considering the differences between the two Houses on House bill 4864, being an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," be, and they are hereby, requested to report to the Senate if they are likely to come to an agreement, and if not, to report to the Senate a disagreement, and also to report the principal items of disagreement, so that the Senate may take action thereon.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Iowa state his amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. My amendment has just been read by the Secretary as part of the text of the resolution.

Mr. HILL. I accept it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to determine the question raised by the Senator from New York. The Chair holds that the resolution is not a privileged question, but comes under section 5 of Rule XIV:

All resolutions shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

A single objection carries the resolution over until to-morrow.

Mr. VEST. I asked for the reading of the resolution, because I am under the impression that until the Senate acts upon it it will not be proper for any member of the conference committee to make a statement in regard to the status of the tariff bill at present and the points of difference between the conferees.

I simply desire to state now, without violating any of the proprieties of the occasion, that so far as I am concerned I am heartily in favor of the resolution. I desire to turn the calcium light upon the differences between the two Houses and to remove the false issue that has been made before the country. I shall take occasion when the resolution comes up to-morrow, if it should be adopted, as I hope it will be, to state for myself all that has occurred in regard to the bill and to put a stop to the infamous lies that are being circulated in regard to the Democratic conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HILL. Is the Senator ready to proceed to-day. Possibly he might get unanimous consent to have the resolution taken up.

Mr. VEST. I am ready at any time.

Mr. HILL. That is right.

Mr. PALMER. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. HARRIS. Before we enter upon the regular order, whatever that may be, I want to suggest to the Senator from New York, the mover of the resolution, and the Senator from Iowa, who offers an amendment, that the language, "report," which carries with it a technical meaning, is used. If the Senate chooses to instruct its own conferees to do any given thing, to follow any given line of policy, or to give information, that is one thing. A report from a conference committee must be the agreement or disagreement of the conferees of the two Houses, and neither House has, or ought to have, the power to coerce the other to make any report. I beg that the word "report" be stricken from the resolution, and that the words "any information upon the points of difference" may be inserted. The Senate conferees can not report by themselves, in the technical language of the word "report."

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question with a view of understanding his proposition?

Mr. HARRIS. I am giving my entire and undivided attention to the Senator from Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. I rose to ask the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, in all courtesy and respect, as an eminent parliamentarian, whether he meant to be understood to say that the committee of conference of one House could not report to that House under any circumstances without the consent of the committee on the part of the other House? For instance, suppose, if it could be conceived, that the Senate committee should say, "We never will act and we never will report; we three or five men will keep a measure which both Houses want to pass forever, without any further action," does the Senator from Tennessee claim that that could be done? I supposed that either committee was responsible to its House, and it could report that the other committee refusing unreasonably to concur in anything, and inform the House which constituted it of that fact, and that would bring back the measure without further action.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. Is there any question before the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. Let the Senator from Tennessee answer my question.

Mr. HARRIS. I think I have already answered the question of the Senator from Massachusetts by the statement I made. A conference committee is a joint committee. It represents the two Houses of the legislative department of the Government, and the conferees of both Houses meet with equal rights. Neither can make what may be called technically a report without the consent of the other. The Senate may instruct me as a conferee, and so far as I can I should feel bound to respect its instructions. If it demands of me information, so far as I can legitimately give it I should hold it my duty to do so. But to make what is technically and formally called a report I say the Senate conferees have no power to do. They can not do it without the concurrence of the other House.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the resolution coming over from a previous day, offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], be laid before the Senate.

Mr. PALMER and Mr. GRAY addressed the Chair.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PALMER. I ask what is now the regular order?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have called for the regular order.

Mr. PALMER. There is morning business yet to be transacted, and the morning hour has not expired.

Mr. ALDRICH. This is morning business, I will say to the Senator from Illinois.

PROPOSED ISSUE OF TREASURY NOTES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN on the 3d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and the same is hereby, discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2264) for the relief of the several States of the Union, and for other purposes, and that said bill be placed on the Calendar for present consideration by the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to strike out all after the word "Resolved" in the resolution and insert the following——

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to make the point that we were on the Calendar and we can not pass from that and take up this resolution except by a majority vote of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is before the Senate now.

Mr. BERRY. It is not before the Senate, because the Calendar was before the Senate, and we were acting on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that my amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will determine the question. The resolution of the Senator from Nebraska was entitled to be laid before the Senate and the Chair has done so.

Mr. ALDRICH. I submit an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. BERRY. I submit that the resolution was entitled this morning before we passed to the Calendar to be laid before the Senate by the Chair, but it was not done, and it is not now in order except by a majority vote of the Senate, because the Calendar now is the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that the resolution is properly laid before the Senate under the rule.

Mr. ALDRICH. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert:

That the managers on the part of the Senate in the conference now being held on the bill H. R. 4864 be directed without further delay to report the said bill and amendments back to the Senate with a disagreement.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, I wish to raise the question of consideration against the resolution. It was brought in on the 3d of the month, and while it was a privileged resolution on the next day it is not a privileged resolution to day.

Mr. ALLEN. I undertook to call up the resolution according to the rule the morning after it was offered, and for two successive days I undertook to call it up and have it considered; but it was passed over on the request of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] with the distinct understanding that it would not lose its place, and would be subject to be called up at any time.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is my understanding of the situation.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, I will state that it was done on my suggestion; that owing to the absence of every member of the Committee on Finance on this side of the Chamber, I appealed to him to let the resolution go over and not lose its place.

Mr. ALLEN. That is true as to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is my exact understanding of the situation. I think there is no question about it.

Mr. ALLEN. Both Senators made the appeal to me, and with the understanding that the resolution should not lose its place, it went over.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I decline to yield any further.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair can not possibly hear three Senators at one time. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. I distinctly understood that at the request of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Maryland the resolution was passed over, retaining its place.

Mr. PASCO. The question of order has not yet been settled.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that there is no such thing as raising a question of consideration in the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the point of order of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PASCO. I make the point that the resolution was introduced on the 3d day of August; that it was a privileged question on the next day and the day after, and that if there was not unanimous consent given after that time the resolution went under the rules of the Senate to the Calendar. If there is anything different from that, in accordance with any understanding or unanimous agreement, let that consent be shown by the RECORD. Under the rules of the Senate the resolution has gone to the Calendar. If there is an exception it must be by something that is of record, and I have not been able to find it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the indorsement on the papers themselves be read. That shows that the resolution is to be laid before the Senate in the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state, in reply to the Senator from Florida, that the resolution has not gone to the Calendar, but, as was stated by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], unanimous consent was asked, for the reason the Senator stated at the time, that the resolution should go over.

Mr. PASCO. That can be shown by the RECORD, but no one has yet produced any such record as that. My understanding and recollection is that the resolution went over one day under that consent, and that the next day it would go to the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. The record which is on the table will show.

Mr. PASCO. Let me get through what I have to say.

The resolution would then go, under the rules of the Senate, to the Calendar. If there is any such record, as stated by the Senator from Maryland, which sets aside this rule by virtue of unanimous consent, it can very easily be shown, and the record can be produced. If that is the case, I have no further words to say in reference to the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I remember as distinctly as possible that when the resolution was called up in order, I myself appealed to the Senator from Nebraska to withdraw it, stating that I was the only member of the Committee on Finance present; that the resolution contained a direction to that committee, and that the members of the committee ought to be present when it was considered. The Senator from Nebraska acquiesced, and the resolution was by order of the Senate put over without prejudice. There is no doubt about that, and that is doubtless shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. The RECORD shows conclusively that the resolution went over, retaining its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will have the RECORD read.

The Secretary read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 7, 1894, page 9685, as follows:

PROPOSED ISSUE OF TREASURY NOTES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read:

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN on the 3d instant, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and the same is hereby, discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2264) for the relief of the several States of the Union, and for other purposes, and that said bill be placed on the Calendar for present consideration by the Senate."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, on the 30th day of July I introduced a bill (S. 2264) for the relief of the several States of the Union, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance. On the 3d instant I introduced a resolution to discharge the Committee on Finance from the further consideration of that bill——

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska and the remarks he is making relate to a bill which is before the Committee on Finance, all of the members of which, with the exception of myself, are absent from the Senate on public duty, as is known by all Senators. I hope, therefore, without displacing the resolution, that it will be continued until some other members of the committee shall be here. As I have stated, I am the only member of the committee present, and I have no knowledge about the matter to which the resolution refers.

Mr. ALLEN. The course suggested by the Senator from Ohio is satisfactory to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the resolution coming up to-morrow, when the members of the committee are present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the resolution will be passed over, retaining its place.

Mr. PASCO. That was on the 7th of August, and it will be seen from that that the resolution went over until "to-morrow."

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. SHERMAN. "Retaining its place."

Mr. PASCO. That does not mean that the resolution retains its place indefinitely. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] stated:

I have no objection to the resolution coming up to-morrow, when the members of the committee are present.

"To-morrow" came; the members of the committee were present. "To-morrow" passed and the next day passed, and the resolution was not called up. Then I insist, Mr. President, that under the rules of the Senate the resolution went to the Calendar, and can not be called up as a privileged question at any time within the morning hour. It must give way, as other business must, to the regular morning business of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. The language read by the Secretary shows conclusively that the resolution retains the place it had on the 3d day of August, when it was offered, which was that it might be called up at any time.

Of course this discussion does not amount to anything, for we can very easily move to take up the resolution, and if we have a majority of the Senate with us, the motion will be carried.

Mr. BERRY. Certainly, if you have a majority.

Mr. ALDRICH. It could not pass unless a majority of the Senate were in favor of it.

I do not see any particular stress of circumstances which requires Senators on the other side to filibuster against a plain proposition of this kind. It seems to me the question which it involves is of sufficient consequence for us to meet it squarely as men. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has expressed his desire to explain the situation of the conferees in regard to this matter; the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] has already explained in part; and certainly the country is anxious to hear the real status of this case, and is anxious to have this matter taken up and disposed of; and it is with very great regret that I find any Senator upon the other side resorting to such unusual parliamentary methods to filibuster this question out of sight of the country.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to determine the question raised by the Senator from Florida. The Chair thinks that the resolution retains its place under the unanimous-consent agreement given at the time.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the resolution and amendment may be read, that there may be no misunderstanding as to the question.

Mr. RANSOM. Will the Senator excuse me for one moment?

Mr. ALDRICH. I can not excuse anybody and can not yield for any purpose. It is now nearly 2 o'clock, and I propose to go on as far as I can with this resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], together with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution of Mr. ALLEN and the amendment proposed by Mr. ALDRICH.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the resolution before the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. This is not the House of Representatives.

Mr. BERRY. The amendment is, in fact, a new resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will please restate his point of order.

Mr. MILLS. My point of order is that the proposition made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has no relation whatever to the proposition contained in the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], and is not germane to it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Chair that it is the universal rule in this body that it is not an objection to an amendment that it be not germane to the pending proposition, unless it be on an appropriation bill. A signal instance of that will be found in our RECORD, where a very dangerous bill, taking a large sum of money from the Treasury, had been passed by both Houses and signed by the President, when its true nature was discovered and it was repealed by an amendment to a private pension bill on the last night of a session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate for its decision the point of order raised by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. HILL. What is the precise point raised, Mr. President? I did not hear it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas raised the point of order that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska is not germane thereto. The Chair submits the point of order to the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to have the rule read or cited by the Senator from Texas under which he claims that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. MILLS. In response to the inquiry of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], I will state that my point of order is that the bill of the Senator from Nebraska, from the consideration of which he proposes by the pending resolution to have the Committee on Finance discharged, provides for the issuing of $50,000,000 to lend to the different States of the Union for certain purposes. The resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island is to require the conference committee on the tariff bill to report. I say the two things have no relation to each other; that the amendment is not germane, in parliamentary parlance, and the two can not go together. Nobody has ever proposed to ingraft a bill proposing to support the Army upon a bill to raise revenues for the support of the Government.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Is the amendment not just as proper as it is for a Senator to make a speech on the Chinese question when a tariff bill is under consideration?

Mr. MILLS. That is a question about making a speech, and this is a question about complying with the rules in making an amendment to a bill.

Mr. HILL. The only question is whether it is pertinent to the matter, and there is no rule of the Senate which prevents making an amendment upon an entirely different subject than that contained in a pending bill, any more than there is to prevent a Senator from making a speech upon a bill that relates to an entirely different matter from the one under consideration. Such are the rules of this body.

Mr. MILLS. I will state that the Senator is himself confused in not drawing the distinction. The unwritten rule of this body is—and it is a body almost without rules except the unwritten ones—that any Senator may speak as much as he pleases on any subject he pleases, at any time he pleases, and as long as he pleases, it makes no difference what is before the Senate. That is the rule.

Mr. GRAY. May I interrupt the Senator for one moment?

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. I would ask the Senator, as one familiar with parliamentary law, what, in his opinion, becomes of the rule which has just been authoritatively stated by the President of the Senate, that a resolution introduced must lie over for one day, if, immediately upon such a resolution being ordered to lie over for one day, it can be substituted for another, and immediately discussed and passed?

Mr. MILLS. The Senate would be simply trampling upon its own rules.

Mr. GRAY. And stultifying itself.

Mr. MILLS. Yes; and stultifying itself.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas a question. I understand the original resolution to be a resolution seeking to discharge a committee of this body from the consideration of a particular subject. Now, would it not be in order to amend that resolution by adding to it that another committee shall also be discharged from another subject?

Mr. MILLS. In reply to the Senator, I will say that on the question of whether the amendment is germane to the resolution or not, would the Senator from Iowa think it would be in order to add to this resolution a bill raising $50,000,000 for the annual support of the Army of the United States?

Mr. ALLISON. If it was a measure for the general support of the Government, I should think it would be a very proper bill to add to it in the present condition of the Treasury.

Mr. MILLS. But would it be in order and germane under the resolution now pending?

Mr. ALLISON. Under the practice of the Senate I think so.

Mr. MILLS. Then we have no rules.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, a single word. The only reference in our rules, so far as I know, to an amendment not being germane is contained in section 3 of Rule XVI, relating to appropriation bills, and is as follows:

3. No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto; and all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate; and any amendment to a general appropriation bill may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill.

My point is that one rule of the Senate relating to appropriation bills only containing the clause that an amendment must be germane to the subject-matter, that is, to the appropriation bill, conclusively proves that as to all other matters an objection to an amendment that is not germane is not to be entertained.

If all amendments must under the rules or practice of the Senate be germane to the subject-matter, why provide that as to appropriation bills no amendment not germane or relevant shall be received? When the Senate finds it necessary to make that provision with reference to a particular class of bills, it conclusively proves that such amendments would be in order and are in order as to all other bills and resolutions.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, the Senate in adopting that rule in reference to appropriation bills, in speaking of amendments to be offered to appropriation bills simply recited and reaffirmed the well known and never disputed proposition in any legislative assembly that any amendment to a pending proposition must be of the same nature as the proposition then pending before the body.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I think there is a more serious point of order against the amendment submitted by the Senator from Rhode Island than the one suggested. That amendment requires the conferees on the part of the Senate to report the revenue bill with a disagreement. I am satisfied that the Senate has not the power to instruct its conferees to take a bill which is in the custody of the two Houses out of that custody and return it with a general disagreement.

The Senate might have power to recede from the conference; it might have power to instruct the conferees to act; but it has not the power to instruct conferees to take a bill which is in the joint custody of the two Houses under a conference which has been agreed to, and direct them as to the character of the report they shall make. It would be an absolute infringement upon the rights and powers of every gentleman upon that conference committee.

I am satisfied the point of order I suggest is conclusive against the amendment the Senator from Rhode Island has proposed.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the suggestion now made by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is certainly not pertinent to the point of order raised by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. In my experience in the Senate no question of this kind has heretofore been raised.

Here is a resolution of instructions to the Finance Committee in regard to a certain matter. It is proposed to amend that by instructing a portion of the Finance Committee in regard to another and similar measure. If there was any rule of the Senate that amendments of this kind should be germane to a resolution, that question would not apply to my proposed amendment; but there is no such rule of the Senate.

From the time I have been a member of this body it has always been the practice both upon bills and resolutions to offer amendments and have them acted upon, without regard to the fact whether or not they were germane to the original proposition. It seems to me that the Senate certainly can not retrace its steps in a matter of this kind without violating all of its traditions.

I am certain that the parliamentarians upon the other side of the Chamber will agree with me that there is nothing in the point suggested by the Senator from Texas. It is not strange, perhaps, that that Senator, fresh from another body which has a rigid rule upon this subject, should have thought it necessary to raise the point of order; but I am sure, if he had studied the rules and practices of the Senate he would not have made this point. I hope that this question at least may be determined without a division.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits the question to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to say one word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, from the standpoint of one of the conferees, I propose to be silent as to what the Senate may do in the way of direction or may do in respect to the subject-matter under their control, but I have some interest in maintaining something like a decent respect for the principles upon which the rules of this body are based.

The reason why, upon the objection of one Senator, a resolution introduced this morning shall go over one day, is that every Senator may have an opportunity to look at it, to examine it, to see what it means, and what effect it will have. It goes over one day on the objection; and having given that day for examination and arriving at a conclusion as to what it will accomplish, the resolution comes up as a matter of right the next morning. Suppose it does, as in this case, and a resolution upon a totally different subject, having no earthly connection or relation with the subject-matter of the resolution as originally drafted, is offered as a substitute, it is in the nature of a new proposition that the Senate has had no hour, no day to investigate and determine whether the resolution is right or wrong. The same reason why the original resolution should go over one day upon the objection of a Senator would apply with exactly the same and equal force to a substitute upon a totally different subject and declaring totally different ideas.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me?

Mr. HARRIS. I always allow the Senator, and generally differ with him after allowing him. [Laughter.]

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator is generally wrong when he differs from me.

Mr. HARRIS. So the Senator would say.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the distinguished Senator the question, would not the rule for which he has just contended place it in the power of any one Senator on this floor to indefinitely postpone the consideration of a resolution?

Mr. HARRIS. By no means.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Why not? By offering a substitute such as the Senator contends this is, something not pertinent, under the contention of the Senator it would have to go over each day and every time it is offered.

Mr. HARRIS. A resolution upon a totally different subject, which is to all intents and purposes a different and a distinct resolution, having no relation whatever to a pending proposition, should be treated as a new and a distinct resolution, and the Senator would have his day in court upon such a resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And any other Senator might come in the next day and offer another substitute. In my opinion, the effect would be to place it in the power of any one Senator on the floor to indefinitely postpone the consideration of the original resolution.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the objection made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is rarely made in the Senate. It has been so well understood that such an objection would not lie that I do not myself remember to have ever heard it made.

It is understood in this body that the custom prevailing in the House of Representatives by virtue of a rule, and not by virtue of general parliamentary law, does not exist in this body and never did; and the Senator is in error when he says it is the general parliamentary law that an amendment must be germane. I will venture to say he can not find an authority on this subject which will sustain him. I have before me Jefferson's Manual, which is recognized in this country at least as authority, and speaking of the general parliamentary law it says:

Amendments may be made so as totally to alter the nature of the proposition; and it is a way of getting rid of a proposition by making it bear a sense different from what it was intended by the movers, so that they vote against it themselves. (2 Hats., 79; 4, 82, 84.) A new bill may be ingrafted, by way of amendment, on the words "Be it enacted," etc. (1 Grey, 190, 192.)

That is the rule of the British Parliament, and that is the rule here; and so strictly have they held to that rule in the British Parliament that where an amendment has been offered and adopted and another amendment offered absolutely inconsistent, it can not be held to be out of order, but must be voted down.

I may have, after some experience in the Senate, that that rule has never been adopted in this body, and it is not general parliamentary law. The general parliamentary law is as I have read. Until the Senate adopts a rule which will declare that all amendments must be germane, under the general parliamentary law amendments must be held to be in order whether germane or not. So the Senator is in error when he says that it is the general parliamentary law that amendments must be germane. If he will refer to Cushing, or to Gray, or to any parliamentary authority, he will find that that is not a correct statement.

I should dislike very much indeed to have the Chair rule differently here from what has been the practice of this body for the last one hundred years, and which, as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] has aptly said, would put it in the power of any one Senator, under just such conditions as these, to indefinitely postpone the proceeding upon a resolution. Every resolution and every bill which is entitled to come before the Senate, when it is before the body for consideration may be amended by striking out everything after the resolving or the enacting clause and inserting an entirely different resolution or bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, Mr. President; but if the Senator will permit me, when a motion is made to strike out an entire resolution and substitute a new one which relates to an entirely different subject, does not that resolution necessarily lie over under the rule which I shall read?

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no; not at all. There is no rule which says it shall lie over.

Mr. CULLOM. It is in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to the rule?

Mr. TELLER. I have read the rule, and I have it now before me. I have, however, no objection to the Senator reading the rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. Clause 2 of Rule XXVI reads:

2. All reports of committees and motions to discharge a committee from the consideration of a subject, and all subjects from which a committee shall be discharged, shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

The resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] was to discharge the Committee on Finance from the further consideration of Senate bill 2264. That was a given subject-matter. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] offered an amendment to discharge another committee from another and entirely different subject-matter in a separate and independent bill. That makes it a new motion practically.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator from Missouri rather misunderstands the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island; but if the Senator were correct, if a bill were before the Senate and I should move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert another bill, some Senator might rise and say that it was requisite that it should have a first and second reading before it could be brought before the Senate. Nobody contends that.

Mr. COCKRELL. That does not apply. Here is a resolution referring to a particular subject, Senate bill 2264. That is one independent matter. Here is a motion to substitute for that an entirely independent proposition, to discharge another committee from another and an entirely different bill. I admit much that the Senator says in regard to the latitude of amendment, but here is an entirely different bill. It is not substituting a new bill, but it is substituting a new matter, a new subject entirely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Calendar under Rule IX is in order. The first case on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from Colorado may have unanimous consent to finish his remarks upon the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. FAULKNER. I object.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know that I care to continue.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not desire to be discourteous to the Senator from Colorado, but if the resolution goes over, as it necessarily will, I have no doubt the Senator would prefer to finish his remarks when the resolution is properly before the Senate. I therefore object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senator from Colorado may conclude his remarks.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COCKRELL. In view of the fact that there are exceedingly important executive matters which must be acted on, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, August 11, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 10, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. W. E. PARSON, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Journal as read will be approved.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Before that is done I desire to make a remark. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] is not present; and as the approval of the Journal in the form in which I understood it as it was read would result in a decision by the Speaker of the House which in my judgment ought perhaps to be reconsidered, or which at least should not be accomplished inadvertently, I want to bring the matter to the attention of the Chair and the House. I have no partisan feeling with reference to the question.

The gentleman from Maine yesterday, in addressing the House upon a question of personal privilege, made some remarks in regard to the Secretary of State which were possibly unparliamentary, if it be held that criticism of a Cabinet officer can not be made by a member of the House. The Journal shows that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] called the gentleman from Maine to order, and thereupon the Speaker made a ruling. I will thank him if he will give me the exact language.

The SPEAKER (reading from the Journal):

Mr. BOUTELLE addressed the House—
When, being called to order by Mr. OUTHWAITE—
The SPEAKER held that Mr. BOUTELLE must confine his remarks to the question of privilege presented.
Mr. BOUTELLE continued his remarks.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, if that decision only means that the attack upon the Secretary of State was a deviation from the question of personal privilege, there can be no objection to that entry upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. Of course the Speaker did not intend to hold that the question was affected at all by the reference to a Cabinet minister. The Chair had no idea of that sort.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I have nothing further to suggest. I do not know what the parliamentary rule is—whether it is considered unparliamentary to assail a member of the Cabinet or not; and I do not care about having that question decided. I only want to have it appear that it was not decided.

The SPEAKER. The Chair certainly did not intend to decide any such question. If there be no objection, the Journal as read will be approved.

The Journal was approved.

WASHINGTON, ALEXANDRIA AND MOUNT VERNON ELECTRIC RAILWAY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 7006) to authorize the Washington, Alexandria and Mount Vernon Electric Railway Company to extend its line of road into and within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to ask concurrence in these amendments. They are material in their character, but they tend decidedly to improve the bill. I hope the House will listen to the amendments as read, and then I shall ask that they be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate, as appearing in the Senate proceedings (pages 9755-9758 of the RECORD) were read.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I will state substantially the changes proposed in this bill, which changes I am sure every member of the House will approve when he understands them. This bill, as passed by the House a short time ago, provided for a road beginning practically at the Seventh Street market, running on B street out around the White Lot, up Seventeenth street to E, and on E street to the Potomac River, it being proposed to cross the river on a ferry at the intersection of E with New Hampshire avenue. The bill also proposed the construction of a spur, beginning at the intersection of B and Fifteenth streets, running up Fifteenth street to Pennsylvania avenue, by the Randall Hotel. The bill also proposed a branch to run from the intersection of B and Fourteenth streets, down Fourteenth street over the tracks of the Belt Line Railroad, to a point near the foot of the Long Bridge.

The Senate has eliminated all that part of the route which would carry the road on B street around the White Lot, up Seventeenth street, and across the river at the upper ferriage. That has all been wiped out. The bill, as now presented with the Senate amendments, contemplates a route from the initial point near the market up B street to Thirteen-and-a-half street, thence north on Thirteen-and-a-half street to the avenue, thence west on E street, in front of the power-house of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, to Fourteenth street, there intersecting the Belt Line tracks, and following those tracks south to the Long Bridge.

This route would require no new track except from Ninth street to Thirteen-and-a-half street, and on Thirteen-and-a-half street from B North to E street, at the corner of the power house of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, and then one block west to the intersection with the Belt Line road. This route would be very much more direct. It would eliminate that part over which there was contention both in the committee and in the House. It would appropriate only a few squares of streets not now occupied by street-car tracks—adopting as it does the line now on B street and the Belt Line on Fourteenth street. As will be seen, this is a more direct route with smaller appropriation of new streets.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HEARD. Does my friend from New Hampshire rise to ask a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I wish to ask if it would not be entirely satisfactory to the gentleman from Missouri, as the changes made by the Senate in the House bill are very material, to have the bill as it passed the Senate printed in the usual form, and let the matter go over until to-morrow without prejudice?

Mr. HEARD. I would say to my friend from New Hampshire that I have no objection in the world to that, excepting that it is just that much further delay at a time when we can not very well afford much delay. The bill as proposed to-day is printed by the Senate. The amendments of the Senate are printed already in the bill.

Mr. COOMBS. I have been unable to find the bill with the printed amendments.

Mr. HEARD. If my friend had made inquiry at the Clerk's desk he would have found the bill there as it comes from the Senate.

Mr. COOMBS. Not the House bill with the Senate amendments printed. The Senate amendments are there.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is a very important bill, and we ought to be able to see the Senate amendments in connection with the House bill.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to finish my statement first, and then if any gentleman wishes to insist that the bill shall go over I will make no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. These amendments have all been printed in the RECORD already.

Mr. HEARD. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In yesterday morning's RECORD. The amendments are also printed by the Senate.

Mr. COOMBS. Not in a way that makes them intelligible in connection with the House bill.

Mr. HEARD. I am sure my friend from New York, if he understands the amendments, will not insist upon delay at this stage of the session, when it is very desirable to progress with the business, and since there is not a single new feature in the bill, and as the Senate amendments eliminate the part of the original course, about which there was some contention in the House, I do not think there is a single member present who would not approve of the changes proposed by the Senate bill. So believing, I therefore desire to move concurrence in the Senate amendments; but if anybody insists that the bill shall go over, with a view to examining these amendments in connection with the House bill, I shall not oppose the request.

Mr. HULL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

Mr. HEARD. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. Do not the Senate amendments eliminate that portion of the House bill which prohibits freight cars to run over the road?

Mr. HEARD. They do.

Mr. HULL. Do they not also eliminate that portion of the House bill as to permitting the use of steam in the locomotives?

Mr. HEARD. Yes, sir.

I will say to my friend from Iowa perhaps I misunderstood his question. As the bill passed the House it authorized some light freight to be carried over the line of the road, but the Senate bill eliminates that provision, and confines it exclusively to passenger traffic. The further prohibition on the part of the House as to the use of steam on the road, is preserved in the bill as amended by the Senate.

Mr. HULL. It seems to me it would be better to let the bill be printed in the usual form with the Senate amendments.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is already published in the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I could not find it.

Mr. HULL. I think it had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The amendments will be found on page 9755 of the RECORD.

Mr. HEARD. In view of the application of my colleagues on the committee, Mr. HULL, and of other gentlemen, I will withdraw the motion to concur in the Senate amendments, and now request that the bill be permitted to remain on the table; that it be printed with the Senate amendments in italics, and I give notice that I will call it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The request is that the bill be printed also?

Mr. HEARD. It is already printed,

Mr. DINGLEY. But it ought to be printed in bill form, with the amendments numbered.

Mr. HEARD. I will say that I am advised by the gentleman from Tennessee that it has already been printed in full in yesterday's RECORD.

Mr. DINGLEY. But not in the form that makes it available for comparison. It ought to be printed in the usual bill form with the Senate amendments numbered.

Mr. HEARD. As I have just said I have no objection to that. I ask that the bill be printed, giving in italics the amendments proposed in the Senate.

Mr. COOMBS. That is right.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, that is only a multiplication of expense. The bill has already been printed and is accessible to anybody who wishes to examine it with the amendments.

Mr. HEARD. It has already been printed in the RECORD, as I have said.

Mr. COOMBS. Has the gentleman from Tennessee any objection to having the bill printed in the usual form?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. My only objection is the unnecessary expense it entails.

Mr. HEARD. I hope my colleauge will not object. It will only make a delay of one day.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am objecting to the expense of printing.

Mr. COOMBS. Oh, that comes with very bad grace.

Mr. HEARD. I agree with my friend from Tennessee in opposing the bill as presented, but he and I have had an opportunity of examining the matter and understand these provisions. Other members may not have had the opportunity. I think there is no reasonable objection to letting the bill be printed and go over. Let it be printed with the amendments of the Senate in the usual form. I submit that request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that there be a print of this bill with the Senate amendments, as proposed, in italics, and that it lie on the table for the present, to be called up at some subsequent date. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, these amendments are not material, and I ask that the House concur.

NORTHERN MISSISSIPPI RAILWAY COMPANY.

The Speaker laid before the House the bill (S. 2107) granting to the Northern Mississippi Railway Company right of way through certain Indian reservations in Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the Northern Mississippi Railway Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota, and its assigns, the right of way for the extension of its railroad through the Leech Lake Indian, Chippewa Indian, and Winnebagoshish Indian Reservations, in the State of Minnesota; such right of way to be 50 feet in width on each side of the center line of said railroad; and said company shall also have the right to take from the land adjacent to the line of said road materials, stone, and earth necessary for the construction of said railroad; also ground adjacent to such right of way for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, not to exceed in amount 200 feet in width and 3,000 feet in length for each station, to the extent of one station for every 10 miles of road constructed within the limits of said reservations: Provided, That no part of such lands herein granted shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as are necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad line, and when any portion thereof shall cease to be used such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall be taken.

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to fix the amount of compensation to be paid to the Indians for such right of way and provide the time and manner for the payments thereof; and also to ascertain and fix the amount to be paid to individual members of the tribe for damages, if any, by them sustained by reason of the construction of said road. But no right of way of any kind shall vest in said railway company in or to any part of the right of way herein provided for until plats thereof, made upon actual survey for the definite location of such railroad, and including the grounds for station houses, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and until the compensation aforesaid shall have been fixed and paid, and the consent of the Indians on such reservations, as to the amount of said compensation and right of way, shall have been first obtained in a manner satisfactory to the President of the United States. Said company is hereby authorized to enter upon said reservations for the purpose of surveying and locating its lines of railroad, provided that said line of railroad shall be located, constructed, and operated with due regard to the rights of the Indians, and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. That the rights herein granted shall be forfeited by said company unless the road is constructed through said reservations within three years.

SEC. 4. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, alter, or repeal this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAWNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that the House bill on the same subject lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill on the same subject will lie on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HARMER, for three days, on account of sickness.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I present the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. ENLOE. I desire to raise the question of consideration on that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill on which the conference report is made.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee raises the question of consideration against this report. The question is, Will the House consider the conference report?

The question was taken, and the House decided to consider the conference report.

Mr. ENLOE. I think we ought to consider bills on the Private Calendar, but as nobody else seems to think so it is not worth while to press the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement.

The statement was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the sundry civil appropriation bill submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report on each of the amendments of the Senate, namely:

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
JOS. H. O'NEIL,
WM. COGSWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. M. COCKRELL,
A. P. GORMAN,
W. B. ALLISON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, if the House will give me its attention I will make a brief statement as to the present status of this bill. The Senate by its amendments increased the bill $3,707,882.40. Of this sum the conference committee recommends that the Senate recede from $1,670,310.65, and that the House agree to $1,416,491.75. The amendments upon which the conference committee have been unable to agree involve $621,080. The total number of Senate amendments to the Senate on the sundry civil bill is 280. All of these have been settled by the conference report except 19. I will read them for the information of the House.

Amendment numbered 11, public buildings in new States, $100,000. Amendment 110, Ford's Theater disasater, $105,000. Amendment 111, North Carolina quarantine station, $25,000. Number 119, the Columbia River quarantine station, $40,000. Numbers 127 and 128, Senate electric light plant, $10,000 each. Numbers 133 and 134, electric light service in the Capitol. Numbers 141 and 142, selection of land in new States. Number 145, Grant and Hooker Counties surveys, $16,000. Amendment 148 is for soldier's homestead certificates. Amendment 238 is for dry dock at Puget Sound, $86,000. Amendment 261 is for Bureau of American Republics, $16,000; amendment 270, for law librarian, $2,080; amendment 277, for Government Printing Office, $10,000. Amendments 278 and 279 relate to the Atlanta Exposition and appropriate $200,000, and amendment 280 is with respect to arid lands, $1,000.

I will state for the further information of the House that the amendments 127 and 128, for Senate electric light plant, and amendments 133 and 134, electric light service in the Capitol, have only been formally disagreed to in order that the conferees may get the amendments into better shape. Amendments numbered 141 and 142, selection of lands in new States, and amendment 148, soldiers' homestead certificates, and amendment 280, arid lands, have been brought back to the House by the House conferees in order to enable gentlemen who represent States in which the arid lands are situated to consider the Senate amendments. They did not have an opportunity to do so when the bill was first reported to the House.

Mr. PICKLER. I understand there is no serious objections with the conferees.

Mr. SAYERS. There is none.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. On amendment 142 I will state that when it passed the House it passed only for the State of Washington.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. But at the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri I redrafted the amendment and inserted the other new States, so that it would apply to them.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well. I intend to bring the matter before the House.

Mr. DUNN. Is this the bill that contains the provision for the purchase of the Mahone site?

Mr. SAYERS. It is.

Mr. DUNN. Did the committee agree to that?

Mr. SAYERS. They did not. Now, Mr. Speaker, before proceeding further I ask for a vote on the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. This is a report of a partial agreement, and the gentleman from Texas moves that it be adopted.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman about amendment 107. At the end of that amendment I find this language: "And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby required to fix a reasonable price to be paid the natives of said islands for blue fox skins secured by them."

I want to know what that means, and who is going to have these fox skins?

Mr. SAYERS. The Government has been supporting those Indians ever since the United States purchased Alaska, and——

Mr. HAUGEN. I know; but have we received anything in return for that support, in the form of furs or otherwise?

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir. Ever since the treaty between Russia and the United States for the transfer of Alaska the Government has been supporting these Indians——

Mr. HAUGEN. I understand the general purport of the amendment; but what does this provision in regard to "blue fox skins" mean? What do we do with the fox skins after we receive them?

Mr. COGSWELL. We do not have anything to do with them. We do not receive them. That is only a provision to fix the price.

Mr. SAYERS. It is intended to enable the Government to prevent the Indians from being overreached by speculators and traders.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then the Government does not purchase the fox skins?

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all. This is merely to fix the price, in the interest of the Indians.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. As I understand the gentleman from Texas, his proposition is, first, that we ratify the agreements thus far made by the conferees.

Mr. SAYERS. It is.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. And secondly, that we adhere to our disagreement upon the other items.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; I will make that motion later.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. And also that certain matters are to be left to be discussed in the House, so as to get an expression of the sense of the House.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. I wish to ask the gentleman about amendment 194, in regard to the militia.

Mr. SAYERS. Under the ruling of the present Comptroller of the Treasury it is thought that the permanent appropriation which has been made by Congress will lapse into the Treasury. That is to say, that an appropriation of the money would have to be made every year. This contains no new language, gives no additional authority to the militia, does not increase the appropriation, but only fixes the amount of $400,000 as it has existed for many years, I believe ever since the Forty-ninth Congress. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief statement in regard to one item in this bill.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is an item in this sundry civil bill which was introduced as an amendment in the Senate by the senior Senator from my State, Mr. CAMERON, appropriating an additional $20,000 for the post-office at Chester, Pa., and which passed the Senate. When the bill went into conference I took the trouble to write to the chairman of the Senate conferees, asking to be heard for ten minutes before the conference committee on the subject of this amendment. I was referred by him to the chairman of the House conferees, and he referred me back to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], the chairman of the Senate conferees.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman ought to state further that I told him that we would meet that evening at 8 o'clock, and that, as the chairman of the Senate conferees had control of the conference for all such purposes, I referred the gentleman to him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. He referred me in writing back to you, and you referred me to him again, and the consequence was that I did not have a hearing before the conference committee in regard to this matter. I merely want to put the responsibility where it belongs, and to call attention to the fact that the recession from this amendment is on the part of the Senate, as stated by the gentleman from Texas and the other members of the committee of conference. The item embodied in the amendment was one recommended by the present Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and it went through the Senate, and I can not understand why it was not adopted in conference. The reason assigned is that the Senate by its conferees receded from its own amendment. The city of Chester, through which gentlemen pass as they go North, is a city which contains more wealth and more manufactures than are to be found in the whole district of the distinguished gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SAYERS. There is nothing in this bill for the district which I represent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. No; but I make that remark to show the propriety of the Senate amendment, and I want to have it distinctly understood that I could not get a hearing before the committee of conference; indeed it was with difficulty that I could find out where they met. It was as much as I could do to find out where they met.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to the gentleman that there is not a dime, not a penny, in this bill for my district.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. But the State of Texas, as I said the other day when I was on the floor, has appropriations of $175,000, $150,000, and $110,000 for towns the aggregate of whose population will not exceed the population of the city of Chester. I want merely to be on record in this matter, and to place the responsibility where it belongs.

Mr. COGSWELL. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBINSON] is not criticising the House conferees for persuading the Senate conferees to recede on this matter and thereby put themselves in accord with the House. I supposed that was our duty. The instructions of the House to its conferees were practically that we should, without putting the bill in peril, persuade the Senate conferees to recede from as many of these amendments as possible. The Senate has receded from this amendment.

My associate on the conference committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], does not need any word from me in answer to the unfair reflection which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made about appropriations for Texas. This bill was made up, so far as this conference is concerned, in a way that does not invite any such unkind reflections upon the gentleman from Texas as those which have fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] need not attempt to defend the gentleman from Texas from any imputation that he may suppose I have made upon that gentleman. I am not casting any imputation upon him or upon his State. I am simply making a comparison, and putting my statement on record for the purpose of placing the responsibility where it belongs for the recession from this item.

Mr. SAYERS. If it will be pleasant to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to know, I will say to him that if he will give us a few years longer, Texas will have some cities as large as Chester.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly; and I shall be very glad to see her have them. I am not making any imputation upon the gentleman or his State.

Mr. PICKLER. As I understand, amendment 237 in regard to naval cadets has been agreed to.

Mr. COGSWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. That amendment seems to reënact the provision which we passed here a few weeks ago on the naval appropriation bill. I do not understand the object. I feel a direct interest in that item.

Mr. SAYERS. The naval bill, which has become law, provides under the ruling of the Secretary of the Navy for the appointment of more than three hundred additional cadets. The clause to which we have agreed on the pending bill was put on to correct that provision, so that it might meet the evident wish of the House. It is merely a correction of erroneous language in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. PICKLER. We want the cadets that we are entitled to. I want that understood.

Mr. SAYERS. But you will not secure them if the clause proposed as an amendment to this bill does not pass.

Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question on the adoption of this report.

The question being taken, the report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman desires a separate vote, I will ask that the House insist upon its disagreement to the following amendments: Amendment No. 11, in relation to public buildings in the new States; amendment No. 110, relating to the Ford's Theater disaster; amendment No. 118, with regard to the North Carolina quarantine station; amendment 119, in reference to the Columbia River quarantine station; amendments Nos. 127 and 8, in reference to the Senate electric-light plant; amendments 133 and 4, relating to the electric-light service in the Capitol; amendment 145, with regard to resurvey of Grant and Hooker Counties, Nebr.; amendment No. 238, in regard to dry dock at Puget Sound; amendment No. 261, relating to the Bureau of American Republics; amendment 270, in regard to the law librarian; amendments Nos. 278 and 9, relating to the Atlanta exposition.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in reference to amendments 278 and 279, providing an appropriation for the Atlanta exposition the gentleman proposes, as I understand, that the House further insist on its disagreement.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Before that is done, the House, in my judgment, should consider that item.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well. Then, Mr. Speaker, I except that item from the amendments to be voted on in gross, and will reserve it to be considered separately.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will not ask that.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I wish to say—and I should be glad if the gentleman from Texas would yield to me——

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly; how much time?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I desire to occupy a very little time, and only because the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has expressed the hope that I will not call for separate consideration and vote upon this amendment. I want to say that I am inclined to call for a separate vote, and for this reason: I was a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Georgia being its chairman, that investigated the matter touching the Atlanta Exposition, and after two or three weeks of investigation we prepared a bill with very great care, which was reported to the House by a majority vote of the Committee on Appropriations on the 4th day of June last and went upon the Calendar, where it has slept from that date to the present time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of that bill. It is properly guarded, in my judgment; the rights and duties of the Government are clearly defined, and I would have been glad if it could have been called up by some special rule, or otherwise, and considered in the House. That, however, has not been done.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Right there will the gentleman allow me to say that the very bill to which he refers is now on the Speaker's desk and ready to be taken up. The Senate saw fit simply to put a provision on the sundry civil bill making the appropriation. Then they passed a bill through the Senate, which is now on the Speaker's table, and will be laid before the House to-morrow, which contains the details to which the gentleman from Illinois refers.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, in that condition the Senate passed on these two amendments that for the first time I have read this morning. They are entirely different, I am inclined to think from my examination of the bill reported, and in my judgment these amendments should not be agreed to by the House conferees until they have been discussed and considered by the House fully; because, it seems to me, that it has either got too much or too little in it. There are many provisions left out; unless the sweeping provision that would seem to adopt the World's Fair legislation at Chicago almost in its entirety, by reference, is in it. If so it is too large; otherwise——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It only adopts the sixteenth section of that act.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think it is very much broader than that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It can not be; and if it did it is not, in my opinion, in many respects broad enough.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, in my judgment, good legislation and the interest behind it will be served, and correct and proper action arrived at, if the amendment is considered by the House, so that there may be, after such consideration, a proper instruction to the conferees on the part of the House. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, now, or at some proper time, before the bill goes back to the conferees for consideration, this matter should come before the House, so that instructions may be given to the conferees in regard to it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SAYERS. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire desire time?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I only wish to ask a question.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I find in the list of amendments the amendment of the Senate, No. 110, relative to the payment to the victims of the Ford's Theater disaster. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Texas what objection there is to the Senate amendment?

Mr. SAYERS. I have no hesitancy, Mr. Speaker, in saying to the gentleman from New Hampshire that I have found, on a casual examination—as one reason for the objection—that one of these men, indicated as a sufferer by the Ford's Theater disaster, if Congress should adopt the policy of insuring the lives of those in its employ, would not be entitled to relief.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Why? Who is he?

Mr. SAYERS. So in my judgment this appropriation should not be made until the House of Representatives has had an opportunity to pass upon the measure separate and distinct from an appropriation bill.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I will suggest to the gentleman that there can be no shadow of doubt that the death of the individuals was through the fault of the Government officers.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, that is the question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I think, if the gentleman from Texas had been in the city as I was at the time this disaster happened, and saw the suffering of the people in consequence of it, he would have raised no objection of a technical character, and I suggest, if there is one to whom there is possible objection on the list of sufferers, that can be remedied by striking out the name.

Mr. SAYERS. When we get into conference, I will state to the gentleman, we will consider the question fully in all of its details.

Mr. COGSWELL. Let us have a vote, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Before the gentleman from Texas submits his motion, I understand that a separate vote will be made to consider the amendments to which I have referred; that is, with reference to the Atlanta Exposition. I do not press the consideration now, unless it is agreeable to the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say to the gentleman, with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that if he intends to press the matter he ought to do it now.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It was my purpose to ask a separate vote on that amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well. I will not include that amendment in the motion I am going to make.

Mr. COGSWELL. Let us have a vote on the other amendments.

Mr. SAYERS. I send up the motion I wish to make.

Mr. PICKLER. These are the items on which you still desire to disagree?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Texas will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments numbered 11, 110, 118, 119, 127, 128, 133, 134, 145, 238, 261, and 270.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the vote will be taken upon all the amendments embraced in the motion.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I ask the gentleman to except No. 110.

Mr. SAYERS. I hope the gentleman will let us have a vote on that also.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Very well; I withdraw the request.

The motion of Mr. SAYERS was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to call up amendments 278 and 279.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. On that, Mr. Speaker, I want to move——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The amendment 278 was read, as follows:

COTTON STATES AND INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT ATLANTA, GA.

Sec. 2. That for the expense of the selection, purchase, preparation, transportation, care, and return of articles and materials to comprise an exhibit illustrative of the functions of the Government of the United States, to be made at the Cotton States and International Exposition, to be held in the city of Atlanta, in the State of Georgia, in the year 1895, of which not exceeding $5,000 may be expended for clerical services, $150,000, to be disbursed by the board created by section 16 of the act approved April 25, 1890, entitled "An act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus, by holding an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and the products of the soil, mine, and sea, in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois;" and the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the said board are hereby extended to include the said exhibit at the Cotton States and International Exposition, under all the provisions of law which governed the Government exhibit at the World's Columbian Exposition: Provided, That the foregoing sum shall be apportioned among the several Departments, the Smithsonian Institution, and the Fish Commission, by the Secretary of the Treasury, and such apportionment shall be final and shall be so made by him as not to create a deficiency, and shall cover every expenditure on the part of the United States, including the return of said exhibits, except as hereinafter provided.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its disagreement.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman from Texas if the two amendments should really not be read, so that they may be considered together?

Mr. SAYERS. I think so.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. You have only had the first amendment read.

Mr. SAYERS. Let the next amendment also be read.

Amendment numbered 279 was read, as follows:

For taking down the Government main building erected for the Government exhibit at the World's Columbian Exposition, and its transportation, or so much of the material thereof as may be available, and its reerection upon the site selected for the said Cotton States and International Exposition, including the purchase of such new material as may be found necessary, $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That if it be found impracticable to take down, transport, and reërect said building for the sum herein appropriated, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause a new building to be erected upon said site of the Cotton States and International Exposition for the Government exhibit, at a cost not to exceed $50,000, for which purpose the amount herein appropriated is hereby made available: Provided further, That the United States shall not be in any manner responsible for the conduct or management of said exhibition, nor shall it be liable in any manner for any sum on account of the erection of any buildings for the Cotton States and International Exposition, or for the expenses of the officers or employés thereof, or for any expenses incident to or growing out of said exposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to further insist upon the disagreement to these amendments.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I believe that the House should further insist on its disagreement; but I am desirous, if I can do so, to get the sense of the House as to what legislation should be had, if any, on this subject. My recollection is, that if the House should further vote to insist, under parliamentary usages, that then it would be in order to instruct the conferees covering the views of the House, or expressing the sense of the House upon the matter.

The SPEAKER. That would be in order.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That would be in order, but would not be in order until after the vote?

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order until after the vote.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have no objection to the House insisting on its disagreement, and then taking the sense of the House.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution:

That the House conferees are instructed to present to the Senate conferees the proposition to strike out Senate amendments numbered 278 and 279, and to agree in lieu thereof, in substance, to the provisions of House bill 7324, reported by the House Committee on Appropriations to the House on the 4th day of June last.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman send the bill to the Clerk?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House conferees are instructed to present to the Senate conferees the proposition to strike out Senate amendments numbered 278 and 279, and to agree in lieu thereof, in substance, to the provisions of House bill 7324, reported by the House Committee on Appropriations to the House on the 4th day of June last.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard touching this motion. I suppose it would be proper, before I submit any remarks upon it, that the bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations on the 4th of June last should be read.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would ask the gentleman to read the bill that passed the Senate and is pending in the House. That covers the very point that the gentleman wants.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not care to complicate the Senate bill with this.

The bill can be read later on or now. I can probably state the substance of the bill so as perchance to dispense with its reading, unless the gentleman from Texas wants it read later on; and gentlemen can send to the document room and get House bill 7324, if they desire.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have been recognized, and will use no more time than I have to.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman yield back his time to me?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Some gentleman about me may want a little time; I do not know.

Mr. Speaker, on the 4th day of June last the Committee on Appropriations reported the bill (H. R. 7324) to the House, entitled "A bill to aid and encourage the holding of a cotton States and International Exposition at Atlanta, Ga., in the year 1895, and making appropriation therefor." This bill was reported as a substitute for a bill before that time introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] and referred to that committee. The bill that the gentleman from Georgia, if I recollect properly its provisions, first introduced, provided in round numbers for an appropriation of say half a million of dollars for this purpose; and provided also that the President of the United States should invite foreign peoples to participate in the exposition.

A subcommittee was appointed to consider that bill, of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] was chairman, and I had the honor to be one of the minority members. Committees from Atlanta appeared before us; hearings were had before the full committee and before the subcommittee, a portion of which are in print; and after full consideration this bill that I hold in my hand was agreed to by the majority of the subcommittee, and subsequently by the full Committee on Appropriations, and reported.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. How much money does it carry?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. LIVINGSTON (to Mr. CANNON of Illinois). I will accept your proposition, and let it go right through.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In a minute. We found that a company was organized to hold this exposition at Atlanta, that they had subscribed in good faith over $200,000 for that purpose, and after we had made full inquiry as to the estimates of receipts and expenditures, as to the grounds that they had and the improvements and the buildings thereon, we came to the conclusion that the Government might and could afford, in pursuance of its former policy, to make a Government exhibit at Atlanta.

But there we wanted to stop, so that, instead of $600,000, we recommended an appropriation of $200,000 for this purpose, and, recollecting the trouble that we had had with some expositions, notably the one at New Orleans, to which the Government had invited foreign countries and where it came in and footed the deficit because it felt in honor bound to do so, we struck out of the bill all authority on the part of the President of the United States to invite foreign nations to participate. So that the bill which I hold in my hand merely appropriates $200,000 for a Government exhibit at Atlanta, authorizes the removal of the Government building at Chicago provided it can be done for $50,000, provides that the Government shall have such portion of that building as it may desire for its exhibit, and that the remainder may be used for the exhibits at the exposition at Atlanta.

The bill provides further that all goods imported from foreign countries for the exposition may come in duty free. It expressly provides that the Government shall not be liable for one dollar above the amount appropriated, and it is carefully drawn so as to provide that the Government can not be, in honor or in any other way, bound to foot the deficit, if any deficit should result from this exposition. For some reason, I know not what, it has slept upon the Calendar from that time to this, and if we make this appropriation, I believe that the provisions so carefully guarded, reported from the Committee on Appropriations, should go in substance if not in hæc verba, into the sundry civil bill.

The Senate amendment—and I read it for the first time this morning, the House not having heretofore considered this matter—appropriates $200,000, and provides for the removal of the Government building in Chicago; but instead of creating a board for the Government exhibit it adopts the board that was in existence under the law for the World's Fair at Chicago. It goes further. I call attention to the language:

> And the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the said board are hereby extended to include the said exhibit at the Cotton States and International Exposition under all the provisions of the law which governed the exhibit at the World's Columbian Exposition.

Now, just how broad that adoption of all the provisions of law that governed the exposition at Chicago is I can not tell, but I apprehend that it is tolerably broad.

At least the drawer of this amendment thought it was broad enough to let foreign imports for exhibition come in free of duty, because the Senate amendment does not provide for that, and I think it is probable that it is broad enough to authorize the President to invite foreign countries to participate in the Atlanta Exposition. If so, and those peoples should accept, it commits the Government, in good faith and in honor, to the payment of the expenses if the Atlanta corporation should fail, as the Government was committed in the case of the New Orleans Exposition. Therefore I think the House did right when it insisted further on its disagreement to that amendment of the Senate, and I believe that the instruction which I had the honor to offer, to incorporate in substance the well-considered bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations, or at least to do what the House conferees can to that end, ought to be adopted.

Now, having said that much by way of explanation, I want the attention of the House for a very few minutes to the merits of the proposed appropriation. I ask it because, since I concurred with the majority of the Committee on Appropriations in reporting favorably this bill, I have been somewhat critised in some portions of the country, and I want to answer those criticisms here and now. I do not want to embarrass this bill. I am in good faith for it; but the proper place, as it seems to me, to answer these complaints is here, upon the consideration of this question.

One gentleman criticises my favoring the appropriation, saying that the State of Georgia made no exhibit at Chicago; that she had no State building there; that Georgia and South Carolina, of all the States in the Union, were the only two that had no exhibits at Chicago, and then goes on to say—I presume correctly, although I do not know the facts—that not only was there no Georgia building, that not only was there no exhibit of the State of Georgia, but that the total individual exhibits from the State of Georgia were five in number—two from negro colleges or schools, industrial exhibits; two from nursery and fruit men, and one of watermelons. [Laughter.] He queries why I, coming from Illinois, should favor this appropriation. Another questions the right under the Constitution to appropriate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the criticism: First, I believe that under the Constitution of the United States we have the right to make this exhibit, illustrating the progress of the United States, its wealth and resources. Many gentlemen have constitutional scruples on questions of this kind. I have not now, and never had. I had no constitutional scruples when I reported from the Committee on Appropriations the bill for the New Orleans project. I had none when I advocated the Government appropriation for Chicago; none when I voted for the exhibits (small although they were) at Louisville and at Cincinnati, and I have none now.

Whatever differences there may have been about the strict construction or liberal construction of the Constitution are behind us. In the last thirty years, on the battlefield, in the Senate, in the House, in the Executive Mansion, in every State of the Union, the Constitution of the United States has been construed; and it stands to-day an instrument adjustable according to the national necessities and bounded only by the needs of the whole nation.

Having said that much, this appropriation within that definition of our constitutional powers is justifiable——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Under the bill that the gentleman has spoken of, what is the amount which it is definitely ascertained the Government would have to pay?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. COX. Under this bill what would be the amount?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Under the proposition of the Senate?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It is probable, while the Senate amendment appropriates in terms only $200,000, it so adopts the provisions of the Chicago World's Fair legislation that the whole world may be invited; and under such general legislation we may incur such expenses that if the Atlanta exposition should fail to pay we may have to march up and pay half a million or a million dollars, as we did, according to my recollection, for New Orleans.

Mr. COX. Then the point of difference is that under the bill reported by the committee the amount to be expended by the Government is ascertained and definite, while under the amendment from the Senate it is uncertain.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes, sir; in my judgment it is uncertain.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman think that in a little while it might be well to have an exposition of this kind down at Nashville, Tenn., where we can exhibit almost everything? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If Nashville, if Tennessee and the adjacent States get ready, as no doubt they can if they undertake it, and make as large an appropriation as Atlanta has made, and make an equally good showing, I will say that if I happen to be a member of the House when such a proposition is presented I will vote to appropriate $200,000 to enable the United States to make an exhibit at Nashville.

Mr. COX. That is very clever on the part of the gentleman. And Nashville will be there just as soon as you give her a chance.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, let Nashville first give us a chance.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I would like to inquire whether it is the settled policy of this Government that one or two or three or four international exhibitions or fairs—so-called "international" exhibitions—shall be held every year and that Uncle Sam shall assist in footing the bills?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not think it is.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Do you not think it is a fraud to call such an exhibition as this "international," when everybody knows that the term "international" is simply an advertisement; that the exhibition will not be in fact international, although it is so designated in the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] (because his question is apt), that I do not agree in the view which he indicates. On inquiry I found that the Georgia corporation had made efforts which they reasonably expect to bear fruit, to have exhibits from many of the South American countries and from Mexico.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mexico has signified her intention to take part in the exhibition.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes, sir. But whether it is to be international or not, whenever a great railroad center full of an enterprising population like Atlanta goes to the trouble and expense of making the appropriation that she has made—a city with a country about her extending 500 miles in every direction except on the east, where the sea would not allow it to extend 500 miles—as rich in mineral and in other natural resources as that country is, awaiting development, awaiting information, I will, whenever any portion of the United States comes here under such circumstances, having made a similar appropriation, vote, if I am here, for an appropriation, so that the United States may participate in the exhibition by making an exhibit.

I want to say further, in justice to this Georgia corporation, that in the hearings before the full Committee on Appropriations and the subcommittee, great stress was laid upon the opportunity they were going to give (and which they asked us to assist them in giving by the means indicated) to the colored people to show what progress they have made since they were freed—on the farm, in the shop, in the school. And some as bright men, I think, as I ever saw—both white and colored—came before the committee and presented this question not only from the standpoint I have spoken of, the industrial standpoint of the whole country, but from the standpoint of giving the colored people a chance to show what they have wrought out in less than a generation since they came to rely upon themselves.

Now, one or two minutes more and I will not further take up the time of the House.

I think, Mr. Speaker, when I see about me here one of the heroes of Gettysburg (referring to Gen. SICKLES) as a member of this House; when I see before me my own colleagues from Illinois, Gen. BLACK and Col. MARSH, Gen. HENDERSON, and others, men yet full of vigor, who, with over two millions of other men in the Union Army, met that great flock of population known then as the Confederate States; and fought for four years the most desperate series of battles that the world ever saw, at the end of which the labor system of nearly one-half of the country was cut up by the roots, and men who had before worked under compulsion must work in the future from choice, or else starve or steal; when I reflect that the results of the contest were in part written in the Constitution of the United States, and nearly all of the States South, and a new public sentiment was created that is greater than constitutions; and when I see these men about me that participated in these great contests on both sides, I am filled with wonder and amazement that in less than one generation so much of the hatred and heartburnings engendered in that great civil struggle have been so soon wiped out and overcome, and that we have so nearly a reunited people in interest and in sentiment. [Applause.]

I do not believe that the annals of history anywhere show a parallel to this. Mr. Speaker, now when the late master and slave and their descendants strike hands and propose to exhibit their products at Atlanta and invite the people of the whole country and the world to come and see and bring their products with them and participate, it seems to me that the United States may well expend $200,000 in making a Government exhibit.

Mr. Speaker, that $200,000 will make a better Government exhibit than $800,000 would have made, were it not that many portions of the Government exhibit at Chicago are yet in being.

Now, having said this much, in conclusion I make a summary of the whole matter: I want us to see to it that this $200,000, with the Government building at Chicago thrown in—no more and no less—that that is the end of it; that with that aid and with that exhibit, and with a "God bless you" from the people of the United States let Atlanta and the cotton exhibition and the people contiguous to Atlanta work out their own salvation. [Applause.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the gentleman from Illinois takes his seat will he permit a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understood the gentleman from Illinois, in referring to the language of the Senate amendment, to say that the act relating to the World's Columbian Exposition had been accommodated and made in some respects to apply to this exposition; and that his judgment was that it would admit, or it had been claimed that it would admit, foreign exhibits free of duty, at least that such a construction had been given to it. Am I correct in understanding the gentleman in that way?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not know what construction may be given to it, but the Senate amendment goes very far. In my opinion it was intended to do so because it does not provide for the admission free of duty, and I am inclined to think the Senate amendment is so broad that it adopts all of the provisions of the Chicago World's Fair legislation in that regard.

Mr. DINGLEY. I was about to say if it goes as far as that, necessarily it extends all of the provisions of the World's Columbian act to this exposition. But I did not suppose the language could be construed to go so far. I supposed it was confined simply to the powers and duties to be exercised by the board that was created by that act with reference to the Government exhibit, and affected nothing else. But if it goes as far as the gentleman suggests, I do not see why the act is not completely extended to this exposition in all of its provisions.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It seems to me that there ought to be no question about that. And I know our committee, of of which the gentleman is a member, carefully provided for a board to consider the question from every standpoint. Therefore my instruction proposes that in substance that bill shall be proposed to the Senate conferees.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question with his consent.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to state that he had no constitutional scruples with regard to this proposition because it was so broad as to include all the Federal Union, and that as it was a measure for the general welfare, therefore he thought this appropriation was proper.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman has stated it better than I could.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask him if he understands this to be a national exposition? As I understand it, it is an exhibit of the "cotton States, and international exposition," and that in order to be a participant here it is necessary that the community that may participate shall be either a cotton State or a foreign nation. Is that correct?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let me reply to the gentleman, that we found on making inquiries of the Atlanta committee that appeared before us, and that has the keeping of this work, that they extended their invitation especially to the South American countries and to Mexico, and their invitation to every State and every considerable city of the whole country; and they expect, let me say to my friend further, that a considerable part of the exhibits that will make this exposition a success will come from what is known as the Northern States, on account of our greater industries.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon the proposition offered by the gentleman from Illinois be closed in twenty minutes, and the previous question considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee). The gentleman asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois be closed in twenty minutes, and that at that time the previous question be considered as ordered.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before that is asked, I make the suggestion as to the motion of instructions that has been offered by the gentleman from Illinois. It does not reach the primary question as to whether it is the desire of a majority of this House to aid this exposition. Now, it seems to me that the motion should include a substitute that is to be offered or may be offered to test the sense of the House as to whether it desires to aid any exposition.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to the gentleman that the House has already insisted upon its disagreement to this amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I know; but that is only formal. It does not reach the point where the conferees would consider it as an instruction. A mere formal disagreement like that is never accepted by the conferees as an instruction binding on them; and I ask whether or not a modification should not be had, which will cover any substitute, for the purpose of testing the question of whether a majority of the House desire to give any aid. I suppose this may be voted up or down, but that is only a question as to the method of doing it. It still leaves the Senate proposition, and the conferees may take the rejection of the motion to be an instruction to assent to the Senate proposition.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Maine to offer a modification.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not desire to offer an amendment, but several gentlemen have indicated a desire to have offered a substitute that will test the question.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will say to my friend, parliamentarily, it may be arrived at, as I understand it, by an amendment to the resolution which I offered, striking that resolution out and instructing the conferees to insist on the provisions going out—that it is the sense of the House that no appropriation should be made.

Mr. DINGLEY. That would reach it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The House can then vote upon the amendment to the resolution; and if that be voted down, it would register the feeling of the House that it should appropriate; and if the resolution were adopted, that the House scheme was a proper one.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I will accept the suggestion offered by the gentleman from Maine, and will amend my request and ask unanimous consent that all debate upon the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Illinois and any amended proposition to test the sense of the House as to the making of any appropriation whatever for this purpose be closed within twenty minutes, and that the previous question be considered as ordered on the proposition offered by the gentleman from Illinois and upon such amendment as may be offered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the proposition or motion of the gentleman from Illinois and any amendment that may be offered thereto be closed in twenty minutes, and that the previous question then be considered as operating upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois and such amendment as may be offered. Is there objection?

Mr. DURBOROW. I object.

Mr. MURRAY. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made by two gentlemen.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that all debate be closed on the pending amendment——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think that if the gentleman will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina time may be saved. (To Mr. MURRAY) How much time do you want?

Mr. MURRAY. About twenty minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. How much time does the gentleman from South Carolina want?

Mr. MURRAY. Twenty minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that all debate——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can give notice when he will move the previous question.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW] very kindly tells me that if I will consent to an hour for debate that he will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can give notice when he will demand the previous question.

Mr. SAYERS. Then I will yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a few remarks in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. I think this presents a favorable opportunity not only to the colored people of the United States, but to the white people as well, for a demonstration of their capacity and a vindication of some of the wrongs that have been perpetrated upon the colored citizens of this country.

The colored people are in favor of this Cotton States Exposition, because they are to be allowed an opportunity to exhibit the progress that they have made within the past thirty years. Thirty or forty years ago our ability to even learn to read and write, or to learn ordinary arithmetic, was doubted. There were those who denied that we were a part of the Adamic creation, and assigned as a reason that we could not vie with the other members of the human family in producing what they produced, in making what they made, or in doing anything except the lowest order of manual labor.

We have proven in almost every line that we are capable of doing what other people can do. We have proven that we can work as much and as well as other people. We have proven that we can learn as well as other people. We have proven that we can fight as well as other people, as was demonstrated in the late war. There are still, however, traducers and slanderers of our race who claim that we are not equal to others because we have failed to produce inventors: because, as they say, we have not contributed to the progress that has been made in the invention of useful implements and machinery.

Now, sir, we feel that if we are allowed the space provided for in this amendment, and are given a fair opportunity, we will demonstrate to the satisfaction of everybody that we have made and are capable of making almost anything that other people can make or have made. I hold in my hand a statement prepared by one of the assistants in the Patent Office, showing the inventions that have been made by colored men within the past few years.

It is intended to be a complete statement, yet I consider it incomplete, because the inventors are not always classified in the office according to race, as is shown in the case of one man in my own locality whom I know to be a colored man, but who is not down on the list.

This statement shows that colored men have taken out patents upon almost everything, from a cooking stove to a locomotive. Patents have been granted to colored men for inventions and improvements in the workshop, on the farm, in the factory, on the railroad, in the mine, in almost every department of labor, and some of the most important improvements that go to make up that great motive power of modern industrial machinery, the steam engine, have been produced by colored men.

Mr. Speaker, if we are permitted to have the opportunity proposed in this amendment, we will show to the satisfaction of the world that we are capable of producing nearly everything that other people can produce, and in doing so we will in a certain sense vindicate our white fellow-citizens, by showing that in spite of all that has been done to retard his progress, in spite of all the wrongs that he has suffered, the American negro has been able to accomplish more, has made more progress on the American continent, than the members of his race in any other part of the world. [Applause.]

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment will meet the approval of every member present. The colored people all over the United States are doing everything in their power to prepare to make such an exhibit as will do credit not only to themselves but to the United States. In all the townships, in all the churches, in all the schools throughout the length and breadth of this land, they are organizing for that purpose. They have entered into the matter full of enthusiasm, determined to make their exhibit all that it can be made, determined to help their white fellow citizens to make this great exposition what they desire to make it.

Mr. Speaker, there is another consideration involved in this matter about which I wish to say a word before I take my seat. I think that this exposition, to be managed and controlled by the white and colored people of the South combined, will bring about a better state of feeling between the two races. I feel that contact with the colored man of the South, I feel that a knowledge of his ability to manage affairs which will be there demonstrated, will tend to educate the white people of that section to appreciate the fact that the colored man is entitled to a share in the government of the country.

I feel that thinking white men will begin to consider whether it is just continuously to deprive the colored man of his right to participate in the Government. Mr. Speaker, the colored people of this country want an opportunity to show that the progress, that the civilization which is now admired the world over, that the civilization which is now leading the world, that the civilization which all the nations of the world look up to and imitate—the colored people, I say, want an opportunity to show that they, too, are part and parcel of that great civilization.

We want an opportunity to prove that this country is truly a cosmopolitan country, that it is neither a white man's country nor a black man's country, but a country to the building up of which all American citizens have alike contributed, whether by effort of muscle or of brain. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I ask the liberty of appending to my remarks the statistics to which I referred.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS].

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have an opportunity to express my most hearty approval of the suggested participation on the part of Government in the Atlanta Exposition; and shall briefly state my reasons for favoring it.

It has been urged in opposition, that it is a local affair, and one in which only a limited portion of the country has an especial interest.

I do not so regard it, but look upon it as an enterprise which will have a beneficial effect upon the whole country. The interests of each section are so linked to the prosperity of all that we can not truthfully call anything that deeply effects the interest of any section a local one.

The South before the war and immediately after its conclusion had a comparatively limited field of agriculture. By limited I mean limited in variety; her commerce was, for the same reason, limited in its scope. It has only been in recent years that she has widened the field of her enterprises and discovered the richness and variety of her mineral and manufacturing resources. These are still not half understood or appreciated, and so far have not inspired the confidence that they are entitled to.

At this proposed exposition they will be able to compare their products with one another and with those of the outside world. Will be able to judge of the advances that they have made, and will, I am sure, be encouraged to undertake larger enterprises. The days of crude speculations are over, and the era of legitimate development has begun. It can not be denied that there has existed and still does exist in many sections of the South a narrow prejudice against the more commercial sections of the country. Nothing will remove these narrow views more quickly than an invasion of commerce and manufactures.

Commerce is a great educator; out of its conflicts comes a broader intelligence and a more tolerant spirit. I believe that this enterprise will largely increase the variety of the commerce and manufactures of the South and demonstrate the fact that we are not as poor as demagogues try to make us believe that we are. It will deprive agitators of half their political capital and help stamp out many of the financial and economic heresies that threaten the stability of the Government by promoting a more perfect unity of interests.

Any money spent by the Government toward accomplishing this purpose is wisely spent. If instead of the tacit antagonism toward the commercial centers that now exists, a better understanding can be reached through a community of interests the whole country will profit by it.

I do not look with any disfavor upon the possibility of some of the trade of our neighbors in the republics south of us being diverted from my own city to Southern cities. I would like to have them acquire a knowledge of and a taste for foreign commerce, to feel that they have a direct interest in its extension, and assist us in obtaining from our Government a more efficient consular service.

There is another reason, which was impressed upon me more powerfully than I ever had it impressed before, by the addresses of the two colored bishops who appeared before the Committee on Appropriations. Up to that time I had no idea of the advances which have been made by the colored race.

I had always looked upon it as almost exclusively devoted to agriculture, but found that they were largely employed in factories and were steady and reliable workmen, and that they have an ambition to improve themselves by study and practice in technical schools. The exhibits from some of these schools will be made at the fair. If these statements are correct, and I have no reason to doubt them, they furnish grounds for the hope that the race problem which has puzzled the country is in the way of settling itself.

Instead of being a hindrance to the prosperity of the South, they will furnish a body of workmen to be drawn upon for the development of the future enterprises of that section. It is proposed, as I understand, in this Atlanta Exposition, to have the colored people coöperate with the white men. They are not to be kept separate and distinct, but the two races are to act together. Anything that will induce them to act together and come to a mutual appreciation and understanding of one another's abilities and desires must be helpful to the whole Union.

I hope, sir, that in deciding this question Congress will be governed by a broad and liberal spirit. It is true that our national finances are at a low ebb, but we are not poor. We are a rich people; none other has such magnificent resources. Any temporary expenditure that serves to develop them is true economy. Any effort in the direction of giving our people an appreciation of the magnitude of our resources should be encouraged.

Anything that tends to obliterate sectional lines and promote a greater community of interests between the various parts of the nation is well worthy of the encouragement of this House.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SICKLES].

Mr. SICKLES. Mr. Speaker, the remarks of my colleague [Mr. COOMBS] and of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] have covered so completely the ground that I should have occupied that I have but little to add beyond the expression of my concurrence in what they have so well said. I would like to see, on the part of this House, in some appropriate form, an expression of concurrence in this proposition; and I would advise the friends of the measure to accept the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], because it so carefully guards the Government from any expenditure beyond the sum appropriated, while it recognizes the national obligation to promote these exhibitions of industry.

The cruel exigencies of war compelled the destruction of Atlanta and much of the adjacent country, and it is a glorious exhibition of the common fraternity of the American people now to erect on that very spot and in that center of Southern industry and enterprise temples devoted to the commemoration of the peace and prosperity of the whole country.

I shall vote for the appropriation with the greatest satisfaction.

Mr. SAYERS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL], or so much time as he may desire to occupy.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will vote that the Government of the United States shall take part in this proposed exposition at Atlanta; and if it so votes, I hope also that it will instruct its conferees on the sundry civil bill that the appropriation for the purpose may be made in the language of the bill which was reported by the Committee on Appropriations of the House, rather than in the language of the amendments proposed by the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, on the morning of the 3d day of September, 1864, as a member of the Federal Army, I marched into the city of Atlanta. It had been partially destroyed by the retreating Confederate forces under Gen. Hood. We occupied it until the 17th day of November following. At that time it had a population of but 10,000 inhabitants. During our occupancy of the city we sent north or south the people there residing, and made it a complete military post. On the 16th day of November Gen. Sherman's army withdrew from the region of country surrounding that city, and, as the commandant of the post of Atlanta, it became my duty to remain the night following with my command. The day and night following, and indeed for nearly the entire three days, ending on the morning of the 17th of November, the city was wholly destroyed for any military purposes and occupancy under the sad exigencies and necessities of war, and I left it a heap of smoldering ruins and of ashes.

Mr. Speaker, I returned to the city of Atlanta not many years ago, and I found that that city, which was then, when I last saw it, but a mound of ashes and ruins, had arisen from its fires, from its ashes, and from its sad condition, and had grown to be a magnificent city of 100,000 inhabitants, with all of the evidences of prosperity, of enterprise, of push, and of business exhibited by any other city on this continent. I found that from the narrow limits which formerly environed it, it had grown out 7 miles, and where we had surrounded the city with earthwork after earthwork, it had pushed its settlements, its dwelling houses, its factories, its workshops, and its places of business away beyond the old limits, and had so far obliterated the whole line of earthworks and the evidences war that I could hardly find one of the fields of the many where we had engaged in battle when we besieged the city.

I came back to see a typical American city, built upon the ruins and the ravages of war, in a contest in which its defenders had been defeated, and I was proud to see it capable so soon of renewing its old American spirit and putting itself in the front where the noble and enterprising citizens of Atlanta have put that beautiful "gate city" of the South.

Mr. Speaker, when the proposition came before me, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, whether in this enterprise, which contains all of the elements of success, we should take a part and have the Government exhibits displayed and help along the great exposition, I said to that people, "If I stand alone there is one voice and one vote that will give Atlanta any reasonable assistance from the General Government;" and so all hail to her in her grand and what I believe will be successful exposition. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following substitute for the motion of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the House be instructed not to agree to Senate amendments numbered 278 and 279 or to any proposition as a substitute therefor, making an appropriation for the Cotton States and International Exposition at Atlanta, Ga.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I shall consume the time of the House but a few moments in discussing the pending proposition.

I fully agree with what my colleague on the committee has said with reference to the beauty and the enterprise as well as the magnificence of that great city in which it is proposed to hold this exposition. But what I wish to say is that we can not expect the United States to hold a successful great international exposition every year. Coming so soon after the World's Fair at Chicago, which was in truth an international exposition, we can not expect this to be any more than a local affair; and as a member of the majority party of this House, that party which is responsible for the appropriations of this Congress, I want to say, for one, that I am not willing to issue interest-bearing bonds for the people to pay in order that the Government should go into the show business now or hereafter. [Applause.]

I know you always find members on this floor, and especially on the other side of the House, who are always ready and willing for the Government to help forward anything that needs help. But when it is remembered that whatever help is furnished to this exposition must come from the taxes levied upon the people, if we shall but for a moment reflect upon the condition of the people's treasury at this time, I am inclined to think we will not hesitate to vote down any proposition to commit the Government to this exposition.

It is true that it is only proposed to appropriate $200,000. And I believe they claim that is all they want. But we know from sad experience, in more than one instance, that when the Government is once committed to this exposition it may expect hereafter to be called upon for additional aid.

Now, I am perfectly willing that Atlanta, if she will only wait one hundred years, may have the next international exposition. But if we grant this request to Atlanta now, next year, or in two years from now, you can not refuse the same request if made by Denver, Omaha, San Francisco, or some other great Western city, claiming, as they will, that that great section of the country has never received any aid from the National Government for such purpose.

It is simply ridiculous to compare this proposed exposition with the great World's Fair held in Chicago. You can not have these every year. As I have said, it is only a local affair, and I am opposed to this appropriation.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, in the one minute allowed me I desire to say that I believe in the doctrine that public money should be appropriated for public purposes; and I do not concede that this exposition comes within the purview of this wholesome doctrine. I voted against the $1,300,000 for the New Orleans Exposition; I opposed giving $2,500,000 to the Chicago Exposition; and in the balance of the minute remaining I want to say that I shall vote against this appropriation.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, if this proposition embodied a plan by which we should give anything to the corporation having it in charge, as the proposition did against which the gentleman from Missouri voted—and I voted with him—I would oppose it. As I recollect it, the money given the New Orleans Exposition, against which he voted, was also a gift to the corporation having it in charge. I would have voted with him against it; but this proposition is not a gift. This is a proposition to make an exhibit there, just as the United States Government made an exhibit at Chicago, at an expense of more than $1,500,000. To the extent of making an exhibit I shall heartily favor this appropriation.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the expense of making an exhibit of the Government's work is for a public purpose when, as in this case, the exposition is national in its scope and interest. The city of Atlanta is 750 miles from Washington, and the people of that section are not able to see the Government's agencies at work. It is, I believe, the first time that any great exposition of this kind has been attempted in that city or in that section; and I think it is money well spent to show to the people who will gather there, and people who can not come here, some of the work of the Government of the United States. We have done it in other places; we have done it on many former occasions; and to the extent of exhibiting the Government work, I believe that it is a Government purpose and does good.

I am glad this exposition is to be held in the city of Atlanta. That is the city that took the lead in building up the New South; and I am glad that the people of the North are to have an opportunity to go down there and see the city and the people. I am glad they will have an opportunity to see the statue erected by admiring friends to the memory of the leader of the movement in favor of the New South, Henry W. Grady. It will do them good to read the inscription on that monument—the words of the great orator that the country's security is to be found not in her army, but in her contented and happy citizens. It will be worth something as a patriotic lesson.

I was surprised at the growth and prosperity of Atlanta. It will do our people good to mingle with the people of the Southland; to march again from "Atlanta to the sea," and note the difference that a generation has wrought and become acquainted with people who make hospitality a business. I am glad that they are going to have an opportunity to exhibit the work of the freedmen in the last thirty years. This alone would justify the exposition. It will also bring us into closer trade relations with the Southern Republics, and ought to increase our commerce with them.

As I said, if there was attached to this a proposition to give money to the corporation which has it in charge, I should vote against it. If they come on a subsequent occasion and ask, as they did for Chicago, help for a private corporation, I shall vote against the aid; but as this is a proposition confined to an exhibit of the Government at that place, I gladly vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PENCE].

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, it was to be expected, I suppose, that some one would come forward to oppose this appropriation. I expected to find that, after this House had listened to the words of Gen. COGSWELL and the words of Gen. SICKLES, and the words of Mr. MURRAY of South Carolina; but I was sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the objection had to come, even after that, from a young man of my generation, and an objection, too, from a young man from Illinois. It seemed to me that if some old stickler for a strict construction of the constitutional power of Congress to vote money for any purpose had seen fit to take five minutes of our time in objecting, no one would have been amazed.

I myself was amazed, disappointed, aye, infinitely grieved, that those words had to come from a young Representative of Southern Illinois, the State in which Chicago presides as metropolis, the beneficiary of the broadest liberality and generosity of this Government during the last two or three years. He has mentioned the fact that maybe farther Western cities, Omaha or Denver, might come in, following up Atlanta as an example, and ask at some time for a donation for a similar purpose. I do not know but that may be true. It is not a fair argument if any such suggestion had ever been made. No such purpose is contemplated. One thing is true, Mr. Speaker, the cities farther west than Egypt, Ill., will not be ungrateful in any year that shall come hereafter if such a favor as this shall be given; and if perchance they should be the recipients of favor, they will not object unseemingly to any such claim or request that may come from any other section.

Mr. Speaker, if the old sectional troubles which seem to be dying out, as shown by the words here to-day of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL], the gentleman from New York [Mr. SICKLES], and others—if those old troubles between the North and the South are really to die out entirely, the proof of it is going to be found in those of us who have come upon the stage since the conflict of the sixties. It is to me a source not only of satisfaction, but of infinite pleasure, and I undertake to say to every young Representative on this floor, except one only, to vote for an appropriation of this kind, that shall give token to the South—which has been for the last year, in the midst of all the difficulties and disturbances in the North and West, the single seat of peace and contentment—that shall give token to the South that the past is put behind us, that the future is not theirs alone, nor ours alone, but theirs and ours together; and the section of country from which I come, which has been mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS], will be found at this exposition displaying, exploiting that which in the Providence of God it has been possible for us to accomplish, hailing the day of peace that has come and the day of prosperity that is promised. I am in favor, sir, of this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to deal in any beautiful language while I press a thought or two in favor of this appropriation with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois. I do not believe the Government of the United States will be any better off five years hence, or two years hence, or to-morrow, by proclaiming to the world its inability to make proper and suitable appropriation to demonstrate its wealth, its power, its magnanimity in all the sections of this mighty country. I wholly differ from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] on that point. I do not believe that an exhibition of penury ever added to the wealth of anybody.

I believe that when a great government demonstrates that it is incapable of making suitable provision for matters of this kind, it paves the way for loss of credit, loss of character, and loss of self-respect. So much, Mr. Speaker, upon that branch of the question.

Now, sir, there is no place on this continent where I, as a humble representative of the great body of loyal men who went to Atlanta during the stirring times from 1861 to 1865, would rather go than to Atlanta, the "Gate City" of the New South, and see the flag of my country waving over a great exposition in which the wealth of the South, the loyalty of the South, the intelligence of the South shall be demonstrated, and the magnificence of my Government in close accord with the spirit of the exposition itself.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PENCE] says, in very eloquent language, that he hopes the dead past is buried. Let me say to him that if there is any class of men in this country who, above all others, denounce and condemn sectionalism, whether it be in the form of adherence to old customs, ancient landmarks, bygone prejudices about constitutional limitations, or other heirlooms of the past misfortunes of the country, it is composed of the old soldiers. I have been in favor of having the Grand Army of the Republic go down in a solid column and meet the people of the South at Atlanta. [Applause.] We went down there once when the men of the South stood by tens of thousands in arms against us. We got along tolerably well then, and now, when they stand with outstretched arms to welcome us, surely we can get along very much better.

For my own part, I would rather go the whole way there now than to have gone half way there on the former occasion to which I have referred. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Speaker, I had the distinguished pleasure of being present not many years ago at Crawfish Springs, Ga. The occasion was a great gathering of the men of the North, men who in 1861 did not stand on the question of constitutional power of the President to put down rebellion, and we were met by a great army of the men who had resisted the Federal Government in 1861, and it was a glorious sight to see surrounding that magnificent stand the veterans of both sides—old Rosecrans, of the North, and the distinguished leader of the chivalry of the South, now the senior Senator from Georgia. [Applause.]

If there is anything left of the old feeling which the gentleman from Colorado deprecates, and $200,000 will contribute to obliterate it, in the name of patriotism let us give the money and give it quickly. [Laughter and applause.] I want to live to see the time when I can contend with the men of the South upon legitimate political lines, without feeling either that they have any war sentiment against me or that they expect me to utter or to entertain any war sentiment against them, and when that time comes I shall be content. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, as we have succeeded in annexing the United States to Georgia, I think we ought to have a vote on this question. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS].

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to say anything that will stay the disposition which seems to prevail here to violate the fundamental law of the land and to waste the money collected by the taxation of an overburdened people.

I have learned long ago that when a man rises on this floor to oppose an illegal and unconstitutional appropriation of the people's money, there is a certain class of statesmen who turn up their noses at him and call him a stickler for the strict construction of the Constitution. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be denominated a stickler for the strict construction of the Constitution. I am one of the men who believe that this is a body of limited and delegated powers. I am one of those who believe that this Congress has no power to expend one dollar of the people's money except for a public purpose. And I insist that upon no construction of the Constitution can any man find a place to stand and claim that this expenditure is for such a public purpose.

Gentlemen need not be alarmed about the feeling of the South toward the people of the North. Long years ago all the bitterness, all the strife, all the turmoil of the war passed from the hearts of our people; and they have been willing, they are willing to-day, to join hands with their brethren of the North who assisted in establishing the independence of this country and to go with them shoulder to shoulder in the upbuilding of this great country. But we are unwilling—I say the sticklers for a strict construction of the Constitution are unwilling—to stultify ourselves by the usurpation of a power of this kind, although the benefit is to come to our own section. And I appeal to Democrats on this floor to stand by the Democratic doctrine of a strict construction of the Constitution and refuse on this occasion—no difference if the benefit does come to the people of the South—to set a precedent that will come back to mock us in all the years of the future. [Applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT].

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not ask any further constitutional warrant for this expenditure than may be found in reading the preamble of the Constitution in its first clause. As soon as the "people of the United States" are named the purpose of the Constitution is declared—"to form a more perfect union." And if this appropriation for the Government exhibit in the city of Atlanta can "form a more perfect union" and unite North and South together more thoroughly, I am content to vote for it—on that ground alone if for no other.

Mr. Speaker, this does not strike my people as a local exhibition. There is no local feeling between Massachusetts and Georgia. On the contrary, there is between them a bond of perhaps the most ancient union in this country. In the early days of the Revolution, before the Declaration of Independence, when the colony of Georgia hesitated to come into the Continental Congress, a single parish in the colony of Georgia sent a single native of Massachusetts to represent it on the floor of the Continental Congress. Lyman Hall, of Massachusetts, stood there alone to represent Georgia. In the next Congress he drew to him Button Gwinnett and George Walton; and their three signatures were appended to the Declaration, under the lead of Midway Parish and a Massachusetts man. Massachusetts remembers that to this day. As her great statesman said in that Hall, she indulges in refreshing remembrances of the past.

And it is particularly agreeable to me, Mr. Speaker, to vote an appropriation of money by which the great central light of the country shall show itself to the citizens of that noble city in that noble State—the ancient empire State of the South. The former exhibition of Atlanta delighted Massachusetts manufacturers and merchants and visitors of every class. We look forward with equal interest to the exposition now at hand; and I hope there will be no opposition from any one from the North to making this most graceful and impressive demonstration of the feeling of the whole country toward the "New South." [Applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, the friends of this measure have asked for no aid to Atlanta; and we ask no aid to the South. We ask for no subsidy. We are here with a proposition that the Government may help herself by making her exhibit in the South on the occasion contemplated. That is all there is in this proposition. This is simply a clean-cut exhibition to be made by the Government, the provision being hedged by every possible means to prevent any afterclap or aftermath.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] said this was a local exhibition. I hold in my hand petitions and resolutions from every city in the gentleman's State, and from his own town, his own home—from every city and town in the State of Texas, and all the way up to Montana, and all the way around to New York, and all the way back to Washington City.

I am proud to say here to-day to this side of the House that there is not a single city in either a Republican or a Democratic State of the North that has not responded to this movement and promised not only to send visitors and exhibitors, but to send a State exhibit if possible.

I want to say to this House and to these gentlemen who have spoken so kindly for us and our people, we thank you from the bottom of our hearts. And in closing, I will say we cheerfully accept as a substitute for the proposition in the bill the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. WILLIAMS, for the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON.

The resolution of Mr. CANNON was read, as follows:

That the House conferees are instructed to present to the Senate conferees the proposition to strike out Senate amendments 278 and 279 and to agree, in lieu thereof, in substance, to the provisions of House bill 7324, reported by the House Committee on Appropriations to the House on the 4th day of June last.

The SPEAKER. For the resolution just read the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] offers as a substitute the resolution which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the House be instructed not to agree to Senate amendments numbered 278 and 279, or to any proposition as a substitute therefor making appropriation for the Cotton States and International Exposition an Atlanta, Ga.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute just read.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 41, noes 152.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER announced as tellers at the desk Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois and Mr. LIVINGSTON.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 49, nays 171, not voting 131; as follows:

On motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to call up amendments numbered 141 and 142.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read.

Amendment numbered 141: Strike out all after the word "lines" in line 18, page 48 of the bill, down to and including the word "lands" in line 2, on page 50, and insert:

(142) That it shall be lawful for the governors of the States of Washington, Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wyoming to apply to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the survey of any township or townships of public land then remaining unsurveyed in any of the several surveying districts, with a view to satisfy the public land grants made by the several acts admitting the said States into the Union to the extent of the full quantity of land called for thereby; and upon the application of said governors the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall proceed to immediately notify the surveyor-general of the application made by the governor of any of the said States of the application made for the withdrawal of said lands, and the surveyor-general shall proceed to have the survey or surveys so applied for made, as in the cases of surveys of public lands; and the lands that may be found to fall within the limits of such township or townships, as ascertained by the survey, shall be reserved upon the filing of the application for survey from any adverse appropriation by settlement or otherwise except under rights that may be found to exist of prior inception, for a period to extend from such application for survey until the expiration of sixty days from the date of the filing of the township plat of survey in the proper district land office, during which period of sixty days the State may select any of such lands not embraced in any valid adverse claim, for the satisfaction of such grants, with the condition, however, that the governor of the State, within thirty days from the date of such filing of the application for survey, shall cause a notice to be published, which publication shall be continued for thirty days from the first publication, in some newspaper of general circulation in the vicinity of the lands likely to be embraced in such township or townships, giving notice to all parties interested of the fact of such application for survey and the exclusive right of selection by the State for the aforesaid period of sixty days as herein provided for; and after the expiration of such period of sixty days any lands which may remain unselected by the State, and not otherwise appropriated according to law, shall be subject to disposal under general laws as other public lands. And provided further, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall give notice immediately of the reservation of any township or townships to the local land office in which the land is situate of the withdrawal of such township or townships, for the purpose hereinbefore provided: And provided further, That the governors of the several States herein named are authorized to advance money from time to time for the survey of the townships withdrawn at such United States depository as may be designated by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the moneys so advanced shall be reimbursable. The foregoing provisions shall be applicable to Utah when admitted as a State into the Union and a governor is duly inaugurated and acting.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to these two amendments of the Senate and agree to the same.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, this action of the House affects the two amendments 141 and 142. I desire now to have considered amendment numbered 148.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee). The amendment will be read.

On page 51, after line 12, insert:

(148) That all soldiers' additional homestead certificates heretofore issued under the rules and regulations of the General Land Office under section 2306 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or in pursuance of the decisions or instructions of the Secretary of the Interior of date March 10, 1877, or any subsequent decisions or instructions of the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, shall be, and are hereby, declared to be valid, notwithstanding any attempted sale or transfer thereof; and where such certificates have been or may hereafter be sold or transferred, such sale or transfer shall not be regarded as invalidating the right, but the same shall be good and valid in the hands of bona fide purchasers for value; and all entries heretofore or hereafter made with such certificates by such purchasers shall be approved, and patent shall issue in the name of the assignees.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask to have printed, in connection with the motion I may make with reference to this amendment, a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated March 23, 1894, which I will not detain the House to read.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1894.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive, by reference from the Department on March 2, 1894, for report in duplicate and return of paper, Senate bill No. 1590, "To validate outstanding soldiers' additional homestead certificates, and for other purposes," which was transmitted to the Department by Hon. JAMES H. BERRY, chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, with a request for the views of your Department thereon.

The bill provides:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to allow the location of soldiers' additional certificates heretofore issued under the rules and regulations of the General Land Office, under section 2306 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or in pursuance of the decision or instructions of the Secretary of the Interior of date February 1, 1883, where such certificates have been transferred or sold to purchasers in good faith; and all such transfers or sales shall be treated and considered as valid, and patent upon all such locations shall issue in the name of the transferee."

In reply, I have the honor to report that the practice of certifying to the soldiers' additional right under section 2306, Revised Statutes, originated in the following manner, viz:

Prior to August 5, 1874, all applications for soldiers' additional homestead entries were required to be made in person at the local offices, but, by circular of that date (1 Copp's Land Owner, page 92), applicants were relieved from going to the local offices to make entry, and it was provided that the affidavits might be made before the clerk of any court of record for the county in which the applicant resided, and transmitted, with the application and fee, by mail or through an attorney, to the proper land office. By departmental decision of May 17, 1876 (3 Copp's Land Owner, page 22), the instructions contained in the above-mentioned circular were revoked, because it was found that said regulations led to many abuses. In accordance therewith, the circular of May 22, 1876 (3 Copp's Land Owner, page 52), was issued, requiring soldiers' additional entries to be made in person at the local offices. These regulations were made applicable to applications then pending, but on July 10, 1876 (3 Copp's Land Owner, page 52), the Department modified the before-mentioned decision so as to make the said regulations apply only to entries made subsequent to May 17, 1876.

The Department, on March 10, 1877 (4 Copp's Land Owner, page 37), further modified the circular of May 22, 1876, so as to permit entries to be made in the following cases, viz: (1) Those presented prior to March 20, 1876, which were rejected, but kept alive by appeal; (2) those in the hands of agents or attorneys at the date of the promulgation of the circular of May 22, 1876, which, under said instructions, were not recognized; (3) to allow entries to be made by the agents or attorneys of the party originally entitled to the entry, after the right shall be certified to by this office.

The practice was discontinued by the circular of February 13, 1883 (9 Copp's Land Owner, page 232), since which time parties entitled to the additional right have been required to present themselves at the local land offices and make their applications in the same manner as in cases of original entries.

It appears that the practice of certifying to the additional right originated with the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, dated March 10, 1877, not February 1, 1883, as stated in the bill. This error is corrected in the amendment herein proposed. Said practice was discontinued by the circular of February 13, 1883.

Over 5,500 of these certificates were issued, covering an estimated area of 400,000 acres. Most of them have been located, and the entries made thereunder patented, but entries made under a small number of them have been canceled for various reasons.

The lands which the outstanding certificates cover approximate about 10,000 acres.

The Department has uniformly held that the additional right is a personal right and not assignable. But under the body of the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stats., 1095), the rights of bona fide purchasers, for a valuable consideration, who made such purchase after final entry and prior to March 1, 1888, are protected, and a number of entries of the class under consideration have been passed to patent under this provision of law. Also, under departmental decision of August 11, 1893, in the case of Carroll Salsberry (17 L. D., 170), entries of this class may be approved under the proviso of said section 7 of the act of March 3, 1891, where the said entries had been pending in this office for more than two years after the date of the final receipt, and no contest or protest had been filed against them.

Further legislation was had looking to the protection of the rights of transferees in entries made under the certificates of right, which is found in the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses, approved March 3, 1893 (27 Stats., 593), and which provides:

"That where soldiers' additional homestead entries have been made or initiated, upon certificate of the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the right to make such entry; and there is no adverse claimant, and such certificate is found erroneous or invalid for any cause, the purchaser thereunder, on making proof of such purchase, may perfect his title by payment of the Government price for land; but no person shall be permitted to acquire more than 160 acres of public land through the location of any such certificate."

In some cases it has been found that certificates were erroneously issued; that at the time of the issue thereof the soldier was not entitled to enter additional land as set forth therein. In such cases, the soldier, acting directly or through an agent by power of attorney, may have entered land and disposed of his right thereto to innocent purchasers, relying on the certificates of right issued by this office; in other cases, certificates of right have been secured through the presentation of spurious and fraudulent papers, and these have passed into the hands of innocent purchasers. The provisions of the act of March 3, 1893, seem to fully cover these classes of cases, and afford relief to the purchasers thereof, such as they are equitably entitled to.

The bill under consideration proposes to allow the location of certificates of right heretofore issued by this office where such certificates have been transferred or sold to purchasers in good faith, without regard as to whether the parties in whose names they were issued are entitled to the additional right or not, or whether said certificates were issued on spurious and fraudulent papers, and also to enact that all such transfers or sales shall be treated and considered as valid, and that patent upon all such locations shall be issued in the name of the transferee.

Probably the most of the outstanding certificates are held by parties who purchased them in good faith, believing in their validity, as in all cases they bore the signature of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in some cases the seal also of said office.

The purpose of Congress is undoubtedly to recognize as legal and valid all assignments or sales of these certificates heretofore made and to recognize the validity of all future transfers. This is, in my opinion, strictly in accord with the rights and equities of the situation. I therefore have the honor to suggest that the bill be amended to read as follows, viz:

"That all soldiers' additional homestead certificates heretofore issued under the rules and regulations of the General Land Office, under section 2306 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or in pursuance of the decisions or instructions of the Secretary of the Interior, of the date of March 10, 1877, or any subsequent decisions or instructions of the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, shall be, and are hereby, declared to be valid, notwithstanding any attempted sale or transfer thereof.

"SEC. 2. That where such certificates have been or may hereafter be sold or transferred, such sale or transfer shall not be regarded as invalidating the right, but the same shall be good and valid in the hands of bona fide purchasers for value, and all entries heretofore or hereafter made with such certificates by such purchasers shall be approved and patent shall issue in the name of the assignees."

Said bill is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What motion does the gentleman from Texas submit?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I want to ask a question of the chairman, because that is a matter, as I understand, that has been reported on once or twice by the Committee on Public Lands. I would like to ask whether the Committee on Public Lands has any objection?

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Public Lands has not reported in favor of this amendment. Whenever there has been any action it has been against it. From time to time, however, the Committee on Appropriations has assumed to legislate upon this subject until it has about exhausted the certificates issued. There are now outstanding certificates for only about 10,000 acres of land. I believe that the ruling of the Department referred to in the amendment, by which assignments were allowed, was an error, and that the certificates should never have been locatable by attorney. I think the present ruling of the Department, holding that the right is personal to the soldier, is correct, and I do not approve of the legislation. It can not be said that the Committee on Public Lands approves it; on the contrary, I know it has never recommended such legislation.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in behalf of the conferees on the part of the House on the pending bill that, having no personal knowledge with reference to this amendment, we concluded that it was the better plan to bring it back to the House so that gentlemen with a fuller understanding of the land system of the United States might have an opportunity to make known their objections to the legislation. The letter which I have forwarded to the Clerk's desk, and which will appear in the morning's RECORD, shows that the Commissioner of the General Land Office advises legislation word for word like that which appears in this amendment. I therefore have no objection to the House receding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same.

Mr. HARTMAN. I desire to ask one question. As I understand this is a motion to recede from the disagreement to the Senate amendment and to accept it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It is.

Mr. HARTMAN. That is all right. I favor that.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to call up amendment 280, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

ARID LANDS.

SEC. 4. That to encourage the reclamation of arid lands, and the cultivation and sale thereof in small tracts to actual settlers, there is hereby reserved, for the purposes and upon the conditions provided in this section, in each of the States to which the desert-land law of the United States is applicable, and to each of the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and to each of the States that may be formed out the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Utah, one million acres of the surveyed public arid lands in said States, respectively, to be selected by each of said States within the ten years after the passage of this act, and such reservation to take effect from the date of such selection and approval, and be thereafter withheld from other disposal, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That any lands so reserved, which shall not be reclaimed within five years from the date of their selection and approval, as aforesaid, or as to which the State has not expended or caused to be expended the sum of $3 per acre in works intended for the reclamation of such lands, as now required by the United States desert-land law from claimants thereunder, shall be released from such reservation and become subject to disposal as other public lands of the United States, after proclamation by the President so declaring.

That any State accepting the conditions of this section is hereby authorized to make all necessary regulations governing the manner or extent of the reclamation, and to make all contracts to cause said lands to be so reclaimed and settled and cultivated by actual settlers in accordance with such regulations; and as rapidly as the State may furnish competent proof that any of said lands are reclaimed and occupied by actual settlers, in accordance with its said regulations, patents shall issue to the State or its assigns for said lands so reclaimed and settled: Provided, That said States shall not sell or dispose of more than 160 acres of said lands to any one person, and the net proceeds derived by each State from the sale of said lands shall be held and expended as a separate fund to aid the work of reclaiming the lands so reserved by this section, and the surplus, if any, shall be devoted by the State to reclaiming other arid lands in said State.

That all lands, exclusive of timber lands and mineral lands, which will not, without irrigation, produce some agricultural crop, shall be deemed arid lands within the meaning of this section, which fact shall be ascertained by affidavit of two or more credible witnesses, filed in the land office of the district in which such land may be situated at the time of the selection thereof, as herein provided: Provided, That this section shall not be construed to authorize the leasing of the lands selected or the disposal or use of them by the States, respectively, in any way whatever except to secure their reclamation, cultivation, and settlement; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, make all rules and regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of this section; and to enable the Secretary of the Interior to examine any of the lands that may be selected under the provisions of this section there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $1,000.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Before that is done, I would like to have some explanation made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. McRAE. I move as a substitute for that motion that the House conferees be instructed to strike out the Senate amendment and insert the following section——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands it, the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota would be first in order, that the House recede; and if that motion be voted down, then the proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas can be voted upon.

Mr. McRAE. I hope the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota will not prevail.

Mr. PICKLER. I will accept this amendment in lieu of my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota desires to withdraw his motion and accept the one offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. PICKLER. As I understand it there is a practical agreement by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Committee on Public Lands on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas; and I do not wish to antagonize that. Therefore I will withdraw my motion to recede from the Senate amendment.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the suggestion that inasmuch as this amendment spoken of by the gentleman from South Dakota and the gentleman from Arkansas has not been read, and is not before the House, those interested can not agree to any other motion such as suggested by the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. PICKLER. Let the amendment be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will have the amendment read, for information at least.

Mr. SAYERS. But before that amendment is read, I trust the Speaker will inform the gentleman from South Dakota and the House as to what motion shall be made in order that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas may be adopted or rejected by the House in connection with the motion to recede.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Arkansas desires to offer an amendment which he sends up as an instruction to the House conferees, to be agreed to in lieu of and as a substitute for the Senate amendment. Is that what is offered by the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The only way, then, that that can be reached would be for the House to insist upon its disagreement, and if the House should so do then a resolution of instruction would be in order. But if the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota prevails, why that closes the whole matter up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unquestionably. The Chair understands the gentleman from South Dakota to be willing to withdraw the motion in order that the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas may be made.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to recede, and the gentleman moves to recede with instructions; and that motion is proper.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. With an amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. That motion is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rules of the House provide that that motion which brings the two Houses to an agreement is first in order, as the Chair understands; and, inasmuch as the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota brings the two Houses to an immediate agreement, it is first in order.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Can not the gentleman from South Dakota withdraw his motion, and then can not the gentleman from Arkansas move to recede with an amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Would not that be the proper line of procedure?

Mr. PICKLER. That is the parliamentary status now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would accomplish the purpose suggested by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McRAE. I suggest, if the gentleman from South Dakota is satisfied with the amendment which I have proposed as instructions, that he make his motion to insist upon our disagreement and then to instruct our conferees to agree to the amendment; that is, that the House conferees agree to recede from our disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to it with this amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. A great many of us would like to have that amendment read, so that we may know what it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In order that the House may act intelligently, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. 4. That to aid the public land States in the reclamation of the desert lands therein, and the settlement, cultivation, and sale thereof in small tracts to actual settlers, the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, upon proper application of the State, to contract and agree, from time to time, with each of the States in which there may be situated desert lands as defined by the act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of desert land in certain States and Territories, approved March 3, 1877," and the act amendatory thereof, approved March 3, 1891, binding the United States to donate, grant, and patent to the State free of cost for survey or price such desert lands, not exceeding 1,000,000 acres in each State, as the State may cause to be irrigated, reclaimed, and cultivated by actual settlers, within ten years next after the passage of this act, as thoroughly as is required of citizens who may enter under the said desert land law.

Before the application of any State is allowed or any contract or agreement is executed or any segregation of any of the land from the public domain is ordered by the Secretary of the Interior, the State shall file a map of the said land proposed to be irrigated, which shall exhibit a plan showing the mode of the contemplated irrigation and which plan shall be sufficient to thoroughly irrigate and reclaim said land and prepare it to raise ordinary agricultural crops, and shall also show the source of the water to be used for irrigation and reclamation; and the Secretary of the Interior may make necessary regulations for the reservation of the lands applied for by the States to date from the date of the filing of the map and plan of irrigation, but such reservation shall be of no force whatever if such map and plan of irrigation shall not be approved. That any State contracting under this section is hereby authorized to make all necessary contracts to cause the said lands to be reclaimed, and to induce their settlement and cultivation in accordance with and subject to the provisions of this section; but the State shall not be authorized to lease any of said lands or to use or dispose of the same in any way whatever, except to secure their reclamation, cultivation, and settlement.

As fast as any State may furnish satisfactory proof, according to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, that any of said lands are irrigated, reclaimed, and occupied by actual settlers, patents shall be issued to the State or its assigns for said lands so reclaimed and settled: Provided, That said States shall not sell or dispose of more than 160 acres of said lands to any one person, and any surplus of money derived by any State from the sale of said lands in excess of the cost of their reclamation shall be held as a trust fund for and be applied to the reclamation of other desert land in such State. That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to examine any of the lands that may be selected under the provisions of this section, there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $1,000.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, while I prefer the measure reported by the Senate, I do not desire to antagonize this proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas, and I withdraw my motion.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman must not understand that this is any proposition of mine. This proposition was prepared with some care to take the place of the one in the bill. I am not advocating either one of them, but as between the two I very much prefer this to that of the Senate. But if the gentleman from South Dakota does not want it, he need not accept it. I think that we are hardly ready to legislate upon this subject, anyway.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] withdraws his motion, and moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to it with this substitute therefor. The question is on that motion.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a letter, which I desire to have read in this connection.

The letter was read, as follows.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., August 8, 1894.

SIR: In reference to the subject of the amendment proposed as a substitute for Senate amendment No. 280 to the sundry civil bill, this day submitted for an expression of my opinion in letter from the clerk of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, I have the honor to state that the amendment proposed seems to be similar in its general purposes to the Senate bill No. 1591, "To provide for the reservation, sale, and settlement of certain lands in the several States and Territories," in regard to which the views of this office were expressed in a report of March 2, 1894, which is incorporated in the report of the Senate Committee on Public Lands of April 17, 1894, in reference to that bill.

The proposed substitute appears, on careful examination, to differ somewhat in its provisions from said bill, but as a result of such examination, I see no reason why the purposess ought to be accomplished by the bill referred to, which was favorably reported upon by this office in the report mentioned, may not be attained under the provisions of the proposed substitute, should it be adopted.

It is the opinion of this office, however, that should the proposed substitute be adopted, such amendment be made as will make it clearly and unequivocally applicable not only to existing States or the States to which existing desert land laws apply, but also to the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and to the States that may be formed out of the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Utah, when admitted, as provided for in fourth section of Senate bill 1591.

The draft of substitute is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

EDW. A. BOWERS,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. FRANCIS M. COCKRELL,
United States Senate.

Mr. SAYERS. In connection with this subject I also ask to have printed in the RECORD the report made to the Senate upon Senate bill 1591.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report (by Mr. CAREY) is as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred S. 1591, a bill to provide for the reservation, sale, and settlement of certain lands in several of the States and Territories, having considered the same, report the bill favorably and recommend its passage with amendments.

The letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior, hereto annexed and made part of this report, sets forth very fully the objects and purposes of the bill.

A large number of bills have been introduced in this and previous Congresses having in view legislation which would secure or encourage the reclamation of portions of the arid lands. Many plans have been proposed, but not one save the desert land law of 1878 has received the favorable consideration of Congress. All the bills introduced on the subject appear to have been based on either of two propositions, namely, to donate the arid lands to the States in which they are situated, on condition that the States undertake their reclamation; or that the General Government, by appropriations of money from the Treasury, should undertake the construction of canals, dikes, dams, and other necessary works to reclaim the arid lands wherever water is available, or can be made available by storage basins.

Many think the General Government can distribute the lands far better among those who seek homes in a new country than would be possible under the different systems that would be adopted by the several States, but even these stand in awe of the proposition for the Government, commencing directly the reclamation of the arid lands. It can not be denied that the undertaking would be a most formidable one, and would cost many hundred millions of dollars.

The purpose of this bill under consideration is, so far as possible, to overcome these objections. The plan contemplated by the bill will prevent the lands falling into a few hands, and if the States avail themselves of its provisions it will cause as wide a distribution of the lands as could take place under the homestead law. The arid lands belong to the General Government. Without additional legislation by Congress on the subject the States are helpless. The land laws in existence are not well adapted to the arid region, but until some other mode is adopted and found practicable it will not be wise to repeal these laws.

The States where the arid lands are situated have done all it is possible to do in the absence of Congressional legislation. They have passed good laws for the distribution of water. Some of these have provisions in their constitutions which provide that all water shall belong to the State, but that so long as water is available that no one shall be denied of its use for agricultural purposes. These States have officers to regulate the apportionment of water and to settle disputes between settlers growing out of its distribution.

All the various plans and usages of countries where irrigation is practiced have been considered and the best means to regulate the important subject have been adopted. These States have arrived at a time when Congressional action is absolutely necessary. The irrigation of arid lands under the most favorable circumstances is very costly. Before a settler can make a living upon these lands large expenditures of money must be made. The task is beyond individual effort. It will be difficult to estimate the amount of money (in the absence of reliable statistics) that has already been expended in irrigation work in the arid regions of the United States—probably not less than $200,000,000. These works may have cost double this amount; yet the beginning has scarcely been made.

When all the visible water has been utilized, then the investigation and experiments will have to be made to determine whether great storage basins are practicable for the conservation of the snow and rain precipitated during other than the growing seasons. Whether the raising of subterranean water supplies for purposes of irrigation is feasible is yet to be determined. There are many millions of acres where there is no available water supply for irrigation, but before these lands will have to be considered there are millions of acres, the irrigation of which is practicable and which would be undertaken if favorable legislation should be adopted.

The object of the bill is to permit the States, and the Territories when they shall become States, in which arid lands are situated to reserve a limited amount of such lands for reclamation, settlement, and disposal in small tracts to actual settlers.

The bill does not propose to grant any lands to the States, but only to reserve them for disposal to actual settlers after satisfactory proof has been furnished the Government that they have been reclaimed and settled upon. The title is not to pass out of the Government until the two chief conditions of the bill are fully complied with. First, that the lands shall be fully reclaimed; and second, that the lands shall be settled upon in tracts not exceeding 160 acres to each settler. There is no inducement in the bill for the States to take steps to cause any of the land to be reserved in advance of some well-formulated plan for their reclamation and settlement, for the States, under the provisions of the bill, can exercise no control over the lands reserved, except for the purpose of their reclamation and settlement.

If all the States to which the bill applies should avail themselves of the full acreage proposed to be reserved, it would amount to but a small percentage of the total acreage of the arid lands of the United States. The Government can not be injured by the experiment. If the States, or any of the States, should undertake the reclamation of any of the lands under the provisions of this bill and should fail to accomplish the purposes of the act, the lands would, by proclamation of the President, be released from such reservation and become subject to disposal as other lands of the United States.

If the States complied with the conditions of the act, the lands would be reclaimed, settled upon, and disposed of to actual settlers in small tracts, thereby accomplishing the same purpose as is contemplated by the homestead laws of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, March 12, 1894.

SIR: I am in receipt, by your reference, of a copy of Senate bill No. 1591, "To provide for the reservation, sale, and settlement of certain lands in several of the States and Territories," said lands being of the class commonly known as "desert land." I have referred the same to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a copy of whose report I submit herewith, and concur in his favorable recommendation.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

Hon. JAMES H. BERRY,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to receive by reference from the Department on February 15, 1894, for report in duplicate and return of papers, Senate bill No. 1591, "To provide for the reservation, sale, and settlement of certain lands in the several States and Territories," transmitted to the Department by the Hon. JAMES H. BERRY, chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, with a request for the views of your Department thereon.

In reply thereto I have to report that the object of the bill is to encourage the reclamation, settlement, and disposal of lands in the arid belt of the United States, which will not produce, without artificial irrigation, agricultural crops.

The bill proposes that there may be selected and reserved, by each of the States to which the desert land law is applicable, 1,000,000 acres of the arid lands therein, with the proviso that any of the said lands selected and reserved which the State shall not reclaim or cause to be reclaimed within a period of three years, or shall fail to expend or cause to be expended in a like period in works for the reclamation of said lands at least $3 an acre, shall on the proclamation of the President to that effect, again be subject to disposal under the land laws of the United States.

The bill further provides that when competent proof is furnished by any State that any of the lands reserved are reclaimed and occupied by actual settlers, in tracts not exceeding 160 acres to each settler, patents shall issue to the State or its assignees for such lands so reclaimed and settled in tracts not exceeding 160 acres to each person, with the proviso that the proceeds derived from the sale of the lands shall become a fund in the hands of the State for the reclamation of the arid lands so reserved and other lands in such State.

The bill is clear and is guarded in its terms. It is in the interest of small settlers. The United States holds the title until the lands reserved are actually reclaimed and settled. The States will have no power over the land, except for the purpose of reclamation and individual settlement, as expressed in the bill, while it will clothe the States with authority ample to induce the reclamation and settlement of the reserved lands, especially by colonies, a system which has worked admirably in several of the States to which the bill will apply.

The bill does not propose to interfere with the existing laws of the United States affecting the disposal of lands to individuals.

The building of irrigation works has been found to be very expensive, costing from $5 to $10 an acre for land irrigated under the most favorable circumstances, and only where it has been possible to secure large bodies of land has the cost been the minimum. Consequently, the most successful settlements, notably in California and Colorado, under irrigation canals, have been where the lands could be procured in bodies, generally within Spanish and railroad grants.

Now that the lands along the water courses, as a rule, have been taken, the question arises, how can the lands difficult and expensive to irrigate be made available for settlement?

The people of the States in which the arid lands are located would like to see the United States undertake their reclamation. This is certainly impracticable now, and it is doubtful whether it will ever be otherwise. There are those who think that the arid lands should be given to the States under certain restrictions. Public sentiment would scarcely justify such legislation at this time. The experience of the United States and the several States under the swamp-land acts does not argue in favor of such disposal of the arid lands. That additional legislation to induce the reclamation and settlement of arid lands is necessary can not be denied, and since the entire acreage to be reserved under the bill, if all the States to which it is applicable should avail themselves of its provisions, would not be as great as each of the several States acquired under the swamp acts.

Congress may well try the experiment here proposed, retaining the title in the United States as the bill proposes, so that if the results are satisfactory, which I have no doubt will be the case, like comprehensive legislation may hereafter be enacted to cover other large bodies of land. The following table approximates the average of public lands vacant in the several States and Territories to which the bill, if it should become a law, would be applicable:

	Acres.
Arizona	49,000,000
California	47,000,000
Colorado	41,000,000
Idaho	37,000,000
Montana	74,000,000
New Mexico	54,000,000
North Dakota	18,000,000
Oregon	37,000,000
South Dakota	13,000,000
Utah	35,000,000
Washington	18,000,000
Wyoming	53,000,000

Maximum amount to be reserved under this bill, 13,000,000 of the total amount of 529,000,000 acres.

The general desert-land law requires payment to the United States of $1.25 per acre, but does not require actual settlement and residence on the land. This bill proposes to both reclaim and settle the lands reserved thereunder. The State will thereby accomplish under this law what the Federal desert-land law and homestead laws separately provide. As the State is required to devote the entire proceeds of these lands to aid their reclamation the additional condition of settlement by individuals on each 160-acre tract is the full equivalent of the Federal policy of disposing of the public domain to actual settlers, and fully justifies legislation in the form proposed by the bill.

The reclamation of the arid lands can not be accomplished to any great extent through the efforts of any single individual. Home seekers are not men of means. The construction of canals and ditches to irrigate a single quarter section usually involves expenditure far beyond individual ability and far beyond the values which a reclaimed single quarter section would yield. Combined effort of many settlers to reclaim large bodies of land can not be secured, nor successful results accomplished except under such municipal superintendency as shall insure economic and safe expenditure under intelligent control, and yielding thereby the greatest measure of success.

Enterprise thus undertaken under State control, under plans subjected to scrutiny of State officers, disbursements directed by intelligent comprehension of the plan proposed and utility of the end designed and the certainty through State superintendency that the settlers will be protected in the enterprise, furnish the strongest guarantee of success which experience can suggest. The States are highly interested in the reclamation of the arid lands within their boundaries and the settlement and cultivation thereof by individual citizens. The work is too vast to be undertaken by the General Government. Local and community interest under State control will stimulate results with far greater zeal and success.

The principal proposition involved, reclamation and settlement by individuals in small holdings, meets my strong approval, and this bill seems to me to present full opportunity for the practical experiment and under proper safeguards. The United States retains title until reclamation is accomplished and the land occupied by actual settlers. This, if successful, is the great object to be attained; and if unsuccessful the United States still holds the unincumbered fee.

I suggest that the bill be amended by striking out the word "three" in line 9, in section 1, and insert in lieu thereof the word "six," as time will be required for the States to perfect legislation to carry the provisions of the proposed law into effect. After a careful examination of the bill and for the reasons stated, I recommend its passage with the amendment suggested.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. SAYERS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to detain the committee further than to state just what the proposition is that the Senate has placed on this bill. There are between five and six hundred million acres of Government land not yet taken, consisting largely of arid and desert lands. The question has been discussed in the House for many years past as to the best disposition to make of those lands. Now, this is simply a proposition to donate to each of the States that the desert land laws apply to, a million acres of such lands. Gentlemen will understand that we have between five hundred and six hundred million acres of the public domain left, and this simply proposes to appropriate thirteen or fourteen millions of these arid lands, giving 1,000,000 acres to each of the States named.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. A million acres of desert lands.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes; a million acres of desert lands.

Mr. MERCER. Provided there are a million acres of arid lands within the State.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes. These lands are doing nobody any good now, and they never will do anybody any good until they are irrigated. This proposition does not cost the Government anything. It simply allows each of these States to take a million acres of these desert lands and see whether or not, under the direction of the State Legislatures, they can be irrigated and reclaimed.

Mr. MERCER. Do I understand that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] has been framed by the Land Office?.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir. The proposition that is now before the House is one that has been approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and I think there can be no objection to it. Gentlemen will remember how sensitive this House has shown itself from time to time in regard to making direct appropriations for the irrigation and reclamation of arid lands. Now, here is a proposition which costs the Government nothing, but simply donates these lands to the States, leaving them to bear the burden of irrigation and reclamation. Furthermore, it is provided that the title to these lands shall not pass to the States until it is shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that the lands have been reclaimed according to law and the money expended upon them.

That, I believe, is the whole proposition. I understand that the Commissioner of the General Land Office indorses it. I think it will lead to something practical, and will help us in that Western country to reclaim these arid lands. At all events, I repeat, it costs the Government nothing, but simply gives these States an opportunity to try this experiment upon lands which are utterly worthless as they stand to-day.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, as I have already stated, I do not approve of legislating in this way. This is an experiment which Congress has been urged to try. The object is to encourage the irrigation of these lands by the States. The Committee on Public Lands has given this question but little attention. The Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands has jurisdiction of the bill which passed the Senate, and which is now pending as an amendment to this bill.

At the suggestion of the conferees on the part of the House, this substitute for the Senate proposition was prepared, because they were not satisfied with that of the Senate. If anything is to be done at this time it should be carefully guarded so as to protect the United States against fraud in the proof of reclamation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to state briefly what I understand to be the main difference between the two propositions. The Senate proposition makes a reservation outright for the States and will make it possible for the States to put a million of acres in each State in reservation for an indefinite period. It leaves the question of irrigation to be determined under rules and regulations to be made by the States themselves. In short, the States will decide whether they have complied with the conditions as to irrigation. The pending proposition does not make any grant, but only authorizes the Secretary of the Interior with the approval of the President to make a contract with any States in which any of these lands may be situated for the reclamation of not exceeding a million acres in each State, the question of irrigation to be finally determined by the Executive officers of this Government. No reservation or withdrawal is permitted except for temporary purposes until the plan is approved; and no title is to pass until thorough irrigation is accomplished and shown to the satisfaction of the Interior Department.

If an experiment of this sort is to be be made I desire to put around it all the conditions and limitations necessary to insure the irrigation of the land. This will give ample power to the Secretary to secure it. As the gentleman from South Dakota has said there are five or six hundred million acres of desert land—land worthless without irrigation, and very valuable with it. The United States owns the lands, but has no inclination to enter upon its reclamation. We want settlers upon all our public lands. This is simply an experiment by which it is proposed to aid the States in their efforts to reclaim the land, by remitting the price and cost of survey. We charge the individual settler $1.25 an acre for desert land when irrigated. One of the conditions of this measure is that not exceeding 160 acres shall be sold by the State to any one individual.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. And it becomes the duty of the State to provide each 160 acres with a sufficient quantity of water to irrigate those 160 acres.

Mr. McRAE. Yes: according to the test applied by the desert land law to the individual settler.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. According to the test heretofore invoked.

Mr. McRAE. And this will require the State not only to reclaim the land, to supply it with the necessary water to grow ordinary agricultural crops, but to dispose of it to settlers who will occupy it; and in consideration of this the State is exempt from the payment of the $1.25 an acre which we exact of the individual settler. That is all the aid granted or authorized.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Has the gentleman ever examined any figures as to the cost of constructing these irrigation ditches?

Mr. McRAE. I have not. Gentlemen who are familiar with it have discussed the question with me, and from what they have said I am satisfied that it is very expensive, and will require all the aid the States and counties can give to accomplish it.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. My reason for asking the question is that I am exceedingly doubtful whether legislation of this kind can be effectual. However, we can go ahead and try the experiment. If it is a failure we shall have profited, no doubt, by the experience. But in the section of country where I reside, although there are only two counties requiring irrigation, a ditch for the irrigation of 1,000,000 acres of land would probably cost $600,000 or $700,000.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman will understand that no State is required to irrigate a million acres. The limitation proposed is "not exceeding a million acres;" but each State may irrigate less and secure it upon proper proof.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Of course: but in reaching the water supply it is generally necessary that these ditches should run a long distance; and therefore works of this kind are very expensive. For instance, the Sunnyside irrigation ditch in Yakima County of my State irrigates about 80,000 acres, and it cost over $400,000. Another ditch, now in course of construction, will irrigate 120,000 acres and will cost $300,000. Then there is a ditch in Kittitas County which will extend about 70 miles, and cost over $500,000. The great expense is in getting to the streams which furnish the water supply.

It is a serious question, therefore, whether this problem can be taken up and handled successfully. But I believe this is a movement in the right direction. We can at any rate try the experiment. If it should prove a failure we can of course repeal the legislation, and we shall have had the experience.

Mr. McRAE. If this substitute be adopted it will only authorize contracts which will lapse in ten years after their date. It is not a legislative grant; it does not require any action of Congress for its forfeiture. It does not even put the land in a state of reservation until a map is filed and the plan of irrigation is approved.

My friend from New Mexico [Mr. JOSEPH], who perhaps knows more about this question than any other man on this floor, suggests to me that it costs from four to five dollars an acre to reclaim desert land, but when reclaimed it is worth from $25 to $50. So, Mr. Speaker, it is possible that a proposition of this kind on the part of the Government may aid in making this arid region the richest and most fertile part of our country. This is a proposition coming from the Representatives of the States and Territories in which the arid lands are situated, and is designed to induce them to take hold of the matter and deal with it as States. The great questions of preserving our forests and the storage of the water now wasted will aid very much in reclaiming our deserts. These great questions must soon be considered by the people of this country.

As the gentleman from Washington has said, the States may not be able to secure the capital to irrigate these lands. Be that as it may, this is at least an invitation to them to undertake it, and will be the cause of much investigation as to plans and methods.

Mr. PICKLER. But many places can be irrigated by artesian wells at a very much less expense; and I think that this will lead to beneficial results in the future.

Mr. HERMANN. Let me ask the gentleman from Arkansas as to the limitation of 160 acres to which he refers. I would ask him, after all his extensive examination of the subject, whether he thinks it would be practicable for the State to obtain the appropriation to make the large expenditure necessary to irrigate these lands if the limit is fixed at 160 acres as the maximum?

Mr. McRAE. I would not favor any proposition that would allow the sale of land in larger quantities. If there is a change at all the limit ought to be reduced. But this limit has been fixed, that is, the quantity allowed for a homestead, notwithstanding the fact that on arid lands, when it is once reclaimed, 80 acres are equal to 160 acres of ordinary agricultural lands.

Mr. HERMANN. Then the State must take its chances.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it is with very much diffidence that I take the floor to say anything about the Senate amendment or the proposed substitute to this bill. Especially is that true as I do not come from a State that has arid lands in it. I want to express a doubt, however, about the wisdom of legislation of this kind upon the sundry civil or any other appropriation bill.

I will confess, at the beginning of what little I shall say, that proper legislation ought to be had that will enable the States, or compel them, if they do anything with the lands, to make such regulations and appropriations of money as will insure their reclamation by irrigation.

But I very much doubt whether the proposed provision will bear good fruit. I recollect—I do not recollect, but all of us know—that in 1850 there was a grant of swamp land to the various States—Minnesota, Illinois, Arkansas, and all of the States that had public lands of that character. The question presented then was to get rid of the water in certain sections. This is a proposition to supply the water in certain other sections.

Now, I must say that the operation of the swamp-land grant act was not satisfactory. Great lots of land were selected, for instance, in my own State of Illinois, the most valuable agricultural lands we have now, and great claims of indemnity are still pending in some of the States, so that that appropriation of land in the main was worse than wasted—not properly considered, not properly guarded.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Did not the lands fall into the hands of speculators?

Mr. LUCAS. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois this question: Does he not know that irrigation is possible in the swamp lands; that the drainage of the swamp lands is practicable? That is a matter that men can control by labor. But the matter of moisture or of rain is something that man can not control.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, I understand that. But this is a subject that I have had just enough to do with in the Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, and Fifty-first Congresses to have dawn upon me, namely, the magnitude of the question. Why, we went to work in the Forty-ninth Congress and absolutely withdrew all lands from sale in the arid regions and made magnificent appropriations for the purpose of surveying the water sites, and went along for three or four years, and found a good many water sites; but in the meantime the people wanted to enter the lands for homesteads, or under the desert land act, and they found they could not do it. Then there came up a cry and a great contest in the Fifty-first Congress to repeal that legislation, and it was subsequently repealed, and I have no doubt a great many reservoir sites got into the hands of some people, I presume availing themselves of the work of the Government.

Now, to me this is one of the most interesting and important of questions. A great area of the most productive lands on this earth in a very large section of this country if we can get water on them will be available for agricultural purposes. But you can not get the water economically with a population of 70,000,000 of people; but when you get, within the century, twice 70,000,000 or three times 70,000,000 of people, then these lands in my judgment are to be utilized. All of the rivers are to be utilized for irrigation, the mountain streams are to be utilized, the waters of the mountains that come from the snow are to be utilized, and in my opinion a century from this time will give us the storing of storm water in all this section to be utilized, because this race of ours, given a necessity, will reach out and utilize everything that can be utilized to attain a desired result.

Now, then, when you come to enter upon this question and grant a million of acres in each one of these States and undertake to properly grant it upon an hour or two's discussion; and put it upon an appropriation bill, so that it must pass because the appropriation bill must pass, I am very much afraid that some improvident action will be taken in some of these new States, because in the recollection of all of us who have grown up in the States that were young, even where there was not arid land we know that much of improvident legislation was enacted, much of ignorant legislation, much of wasteful legislation. And what I fear is that such steps will be taken in some if not all of these States as will hang about the necks of those people in a future generation or generations like a millstone.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In a moment I will.

Now, then, it may be claimed by the gentleman from South Dakota and others that this is but the commencement. He may be right; but I believe this subject is important enough that one or more of the great committees of this House should investigate, discuss, and thoroughly mature legislation. It is not the land. I would be glad to give every acre of land in the arid regions to those States that would wisely and properly use it, and take care of it for the millions that are to come, and not waste it. That is not the question.

It may not follow that these lands will be given away to be used as I have indicated, but I fear that in this hasty legislation we may do great damage for want of proper consideration; and I am inclined to the view that whatever legislation is had should be had after the maturest committee work and then should stand from day to day if not from week to week under discussion and consideration in both House and Senate upon its own merits and not be dragged through upon an appropriation bill that carries $30,000,000. Now, then, I yield to my friend.

Mr. PICKLER. If I can have the floor——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that for probably ten or twelve years this matter of irrigation in the arid regions has been before Congress, has been discussed, has been talked about, and we have so far failed to get any legislation in regard to the matter—an utter failure in any legislation. Now, this subject is well understood by the House of Representatives. Everybody knows that this land is lying out there. They know that it is useless; and everybody desires it reclaimed. It is a very simple proposition; and the answer to the objection of the gentleman from Illinois is this: that where this differs from the swamp-land grants is that the Government does not grant this at all. The Government only grants it and the State only receives title to it after it has made its proof that the land is reclaimed. So this does not pass to the States as the swamp land passed to the States.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Will my friend allow me just a single question right there?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I understand the letter of the bill imperfectly; but you take the timber-culture grants. Why, any man could take a timber-culture claim and under the letter of the law it was expected that the man should have a growth of timber, that he should have so much planted and so much cultivated; yet in former years hundreds of grants were made when men did not live upon them, in many instances where men never saw them. The forms of law were complied with and the affidavits filed, but the spirit of the law in most instances was not observed. Now, I do not know that that would be the case in this matter.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. The law does not require them to live on timber-culture claims.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I understand that.

Mr. PICKLER. There may be some instances in all public business where you will sometimes have false affidavits made; but you can not stop because some one will swear to an exaggerated statement. I submit that the objection of the gentleman from Illinois that this is similar to the swamp-land grants is not tenable. Under the swamp-land grants, grants were made of the amount stated to the States and they could go into a speculation. Under this proposition it is a mere bagatelle. Out of between 500,000,000 and 600,000,000 acres we are only asking 12,000,000 or 14,000,000; and we are not asking for that until it is improved; and why should we not have an opportunity to take it and see if we can do anything in this experiment? Who is going to be harmed?

The gentleman talks about appropriations. I want to say that it has become so that you can not get any legislation in the American Congress unless you get it on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BRETZ. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRETZ. Have you a single dollar in any State or Territory in the West with which you would be enabled to irrigate land of this character?

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know how that may be?

Mr. BRETZ. Then you propose to impose a debt on your people that they will be required to pay interest on for many years to come.

Mr. PICKLER. If we can not do it we do no harm to anybody. I think this is an advantage to the Government. It says "You take this land, if it is worth anything to you, and if you can reclaim it we charge you nothing for it;" and if we can not reclaim it we do not damage anybody.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER].

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk to have read a telegram which appeared recently in the Nebraska Journal, published at Lincoln, Nebr.

The telegram was read, as follows:

[Special.]

O'NEIL, NEBR., August 6.

The big irrigation meeting advertised for O'Neil to-day has passed into history. It was a big meeting indeed, one of great importance to Northern Nebraska, and was attended by representatives from Brown, Rock, Cherry, Keyapaha, and Boyd Counties. It was composed of men of energy and determination, who came together to consider the great question of irrigation and how to get it. The big court room was literally packed at the morning and evening sessions.

The meeting was called to order at 10 o'clock by T. V. Golden, secretary of the North Nebraska Irrigation Association, who stated the object of the meeting. Capt. Whitmore, of Long Pine, was elected chairman. Mr. Golden stated to the meeting that the Niobrara Irrigation and Power Company, a corporation, had spent $2,400 in a preliminary survey, filing and holding water rights, and had succeeded in getting people interested who would construct the canal, provided certain conditions were complied with by the people of those counties interested. Said proposition was made in writing by James M. Kerr, representing a New York syndicate of unlimited capital, and it was reported that Kerr was well impressed with the feasibility of the route, with the country to be watered; and further, the company would construct said canal, flumes, reservoirs, and laterals, guaranteeing to water 105,000 acres next year, provided the people of Holt, Rock, and Brown Counties would vote $250,000 bonds, to take water rights for 100,000 acres at $10 per acre, payable ten or more years hence, and for other things of minor importance.

The meeting of the afternoon was especially participated in by many, and finally, after due deliberation, a vote taken declaring it to be the sense of the meeting that the proposition be accepted. Mr. Kerr, during the course of his remarks, said that the ditch promised the best results, and was in most respects the best scheme out of two thousand offered them by Western States. Committees were appointed for each county to present the matter to their people, after which the meeting adjourned.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, my purpose in having this telegram read was to inform members of the House not only that some portions of Nebraska were in serious need of irrigation, but that the enterprising citizens thereof were actively engaged in any movement which would bring about some relief to those acres of the State so much in need of moisture.

I do not think the measure pending is in any sense a response to the needs and necessities of a large part of the Western country, but if it will ameliorate even in a small degree the unfortunate conditions now prevailing there, and we are assured by its sponsors that it is a step in the direction of finally reclaiming all arid lands in America, we welcome the assistance it does contain, and sincerely trust that some Congress will be wise enough, magnanimous enough, to give the arid lands of the country an equal show with rivers and harbors.

The people of the West are becoming serious over this matter of irrigation; the dream period has vanished; air-castle building has come to an end. Active, effective labor is now demanded, and something must be done by somebody to transform these arid lands into flower gardens—for such a transformation easily takes place through the means of irrigation.

Some years ago it was my good fortune to visit the State of Oregon, and I there noticed some of the benefits of irrigation. On one side of a roadway the soil was pure sand, while 10 feet away the same sand, through the merits of irrigation, was made rich in a most profusive production of vegetation. In Nebraska the same success has crowned the efforts of the enterprising farmers who have attempted irrigation. The sand lots of one year were made to produce a most remarkable yield of potatoes, while farm after farm emerged from the valueless to the valuable.

Eastern Nebraska has been fortunately blessed in nature's gifts, and does not need irrigation or other artificial methods to insure crops. I venture the assertion that this part of Nebraska is the cream of the agricultural kingdom, no matter in what part of the world competition is sought. A failure of crops has not occurred since the first settlement, and year after year this qualification of the soil increases in its usefulness.

It is the western part of Nebraska which seeks and needs irrigation, and if irrigation is given this part of Nebraska—a State which now stands second in the Union as a corn-producing State—it will soon take rank with the eastern part, and then will Nebraska be the greatest corn and wheat producing State in America.

I regret that this amendment falls so far short of the expectations of those hard-working pioneers who have had the courage to settle upon the frontier and the nerve to stay there, for of such people the best citizenship is made. They have been hoping that Congress would authorize a sum of money to be expended in the discovery and the determination of methods for the development and distribution of the water supply for irrigation purposes in the arid regions of America. Accurate field notes of surveys, maps, and other data could be made and preserved and this information might lay a foundation for the solution of systematic and successful irrigation.

In March, 1894, a most successful interstate irrigation convention was held in Omaha, and much good has already grown out of the meeting. Irrigating ditches and canals are being constructed in different parts of the State, and many more, I hope, will follow. This convention was attended by delegates from a dozen States and Territories, and after a session of several days adopted the following resolutions:

Whereas American citizens wishing to secure homes have moved on these plains, bought and paid the Government for land, and expended money in improving it; and

Whereas it has been demonstrated, by the experience of these men and by the signal stations of the Government, that the amount of rainfall at proper seasons is insufficient to make agriculture successful: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that it is the duty of Congress to make increased appropriations to test the practicability of the following methods of irrigation for these plains:

First, That the Government should, by experiments, determine whether the underflow and artesian water is of sufficient volume and can be brought to the surface at a cost to make it available for general irrigation purposes. Second, That it should determine the extent to which reservoirs can be constructed for the purpose of storing storm water sufficient in quantity for irrigation purposes.

Resolved, That we fully indorse the following extract from the report of the special committee of the United States Senate made May 18, 1890, and that the same be made a part of the resolutions of this convention:

"If anything can be done to encourage the people of these great plains, it is important that it should be done speedily. There are over 1,000,000 people in the arid and semiarid belt, who have paid into the United States no less than $40,000,000 for public lands. The Government should demonstrate to them the practicability before they can have the courage or can command the means to prosecute the work on any considerable scale."

Resolved, That since forest culture can be made an effective agent in the reclamation of an arid region, we therefore recommend that every farmer on the prairie be urged to plant and cultivate the growth of forest trees.

Resolved, That we favor the creation of the office of State engineer in the various States, and legislation which shall encourage irrigation, construction, and development.

Resolved, That as authoritative meteorological data is of great importance to irrigation interests, it is the sense of this convention that it is to the best interests of the people of Western America that the present meteorological stations in the arid and semiarid sections of this country be maintained, and their number be increased, and we respectfully urge the Secretary of Agriculture and our representatives in Congress, to use their best efforts to that end.

Resolved, That we ask the agricultural colleges in the various States to devote a portion of the funds received from the United States Government for agricultural experiment work to experiment with and demonstrate the agricultural possibilities with and without irrigation in the plains region, and to investigate the various irrigation problems.

Resolved, That we urge the people of each county to organize county irrigation associations, and put themselves in communication with the officers of their State associations, or with this association where there are no State associations.

In conclusion, I desire to insert in the RECORD the speech of ex-United States Senator Warren, delivered before this Omaha convention, upon the subject of "The powers of Congress with reference to irrigation." Senator Warren spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Convention:

I am enjoying somewhat of a "surprise party," for I had not intended to address you. Having a few hours in your city on my way from the East, I had pleasure in joining you for a little time this morning, and was called before you and introduced by my good friend Dr. Miller. Still later your chairman announced that I would address you, and now I am asked to represent, for the time being, your worthy executive, Governor Crounse, in extending the welcome of the State of Nebraska to the delegates to this convention.

I regret exceedingly, as you undoubtedly will before I have finished, the absence of the governor. It is my pleasure to know your governor, and while I can not hope to do him justice in the capacity in which I have been called upon to represent him, I yet consider it a compliment and an honor to even for a moment occupy his shoes and, standing in his place, bid you welcome.

Governor Crounse is a big, broad man—big physically; large intellectually—and a man who presides over the affairs of a State as large and as broad in advantages as any State or any nation in the world of an equal number of square miles. [Applause.]

The State of Nebraska is notable in very many ways. We remember that during the early struggles of the State, her citizens, seemingly prompted by the spirit of '76, declared that the State of Nebraska and her soil should be the home of highest human freedom. She declared that she would be a free State, that human flesh should not be dealt in and that slavery should not exist within her borders. In this respect she formed one of that notable group of which Kansas is another distinguished example. Nebraska entertained most patriotic views then, and she has always since entertained them.

The spirit of freedom possessed by her citizens then has grown and developed at every stage of the State's existence and progress. It is curious to notice that that same love of fair play has continued in all her affairs of life—in religion, in politics, and in social matters. Following in this line we observe she has been most tolerant to all those new parties and societies that spring up now and then. All have been recognized, have been given a place, and their representatives put upon trial without prejudice, but just as soon as any one of those parties or societies has undertaken to be overradical, or has shown signs of anarchy, communism, or oppression, then the idea of highest freedom has asserted itself, and such parties have been "turned down" and relegated to their proper place. Radicalism will find no place in Nebraska hereafter any more than heretofore. [Applause.]

Now we meet in this marvelous city of Omaha, in this great State of Nebraska. For Nebraska, I most heartily welcome you. As to Omaha, what shall I say of her? Certainly I can add nothing to the generous welcome that has been extended by your handsome and accomplished mayor.

We remember, nearly all of us, when Omaha was a little, struggling hamlet, and it seemed to me then and it seems to me now, that scarcely a place above or below upon this river but what a city could have been as well built as here. It has been, however, the spirit of her people, the ambition, the brain, and the will power of the citizens of Omaha that have made it what it is.

Omaha, when but a small village, took advantage of opportunities and made her supreme effort at a time when the nation declared that it would have a railroad constructed across the continent, connecting the vital life of the great East with the mighty possibilities of the boundless West. Omaha became the gateway of this transcontinental line. There has always been in Nebraska and in Omaha supreme hospitality. In this State, especially in Omaha, a spirit has always existed which said to every man seeking a home, "We welcome you. Law-abiding citizens, all come to us and make your home with us." So to this Nebraska and to this Omaha it gives me the very greatest pleasure to say on the part of and for the governor of this State, there is extended to you a hospitality which is proverbial, not only in Nebraska, but in all this Western country. I can affirm truthfully, from an experience dating back over more than a quarter of a century, that no act has ever been permitted or committed by this people that was not in line with the most hospitable hospitality. [Applause.]

Now, a word as to irrigation. You have met in convention to take up a branch of this question that I can not, perhaps, instruct you in, but one that I very much desire information upon. My thought and research heretofore has been more in the line of irrigation with reference to such localities as can be irrigated from living streams, and it has been largely my purpose and the object of my study to find some way by which we could bring about a greater development through taking the waters that now rush by drought-stricken sections of country unused and with such waters fertilize and fructify the greatest amount of soil, insuring greater production.

But it is all one subject and the branch of it that is now before you, that of development and use of the underflow, is one of importance and interest. It gives me great pleasure to be here, and it will give me still greater pleasure to hear and learn from those who have given the matter close study. I am as anxious that we obtain control of that mysterious element, the underflow, and bring it to the surface to irrigate the plains remote from streams, as I am that we shall take the flowing water from the streams and utilize it in fertilization.

Now, here we are; a nation far advanced. One, we believe, as great as any in the world, and we have not as yet, been obliged to depend very largely upon irrigation, because nature has furnished so large a proportion of our country upon which we annually receive sufficient rainfall.

But it is well to remember that irrigation is liable to soon affect us all, directly or indirectly. It is a subject as old as time; in fact agriculture itself is only coexistent with irrigation. One-half of all the world depends at the present time upon the artifical application of water for production of crops, and as we grow and extend, and increase our landed possessions and population, we must depend more and more upon the effects of irrigation. If we are to make of this nation one greater than any other, it depends, I think, very largely upon efforts such as you are here making, for substantial aid in determining the value of our arid lands.

You seek, if I mistake not, the aid of the Government in a survey of the semiarid region; you ask that the General Government shall, from its great fund, use for its own benefit a portion of its revenue in making a survey to determine where this underflow water is located, where it can be taken from, and where it can be best applied. From the two or three bills now before Congress and from conversations with some of your members, I assume this to be the work you have in hand.

You will find, of course, as you proceed with the work, many objectors—the world can not move without objectors. But they simply incite the ardor of others, who believe that the world does and should move. It is unnecessary to discuss the right and justice of the proposition for this survey. Every principle of right and justice suggests that the Government should be most liberal in its appropriations to aid you in this work. It is simply a question of how to proceed to bring about the consent of Congress and secure the approval of the Executive. I wish I could say of some one of the bills now before Congress that to obtain a vote would be to accomplish a law—but candor compels me to say that it will probably require continued and vigorous effort before you will obtain the assistance for which you pray. You have right on your side, and, in my judgment, no constitutional impediment in your pathway, but no doubt men will rise in their places in both Houses of Congress to misquote or misinterpret the Constitution—that much-abused instrument sometimes used, as an old violin, upon which to play any tune in the humor of the performer.

Time will be consumed to show that it is paternalism, and that it is unconstitutional to use the Government's money in this way, applying it to the improvement and betterment of lands which are largely in the hands of private owners, etc., yet men who make these arguments will probably vote "aye" upon a bill to appropriate $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and will use revenue largely contributed by us in the interior, to uses entirely in the interest of Coast States and then deny us their vote for appropriations to care for our waters on the surface and under the surface in this section of the country.

But it seems to me that if you take this matter up right—take it up earnestly, putting it upon broad grounds to begin with—not that you desire these surveys to be upon Tom, Dick, and Harry's land, but that you ask the United States to make these surveys throughout this particular country upon the lands largely the property of the United States, located in the semiarid region, which by right should be made ready for settlers, you can hardly fail. Put it upon the grounds that the Government should always be impartial with its citizens; remind them how many thousands—yes, millions—of people have found homes upon the public domain, when the lands were fertile.

It has long been recognized as the right of every citizen to take from the public domain a homestead, and until lately a preemption claim in addition upon payment of a certain sum of money. The great mass of people who have heretofore had the advantage of homestead and preemption laws have taken land so good that it simply required the tickling of the soil with the plow or spade to bring forth in one year a crop, oftentimes sufficient in value to pay the entire expense of settlement. Such settlers have had the benefit of those good lands which to-day are worth from $10 to $50 per acre. The Government recognizes the fact that it has given to these earlier settlers nothing but their rights. Now, turn, if you please, to those who have settled later in Western Kansas and Western Nebraska, and ask the Government to consider existing conditions. Here we find cases by the score—yes, by the hundreds and thousands—where men equally deserving have settled upon lands, worth less perhaps than on the day they settled, where they are eking out a bare existence, or perhaps have even been obliged to leave their lands and get employment elsewhere to earn a living. All this on account of the great inequality between their legacies and those of their more fortunate brethren, who settled earlier outside the arid belt.

One has received land of great value, the other, equally deserving, has lands which are practically valueless. The Government can not shirk its responsibility. It put the same price and restrictions upon the acquisition of arid lands as upon the fertile lands of the Missouri and Mississippi Valleys. It is right and just that we should be put upon the same level and condition with those more fortunate settlers. The fact that we were born a year later, or that we emigrated two years later, should not take from the value of our legacy, and our rights should not be sacrificed because we remained longer East with our aged parents. We should be put as nearly as possible upon an equality.

When you ask the Government to do this, it is policy to ask it to assist itself. It is policy to ask simply the incidental benefits for settlers already located. It is a business proposition for the Government to make its own land more valuable and to provide in some way, so that settlers upon the public domain can be successful agriculturists, producing their part of the nation's wealth.

You have to deal, in securing legislation, with the people of the East and the middle West. You will have to deal with many kinds of people; with the class who always look backward; the class who never look anywhere; and with those who only look down their own chimneys and dooryards. There are those who look selfishly after their own interests only, but there are others who look forward and for the good of the whole nation. Some look in their old geographies, where all this country appears a vast waste—an unexplored desert—and they petition Congress that no money be spent within the arid regions; they wish us to do nothing further, fearing it will bring about disastrous competition for them, and because, as they put it, it will take money which they have earned and paid and appropriate it for our use.

Of course, no argument need be wasted on this class of objectors. We class such objection as rubbish—the productions of dwarfed intellects. The question at issue must be tied up and associated with that of the public lands of our Government throughout; it must be associated with the arid lands further west as well as here, and it must be connected with the general subject of irrigation in order to be successful.

Now, I believe you will find in Congress representatives of other localities ready to vote for you and with you, and ready to champion your cause, and you in turn should be willing to afford them the relief which they are asking for other arid sections.

The forests, which form practically great natural water reservoirs, should of right be protected and preserved against the havoc that is annually going on. Probably 95 per cent to 97 per cent of the consumption of the great forests goes up in smoke as a result of forest fires, the other 3 per cent to 5 per cent only being used for wood and lumber. The people are asking that the forests shall be preserved.

There are others who ask that there be some effort made to collect and detain in reservoirs the surplus water which falls in rain or snow in the higher lands, in order that it be made available and useful for irrigation in the growing season, instead of going to waste in those torrents which sometimes rush down and spread devastation in the lower southern regions at certain seasons of the year. In the region wholly arid where large streams of water are running to waste, the Government should do something to utilize the surplusage, but if any of you have been led to believe that people living in States and Territories situated higher and nearer the heads of streams are proposing to act regardless of your wishes, you have been misinformed.

We simply ask of the Government either to move on, or step aside and let us move on. You in the semiarid region ask that the Government shall make its past promises good, and that it shall do itself credit and honor by being fair and just to you in assisting to solve this problem. Let us strive to work together; to work with force; to make it a matter nonpolitical, but a matter of importance in every political party. And in every election that occurs we must insist that the men who represent us in Congress shall be pledged to the relief of this arid and semiarid region.

We have got to go farther, if you will permit me to say so, and resolve that when our delegates go to the next national convention, in whatever name they go and for whatever party, they shall not sit supinely by and let the East nominate a President who never has been west of his own bailiwick. I do not wish to be understood as inveighing against President Cleveland, the present occupant of the White House; far from it. It may be true that Grover Cleveland had never been west of Buffalo when he was nominated for President of the United States, and it may also be true that while serving as our Chief Executive for four years and in all the four years afterward, while planning for another term, it did not suit his purpose to come further west than the western bank of the Missouri River, but it is not altogether his fault; it is the fault of the people.

They knew when they nominated him that he was not conversant with the West and its interests. They knew, furthermore, when they nominated him the second time that he was not yet acquainted with our Western desires and needs. The West is sure to become, in fact has already become, an important factor in this Government, and I say to you that I believe our next Chief Executive should be chosen from some Western State, where agriculture is the leading feature of the lives and industries of the people.

I do not encroach upon party politics, parties or party lines, when I say that bills of importance now before Congress show as plainly upon their face as it is possible for written words to show that the West and her interests, and agriculture in general, are not properly protected. We want men interested in agriculture and Western interests, not only in Congress, but we want an Executive and a Cabinet made up of able men, who can sympathize equally with Eastern and Western interests, so that the products of our mines and soil shall not be considered of so little importance that they are relegated to the rear in all legislative deliberations.

We want men who deem the manufactories of the East of no more importance than the mines and the farms of the West. There is no antagonism existing between the East and the West that can not be overcome. The East looks out for its own interests, and expects us, my dear friends, to look out for ours. The time is ripe, and more than ripe, for the West to make its stand and assert its rights in that spirit of kindness which should always exist between neighbors, and so state our wants and represent our interests as to force from the East an equal consideration in the affairs of the nation.

Here is a group of States, important so far as the present is concerned, and preeminently most important in considering the future, a group of States that has never enjoyed the benefits of a dollar, not even one dollar, of all the vast sums of money appropriated by Congress for rivers and harbors, now asking for a mere pittance for water development in the West, and the amount you have asked for, for this survey, is a mere bagatelle. The nation could put in, not only $500,000, but a round million, to good advantage, and sweep aside, as unworthy of consideration, all objections urged against paternalism and unconstitutionality.

Go into court and listen to a case that is upon trial; you hear the learned counsel upon one side, and come to the conclusion that he is right; then you hear the celebrated opponent upon the opposite side; you hear him brush away the arguments opposed to his view and then he seems right. You wonder what the judge is going to do. The judge takes the case under advisement and delivers his opinion. He states that John is right in such and such points—that on some constitutional ground, perhaps, he is in the right—and then he takes up Peter's side and shows wherein he also might be right in his views of the case; but finally the judge gets down to bottom facts and puts the whole case upon the broad ground pro bono publico. Whatever may be the meshes and uncertainties of the law, it is for the public good, and the ruling of the judge is made to conform to this great principle. Now, I believe that after a proper presentation of your case you will receive from the nation a favorable verdict.

When I came to Omaha twenty-six years ago it was said there was a pretty good country out as far west as 30 miles from here—that they could raise corn as far west as Fremont, but that beyond it was all a desert. Now two or three hundred miles west of here we have a corn-producing country unsurpassed by any in the world, and this brings to mind a theme.

Sometimes we meet men who claim that the natural reclamation of the arid region is simply a matter of a little time, and that further settlement will change the soil and the climatic conditions just as it has done in Eastern Kansas and Nebraska. I suggest, therefore, that you prepare your arguments with reference to this phase of the question and be able to present facts to show why the semiarid and arid region, under discussion, will not yield to cultivation without irrigation.

Oftentimes men whom you consider educated and enlightened on general topics will overlook the fact that the evaporation in our altitude renders it impossible for us to expect an extension of the rain belt further west. In addition to your other arguments, make this point as strong as possible.

In conclusion, be assured that if I know the people with whom I dwell, you will have the heartiest coöperation of those who live west of you in your efforts.

God speed you, and good luck be with your projects.

Mr. MERCER. I ask leave to supplement these remarks with data which I will not now read, but send to Clerk's desk for insertion in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The data referred to were the resolutions of the Omaha convention and the speech of Senator Warren.

Mr. SAYERS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM].

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, the question that this committee is now discussing is one of the greatest questions that Congress has ever been called upon to consider. We are to day face to face with this problem, and it is one that we have got to solve whether we wish to or not, because the logic of events is driving it fast upon us.

I regret very much that we could not secure two, or three, or four days to discuss this all-important question as its importance demands. But that seems to be impossible, and I simply avail myself of this opportunity to say a few words and then will, if permitted, extend my remarks in the RECORD.

I am not opposed to the proposition before us in this appropriation bill; but I want to say that it will not solve this irrigation problem. I believe it is a step in the right direction only in so far as it brings the matter up for discussion, and to some extent educates the people of the United States.

CRYING NEED OF IMMEDIATE ACTION.

The supreme importance, the crying need of irrigation was never so keenly realized by the people of the West as it is to-day. An awful calamity has fallen on the people of the trans-Missouri corn belt. An extraordinary period of drought and hot winds has almost annihilated the great staple crop of that section.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the West are brave, hardy, and proud-spirited. Nevertheless, they are forced by the extreme necessities of the present to cry aloud for help in some form. Thousands and tens of thousands of them will be compelled to accept charity before another crop can be raised.

All these people ask, even in their hour of greatest need, is a chance to help themselves. They ask only a temporary loan of the Government's strength and resources to enable them to establish a system of irrigation that will make them independent of climatic extremes in the future. In view of the facts as they exist to day, the indifference of Congress on this subject seems astonishing and well-nigh criminal.

When the bankers and stock-gamblers of Wall street call for help to save them from the effects of their own nefarious schemes the Government responds with unseemly haste. But when millions of wealth producers in the West are brought face to face with ruin through no fault of theirs, the Government is deaf to their appeals. If this Congress were in close touch and sympathy with the toiling masses, no adjournment would occur till some plan were adopted by which the people of the West could go to work at once constructing works of irrigation, thereby earning something to tide them over, and at the same time protecting themselves against like calamities in the future.

The irrigation of arid lands is as old as history, and began with the intelligent cultivation of the soil by man. Upon it always depended the welfare and happiness of the human race. Upon it empires have been built, and the fate of dynasties hung. There was no greater factor for good in past ages, and there is none greater now. It is daily becoming more important, especially to the people of this country, and the destiny of millions of American citizens to-day rests on the proper solution of the irrigation problem in the United States. Notwithstanding this, I venture to say that there are few questions about which the people know so little or this body is more ignorant.

Recognizing the importance of this question, I have from time to time endeavored to arouse interest enough among the members of the House to secure some practical results in the way of legislation, something more than the little preliminary surveying which has been conceded in a half-hearted manner in years past as a sort of sop to Western members. Of course this work is valuable and well enough as far as it goes, but unless it is followed up by liberal and intelligent action on a broader plan, embracing the entire arid region, it will amount to nothing, neither furnish bread to the hungry nor homes to the homeless. I trust this discussion will result in something more than simply "playing horse."

The Western people will not be satisfied longer with petty appropriations of a few thousand dollars to make preliminary surveys. What we want, and what justice demands, is a practical system of irrigation. Nothing short of this will suffice, and Congress is the only power that can give us a system which will meet all the exigencies of the case.

MAGNITUDE OF THE PROBLEM.

As I have already remarked, but few have studied the matter sufficiently to comprehend the magnitude of the proposition to irrigate the arid lands of the United States. As at least a partial understanding of this is necessary in order to realize the need of Government action, I desire to call the attention of the House to the following facts:

Nearly one half the total area of the United States lies in the arid and subhumid district, all of which needs irrigation for successful agriculture. The district is composed of the following seventeen States and Territories: North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Indian Territory, Texas, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Idaho, Utah, Nevada, Arizona, Washington, Oregon, and California. Narrow strips on the eastern and western borders of this great district are well watered naturally. Contiguous to these strips are considerable tracts that are classed as subhumid. The rainfall in these tracts is often sufficient to produce good crops, but it can not be depended on year after year. This subhumid region includes about half of the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas, Indian Territory, and Texas.

This arid and subhumid region contains about 2,000,000 square miles of territory, or 1,280,000,000 acres, 100,000,000 acres of which may be irrigated in time. This at a fair estimate gives ample room for 1,250,000 rural homes, sheltering an agricultural population of 6,250,000. Along with these will come other millions to engage in various trades and professions. Just as irrigation spreads out over this vast region will it become populated and brought within the pale of a higher civilization.

Just as the supply of water which is daily running to waste on its way to the sea, is gathered up and utilized in irrigation, the farmers will reach out and take possession of the fertile plains and valleys, the forests that cover the mountain sides will be utilized, and the mountains will surrender the stored wealth of ages. It is estimated by high authority that the full development of this mountainous region alone would create a market equal to that of all Europe. In short, the possibilities of this country under a proper system of irrigation can not be computed by the mind of man.

This vast region offers the opportunity and the raw materials for almost every occupation known to mankind. It produces the cotton and tropical fruits of the Sunny South, the cereals, vegetables and hardy fruits of the North.

On its eastern and western slopes are great tracts of fertile plains the settlement of which has only well begun. Throughout the entire mountain region are innumerable valleys, whose soil of unsurpassed richness is unbroken by the plow of the husbandman. On the mountain sides are vast forests of valuable timber, in which the ring of the woodman's ax has not been heard. Within the strong recesses of the mountains an almost inexhaustible supply of all the principal minerals of the planet lie untouched. I believe, Mr. Speaker, I am justified in saying that nowhere on the globe is there a country, virtually unoccupied as this is, which offers such varied and abundant opportunities as that part of the United States lying west of the ninety-seventh meridian. And all these opportunities are open to man on one condition only—proper irrigation.

A PERFECT SYSTEM.

It is not difficult to see, Mr. Speaker, the importance of establishing as perfect a system as man is capable of devising, a system in which all the natural rights of the citizen shall be secure regardless of his station in life or the location of his habitation. In my opinion this can only be done by nationalizing the system and placing the distribution of the water under control of Federal law that shall apply throughout the entire arid region alike. I do not suppose for a moment that this suggestion will meet the approval of a majority of this Congress, for I have long since discovered that it is built on the way-back plan, and belongs to the ages that were.

But I have great hope that Congress may soon be modernized, when it will be able to meet the requirements of the people, by keeping abreast with civilization. Without irrigation this region can never be settled, and its civilization must and will dwindle. Not only the welfare but the absolute existence of unborn millions rests wholly upon the success with which this irrigation problem is worked out.

NOT SECTIONAL.

Now, I desire to say, before some gentleman from New England charges this with being a sectional measure, that it is not sectional in any true sense. It should be as much the concern of the member from Maine or Massachusetts as from Nebraska or Colorado, and it will be if he is a statesman instead of a politician. There has already been too much sectional feeling displayed upon this floor for partisan purposes, and I hope for the good of our country it may cease and every member view each measure in the light of its effect upon the nation.

I think there ought to be no question about a measure being national when it affects directly millions of our citizens and reaches over seventeen different States and Territories, as this does. It affects not only our own people directly, but it affects equally, though not so directly perhaps, the people of the East, for it solves, in a measure at least, another grave problem, namely, What shall be done with the surplus of humanity which is accumulating as it never did before? Upon the proper solution of the one depends largely the solution of the other. Heretofore in all history westward the course of empire has steadily taken its way.

As the East became filled up and homes more difficult to secure, man has sought an opening in the West and never sought in vain; for there has always been an outlet for the crowded East in the great and fertile West where the man from Maine or Massachusetts might go and, with only brains and muscle as capital, build himself a home. This was comparatively an easy task in all that portion of the West embraced in the humid regions where the copious showers from heaven were distributed evenly over the earth, watering the soil without cost to the husbandman.

But suddenly we find this all changed. The outlet is closed, and the cheap homes of a few years ago are a thing of the past. Nevertheless millions of acres of just as fertile soil as any now occupied are waiting possessors ready to yield up the stored wealth of centuries. But irrigation is the only key that will unlock this storehouse of richness, which is just as necessary to the man in the East as in the West. Unless this Western outlet is kept open, where will the surplus of the East go, and what will become of them? Verily, this is a national question.

PRINCIPLE INVOLVED.

I desire before proceeding further to notice briefly the principle involved in this proposition, recognizing that, before Congress will agree to anything of the sort, it must be convinced that the principle is a true one.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, the principle of Government control to be both true and safe. I believe it is the only solution of many problems with which we are confronted at this time. The rights of one should be the concern of all. It is the duty of the National Government to step in at any time and protect the rights of the citizens as individuals, or collectively as a State.

When the rights of the citizens of one State are jeapordized by the conduct of the citizens of another State, then it becomes the duty of the General Government to act. Every great public improvement which is not confined to one State should be taken charge of and controlled by the General Government. Matters pertaining to the welfare of the citizens of two or more States and governed by the different laws of their respective States are always a fruitful source of evil in pecuniary loss by clash of interests.

One general law should govern all such interests, regardless of State lines. In short, the principle involved is this: National control of all matters which are not strictly local in their nature and effect, such as railway, telegraph, and telephone lines, finance and irrigation. The application of this principle would save to the people millions that otherwise go into the pockets of private individuals as profits on fictitious capital, commonly known as "watered stock." We should abolish the present system, by which private corporations control these great public necessities and build up colossal fortunes for a few by robbing the many. These necessities should be controlled by one gigantic corporation, composed of the whole people.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, in that sort of trust in which every one shares the profits. This method would yield the greatest benefits at the least cost. All the advantages which a large business has over a small one would accrue to the people, and the cost of service would be reduced to a minimum. Under national control employés would be paid such fair and regular wages that strikes and labor troubles would entirely cease.

The work of redeeming these arid wastes through a system of irrigation is more gigantic and fraught with greater good to humanity than any work ever undertaken in this country. It is so colossal both in size and benefits that the mind of man can scarcely comprehend it, and no power on earth can successfully grapple with it, except that of the whole people combined operating through the National Government. But this power can solve the problem successfully, cause this desert to blossom as the rose, and dot its hillsides and valleys with prosperous, happy homes.

There is no question about the Government's ability to do this, but will it? I fear not, Mr. Speaker, until Congress comprehends to a greater degree than it does now the size and necessity of the undertaking, and changes its opinion of the proper relations that should exist between the Government and the people. I trust the time is near when these views will be changed by study, or the personnel of this body may be changed by the ballot.

Mr. Speaker, this arid region, embracing seventeen different States and Territories, exists as a great whole regardless of the arbitrary lines between political divisions, and it must be treated as such.

PRIVATE ENTERPRISE.

If the work of reclaiming these arid lands is left to private enterprise it will only be accomplished in spots, here and there, where the water is most available. The vested rights of those private parties who first enter the field will interfere with the rights of those who may come after. The work will be done under seventeen different sets of laws in as many different States. As a result of this a large amount of irrigable land will remain in a wild state. Endless litigation will follow. The water supply will pass into the control of syndicates. The farmer will be robbed, as is always the case when his necessities are controlled by others. And the final outcome of the whole business will be that the husbandman will become a tenant on his own land, while he turns over to the attorney and water owner everything he makes for the privilege of eking out a miserable existence in his own home.

These may seem strong words, Mr. Speaker, but I assure you they are not idle ones. I have watched the process of home destruction from like causes as it has gone forward year after year, and I speak advisedly. This ought not to continue. This Congress has the power to take the initiative step to prevent this state of affairs and inaugurate an era in which the home builder will be the home owner. Will you do it? You can not begin the work of reclaiming these lands a moment too soon. In fact, it should have begun long since.

JUSTICE TO THE SETTLERS.

This Government owes it to the thousands it has deceived to begin the work at once, and by irrigation make that country what the settler had the right to believe it was when, fifteen or twenty years ago, he entered it under the alluring enticements of the homestead and preëmption laws, to find after years of dreadful experience that he had been deceived. What the Government had led him to believe was a country with sufficient rainfall, he learned to his sorrow can be depended upon for a crop only at intervals. I say the Government deceived these people by failing to make a proper division of the country. Millions of acres of these western lands were opened to settlement under the provisions of the homestead and preëmption laws that should have been opened under the desert land act. If this had been done no one would have been deceived, and these people would not have lost their all in a hopeless fight against fate.

Scattered all over the Eastern slope of this vast Empire are thousands of as fair women and brave men as the sun ever shone upon, whose honesty, integrity, frugality, and industry are unsurpassed the world over. Thousands of them have been bravely fighting a hopeless battle for years in their endeavor to build up homes where there is not sufficient moisture to enable them to produce crops with certainty. Many of these, after exhausting their little all, destitute and heart-sick, are drifting back to the already crowded East where they come in direct competition with the millions who now are struggling for bread, thus making the lot of both more miserable.

Common justice to these people demands that the Government take hold of this matter and, so far as possible, make this country what it said it was when these people entered it. More than $300,000,000 have the settlers of this region paid into the National Treasury for these lands. One-third of this amount will suffice to carry this work of irrigation to a point where it will be self-supporting and not cost the Government a cent. Now is the accepted time for this Congress to begin the work of rescuing this country and people from the blast of hot winds and the curse of railroad monopoly.

PRECEDENTS AND THE CONSTITUTION.

Two of the greatest enemies of reform in legislation are the precedent hunter and the constitutional objector. One can not see to go forward because he is always looking backward for a precedent. The other can not advance because he fears he may trample on the Constitution. Therefore, knowing this measure must run the gauntlet of these two progress obstructors, I deem it proper to offer a few thoughts relative to them.

If a measure is proposed which seemingly encroaches somewhat upon old ideas, the man after precedents is sure to rise and want to know if there is a precedent for it. He at once begins to search among the musty files of past ages to learn if at any time in the dim savage past any of our barbarous ancestors did the same thing. If he finds that they did, the proposition is all right; but woe unto it if he fails to find a precedent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it would be difficult to cite precedents for government control of irrigation from the time of the Pharaohs down to the present time. The principle is as old as government itself, but I shall not cumber the record with citations, for I do not care, neither do I believe the people care, whether a thing we propose to do now has ever been done before or not. The only question should be: Is it right, is it feasible, is it an improvement on the old? If these questions are answered affirmatively, it is our duty to push it to success.

The man who is always searching for precedents is not the man of progress. He simply stands rooted in the foot-prints of his ancestors with his face turned to the past. Progress means getting away from the past. The progressive man is the one who has stepped out of his father's footprints, and, with his face to the future, digs into its mysteries for the hidden truths always lying there awaiting to bless mankind just as soon and often as prejudices for the past can be overcome. The man who does not advance beyond where his father stood had just as well never have been born so far as any benefit he may be to humanity, for though he were to live a thousand years, he would leave the human race just where his father left it.

To think different thoughts from what our fathers thought, to do different deeds from what our fathers did, to discover truths our fathers never dreamed of—this is progress, and without it there can be no advancement.

The precedent hunter is a back number, stale and mossgrown, standing in the shade of the glory which belongs to dead ages. Afraid of the bright light of a higher civilization, he endeavors to prevent others from entering it by his persistent demands for precedents.

What is true of the individual singly is true of him collectively as a nation. Therefore let us cease this overzealous search for precedents. Let us search for the truth and act on the merits of every measure, regardless of what our ancestors may have done or thought.

If a reform measure escapes the precedent hunter, it is sure to be run down by the constitutional constructionist, who always stands ready to hurl the Constitution in the way of all progress. He has been at it from the foundation of the Government, and I presume he will keep at it till the end of time, for he seems never to learn anything.

Mr. Speaker, I have as high regard for the organic law of my country as I think should be required of any man, but I do not place an iron-clad construction upon it, as did the Jews upon their law, which visited the penalty of death upon one found gathering faggots on the Sabbath Day. The Constitution was made for man and not man for the Constitution. It is the creature of the people, made to give them greater liberties and benefits. If time has proved it not sufficiently elastic to permit the people to reach outward and upward in improvement and reform, then a little more elasticity should be injected into it, either by the construction of the courts, or by proper amendments. Nothing must stand in the way of our progress, not even the Constitution.

The fathers wisely provided the means by which this instrument could keep pace with reform ideas and principles. It ever has done so despite the objections of the strict constructionist, and it ever will, for the creator is mightier than the creature. History shows us that every step of progress made by humanity toward a higher civilization in either church or state has been made in the face of determined opposition by the precedent hunter and the strict constitutional constructionist. They are the barnacles which fasten themselves on the keel of the ship of state, from which they must occasionally be scraped to enable her to move forward at all.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, there are no constitutional difficulties in the way of the present proposition. They have all been removed by the action of the Government itself in the construction of the national road years ago, the building of levees on the Lower Mississippi to prevent overflow of lands, and many other internal improvements. But if there be any doubts in the matter, I think this a good time to run the ship into the dry dock and give her bottom a thorough scraping. She will sail all the smoother for it in the future.

OUTLINE OF PLAN.

Mr. Speaker, I desire now to outline briefly the plan of Government irrigation which I have in mind. I shall not enter into the details of such a plan, for these can only be perfected as the work proceeds. We will undoubtedly learn a great many things by practical operation which we do not know now; but we do know enough to begin, and in this case, as in most others, a good beginning is half the work.

In my opinion this Congress should at once establish an irrigation bureau under the Agricultural Department with a competent chief at its head, whose duty it should be to have sole charge of irrigation in the United States. He should be allowed all the help necessary to push the work. This bureau should be made permanent, for it will take many years to complete the work. Then under the supervision of this bureau the army officers, in order to make first cost as light as possible, should be put to work making a systematic survey of this whole region. The bureau should (1) ascertain the amount of water available under the different plans of obtaining water in the different watersheds; (2) the cost of ditches and reservoirs for collecting and storing the water during the season when it is not needed until the season of crop growing; (3) the amount of irrigable land.

This work should begin first in the more thickly settled portions of the territory to be irrigated in order to give speedy relief to those who have been struggling against drought and hot winds for years. As fast as finished in these portions, the work should be pushed into the wilderness, preparing the way for the civilization that will follow fast in its wake.

The drainage of this country, as in all others, consists of various basins or watersheds, each of which is drained by a certain stream or streams. For instance, in my district there is a section of country drained by the Platte and its tributaries. This is one watershed.

Another section is drained by the Loup Rivers and their tributaries; another by the Elkhorn; another by the Niobrara, and so on. Each one of these basins forms a natural basis for a system of irrigation. Each basin has its own water supply. Nature has established the lines regardless of any arbitrary boundaries established by man. This fact alone shows the problem to be interstate, therefore national. Hence the entire system must be operated regardless of State lines; otherwise the laws of Wyoming or Colorado might shut off the water supply of the citizens of Nebraska, and so on throughout the whole district.

When the surveys are begun in one or more basins, as may be thought best, the work in each should be completed, ready for the work of construction to begin before the survey in a new basin is taken up. As soon as the survey in any basin is complete the work of excavating should begin, and the water of the entire basin available for irrigation or manufacturing purposes should be made applicable before the parties having the work in charge are permitted to enter a new field. In this way we shall have each system complete in itself, and, although it may lie in one or more States, the equal rights of all residents of the same basin will be secured regardless of whether they reside in one State or a half dozen States. The Government will begin to derive revenue from this source just as soon as one system is complete, thus making the work self-supporting almost from the beginning.

I want it distinctly understood, Mr. Speaker, that my people are not asking something for nothing. We simply ask that the nation shall do for us that which is so essential to our welfare, and that which is impossible for us to do in a proper manner for ourselves, and give us proper time in which to reimburse the Government for all it expends. We ask this in the belief that it is the duty of the Government to do for its citizens what they individually or in small groups can not do for themselves.

We ask for no paternal gifts of any kind from this Government. What we ask for is fraternal help to aid us in surmounting difficulties we can not surmount alone. Neither are we proposing any Pacific Railroad "confidence" or subsidy "skin games" of any sort to fleece the people of millions. We propose that the people already in this country and those to follow, shall pay for all of the direct benefits derived from this system of irrigation, and no citizen be robbed of a dollar, while all will be greatly benefited. This can be accomplished by the Government retaining control of all water rights and charging each user of water a small annual water rental no larger than just sufficient to reimburse the Government in a reasonable period, say thirty or forty years, for money expended.

The object is to make the burdens of the settler in a new country just as light as possible consistent with safety to the Government. This would be an absolutely safe undertaking for both. Not only would the Government be absolutely sure of getting back all moneys expended, but it would be the most magnificent investment ever made by a government. It would not only add millions of citizens to our population, but citizens with homes, therefore contented, loyal, patriotic citizens, ready, if need be, to defend their flag and country; for in so doing they would be defending their homes.

Every home owner has a pecuniary interest in the Government. He feels that he is part and parcel of it. Each home is a tower of national defence. The more home owners we have the stronger we are. Therefore it should be the desire of every statesman to enact laws which will make it easy for the citizen to own his own home, for so long as we are a nation of home owners this Government is invincible. Make the people tenants by vicious legislation, or for want of legislation, and you have made the Government an easy prey to foes within and foes without. Therefore, I say, that a greater inheritance than millions of home-owning, self-supporting, loyal citizens, can no Government have.

STATE CONTROL.

Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a disposition on the part of some to confine this irrigation problem, so far as the Government is concerned, to Government lands. It is proposed to cede these lands to the States and allow the States to assume full control of the matter. As a representative in part of a State in which the Government has no agricultural lands left, I protest against any such arrangement for various reasons, any one of which seems to me a sufficient objection.

First. The lands owned by the Government suitable for agriculture are but a small part of the arid region, and if all were irrigated the problem would yet be unsolved. In several of these States the Government has no lands left that are fit for agriculture, either with or without irrigation.

Second. If these lands are ceded to the States, it will result in jobs and steals through State Legislatures, as so often has happened heretofore, by which the water rights will pass into the control of combines, and the agriculturist will continue to be their victim.

Third. Each State can only control a small portion of the arid district. This, as already stated, will cause a conflict of interests between the citizens of the different States, and result in endless litigation and loss.

Fourth. It is an interstate question, therefore a national one, and the Federal power is the only power capable of dealing with it successfully in a way to secure to all citizens their just rights.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The settlement of the Western country began in earnest with the beginning of the construction of the Pacific Railroad, and this system of irrigation should have begun with the completion of that road. It is not necessary for me to enter into the details of that colossal steal. It is sufficient to say, it was one of the most gigantic thefts of the people's wealth by corporate power that has ever been quietly submitted to by a civilized nation.

But for the enlightenment of those who are so afraid the Government will become paternalistic under the seductive influences of Populist doctrine, I desire to point out a few facts in connection therewith.

These facts were taken from a report made by the United States Railway Commission appointed by President Cleveland in 1887, in compliance with a law passed the same year. That report shows that this Government, under the control of the Republican party, gave to the Pacific corporations, ostensibly for the purpose of aiding construction, public lands and interest-bearing bonds aggregating in round numbers $447,000,000 of the people's wealth. In addition to this fabulous sum, municipalities voted millions more to aid in the construction of these roads. Yet the most inflated estimate of the actual cost of construction could not exceed $100,000,000.

In other words this Government, which is fighting so shy of paternalism, built these roads, gave them to its favorite sons, the corporations, and in addition $347,000,000 to run them with, and allowed them to charge the people twice what they ought to for transportation. This robbery has gone steadily on. We have to date been taxed $72,000,000 to pay the interest on $64,000,000 of the road's indebtedness. This $64,000,000 of original indebtedness is still unpaid. The people will continue to be taxed to pay the accumulating interest, and in the end we will have to pay the principal, for the security is not worth the paper on which it is written.

The sum total of Government donations to the Pacific Railroad Companies, as already stated, amounts to $447,000,000, besides the municipal donations of millions more, and all for the privilege of being robbed in their transportation. In the face of all this, C. P. Huntington has had the gall to lobby this Congress for the right to continue this robbery for the next hundred years. This is the paternalism I detest, and the kind the Populists are organized to exterminate.

Mr. Speaker, the average citizen learns something by experience, and so ought governments. It remains to be seen whether this Government will, in the light of all this experience, learn wisdom, or whether it will go on in its folly, sowing the wind from which it can hope to harvest nothing but whirlwind. This folly of granting to private corporations subsidies to do the work the Government ought to do should cease. We ought to face square about, inaugurate a new policy of reconstruction and reform, recognizing in that policy the rights of no monopoly composed of a less number than the whole people.

Mr. Speaker, the time to have inaugurated this policy was when these roads were constructed. What a grand opening that was for the beginning in practice of "a government by the people, of the people, and for the people," by constructing these roads and running them in the interests of the whole people!

This magnificent empire at that time was an absolute wilderness, without a foot of railroad and with scarcely an inhabitant. What a splendid opportunity to have followed this railroad building up with a system of irrigation throughout the whole region!

What a great saving to the people it would have been in money, hardship, and misery! It would not have cost the Government a cent in the end, and the people would have received an equivalent for every dollar paid out. But it is useless to weep over the mistakes and sins of the past. I only refer to them as the once hidden rocks of monopoly upon which the hopes and fortunes of so many millions of worthy citizens have been wrecked, that we may, by keeping our eyes on the beacon light of experience, avoid them in future.

PATERNALISM.

Mr. Speaker, is a word that has been in great demand ever since the organization of the Populist party. It has been hurled at us upon every occasion with a vim and energy worthy of a better cause. We are accused of seeking to establish a paternal government. Why should we seek to establish something we already have in its very worst form? Paternalism is just what we are organized to destroy.

What is paternalism in Government? It is the favoritism of the Government towards a few of its citizens by which they are given special privileges, enabling them to control the necessities of the people and rob them. The Pacific Railroad case just cited is an example. This is the Government paternalism of an unjust parent pure and simple.

But I think it should be called infernalism, for really that is its nature. No more paternal infernalism, if you please. We have already had too much of that under Republican and Democratic rule. Our motto is: "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none;" and we hope to see the day soon when the present paternal form of government, which means the Government for the few and the devil take the balance, will be changed to a fraternal form, which means the good of all.

It is a little strange, Mr. Speaker, that these people who suddenly became so frightened at this word upon the advent of the Populist party, never got scared at it before. It is not a new word. It embodies no new principle. This Government, be it said to our shame and sorrow, has been practicing paternalism for many years, as I have already shown, and these people have had, not only all of these years, but all these reasons for becoming scared before. But for some reason they never became frightened until the people began to organize to crush it out and endeavor to establish in its stead the principle of fraternalism. Then they at once saw the danger (to their own pet schemes) and began to shout "paternalism," which is simply the cry of "Stop thief." They are endeavoring to shift their own sins onto the new organization, break it down, and thereby perpetuate themselves in power and continue the very principle they pretend to dread so much.

It is very clear to me that this cry originated with the politician who was afraid of losing his job. It was taken up by the great trusts and combines, the Government's favorite children, who by this paternal discrimination in their favor have been made masters of the people as completely as ever the slave-driver was master of the black man.

As a matter of course, when any proposition is made looking to Government control of these interests, these fellows become frightened, and use "paternalism" as a catchword to fool the people with. It is taken up by the plutocratic press and heralded through the land as something dreadful, and to be avoided as a pestilence. It is echoed and reechoed by the politician and the fellow who is so full of party prejudice that he can not see a truth outside of his own party, though it be as large as a haystack.

All they say is true of the kind of paternal government which we have in this country, as we well know to our sorrow by practical experience. But the fact that they do not seem able to get through their heads is that it is their own parties that are guilty, and not the Populists. If they are so afraid of paternalism, let them help place the Populist party in control of the Government, and I assure them that it will be wiped out and replaced by fraternalism, which differs from it just as much as right differs from wrong.

The paternalism referred to here is that of the parent who gives to one of his children favors and opportunities he does not give to the others.

The principle of government is inherent in man, was born in him, and first appeared in the private family as paternal government. Out of this came patriarchal government through the banding together of the several families of a community for mutual benefit and protection, which they could not have as single families. This simply means a fraternal organization, the principle of which underlies all true government, and is that which we are contending for to-day.

Our Government was constituted by organizing all of the families of this great country into one fraternal organization known as the National Government. The relation that should exist between the Government and the people is not the same which exists between the parent and his helpless infant or a doting father and a favorite son, in which the father lavishes upon the son all the good things of life, while his brothers and sisters go hungry and ragged. The true relation is that existing between the members of a fraternal organization and its officers, the members contributing to the support of the organization according to their several abilities, the officers in turn enacting and executing the laws in such a way as to give protection to all alike.

EXAMPLES OF PATERNALISM.

Mr. Speaker, we have steadily grown away from the declaration of principles on which this Government was founded, and as steadily and surely grown into the very worst form of paternalism, of which I desire to give you a few more examples.

This change began in an early day by the Government giving away large grants of the people's property, known as swamp lands, to individuals and combines on the most frivolous pretexts.

This was followed by giving away franchises of different kinds worth millions to railroad and other corporations, a flagrant example of which is seen in the Pacific railroad deal already cited.

In addition to this the Government has practiced an equally bad form of paternalism in taxing all the people, regardless of their ability to pay, for the benefit of the favored few. In the early history of this Government a small tariff tax was placed on certain articles shipped into our ports from foreign lands, in order, by raising the price of them, to induce their manufacture in this country. This was done with the distinct understanding that said tariffs should only remain in force long enough for the home manufacturer to establish his business, when it should cease.

But as the lion, when he has tasted blood and learned how good it is, thirsts for more, so from that day to this the protected manufacturer has never ceased to beat at the doors of this Capitol, clamoring for more tariff, under which he has grown fat, sleek, and strong, while the masses have paid the bills and grown poor. When, because of the magnificent proportions to which he had grown, he could no longer plead the baby act, then he hid behind the laboring man and plead for protection to American labor against the pauper labor of Europe. But he has never neglected an opportunity to bring into this country this same pauper labor by the shipload to compete with the American laborer in his own dooryard.

This favorite child of the Government succeeded in making this beautiful theory work so well that the tariffs have steadily grown higher and higher, while he has grown fatter, sleeker, and stronger, until it has culminated under the McKinley bill in the highest tariff and the richest manufacturers the world ever saw, while millions of men and women are out of employment, and thousands of the enforced idle are organized into armies marching across the country seeking relief. This is paternalism in its worst form, but you can not get one of its beneficiaries to call it by that name, oh, no!

One more sample of this miserable paternalism, and I am done with this phase of my subject.

If there is one policy of this Government more thoroughly saturated than any other with paternalism that is absolutely vicious in its nature it is its financial policy. The poverty, want, misery, and crime resulting therefrom is absolutely beyond the mind of man to compute or imagine.

All through it we can see the finger-marks of the English parent who robs all his younger children to give to the oldest, so that the one may revel in luxury, though it beggars the rest to do it.

Under this policy the right to control the volume of our currency has been placed in the hands of a few of the Government's pets. By the granting of this special privilege the happiness and welfare of the millions were placed under control of heartless corporations, whose sole motive power is avarice. It is this money combine which has the Government by the throat to-day with the power to crush it the moment it fails to do the bidding of Wall street. Under this power we have the disgusting spectacle of seeing the Executive of the Nation hopping like a jumping jack at every pull of the string, and talking of the patriotism of the fellows who compose this combine, when everyone knows or ought to know that there is not now, nor ever was, a drop of patriotic blood in their veins.

History fails to show a single instance, even in the Government's darkest hour, when these fellows came to the nation's rescue or made any display of patriotism, except under circumstances which would yield them the largest dividends in return. It was this same money power that changed the terms of the bond payment, destroyed the greenback, passed the credit-strengthening act, demonetized silver in 1873, repealed the Sherman act in 1893, vetoed the seigniorage bill, and issued a new lot of bonds. It has steadily contracted the volume of the currency to one-half the amount necessary to do a sufficient amount of business to meet the requirements of our people. This has resulted in the loss of millions of dollars and thousands of homes to the wealth-makers. It has created paupers on the one hand and millionaires on the other.

I might cite many other examples of the paternalism with which our people have been cursed, but these will suffice to show how the Government has given to a few of her favored sons special privileges by which they have the people in their power as absolutely as the highwayman has his victim, and can rob them with greater dispatch and absolute safety.

Mr. Speaker, this is the sort of paternalism that has destroyed every Government which has gone down in history, and it will destroy this one if persisted in. This seems to me to be a good time to begin to check it, and I know of no better opening than in this matter of irrigating the great West. We can not begin a day too soon to head off, not the land-grabber, but the water-grabber, for the fellow who gets control of the water supply is absolute monarch of all he surveys.

THE PRESENT SITUATION.

But, Mr. Speaker, as above stated, I have no hope of getting any relief from Congress as now constituted. It is almost impossible to get even a hearing on this matter, to say nothing of action that will accomplish the work. Thousands of dollars are appropriated for monuments to dead men, thousands for firing the sun-down gun, millions to build cannons so large that it costs hundreds of dollars to fire them once, and millions more for the general interests of the East; but not one cent for irrigation, the West's greatest interest, although we are more than willing to repay it.

In conclusion, I will say that I have endeavored to arouse the interest in this body which the importance of the proposition demands, and whether I will succeed or not, I will have the satisfaction of knowing I have done my duty.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. CAMINETTI].

[Mr. CAMINETTI addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, as no other gentleman, I believe, wishes to speak on this question, and as we can not take a vote this evening, I will ask, as it is now nearly 5 o'clock, that the usual recess be now taken.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. COBB of Alabama, for one day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WOODARD, for two days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. RANDALL, indefinitely, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House of the Fifty-second Congress, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Alfred Rebsamin.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the recess be now taken.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House will now take its usual recess of Friday evening, without waiting until 5 o'clock.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROOKSHIRE] will perform the duties of the chair at the evening session.

The House (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. BROOKSHIRE, as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is now in session for the consideration of business under the special rule for Friday evening sessions.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills specified in the rule.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina) there were—ayes 20, noes 2.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we have enough people to work to-night; and I will have to make the point of no quorum, at least for awhile, to see how many are here.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Oh, no; I hope not. This is the first pleasant evening we have had; let us go on and do some work.

Mr. KILGORE. Oh, there are no members here yet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being made, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. KILGORE and Mr. MARTIN of Indiana were appointed tellers.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 1.

Mr. PICKLER. Is the point of no quorum withdrawn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that it is not insisted upon.

So (no further count being demanded) the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole under the special rule, and the Clerk will report the unfinished business coming over from the last session.

A bill (H. R. 5405)——

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, passing over bills that have been considered and disagreed to, we begin with Calendar No. 421, page 29.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, before that I wish to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill that has been before the committee on several occasions, and to which I think there can be no possible objection. I have letters furnished me—a letter from Gen. WHEELER and from the Speaker of the House, stating that the bill will be passed whenever it is taken up. It is a very meritorious bill.

A MEMBER. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. HULL. No. 5260. My people think that I am not doing my duty by not calling it up, especially as it is near the head of the Calendar. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be first considered, and afterwards I will make no objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one request already pending for unanimous consent. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. It concerns a bill on the Calendar (Calendar No. 406) for the relief of John C. Nuss. My inquiry is whether or not this is a bill of such a character as to require consideration at a Friday night session in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will send up the bill, the Chair will examine it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The bill is not to remove a charge of desertion or to remove a disability, but to revoke a finding of a court-martial.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I beg leave to suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that the parliamentary inquiry would hardly come up until the bill itself is called up.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I trust the gentleman will not raise that point now. I shall occupy but a moment.

This bill has been twice called up by myself in the House, and objection was there made to its consideration. The gentleman who objected asked if it had been considered, at a Friday night session in Committee of the Whole. I claim that it is not necessary that it should be so considered, and so stated at the time in the House; but I desire to ask a ruling of the Chair on that point. The object of the bill is to revoke the finding of a court-martial.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman refer to House bill No. 6926?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That is the number of the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the rule under which we are operating on these Friday night sessions provides:

That the House shall, on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m., take a recess until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Pensions—

This bill is not reported from the Committee on Pensions, but from the Committee on Military Affairs.

and the Committee on Invalid Pensions—

This bill is not reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

to bills for the removal of political disabilities—

This is not a bill for the removal of political disabilities—

and bills removing charges of desertion only.

This is not a bill to remove a charge of desertion. It therefore does not come within any of the provisions of the rule. The whole purpose of the bill is to modify the finding of a court martial dishonorably discharging a soldier for alleged mutiny after the war had closed.

I desire to ask the Chair for a ruling as to whether or not it is a bill that requires to be first considered in Committee of the Whole on Friday evening sessions?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has correctly stated the rule, which limits the consideration of bills at this session to those bills which have been reported from the Committee on Pensions, on Invalid Pensions, for the removal of political disabilities, and for the removal of charges of desertion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. This bill, then, being favorably reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, is on the Calendar; and it would be in the power of the House to pass the bill without going into Committee of the Whole for that purpose?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that this bill does not come within the provisions of the rule providing for Friday evening sessions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That is what I desire to know, Mr. Chairman. This bill carries no appropriation whatever.

THOMAS CORIGAN.

Mr. HULL. I want to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, which is practically at the head of the list, and then we can proceed under the request for unanimous consent made by the gentleman from Indiana. I ask that the House bill 5260 be acted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5260) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Corigan.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered to place on the invalid pension roll of the United States the name of Thomas Corigan, late a member of Company B of the Eighty-eighth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $72 per month, from and after the passage of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KILGORE. How is it that it should be considered out of its regular order?

Mr. HULL. It is at the head of the Calendar.

Mr. KILGORE. I have no objection myself, but I want to know how it comes up.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WEADOCK. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry as to whether this is the same bill that we spent nearly an evening on a while ago?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question of fact rather than a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HULL. It is; but I do not think there will be any objection to it now.

Mr. WEADOCK. I am anxious to save time. I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HULL. I move that it be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. KILGORE. As it is now before the House, let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. LACEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 5260) to increase the pension of Thomas Corigan from $30 to $72 per month, and submit the following report:

Thomas Corigan was a corporal in Company B, Eighty-eighth Illinois Infantry, enlisted July 28, 1862, and was discharged on January 24, 1864.

At the battle of Chickamauga, September 20, 1863, he was severely wounded in the left hand, and is now drawing a pension of $30 per month for that injury, the arm being rendered wholly useless by the wound. At the same time he was wounded by a buckshot in the neck, and the soldier claims that this wound has affected his spine and has produced epilepsy.

The medical evidence shows that the wound in the neck produces distinct crepitus on movement of the neck. The epileptic fits have gradually increased until the soldier is totally helpless and requires constant aid and attendance and has become almost imbecile mentally.

The Pension Bureau in 1892 holds that it can not accept the "fits" as a result of the wound in the back of the neck, but no other cause is evident, and medical evidence has been furnished to show that the wound in the neck is the cause of his present condition.

The soldier's condition is helpless in the extreme, and if the wound in the neck is the cause of his injury he would be entitled to $72 per month under the general law. We are not disposed to criticise the action of the Pension Bureau in rejecting this portion of the soldier's claim, but we think that it might have very fairly decided the other way under the evidence and examination of the medical boards.

Your committee think that the soldier should be given the benefit of the doubt to the extent of being raised to the second grade or $50 a month. The committee is adverse to reporting bills changing the rate of pension as fixed by the Pension Bureau, but in a case of extreme helplessnes like the present, where the wound has been followed by such helplessness, and there is much evidence to show that the soldier's condition is due to his wound, we are inclined to relax the rule.

Your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out "seventy-two," in line 7, and inserting "fifty."

If the case were before us as an original question, we would probably have come to a different conclusion from that arrived at by the Pension Bureau, but in the doubt raised in the case we think that the second grade would relieve the wants of the soldier and ought to be granted, especially as the claimant was an excellent soldier, highly commended by Col. F. T. Sherman, and his severe wounds received in the battle of Chickamauga are clearly shown.

The letter of Col. Sherman is as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE,
"SECOND DIVISION, FOURTH ARMY CORPS,
"Camp near Blains Cross Roads, East Tennessee, January 10, 1864.

"To whom it may concern:

"This is to certify that Thomas Corigan, an enlisted man of the Eighty-eighth Regiment Infantry Illinois Volunteers and corporal of Company B, same regiment, is a soldier good and true; ever faithful in the discharge of duty, never absent without leave, brave as a lion in action, and always at his post. He won the confidence and esteem of his commanding officers by his uniform good conduct and soldierly bearing. I therefore take great pleasure and bear willing testimony to his merit, and request that his wishes may be consulted, inasmuch as he is disabled from active field service by reason of wounds received on the hard-fought and bloody field of Chickamauga on the 20th of September, 1863.

"F. T. SHERMAN,
"Colonel Eighty-eighth Infantry, Illinois Volunteers."

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass after being amended by striking out the word "seventy-two," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I understood the gentleman to say that he had a letter from the President.

Mr. HULL. No, sir; I did not say that.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I understood you to say that you had a letter from somebody, giving a reason why this bill should be passed.

Mr. HULL. Some parties now living in Des Moines who were in the Confederate army——

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. It seems that business is being done now by writing letters. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL (continuing). Now citizens of Des Moines, and well acquainted with this gentleman, and they claim——

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Have the letters read.

Mr. HULL. I want to tell you first how they came into my possession.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Have them read.

Mr. HULL. I propose to have them read. These parties live in Des Moines, and I understand from their letters that they were formerly Confederates and now live in my town. They are well acquainted with the claimant in this bill, and they believe that he should have this increase of pension, and express their astonishment that objection should be made to it. One of them claims to be a personal friend of the Speaker, and the other a personal friend of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], and we all know that Gen. WHEELER was a gallant Confederate soldier, and they wrote letters to the Speaker and to Mr. WHEELER. These are their replies, and I will ask the Clerk to read them.

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 22, 1894.

DEAR SIR: Your letter is received. The bill to pension Mr. Corigan has passed the committee, and been favorably reported, and is in charge of Mr. LACEY. On some Friday night, perhaps next Friday, or the following one, Mr. LACEY will endeavor to bring it up and have a vote on it, and hopes he will be able to pass it.

Yours, very truly,

CHARLES F. CRISP.

Mr. WILLIAM BERRY,
Box 95, East Des Moines, Iowa.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 2, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter is received, and I am sorry to know of the opposition to Mr. Corigan's bill. If Mr. LACEY will bring it up at once I think it will pass without opposition, as some of the members who opposed it are absent. I return the letter from Mr. CRISP, thinking you may wish to preserve it.

Very truly, yours,

JOS. WHEELER,
Per S.

Mr. SAMUEL JONES,
Des Moines, Iowa.

[Laughter.]

Mr. HULL. I will yield to my friend from Alabama.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Like other members of Congress I try to have matters attended to well whether I am here or away. On the 2d day of August I was making speeches twice a day in the cause of the glorious Democracy of Alabama. On the 2d day of August I made a speech to a large audience at Scottsboro, Ala. That evening I went to Larkinsburg, Ala., made a speech that night to a large audience composed of the good citizens of that vicinity.

At half past 10 that night I took the cars, traveled between one and two hundred miles, and reached Florence the next morning, where I again made a speech to the good people of that city, and that night I had the pleasure of addressing the good citizens of Sheffield. It will therefore be seen that I had no time to write the letter which has been read; but in my absence my excellent clerk did the best he could in reply to that letter. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, since my name has been brought into that matter, I want to reply to the charges made that this Congress has been derelict in its duty; and I assert in reply to those charges, made on the Republican side of the House, that no Congress has occupied this Hall for a third of a century that has done as much to relieve the people and to aid in the prosperity of our land as has been done by the Congress now in session.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, I assert that the present Congress has passed more laws for the benefit of the people, and particularly for the farmers and laboring people in general, than any Congress for a third of a century.

Mr. HULL. One minute. I hope my friend will yield the floor to me. I yielded to him for an explanation of the letter.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will not hold it long.

Mr. HULL. I think there will be no objection to the gentleman printing his remarks.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. But then I want to express my views to the House.

Mr. KILGORE. I submit to the gentleman from Iowa and to the gentleman from Alabama that the gentleman from Iowa might be allowed to get through with his statement, and then the gentleman from Alabama might follow and consume all the time he pleases. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That would be very satisfactory to me.

Mr. HULL. I do not want the gentleman to take up all my time. I want to have a vote on this bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. From the moment that the House of Representatives voted for a law which required the people of wealth to pay a tax upon their incomes the metropolitan press, and I may say the press of all the large cities of the North without distinction of party, commenced a most virulent attack upon the House of Representatives, which they extended to the Senate the moment that body sanctioned this just measure by their vote. These papers, the all-powerful agencies in controlling public opinion, have successfully sought to convince the public that this House has been derelict of duty, or, to use their expressions, "has done nothing." In reply to this very unjust charge, I assert without fear of contradiction that no Congress for a third of a century has done one-tenth as much for the people as has been done by the Congress now in session.

REPEAL OF FEDERAL ELECTION LAWS.

We passed the law repealing the Federal election laws, laws which were enacted by Republicans and which have been a constant menace to American institutions.

According to our principles of government, and according to the spirit of the Constitution, all elections were directed to be "by the people."

But, according to the Republican election laws, which we have now repealed, the supervision and conduct of this important safeguard to liberty was virtually taken from the people and placed in the hands of Federal agents, in many cases foreign in interest and feeling to the people of the States whose elections they sought to control. Sometimes these Federal agents were good men, but when Federal officials desired to suppress the will of the people, the lowest and most unscrupulous villains, who disgraced the communities where they lived, were made the instruments to supervise and control the elections of free, honest, and patriotic Americans. Our best citizens were arrested on trumped-up charges, and outrages almost unparalleled were committed.

REPEAL OF LAW EXEMPTING GREENBACK OR NATIONAL-BANK MONEY FROM TAXATION.

Another unjust and un-American law has been repealed by this Congress. A million dollars of greenback or national-bank money might be piled up in a bank, and while it is protected by State and city authorities they were not allowed to tax the owner of this property one farthing. Policemen were employed to protect it and all the agencies of State and city governments were exercised to keep it secure and safe, and to pay this great expense other people, even including the poorest of the land, were taxed to meet these expenditures. This unjust law we have repealed, and in future the owners of this character of property will be compelled to pay taxes the same as other citizens.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. And then we passed a voluntary bankruptcy bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I must beg the gentleman not to interrupt me.

Mr. TAWNEY. All I desire to know is how much time elapsed between the passage of the bill repealing the Federal election laws and these other bills of which you speak?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. On account of opposition on the part of Republicans some time elapsed.

Mr. TAWNEY. About a year.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No; much less than a year.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPT ACT.

I was making an effort to state that the House has also passed a law which authorizes any citizen who is in debt to have himself declared bankrupt, and by that means become discharged of all indebtedness.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY THE PEOPLE.

The House has also passed a joint resolution providing for an amendment to the Constitution authorizing States to have their Senators elected directly by the people. The proposed amendment says:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, at large, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

The nearer the lawmakers are to the people the better and more beneficent will be the laws.

Mr. LOUD. Congress has not done that. It has only passed the House.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I stated that the resolution had passed the House.

SAFEGUARDS TO IMMIGRATION.

We have also passed a very beneficent measure (H. R. 5246) restricting and placing very important safeguards upon immigration.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. One question.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Do you think this bill ought to pass?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I have been trying to discuss the measure, but you gentlemen on the Republican side seem to desire to prevent discussion. [Laughter.]

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. If you do, why do you not let us vote on it?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Then, Mr. Chairman, we passed a law reclaiming 40,000,000 acres of lands worth a thousand million dollars. [Laughter.]

AN EMPIRE RECLAIMED TO THE PEOPLE.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the House has also passed this very important law by which it reclaims to the people 48,000,000 acres of land, which Republicans have permitted gigantic corporations to withhold and use and claim as their own, although they had no right to these lands whatever. Many of these lands contained valuable minerals, and their value has been estimated as exceeding $1,000,000,000.

ADMISSION OF UTAH, ARIZONA, AND NEW MEXICO.

I am also glad to remind the House and country that the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman has reported four bills for the admission of Territories into the sisterhood of States. Three of these bills, viz, the bills for the admission of Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico, have passed the House, and the one for the admission of Utah has already become a law. The bills for the admission of Arizona and New Mexico, after passing the House, have been favorably reported by the Senate committee, and are now on the Senate Calendar with every prospect of favorable action by that body. The fourth, a bill for the admission of Oklahoma, is now upon the House Calendar with every hope of prompt action.

BENEFICENT POSTAL LAWS.

We have also enacted laws very beneficial to the people upon our appropriation bills. On the Post-Office bill we extended the 1 cent a pound rate to—

All periodical publications issued from a known place of publication at stated intervals and as frequently as four times a year by or under the auspices of a benevolent or fraternal society or order organized under the lodge system and having a bona fide membership of not less than 1,000 persons or by a regularly incorporated institution of learning or by or under the auspices of a trades union and all publications of strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, including the bulletins issued by State boards of health, shall be admitted to the mails as second-class matter and the postage thereon shall be the same as on other second-class matter and no more.

Then by the judicious provisions in that bill regarding the manufacture and distribution of stamps, postal cards, etc., we hope to make an annual saving of at least $200,000, and although our appropriations for the Post-Office during the coming year reached the enormous and unprecedented sum of $87,240,599.55, which became necessary on account of the extended facilities given to the people, yet by our judicious and economical provisions, we feel confident that the Department will be self-sustaining and that every dollar of this sum will be returned to the Treasury.

MANY MILLIONS TO BE ANNUALLY SAVED.

Another great evidence of Democratic economy is shown by the position of the legislative bill which I hold in my hand, by which a great many offices have been abolished and the work of the Treasury Department materially simplified. These provisions are found on pages 49–52 of the legislative act approved July 31, 1894. By the economies instituted by this legislation and the economies inaugurated by the War Department and the Government Printing Office, by which thousands of surplus employés have been dispensed with, many million dollars are saved which under Republican administration was useless expense.

But this inauguration of economy in the administration of Government affairs would of necessity extend into all branches of the Government service, and result in the reduction of annual expenditure very many million dollars.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I make the point of order that the remarks of the gentleman are not germane to the subject.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that my remarks are in reply to charges which have been made by Republicans that this House has been derelict.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama are not in order.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that it is due to this House and to the rules of the House that the remarks of members shall be confined to the question that is under consideration.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Now, Mr. Chairman, on that point of order I want to say a word. A bill that has been brought up for consideration which appropriates money, and the charge has been made repeatedly, even by the gentleman from Indiana, that we are neglecting our duty here, and I want to show that we are not. That is pertinent to this bill. It applies to this bill as much as it does to all other bills. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The rule of the House is well understood. Paragraph 1 of Rule XIV is in these words:

When any member desires to speak or deliver any matter to the House he shall rise and respectfully address himself to "Mr. Speaker," and, on being recognized, may address the House from any place on the floor, or from the Clerk's desk, and shall confine himself to the question under debate, avoiding personalities.

Paragraph 8 of Rule XXIII provides that—

The rules of proceeding in the House shall be observed in Committees of the whole House so far as they may be applicable.

The gentleman from Alabama will observe the rule, which requires him to address himself to the question under debate. The question under debate now is a bill granting an increase of pension to Thomas Corrigan. The Chair asks the gentleman to confine himself to the question under debate.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest that it is not possible for the Chairman, or for the gentleman from Indiana who makes the point of order, to anticipate what will be the conclusion from the argument which the gentleman from Alabama proposes to present to the committee. [Laughter.] Besides, he has a right to talk about the state of the country, and especially about the state of the finances, because money must be provided to meet this proposed increase of pension. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The bill under consideration is a bill to increase the pension of Thomas Corrigan. The Chair holds that the gentleman from Alabama must proceed in order under the rule.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I shall endeavor to make my remarks applicable to the question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order and insist on the observance of the rule.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am coming right to the point. I do not think the gentleman ought to insist upon his point of order until he sees the applicability of my remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Does the gentleman say he is going to discuss this bill?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am going to discuss the propriety of passing this bill.

Mr. HUDSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. One question.

Mr. HUDSON. Have you any objection to the letter which you say was prepared by your clerk?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I have not seen either the bill or the report, and I never knew of that letter until it was produced by the gentleman from Iowa and read here a few moments ago.

Mr. HUDSON. But you have heard the letter read; now do you object to it?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The general tendency of the letter is probably all right. My clerk, I suppose, investigated the matter fully, but I have not seen him about it, and I do not know what was the result of the investigation.

Mr. HUDSON. Well, if you think the letter is all right, why not let us vote on the bill?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Then, Mr. Chairman, we passed a law to place on the free list agricultural implements, iron cotton ties, bagging for cotton, bags for grain, many agricultural seeds, cotton gins, and binding-twine. Besides this——

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Now, I am going to show how all these illustrations of the work of this Congress will enable us to pass this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the bill under consideration, as the rule requires him to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read paragraph 4 of Rule XIV.

The Clerk read as follows:

4. If any member, in speaking, or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call him to order; in which case he shall immediately sit down, unless permitted on motion of another member to explain, and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, without debate; if the decision is in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed, but not otherwise; and, if the case require it, he shall be liable to censure or such punishment as the House may deem proper.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I was going on in a very proper manner for the purpose of showing what appropriations had been made by this and previous Congresses——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. And the economy to be exercised by the passage of this bill. But I see that the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions objects to this line of remark. I hope he will allow me to go on without further objection. It will not take me long.

Mr. HUDSON. How much time does the gentleman want to occupy?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not want more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. HUDSON. Could you not make it five?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I think I ought to have fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to be allowed fifteen minutes?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do.

Several members objected.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Then I ask unanimous consent that I may print these remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. LOUD. I object.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, then, Mr. Speaker, I think I can make my remarks pertinent to this bill in a way that will satisfy even the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Pensions. But I am so unwilling that anyone should think I am transgressing the rules of the House that I renew my request that I be permitted to proceed without interruption for a period of only ten minutes.

Mr. HULL. I renew the request that the gentleman from Alabama have leave to print his remarks.

Mr. MAHON. I object.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am going to make some remarks perfectly pertinent to this question. Here is a proposition making appropriation——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. The gentleman from Alabama is too good a soldier to insist upon disobeying orders.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will not disobey orders. I will promptly comply with any suggestion from our excellent Presiding Officer. I have great respect for him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman from Alabama is as persistent in peace as he was in war.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. If in what I am going to say I do not make my remarks in order on this bill, I shall sit down. I have such great respect for the Chair that I would not transgress even a suggestion from him upon any subject.

Now, the question is about the means in the Treasury in order to make these appropriations proper——

A MEMBER. Regular order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. And in that line I will call attention to the fact that both the House and the Senate are Democratic, and that all Democratic Congresses have been so economical in their expenditures that we can with great propriety make the expenditure now proposed. And to prove this I will state some facts regarding appropriations.

For six years prior to the Forty-fourth Congress the average appropriations by the various Congresses—all Republican Congresses—was $181,000,000 a year. Then the Forty-fourth Congress——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not proceeding in accordance with the ruling of the Chair, and is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not catch the last remark of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am proceeding to show that in the line of economy——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The gentleman from Alabama has not the consent of the House to proceed.

Mr. KILGORE. But he has the floor, and he has the right to proceed in order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, I can stay here an hour doing something.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman from Alabama to proceed in order. He has had long service on the floor, and is familiar with the rules.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I shall certainly try to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels sure the gentleman from Alabama does not desire to trangress the rules of the House.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I assure the Chairman, for whom I have great respect, that I am trying to keep strictly in order.

Now, the Forty-fourth Congress came in, and it economized appropriations so that the average annual appropriation was only $149,000,000.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Alabama is not proceeding in order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that on a bill making an appropriation of money it is proper to show the condition of the Treasury.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama will suspend. The Chair will again call the attention of the committee to the rule:

If any member, in speaking or otherwise, trangress the rules of the House the Speaker shall, or any member may, call him to order—

Now, in this case the gentleman has been called to order—in which case he shall immediately sit down, unless permitted on motion of another member to explain, and the House shall, if appealed to, decide the case without debate. If the decision is in favor of the member called to order he shall be at liberty to proceed, but not otherwise.

Under the universal practice of the House when a member has been called to order for exercising liberty in debate it has been——

Mr. TATE. I move that the gentleman proceed in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Allow the Chair to conclude his statement. It has been the practice, as the Chair remembers, to allow a motion that a gentleman be permitted to proceed in order; and if the committee or the House desire him to proceed in the line of remarks he is pursuing, it is within the power of either, as the case may be, to so determine. It seems to be in the power of the House to say whether or not a gentleman may proceed in the line of remarks he is pursuing.

Mr. HUDSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes.

A MEMBER. What, out of order!

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I object.

Mr. TATE. I move that the gentleman be allowed to proceed in the line of remarks he is pursuing, for fifteen minutes.

Mr. MAHON. That, I believe, is debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not debatable, under the rules.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Allow the Chair first to state the pending motion. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the gentleman from Alabama be allowed to proceed for fifteen minutes in the line of remarks he has been pursuing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask whether or not that motion is in order under the circumstances? Is it not true that the only motion in order is that the gentleman be allowed to proceed in order or to explain under the rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the practice has been to allow a gentleman to proceed in the line of remarks he is pursuing, if such be the will of the House. That was decided, as the Chair recollects, in a case that arose in the Fiftieth Congress, by Speaker Carlisle. The Chair has been trying to recall the case.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Is that motion debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Alabama has been called to order by the Chair, is it in order to entertain any motion that he be allowed to continue in that line of remarks which have been held to be entirely out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so, under the practice of the House. It is, of course, with the committee to say whether the gentleman shall proceed in the line of remarks he is making or not. The Chair will submit the question.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. TATE; and, on a division, there were—ayes 24, noes 31.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Now, Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. When a bill is before the House which appropriates money, is it proper, in discussing the bill, in the opinion of the Chair, or is it pursuing a proper line of argument to state the condition of the Treasury?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would be.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That is what I was trying to do.

Mr. MAHON. I call the gentleman from Alabama to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has only asked a parliamentary question.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I understand that the gentleman is called to order——

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. A motion was made that the gentleman be permitted to proceed, which motion was voted down. Now, can the gentleman from Alabama proceed exactly as if that motion had been voted up?

Mr. HEPBURN. That is the question I wanted to submit.

The CHAIRMAN. He can not.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Then I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not entitled to the floor.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is the point. The gentleman has not the floor, but was taken off the floor by the direct action of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true. The gentleman from Alabama, by a vote of the committee, of course can not proceed in the line of the remarks he was pursuing.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. But he can proceed on the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Let me make a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I wish to ask whether or not the gentleman can be permitted to proceed at all, in view of the action of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he can proceed in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I insist that he can not, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. He can not proceed out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. He can not proceed at all. The committee have so decided.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, if the gentleman gets the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I make the point that the House having refused the gentleman permission to explain, that that takes him off his feet and he looses the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. And he can not proceed in violation of the action of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all. The gentleman was recognized for the purpose of debate, and can proceed under the rules, in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. But under the rules——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana (continuing). When a member is called to order, after he takes his seat he may be permitted to explain, if the House votes that he be permitted to explain; but the question is whether he shall continue in debate after the House has decided against him, and I hold that he can not; otherwise the making of a point of order would be of no avail, and might just as well be waived if a member is not to be controlled by the rules in the House or in committee. I am quite sure I am right about this.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman has the right to proceed in order.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But the House has refused to hear him.

The CHAIRMAN. The action of the House was only taken on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, that he be permitted to proceed in the line of remark he was pursuing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. With due respect to the Chair, I think I am right, but will not appeal.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Is an appeal in order from the decision of the Chair? If so, I make that appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. Not from a parlimentary inquiry.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. No; but from the decision of the Chair. The Chair has decided that the gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor. From that decision I appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not allow an appeal upon a question of recognition. The matter of recognition is entirely with the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the Chair permit me just one moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I call the attention of the Chair to the latter clause of Rule——

The CHAIRMAN. What rule?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Section 4 of Rule XIV. The latter clause of it provides.

If the decision is in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed, not otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think a proper interpretation of that rule would prevent the gentleman from proceeding in order.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Well, it is very evident that the gentleman does not intend to proceed in order. He intends to proceed in the same line that he was going on.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I abandoned the line I was on before, dropped my papers, and came back to speak on this bill. Now, the annual saving by the Forty-fourth Congress was $32,000,000——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that the gentleman is not in order. He was taken off the floor by the action of the House. He proposes now to make another speech. I submit, sir, that he is not entitled to speak until all other members who are entitled to speak have been heard.

The CHAIRMAN. But no other gentleman asked recognition. [Cries of "Oh, yes."]

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Oh, yes; half a dozen asked recognition.

Mr. PICKLER. He has occupied the floor all the time.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman has attempted to occupy the floor. I make the point now that he is not in order; that he has spoken once. That speech has been concluded by the action of the House, and under the rule he is not entitled to occupy the floor again. [Cries of "That is right!"]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, shall I proceed?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Not now.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Wait until your turn comes.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am unwilling to embarrass the committee or the Chair, and as I see there is a determination to embarrass the Chair, I yield the floor; but I ask unanimous consent to print the few remarks that I had prepared to make.

There was no objection.

BENEFICENT LAWS PASSED BY THIS CONGRESS.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I will now connectedly state some of the laws which come to my mind which have been enacted by this Congress. They are as follows:

1. The repeal of the Federal election laws, which will forever prevent any interference in elections by Federal officials.

2. The law providing for taxing greenback and national-bank money.

3. The voluntary bankrupt act.

4. A beneficent law restricting and placing safeguards upon immigration.

5. Law to amend the Constitution so that Senators may be elected by the people.

6. Law reclaiming 48,000,000 acres of land, worth $1,000,000,000, and now illegally held by corporations.

7. Laws to admit Utah, New Mexico, and Arizona into the sisterhood of States.

8. Laws extending mail facilities, reducing postal expenditures, and reducing postage upon periodical publications.

9. Removing all tax from the following articles used by farmers, by placing them on the free list, viz: Agricultural implements, iron cotton ties, bagging for cotton, bags for grain, salt, many agricultural seeds, cotton gins, binding twine.

10. Besides this the House has reduced the tax on nearly everything bought by farmers from one-half to one-fifth the tax which was imposed by Republicans.

11. Congress has also abolished thousands of offices, so as to reduce the expenses of the Government many million dollars.

12. Last, though probably most important, this Congress has passed an income-tax law, which requires people of wealth to pay their part of the burdens of Government; and all this legislation will remove hardships and lift burdens from men who work, and, in addition, the law is so framed as to increase the foreign demand, and therefore the price, of American farm products.

TEMPORARY DEPRESSION THE FIRST EFFECT OF ALL REFORMS.

The Republican press are filled with denunciations of the Democratic party, charging them day after day with the responsibility of the temporary depression which prevails throughout our land, and they grow eloquent in depicting the discontent which exists among many of our good citizens.

Mr. Speaker, it is not strange that the depression in business, reduction in prices of products, and the distress which has been attendant thereto, should have caused great discontent throughout our land. And it is not strange that the party in power should be held responsible for this condition. But, Mr. Speaker, when we look into the history of the past we find that in all great reforms the first effect has invariably been similar to our experience during the last year or more. The older members of Congress no doubt recall the great distress, bankruptcy, and ruin which followed the financial reform inaugurated by that heroic Democrat, Andrew Jackson.

This great commoner and friend of the people found it his duty to attack the powerful vampire octopus, the United States Bank, which was denounced by President Jackson in these words:

The result of the ill-advised legislation which established this great monopoly was to concentrate the moneyed power of the Union.

Gen. Jackson also said:

It is to be regretted that the rich and powerful too often bend the acts of government to their selfish purposes.

He also said that the—peculiar privileges bestowed upon it enabled it to exercise despotic sway over the other banks in every part of the country. From its superior strength it could seriously injure, if not destroy, the business of any one of them.

In his address Gen. Jackson also said:

That it asserted the power to make money scarce or plenty at its pleasure at any time and in any quarter of the Union by permitting an expansion or compelling a contraction of the circulating medium according to its own will.

Gen. Jackson said the bank charter—gave to its advocates the position they had to struggle to attain from the commencement of the Federal Government down to the present hour.

As might be expected, the beneficiaries of legislation which maintained this gigantic monopoly used every effort to retain the special privileges thus bestowed upon them, and the result was a struggle which, though it resulted in a victory for the people, brought with it unparalleled temporary distress, bankruptcy, and ruin. Cotton, which averaged 18 cents in 1835, fell as low as 12 cents in 1836 and 7 cents in 1837.

Younger members of this House will recall the general depression which followed the passage of the Walker tariff of July 30, 1846, and they will also recall how soon the country recovered, and how bounteous was the prosperity with which we were blessed soon after that law went into operation.

TEMPORARY DEPRESSION CAUSED BY REVENUE TARIFF OF 1846, FOLLOWED BY UNEXAMPLED PROSPERITY.

In a speech I had the honor to make in this Hall on May 4, 1888, I alluded to the depression which existed during the pendency and immediately following the passage of the bill, and quoted from the messages of President Polk, in which he portrayed the wonderful revival of business and unexampled prosperity which without much delay resulted from the passage of that act. President Polk said:

Its effects are visible in the great and almost unexampled prosperity which prevails in every branch of business. While the repeal of the prohibitory and restrictive duties of the act of 1842, and the substitution in their place of reasonable revenue rates levied on articles imported according to their actual value, have increased the revenue and augmented our foreign trade, all the great interests of the country have been advanced and promoted. The great and important interests of agriculture, which had been not only too much neglected but actually taxed under the protective policy for the benefit of other interests, have been relieved of the burdens which that policy imposed on them, and our farmers and planters, under a more just and liberal commercial policy, are finding new and profitable markets abroad for their augmented products. Our commerce is rapidly increasing, and is extending more widely the circle of international exchanges.

After calling attention to the fact that the reduction of taxation had been quite as advantageous to the manufacturing as to other industries, he said:

While the interests of agriculture, of commerce, and of navigation have been enlarged and invigorated, it is highly gratifying to observe that our manufactures are also in a prosperous condition. None of the ruinous effects upon this interest, which were apprehended by some as the result of the operation of the revenue system established by the act of 1846 have been experienced. On the contrary, the number of manufactories and the amount of capital invested in them are steadily and rapidly increasing.

President Polk also said:

While by the repeal of highly protective and prohibitory duties the revenue has been increased, the taxes on the people have been diminished. They have been relieved from the heavy amounts with which they were burdened under former laws in the form of increased prices or bounties paid to favored classes and pursuits.

The President then points out that experience has falsified the predictions of the high-protective theorists. On this point Mr. Polk said:

Agriculture, commerce, and navigation are prosperous, the prices of manufactured fabrics and other products are much less injuriously affected than was to have been anticipated.

From 1847 to 1861 the progress and prosperity of our country under that law far exceeded the progress of any nation at any period in the history of the world.

MR. BLAINE COMMENDS REVENUE TARIFF.

Even Mr. Blaine, in his history, joins his testimony to this indisputable fact of history. He characterizes the tariff law of 1846 as a free-trade tariff. On page 105 Mr. Blaine says:

The free-trade tariff of 1846 was passed.

And in describing the effect of that law upon the prosperity of the country Mr. Blaine says—I read from page 196:

The Whig victory of 1848 was not sufficiently decisive to warrant any attempt, even had there been desire, to change the tariff. Gen. Taylor had been elected without subscribing to a platform or pledging himself to a specific measure, and he was therefore in a position to resist and reject appeals of the ordinary partisan character. Moreover, the tariff of 1846 was yielding abundant revenue, and the business of the country was in a flourishing condition at the time his Administration was organized. Money became very abundant after the year 1849; large enterprises were undertaken, speculation was prevalent, and for a considerable period the prosperity of the country was general and apparently genuine.

After 1852 the Democrats had almost undisputed control of the Government, and had gradually become a free-trade party. The principles embodied in the tariff of 1846 seemed for the time to be so entirely vindicated and approved that resistance to it ceased not only among the people but among the protective economists, and even among the manufacturers to a large extent. So general was this acquiescence, that in 1856 a protective tariff was not suggested or even hinted by any one of the three parties which presented Presidential candidates.

I have alluded to these facts as they are a reflex of what is occurring at the present day. We are enacting a law based upon the same lines and the same principles as the Walker tariff of 1846, and there can be no doubt but what its beneficent results will be very similar to those which blessed us at that time.

It would be well for those who opposed the passage of the reform tariff bill now before the House to observe Mr. Blaine's assertion that the principles, very similar to those contained in this bill, which were embodied in the tariff law of 1846 were approved not only among the people, but also among the protective economists and manufacturers. Further, on the same page, Mr. Blaine says:

It is not surprising, therefore, that * * * the Democratic Congress, in the closing session of Pierce's Administration, enacted what has since been known as the tariff of 1857. By this law the duties were placed lower than they had been at any time since the war of 1812. The act was well received by the people, and was indeed concurred in by a considerable proportion of the Republican party.

I desire now to call attention to the fact that among the prominent Republican Senators who spoke in favor of and voted for this extremely low tariff bill of 1857, were Senators Sumner and Wilson of Massachusetts, Senators Hamilton Fish and Seward of New York, Senator Foster of Connecticut, and Bell of New Hampshire. Senator Toucey, the Democratic Senator from Connecticut, also voted for the bill, and to use Mr. Blaine's words:

In the House the New England Representatives generally voted for the bill.

This included the Representatives of Maine, all of whom supported this extreme free-trade measure.

PANICS CAUSED BY VARIOUS BENEFICIARIES OF VICIOUS LEFISLATION IN 1836, 1846, AND 1892.

I have shown that a temporary depression is always the first effect of great reforms. The beneficiaries of special privileges given by vicious legislation use the power and money thus acquired to prevent the passage of laws which place them upon equality with other men. This was done in 1836, and again in 1846, at which time it would have been more severely felt had it not been that their efforts to depress business were in a great measure neutralized by the activity consequent to the preparations for and the carrying on of the war with Mexico; but never in the history of any country did the beneficiaries of vicious legislation use more efforts to create bankruptcy, panic, and ruin than were used by such men immediately after the inauguration of Mr. Cleveland. In my former speeches I gave extracts from newspapers and other incontrovertible evidence that in the spring of 1893 the moneyed men and manufacturers of the northeast and north combined together for the avowed purposes of withholding money from the channels of trade, refusing credits to the South and West, and by other means, bringing about depression and discontent throughout the country, the purpose being to disparage the Democratic Administration, prevent the passage of laws which interfered with their special privileges, and, if possible, secure the restoration of the Republican party to power.

REMARKABLE EVIDENCE OF DEMOCRATIC ECONOMY.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, give a comparison of appropriations by Democratic and Republican Congresses, showing the hundreds of millions of dollars that have been saved by the Democrats in the last few years. The Republican party controlled the House of Representatives from 1860 to March, 1875. The Forty-fourth Congress, with a Democratic majority, then took their seats in this Hall.

During the five years immediately preceding the Forty-fourth Congress, the average regular annual appropriations by Republicans were	$181,826,321.52
The Democrats then came into control of the House of Representatives, and immediately reduced the regular annual appropriations to	149,572,894.44
Thus making an annual saving of	32,253,427.08
The Republicans again came into control of all branches of the Government in the Forty-seventh Congress, and they immediately increased the annual average appropriations to	264,652,624.96
This was an annual average increase by Republicans in excess of Democratic appropriations of	86,034,554.04
In the Forty-eighth Congress the Democrats again had control of the House, and they immediately reduced the annual average appropriations to	212,652,935.63
Thus making an annual saving to the people of	51,999,689.33
During the six years of Democratic rule in the House of Representatives following the Forty-seventh Congress the average annual appropriations were	253,587,560.05
The Republicans then obtained control in the Fifty-first, commonly called "the Reed Congress," and immediately increased the average annual appropriations to	382,150,961.17
Which was an increase above the average annual appropriations during the preceding six years when the House was controlled by Democrats, of	128,563,401.12
For the first time in a third of a century the Democrats now have control of all branches of the Government, and notwithstanding Republican laws, which compel them to appropriate $151,581,570 for pensions, and notwithstanding many other expenses made necessary by Republican laws, they have succeeded in reducing appropriations, as they passed the House, to	380,107,455.24
A reduction below the appropriations of the "Reed Congress" of	2,043,505.93

In these calculations I have confined the figures to the annual appropriations by Congress, regarding that as the juster method of comparison. If we should include permanent appropriations, the comparison of the present Congress with the Reed Congress will be as follows:

Reed Congress, first session	463,398,510.79
Reed Congress, second session	525,018,672.55
Present Congress, second session	481,182,135.24
The appropriations this year would be much less, but the appropriations for pensions exceed that of the first session of the Reed Congress by	27,822,201.65
And the appropriation for the Post-Office by the present Congress exceeds that of the Reed Congress for the same purpose by	15,013,900.56

Most of which latter sum will be returned to the Treasury, as our eminent Postmaster-General has inaugurated many improvements in the postal system and economies in all branches of the service.

The figures which I have given for the appropriations of the present Congress are as the bills passed the House. Since preparing these figures all the bills have passed the Senate, and all have been sent to the President except the sundry civil and general deficiency bill. The appropriations as they stand to-day for this Congress are as follows:

Agriculture	$3,219,023.06
Army	23,592,384.68
Diplomatic and consular	1,563,918.76
District of Columbia	5,544,593.57
Fortifications	2,427,004.00
Indian	9,329,648.49
Legislative, etc.	21,308,295.79
Military Academy	406,523.08
Navy	25,327,126.72
Pension	151,581,570.00
Post-Office	87,236,599.55
River and harbor	11,473,180.00
Sundry civil*	32,523,393.80
Deficiencies	5,617,641.85
Miscellaneous	515,000.00
General deficiency*	5,005,632.58
	386,371,425.93

*As passed by the House.

As passed by the Senate, the sundry civil bill is $36,216,166.70, and the general deficiency bill is $7,939,551.41. Both of these bills are in conference and will be acted upon very soon. This evidence of economy on the part of the Democratic party ought to be very gratifying to every patriot of our land.

I can not express too much admiration for the good judgment and arduous labors of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and the House and their preëminent chairmen, Senator COCKRELL and Governor SAYERS. They are entitled to the highest commendation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, there is a minority report in this case, which I would like to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be read in the time of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KILGORE. I am quite willing that it shall be read in my hour. [Laughter.]

The minority report (by Mr. MCDANNOLD) was read, as follows:

The minority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 5260) to increase the pension of Thomas Corigan, and submit the following statement of their views:

The records of the War Department show that this soldier served from July 25, 1862, to January 29, 1864, in Company B, Eighty-eighth Illinois Infantry. He was discharged on account of disability from gunshot wound of hand received at Chickamauga. He has been pensioned for this wound ever since discharge, and now receives $30 per month since August 4, 1886. His application, filed February 12, 1864, alleged only this wound.

A later application, filed September 11, 1866, states that he also "suffers pain in the neck from the effects of a wound there received." In 1887 he claimed that deafness had resulted from that wound, and states that the ball was removed in the field hospital; in April, 1888, he alleged resulting impairment of vision and of hearing; in September, 1888, he refers to "buckshot wound in back of neck;" in February, 1892, he alleged affection of sight and hearing and epilepsy as a result of said wound.

In September, 1892, the Pension Bureau accepted the fact that he had received this wound in the neck, but rejected the claim for additional pension on the ground that he had suffered no ratable disability from it at any time since the war, and none of the alleged results were accepted as sequences of such wound. This action was taken after a careful special examination of the claim and was affirmed by Secretary Bussey, on appeal, January 3, 1893.

In his deposition before the special examiner in June, 1892, the pensioner stated that he received the wound of neck at Chickamauga; that the doctor who took the bullet out put a sticking plaster over the wound and it remained until it fell off.

"The first time I felt any serious disability from the wound of my neck was about fourteen years ago (1878). I was flagging at a railroad crossing * * * in Chicago. I felt a cloud come over me and I fell down right in the track. * * * It was a hot day just like this. * * * I have had convulsions for the past fourteen years, but not so much until the last eight years. I saw the shot that was extracted from my neck. I had it a long time. I lost it. It was a buckshot, and went as far as the point of my ear. The doctor said to me when he extracted it, 'Pat, if the shot had gone a quarter of an inch further you would never eat any more potatoes.' * * * I was not bothered with the wound of my neck in 1873, but I knew I had been shot in the neck. In 1875 I was not suffering with the wound in my neck much."

His wife, Rosetta Corigan, corroborates his statement as to the first convulsion or fit about fourteen years previously.

An examination by medical officers of the Pension Bureau September 6, 1873, reports: "Flesh wound on the neck, not rated;" September 7, 1875, "slight flesh wound on the back of neck, not rated;" September 4, 1877, "slight wound of neck, not rated;" June 22, 1892, "wound on posterior surface of neck, size of a nickel, white in color, nonadherent, nondragging, nondepressed, the vertebræ do not seem to have been injured, but there is thickening of soft tissues beneath the integument."

From the facts stated it seems reasonably clear that the pensioner's present condition as to epilepsy is not chargeable to the slight wound of the neck, but rather originated in 1878 in the manner described by himself and wife.

Moreover, he is in receipt of a pension of $1 a day and the question involved is purely one for the determination of the Pension Office, and the committee has repeatedly refused to interfere in the individual adjudications of the Pension Bureau in matters clearly within their jurisdiction and presenting no technical hardship. To pass this bill is squarely in violation of the principle enunciated in several adverse reports on bills of this character, and the minority do earnestly recommend that the bill do lie on the table.

JOHN J. McDANNOLD,
M. R. BALDWIN,
C. J. ERDMAN.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know who made the majority report in this case?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that it was prepared by the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. LACEY.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if he thinks a man ought not to get an increase of pension because he was shot in the neck?

Mr. KILGORE. Well, a great many people get shot in the neck and sometimes they fall down in the street after being shot, but it does not always follow that they ought to be pensioned. Mr. Chairman, from the reading of the minority report I did not catch just when it was that the ball was extracted from this man's neck.

Mr. HULL. I ought to say that the man denies absolutely telling the inspector what the inspector reports him to have said. As a matter of fact, his mind is affected, and he is liable to say one thing at one time and another thing at another time.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. What is his age?

Mr. HULL. He looks as if he were 90, but he is probably between 60 and 70.

Mr. KILGORE. Is it claimed in the majority report that this flesh wound in the neck created any disability at all?

Mr. HULL. It is claimed in the majority report that the flesh wound in the neck is the probable cause of all his trouble apart from the disability of his hand, for which he was pensioned. I want to say further that the majority report should have quoted more fully from the reports of the boards of examiners.

For example, in 1867, the local board found that he could not raise his arm above a certain point, and that there was some difficulty as to the rotary motion of the head. Every board of examiners in Des Moines during the past ten years, and during that time we have had both Republican and Democratic boards, have held that that was the reasonable and probable cause of his epilepsy and paralysis.

Mr. KILGORE. It was simply a flesh wound in the neck according to the report.

Mr. HULL. True; but you do not know how far the ball went in. When he moves his head there is crepitus, as you will find stated in the report. It is a case of a difference of opinion between the doctors here in the Pension Office and the doctors who have examined the man personally. If there was no doubt in the case he would be entitled to $12 a month under the law, but the committee fix $50 a month as a compromise.

Mr. KILGORE. If he is paralyzed, and if there was no doubt that the paralysis came from the gun-shot wound, the gentleman's statement would be correct; but I know something about people being shot, and the idea of a man living for fifteen or twenty years without feeling any inconvenience from a flesh wound and then all at once becoming paralyzed from it is absurd. I don't care how many doctors, or boards, or members of Congress lay down that proposition, it is absurd.

Mr. HULL. But there is no telling whether the ball ever was taken out.

Mr. KILGORE. It is within the comprehension of any man of ordinary intelligence that a flesh wound could not affect a man so as to produce any degree of paralysis. It might affect some of the muscles of his neck, and might perhaps affect the motion of his head a little, but it could only affect the muscles through which it passed. It could not produce the slightest degree of paralysis, and it is ridiculous to talk about it.

Mr. HULL. There is no evidence that the ball has ever been removed.

Mr. KILGORE. He says it was, himself.

Mr. HULL. The man says that he never did say that.

Mr. KILGORE. He says himself that the ball was extracted, and that he kept it twelve or fourteen years.

Mr. HULL. Well, he writes me about once or twice a week, and he says that he never did say that—that the statement is absolutely false.

Mr. KILGORE. Why, that is the principal testimony that the majority rely upon.

Mr. HULL. No. The testimony they rely upon consists of reports of the different local boards that have examined him personally, commencing in 1867 and running down to the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The question being taken; there were—ayes 31, noes 25.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KILGORE and Mr. HULL were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 26.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum has voted.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MAHON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent was given to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] to-night to print remarks on the general subject of pensions. I ask that unanimous consent be given to all present to-night to do the same.

Several members objected.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then I move that consent be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks, in the absence of a quorum, such an order could not be made. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I move a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 18, noes 24.

Mr. MAHON. Yeas and nays.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I make the point of order that the rule of the House provides that 15 members may have a call of the House. Here are 18 demanding it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would require a majority of the 15, if that were the total number present. Less than that number, however, could not order a call, or compel the attendance of the absent members.

The question now is on ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. TATE. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 26; noes none.

Mr. MAHON. The yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

LOUIS A. YORKE—VETO MESSAGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I hereby return without my approval Senate bill numbered 1438, entitled "An act for the relief of Louis A. Yorke."

In the year 1886 the beneficiary named in this bill was a passed assistant paymaster in the Navy. In December of that year he appeared before a naval examining board, convened pursuant to law for the purpose of passing upon his fitness to be promoted to the grade of paymaster.

The investigation of the board was conducted fairly and thoroughly. Much of the evidence relating to the candidate's moral fitness for promotion was documentary and the examination touching his professional competency was of the usual character in such cases.

Considerable evidence was before the board showing quite a large amount of personal indebtedness owing by the candidate, and it appeared that in a few instances his accounts with the Navy Department had not been promptly settled. It was also shown that he had not at all times deposited the Government money intrusted to his care, in the places required by law and the regulations of the Navy. In connection with his personal indebtedness incidents and circumstances were brought to light which certainly indicated that he entertained very lax ideas of honest dealing and fairness, and which developed a disregard of the obligations and requirements of his position as an officer in the Navy. He was given abundant opportunity to meet and explain every damaging allegation and every adverse inference arising from the evidence, and his claim, not without foundation it appeared, that the charges against him were instigated by malice, was doubtless given full weight.

The examining board on the evidence made the following decisions and findings:

"The written examination of the candidate shows that he is deficient in his knowledge of the duties appertaining to the next higher grade; and the record evidence puts in question his moral fitness, and he has failed to establish both his professional and moral qualifications for promotion to the satisfaction of the board:

"Therefore, we hereby certify that Passed Assistant Paymaster Louis A. Yorke, United States Navy, has the mental fitness to perform efficiently all the duties both at sea and on shore of the next higher grade; but he has not the professional and moral qualifications required, and we do not recommend him for promotion."

After the board had thus disposed of the case and adjourned it was, at the request of the candidate, reconvened by order of the Secretary of the Navy, who issued for its guidance the following directions among others:

"The board will inform Passed Assistant Paymaster Yorke of its findings and of the evidence upon which it finds him to be not morally qualified for promotion and will afford him a further hearing and an opportunity to present such evidence as he may desire as to his moral fitness for promotion."

The board met pursuant to such order on the 4th day of January, 1887, when the findings of the board were read to the candidate for promotion and also the evidence upon which said findings were based, and he was informed that the board would accord him a further hearing as to his moral fitness for promotion and would afford him reasonable time in which to submit his case. Thereupon he requested the board to allow him until the 26th day of January to produce the necessary witnesses in his behalf. This request was granted, but on the day appointed, upon his representation that he was then unable to submit his defense, he was upon his request allowed another day for that purpose.

In availing himself of the opportunity thus afforded him to present evidence in defense or explanation of the matters charged against him, he examined no witnesses and contented himself with presenting his own statement, containing little more than a reiteration of statements he had already made before the board at previous meetings, supplemented by slight documentary evidence which established no new facts in his favor.

The board thereupon reviewed all the evidence and proofs which had been submitted during the entire examination, and after full consideration decided that there was nothing in the additional evidence produced to warrant a modification of the original finding, and the board therefore again certified and decided that the candidate had not the moral qualifications to perform efficiently the duties of the grade to which he sought promotion.

The Secretary of the Navy transmitted the record, proceedings, and findings of said examining board to the President, with the recommendation that the same be approved and that the candidate be discharged from the Navy with one year's pay, pursuant to a statute passed on the 5th day of August, 1882, directing a discharge from the service in such cases.

Thereupon, and on the 19th day of February, 1887, the record, proceedings, and findings of said board were approved by the President and Passed Assistant Paymaster Yorke was ordered discharged from the naval service with one year's pay.

The bill now under consideration provides that the action of the examining board above recited "be set aside and declared null and void." It also authorizes the President "to appoint the beneficiary to the office to which he would have been promoted but for said action, and to retire him in that grade as of the date he was wholly retired."

The authority attempted by the bill to be given to the President, to thus make an appointment to the office of paymaster in the Navy without the interposition of the Senate, appears to be inadmissible under the clause of the Constitution which only permits the President to appoint certain officers "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The bill provides for the immediate retirement of the beneficiary. He is now but 47 years old, thus lacking fifteen years of the time when he would be entitled to retirement on account of age. There is no suggestion that he is physically incapacitated. On the contrary, when he was examined for promotion, a medical board certified that he was physically qualified to perform all his duties at sea, and the candidate himself not only certified to the same thing, but further declared that he was "free from all bodily ailments." If this condition continues, and if he should be restored to the Navy at all, he should be sent to duty on the active list instead of being retired. On the facts as presented he would seem to be out of place among those who, though still compensated by the Government, have been on account of age, long and honorable service, or disabilities incurred in the discharge of duty relieved from further activity.

A careful investigation of the facts submitted to the examining board and a consideration of all the statements made on behalf of the beneficiary named in the bill utterly fail, in my opinion, to justify the impeachment of the findings and determination of the board.

I have no doubt malicious feeling growing out of domestic difficulties entered into the affair and gave impetus to the search after inculpating evidence; but facts were nevertheless established beyond any reasonable doubt which abundantly uphold these findings.

I feel obliged to disapprove the bill herewith returned because I believe the power to appoint a paymaster in the Navy ought not, under the Constitution, be conferred upon the President alone, because if the beneficiary were restored to the Navy there would be no justice or propriety in placing him upon the retired list, and because upon the merits of the case I am of the opinion the judgment of the examining board ought not to be reversed.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 11, 1894.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the message of the President of the United States, together with the bill, be printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

STATE, COUNTY, AND MUNICIPAL TAXES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6284) to prevent interference in the collection of State, county, and municipal taxes assessed against corporations and corporate property, and for other purposes, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. PUGH, Mr. COKE, and Mr. HOAR were appointed.

RECENT ELECTION IN ALABAMA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CHANDLER, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be directed to inquire into the facts of the election held in the State of Alabama on the 6th of the present month of August, and to ascertain and report whether such election was full, fair, free, and honest, and resulted in the choice of a Legislature entitled to elect a United States Senator, and that said committee as a whole or by subcommittee shall have power to send for persons and papers and sit during the approaching recess of Congress.

Mr. CHANDLER. The counting of the votes in Alabama has not yet been finished, and the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has not yet returned. I therefore propose to ask that the resolution may go over, not losing its place, until Monday, when I understand the senior Senator from Alabama will be present. I desire to say, however, that I very much hope that the resolution will pass.

History repeats itself. Twenty-two years ago, as the result of the election in Alabama, there were organized two Legislatures, and as the result of those two Legislatures two United States Senators were chosen. The two Legislatures were organized because of the wrongful change of the vote in the two counties of Barbour and Marengo, It required judicious conduct on the part of the Administration of the Government at Washington to put an end to civil commotion and two Legislatures in Alabama, and I very much fear, unless there is an immediate investigation by the Senate, that there will be two Legislatures, two governors, and two United States Senators from the State of Alabama. I believe that by a prompt investigation of the question by the committee of which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] is chairman this great calamity to the State of Alabama will be averted.

I ask that the resolution may go over until Monday in the morning hour, not losing its place.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, the resolution proposes to investigate an election that took place in my State on last Monday. There has been no official report of the result of that election in any county. The returns involving the election of members of the Legislature have to be made to the State next November, and the State Legislature has the exclusive power to deal with the right of the members of the Legislature to their seats.

There is no authority in law, organic or statutory, for this investigation. It would be a naked usurpation of power by the Senate if this resolution were to pass. It would authorize an investigation into matters over which the Senate has no jurisdiction whatever. That has been decided repeatedly by the Senate. I undertake to say that if there were an investigation, and if there were any authority to make it, it would be discovered that there has been nothing whatever in that election to authorize, justify, or to support the investigation.

I am willing for the resolution to go over. The next Legislature elects a successor to my colleague [Mr. MORGAN]. He has been in the State of Alabama engaged in the canvass resulting in the election last Monday. I do not desire that any action shall be taken upon the resolution or any discussion be had upon it in his absence. I think I can say he will be present in the Senate on next Monday, and I therefore ask that the resolution go over until he is present.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, if I understood the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], he asked unanimous consent that the resolution might go over, reserving its place. I must object to that, if it requires unanimous consent. I do not wish to give the sanction even of withholding an objection to a proposition which seems to me so far away from any jurisdiction which the Senate can rightfully exercise, to be so long a step in the direction of centralization, and to be without any precedent worthy of the name in the history of our country. If it requires unanimous consent that the request of the Senator from New Hampshire shall be granted, I must object.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I ask leave to withdraw the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is withdrawn.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask that it may go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be directed to inquire into the facts of the election held in the State of Alabama on the 6th of the present month of August, and to ascertain and report whether such election was full, fair, free, and honest, and resulted in the choice of a Legislature entitled to elect a United States Senator, and that said committee as a whole or by subcommittee shall have power to send for persons and papers and sit during the approaching recess of Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 507) for the relief of J. E. Merriam;

A bill (H. R. 526) for the relief of Joseph Haxthausen;

A bill (H. R. 1075) for the relief of Merril Denham;

A bill (H. R. 2842) to reimburse George C. Tanner, late consul, etc., the sum of $200 paid by him for rent of rooms;

A bill (H. R. 5368) for the relief of H. W. Connell; and

A bill (H. R. 7603) for the relief of Charles Deal.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HILL, as follows:

Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the Senate who are now considering the differences between the two Houses on House bill 4864, being an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," be, and they are hereby, requested to report to the Senate if they are likely to come to an agreement; and, if not, to report to the Senate a disagreement; and also to report the principal items of disagreement, so that the Senate may take action thereon.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, some question has arisen as to the parliamentary status of the tariff bill in case the resolution which I offered yesterday should prevail. I do not know that any doubt absolutely exists in regard to it, but there ought not to be any question upon such an important point. The status of the bill should be determined; and there is no better time to determine it than now, before any action is actually taken upon the bill, either by a favorable vote or an adverse vote. For that purpose, and in order to perfect the resolution, I offer the amendment to the resolution which I send to the desk, only adding a few words to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The modification proposed by the Senator from New York will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the Senate, who are now considering the differences between the two Houses on House bill 4864, being an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," report to the Senate if they are likely to come to an agreement; and, if not, report the principal items of disagreement, delivering said bill to the Secretary of the Senate for the further action of the Senate thereon.

Mr. HILL. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I should like to hear from the Senator from New York some reason for the parliamentary position which is asserted by the amendment to the resolution. It is a very important question, as he has stated, and I think ought not to be voted upon without some discussion at least. I should like to hear from the Senator before I say anything.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator can not be heard on this side.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the Senator from New York has a right to modify his resolution in the form now suggested by him. That is not a question to be submitted to the Senate. All he has to do is to submit the modification.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Rhode Island quite misunderstood me. I have not objected to the right of the Senator from New York to modify his resolution. I know as well as the Senator from Rhode Island that the Senator New York has that right.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator could not be heard.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator was addressing his colleagues upon the other side in such a tone of voice that he could not be heard on this side.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was asking the Senator from New York to give some explanation of the principles embodied in the amendment which he has offered to the resolution.

Mr. HALE. It is not an amendment; it is a modification.

Mr. HILL. There is not the slightest objection to complying with the very pertinent request of the Senator from Delaware. In my judgment, under the situation in which this bill is now placed, the custody of the bill must be deemed to be in the possession of the Senate for every practical purpose of legislation. It is somewhat a new question where this bill can be said to be in a parliamentary sense. I do not know that the question will be of the slightest importance; but it is only to guard against a possible contingency and a complication between the two Houses that at least, so far as we are concerned, the Senate should assert what we believe to be its rights.

I do not propose to indulge in comment as to newspaper discussion of this question. Senators are aware of the various claims which have been made pro and con as to "where the bill is at," [laughter] and it is important that we should determine the question. The history of the bill is patent to everyone. The request for a conference came originally from the Senate. The House of Representatives acceded to it, a conference was had, and a disagreement was had. A report was made to the House of Representatives and then to the Senate, and at the request of the Senate a further conference is being had. In my judgment the bill is deemed in parliamentary law to be in the custody of the Senate at all times for every practical purpose of legislation. My object, however, is simply to have that question settled so far as the Senate can settle it. Of course if an agreement shall be reached at any time, that will end the question, but if a disagreement shall be reported, as was yesterday intimated to be quite likely, then it is important to know, pending the discussion of the question of disagreement, what the parliamentary status of the bill is.

I should judge that there can be no real objection to the first part of the resolution. I think it will throw light upon the differences between the two Houses to hear an explanation from the distinguished gentlemen who are our conferees. It can do no harm; it may do much good. It may facilitate the disposition of this measure for the Senate to know what has taken place and what is now taking place and what the real points of disagreement are other than what we simply know from rumors in the newspaper press. In view of the suggestion made yesterday that there is no objection to the resolution on the part of the conferees themselves, in whom we have confidence, I suppose there will be no substantial objection to that portion of the resolution. I have merely added the words requiring the delivery of the bill to the possession of the Secretary of the Senate. I might assume that that would be the course. I do not know that the conferees themselves would take any other position. Adding those words is, of course, no sort of reflection on them. I disclaim any such intention. But let us settle this question here and now while we can, if it needs any settlement. If any one doubts where the possession of the bill would be in law if a report of a disagreement should be made, then that question can be raised.

I do not understand the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] to take a contrary position. He has expressed no opinion upon the question. In case the resolution shall pass and a disagreement shall be reported, where is the bill? Who has its custody? Where is it in a parliamentary sense? Let us settle that question now. I therefore give way for the present to hear the views of the Senator from Delaware upon that point.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the proposition as it came over from yesterday, embodied in the resolution of the Senator from New York, was one which we all understood, whatever might be thought of its parliamentary propriety. I do not care just now to discuss those matters which seem to me to affect the parliamentary propriety of the resolution as it was originally framed. I desire to say a few words about the propriety of placing upon the resolution a declaration of parliamentary law so far-reaching and important as I conceive that declaration to be.

I do not see, to use a favorite expression of the Senator from New York, why we need cross a bridge until we come to it. After the committee of conference shall have reported a disagreement, if they shall indeed report a disagreement, that question will arise. If the resolution as originally framed by the Senator from New York be adopted and the conferees feel constrained to modify their action in accordance with what they conceive to be the mandate of that resolution and make deliverance to this body that they can not agree and the cause of the disagreement, even if it be not the report of a disagreement, which I understand can come only as a conference report from all of the conferees, then there will be time to raise the question and consider it. But I do not see what purpose there can be or what good is to be accomplished by raising this question in advance of the facts and circumstances to which alone it can apply.

There is no parliamentary situation here which demands your decision, Mr. President, or the decision of the Senate, as to who has the legal custody of the bill, because the bill is in conference. I have a very strong notion, after some consideration and reflection, that the bill is in the possession of both the House of Representatives and the Senate. Notwithstanding some of the propositions of the old text writers on parliamentary law, I do not believe that at this day and at this time the physical possession of the particular copy of House bill 4864 is to determine its parliamentary status or where it rightfully belongs. The bill was passed by the Senate and was sent to the House of Representatives and became a part of the records of that body, as it remained a part of the records of this body as to the action of the Senate upon it.

I do not believe that the House of Representatives has ever disabled itself from taking such action upon the bill as in its wisdom it may determine to take. I do not think that the bill could be stolen, for instance, and spirited away, so as to defeat tariff legislation. I do not believe that a great people, 65,000,000 in number, are to depend upon the safety of a Yale lock or the absence of temptation on the part of some thief to get manual possession of the particular print which may be used by the conference committee. I do not believe that legislation can be defeated in that way in the last decade of the nineteenth century. I do not believe that a burglar can destroy the rights of the Senate or the House as constituent members of the greatest legislative body in this country. Therefore I am of the opinion that the manual possession, as it is sometimes called, the physical possession, the manucaption of the bill can not determine the matter for either the Senate or the other House.

Mr. President, as to the more technical question raised by the amendment of the Senator from New York, the Senator says that after the bill had passed the Senate and was on its way to the other House the Senate requested a conference and appointed conferees. He says that that has something to do with determining which House alternately has possession of the bill; that if the Senate had not first requested a conference the other House would have requested a conference, and that the House which was requested to agree to a conference would have the possession of the bill, and then seesaw back and forth again.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I misstated myself in one particular. The Senate unquestionably asked for the first conference, and the House of Representatives asked for the second conference.

Mr. GRAY. I did not intend to misquote the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. The Senator did not misquote me. I misstated myself. The second conference was asked for by the other House.

Mr. GRAY. If that is to determine it, according to precedent, as to who has the first move, so to speak, if we come down to that technicality, let us see what actually was done. The Senate passed the bill with amendments and sent it to the other House. It was in the possession of the other House. The House could have concurred in the amendments.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Deleware permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not want to interrupt the Senator's line of argument.

Mr. GRAY. I am hardly making an argument.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senate passed the bill with amendments, and then resolved to insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. GRAY. I am coming to that point in a minute. The other House had possession of the bill. It could have done as it pleased with it. It could have concurred in all of the amendments, and then the bill, if it had received the signature of the President, would have become a law without any further action on the part of the Senate.

The Senate did, on the motion of some Senator on this side, ask for a conference and appoint conferees. I recollect that I was very much struck with what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said upon that occasion, for I always listen to him upon those matters where his great experience is so illuminating, not having it myself and not being much of a parliamentarian. He said, and I think properly said, that that was an improper motion at that time. Non constat but that the other House would accept all the amendments, concur in them, and here we were anticipating a difference of which we had no suggestion from the other House. The question was discussed, and I believe the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] took part in the discussion.

Certainly other gentlemen on this side, who are able parliamentarians, participated in the discussion, and they all agreed with the Senator from Iowa, that there was no place in parliamentary law for such a motion; but it was said that, in order to save time, there had been a practice growing up of anticipating a request by the other House and appointing the conferees in advance; that we did not in effect take the unparliamentary course of requesting a conference when no disagreement had occurred, but merely appointed in advance the conferees who, when the other House asked for the conference, were all ready to act.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Both the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] have forgotten what has taken place on this question in the history of the Senate heretofore. There was a shipping bill sent over from the other House, to which the Senate made a great many amendments. I regarded it as very important to get the bill into conference without submission in the other House to the Committee of the Whole. It occurred to me that the moment the Senate amended a bill there was, in a parliamentary view at any rate, a disagreement between the two Houses, and that the Senate had a right to ask for a conference. I looked up the authorities with great care. Senator Edmunds was President of the Senate. I asked him in relation to it, and he made the declaration which the Senator from Iowa made, and which the Senator from Delaware now makes, that such a motion was not in order. I asked him to examine the authorities. He spent several hours and made a thorough examination.

The next morning the matter came up in the Senate. I made my request that the Senate insist upon its amendments and request a conference with the other House. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] declared that that was entirely out of order. A discussion arose in the Senate which lasted several hours. The Presiding Officer ruled that the motion was entirely in order, and that it was justified by all of the principles of parliamentary law and by practices under it. An appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair. The Chair was sustained, and from that day to this the Senate has at any time, on amending a House bill, immediately insisted upon its amendments, requested a conference, and appointed its conferees.

Mr. GRAY. Of course the interesting precedent cited by the Senator from Maine is important; but what I was stating is that when the bill was passed by the Senate, with the amendments, the question I have discussed was raised by the Senator from Iowa. It seemed to go by common consent, repeating what I have already said, that though there was no place in parliamentary law for such a practice, it was merely the appointment of conferees in advance of a request of the House for a conference. That, precedent or no precedent, seemed to be the logical situation—the philosophy of the situation, if I may so state; and with great deference to the Senator from Maine, whose authority in parliamentary law I gladly acknowledge, I say it is the only interpretation of that action which seems to me consonant with common sense and with those rules of conduct which ought to govern the intercourse between the two Houses in respect to legislation.

Mr. President, all of this is a matter which has been thrown on the yeasty waves of debate here suddenly this morning. I admit that it is an important question, but why should we seek to determine it now? I have a very fixed notion about it; I may be wrong, but I should like to hear it discussed by those who are better able than I am to discuss matters of parliamentary law. Therefore I hope the Senator from New York will agree to disembarrass the resolution of that subject.

Mr. HILL. I will inquire of the Senator from Delaware, in order to facilitate the matter, whether the Senator is at liberty to assure me that there will be no objection to the remainder of the resolution?

Mr. GRAY. I can speak only for myself. I have had no conference with anybody about the matter, and have no authority to speak for anyone else.

Mr. HILL. Possibly this is anticipating a difficulty which may never arise. I thought that that was the best way to bring the question before the Senate. If my resolution shall pass as first proposed and the conferees shall report a disagreement, the question then will more properly arise. I am not strenuous in regard to this portion of the resolution. If the resolution is to pass and we are to make progress in the matter and I can be assured of that fact, I have no objection to withdrawing the amendment which I offered.

Mr. HALE. Let the Senator, then, take the question upon the resolution as it came over from yesterday, leaving the other question to be settled when it properly comes up. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. HILL. If I hear no objection to the other part of the resolution I assume, of course, that that course is to be taken.

Mr. GRAY. I would not want to deceive the Senator about that. We shall wait and see.

Mr. TURPIE. The Senator is not deceived at all.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New York has clearly erred in his parliamentary law as declared in the amendment he has offered this morning to the resolution submitted by him yesterday. Without discussing the question as to whether the House which accepted the conference is entitled to the papers on a disagreement, which I believe is generally considered to be the parliamentary status in case of a disagreement, the fundamental error in the resolution as amended by the Senator from New York is as to what a disagreement is. When the two Houses agree to a conference and appoint the conferees, the bill is then in the joint possession of both Houses. If there is an agreement or a disagreement between the two Houses, then under general parliamentary law the House that acceded to the conference first acts upon the report of the conference.

But, sir, what constitutes a report of a conference committee under which that law, parliamentary law at least, is applicable? To constitute a report of a conference committee it must show a majority of the conferees of both Houses concurring in the report, either of agreement or disagreement.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. FAULKNER. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. What is the Senator's authority for asserting that the bill is in the hands of a joint committee of conference—as much in the hands of the House conferees as in the hands of the Senate conferees?

Mr. FAULKNER. Upon the common-sense proposition that when two bodies of equal privilege and dignity appoint a joint committee to act upon a given subject both Houses have equal rights over the subject-matter while it is before that joint committee.

Mr. FRYE. There is no such thing as a joint rule or a joint committee of conference. There is no rule either of the House or Senate which determines in relation to the passing of the bill. The papers were in the Senate's possession. Seven conferees were appointed on the part of the Senate. Now, a motion can be made this moment to discharge the Senate conferees from the further consideration of the bill, and if that vote passes the United States Senate, those papers resume their place in the United States Senate, and are subject to our orders to do with them whatever we please. They never have really been out of the possession of the Senate.

I call the Senator's attention to this point, so that he may answer it. We commit every bill that comes into the Senate to a committee, special or general. Now, this committee of conference on the part of the Senate is nothing but a special committee; it has no different powers from a special committee. The Senator again and again in the Senate has heard a motion made that a certain committee be discharged from the further consideration of a certain bill. Did he ever hear added to that what the Senator from New York has added to his resolution, that the bill be returned to the Senate? Never. The moment the committee is discharged the bill resumes its place, and the Senate resumes its entire jurisdiction. It would be exactly so in this case. If the committee of conference of the Senate alone was discharged from further consideration, the very moment that discharge was made those papers are on the Senate table, in the possession of the Senate, and subject to the Senate's jurisdiction.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from West Virginia permit me to ask the Senator from Maine a question?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does not the Senator from Maine know the fact that when the Senate agreed to the conference the tariff bill with that indorsement on the back of it was taken by one of the clerks of the Senate and bodily delivered to the House, and was in possession of the House, was taken by the House conferees to the conference committee, and will be in the possession of the House conferees legally and constitutionally until they come to a conclusion, they agree or disagree and report, and then under parliamentary law the conferees of the Senate must first make the report, and then they will bring the bill back to the Senate, and that is the only way it can get back here?

Mr. FRYE. No; I do not understand any such thing. I understand that the Senate simply sent a message to the House. On inquiry at the table four or five days ago as to where the papers in the tariff matter were, I was informed by the clerk having charge that they were in the Senate, where they properly ought to have been in my opinion, and they are still in the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. And I was informed that they had been bodily taken back to the House with the indorsement of the Senate upon them, that they were left with the House, and were taken by the House conferees to the conference. I understand the record shows that fact, and that the papers are there now.

Mr. RANSOM. May I ask the Senator from Maine a question? I know I may. When the tariff bill went from the Senate to the House with the proposition to have a conference, was it not competent for the House not to agree to that conference and to take the tariff bill and agree to the amendments of the Senate to it? If that is true, how could the House do that unless they had the bill in their possession?

Mr. FRYE. But if the House had the bill in possession and agreed to the conference they would send the papers back to the Senate with the agreement to the conference.

Mr. COCKRELL. And then the Senate had to send them back to the House with the announcement that they had agreed to the conference. The Senate did that, and the papers are over there. If the Senator will go over to the House he will find them there.

Mr. FRYE. I am rather inclined to think, from what the newspapers say and from rumors which are flying around the Senate this morning, that the papers may be in the possession of the House or of the chairman of the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question about it.

Mr. FRYE. It being insisted that in some way or other, properly or improperly——

Mr. COCKRELL. Properly.

Mr. FRYE. The House conferees had got possession of the bill and carried it back to the House when, as I assert, it was in the Senate, and they had no right to its possession and never had any right to its possession.

Mr. COCKRELL. The statement I made was that the Senate conferees did not take the bill to the conference; that it was bodily delivered to the House.

Mr. FRYE. I beg pardon of the Senator from West Virginia. I did not intend to get into this colloquy.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Missouri. Is he entirely certain as to where the bill is? May it not be at the White House. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that order is preserved in the galleries and upon the floor of the Senate. The Senator from West Virginia will proceed.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I suppose the most proper answer that could be made to the remark of the Senator from New Hampshire is to say, as I say with confidence, that if the bill has not gone to the White House it certainly will in a few days go there for the signature of the President.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator be kind enough to inform us in what form it will finally get there?

Mr. FAULKNER. It will get there in the form in which a majority of a Democratic Congress deems it proper to send it to the Executive for his signature; and with equal confidence, I may say that it will go there without the approval of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have only one other request to make of the Senator from West Virginia, in view of his assurance, and that is, to ask him to be kind enough to make as much haste with the business as he possibly can.

Mr. FAULKNER. I think the admonition of the Senator from New Hampshire comes with very bad grace after the long and weary months he has kept us here, day in and day out——

Mr. CULLOM, Mr. FRYE, and others. Oh, no.

Mr. FAULKNER. Listening to every possible objection that he could either conceive in his fertile mind or which could be brought forward by the active agency of those he represents, prepared for him and his associates.

Mr. President, the question here suggested by the Senator from Maine is simply begging the question which I was arguing. It is not only that, but it is trying to divert the attention of Senators from the real question before this body.

The question here is not as to the power and the right of the Senator from New York to move that the Senate conferees be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and in that way exercise a power of this body, but it is to leave the conferees and the conference committee absolutely intact as it was originally appointed, and simply to suggest that upon that fact, with the power to instruct a part of the conference to report a disagreement if they could not agree, then the bill must be brought back by the conferees of the Senate. I say that principle of parliamentary law never applies except where there is an agreement or a disagreement of a conference committee.

I assert as a parliamentary principle, that will be undisputed by any parliamentarian who has studied the question, that there can not be an agreement or a disagreement of a conference committee unless a majority of both Houses concur in that agreement or disagreement. Consequently, until that is done, they have no power under the resolution as now framed. I say to the Senator from Maine that when the question he proposes comes up there will be time enough then to enter into any discussion as to the parliamentary condition of the bill under a motion similar to the one to which he refers.

Mr. President, there is another objection I have to the resolution of the Senator from New York. "If not, to report to the Senate a disagreement." That can have but one meaning. It is a technical question. It is that the conference committee shall report to the Senate a disagreement. According to the views I have already expressed and the principles laid down by all the parliamentary writers, and even according to the view of the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who is regarded by the friends on the other side as the ablest parliamentarian here, that is an instruction to the House and the Senate conferees to disagree and report a disagreement as to the bill. What right, what privilege, what function has the Senate to assert that a majority of the free conferees of the other House shall enter into a disagreement, so that a conference report can be made back to this body reporting a disagreement on the bill? Yet, if that is not its meaning, it has no meaning whatever.

It is, then, simply an instruction that these gentlemen shall come back and state to us that they, or a majority of them, and a majority of the House conferees, have not agreed upon a report. I hold that in acting with reference to the rights and privileges of the other House, a coördinate branch of the Government, we should use no terms in the resolution that would imply that we attempted to exercise any power over the conferees of the House. For that reason, as well as the objections I have to the amendment submitted this morning, I think the resolution ought not to pass in its present form.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I understood the honorable and learned Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] to ask whether any person had any objection to the pending resolution excluding the parliamentary part of it, the close of it. I wish to state for the information of the Senator that I have some objections, objections to every part of the resolution, to the beginning, to the middle, and to the close. I have been working for some time, many days indeed, with the men in the trenches, belonging to the reserve corps of silence. I believe that the services of that corps have been as valuable to the Senate, to the people, and to the country as those of any member on this floor, notwithstanding the more ambitious and more public rôle which may have been taken by others.

Sir, on the 13th of April last I participated in this debate, refusing at that time to enter into a discussion of the comparative merits of the House and the Senate bill as peremptory; declaring also that the question was not whether the House bill should pass or the Senate bill should pass, but whether any bill, any measure of tariff reform, could be passed during the present Congress. As that was the question in April, it is the question in August; and in view of that question I have steadily voted against every sort of instruction to the conferees.

I did not deem that it was parliamentary to instruct a part of the committee without a special rule, and we have none; and I did not deem myself competent, and do not now deem myself competent, to instruct the conferees of the honorable House upon this subject or any other. I have therefore steadily voted against any instructions, direct or indirect. I voted against express instructions, not because there was no merit in those instructions. I voted against receding because receding is an instruction.

I voted against any modification of the rules, the ordinary rules of a conference committee, because such modification would have been an instruction. I vote now against every clause in the resolution offered by the Senator from New York, because I do not think that the conferees are capable of instruction by one branch, and I do not think it would be expedient to instruct, even if we had the legal capacity to do so. I am unwilling at this late stage to change the basis of negotiation. The conferees were made free; let them remain so. I do not ask for a report, and I do not want to have a report from this conference committee unless and until they have agreed. I wish to know nothing about the items of disagreement unless they see fit voluntarily to disclose them.

When we had a conference very early of the Democratic party in respect to this bill we did not attempt to settle details, but what we did settle and decide was the means of adjusting these details; and that means was the reference to a subcommittee, that by their agreement and their labor our action should be facilitated. What we have in the Senate to settle and consider is not the details of the tariff bill or disagreements between the two Houses, but to create a means by which those differences may be adjusted. We have created such means in appointing the conferees named on the part of the Senate to consider this bill.

I do not believe we have the power, nor do I believe it wise or prudent if we did have it, to compel any disclosure of the proceedings of the joint conferees upon the bill at this time, and especially am I opposed to the return of the bill to the Senate, which, with this resolution or without the resolution, would be its defeat. Legislation could then only be had in one way—by forcing the House to pass one bill pending. I am not yet prepared for this alternative.

Many bills have been longer in conference than this. A great many bills have been under consideration by committees where there was less hope of agreement than there is this morning, and yet agreement and legislation have followed. I will refer to one where agreement occurred, legislation followed, and the legislative action was a complete success.

Not only am I opposed to this resolution on account of its text, but its terms. Its terms mean the wreck of this bill. Its terms mean the destruction of tariff legislation at this session, the final termination and end of tariff legislation for this Congress. That is the meaning of this resolution. That is the effect of it.

I am not only opposed to it, sir, on account of its meaning and purpose, but I have some misgivings with respect to its source and origin. It is offered by the learned and honorable Senator from New York. Is he a friend of this bill? I am not speaking of the House bill nor of the Senate bill. I am speaking of the bill that is to be framed under the title, "A bill to raise revenue for the support of the Government and to reduce taxation," and its enacting clause.

The Senator from New York has openly, publicly, repeatedly, informed us that he was opposed to this bill; that his opposition was implacable to both bills and to all bills that contain certain provisions in them which do not receive his approval. How does it come, then, that an open enemy is to offer here a resolution for our guidance and our government, and how is such a resolution to be commended to our support?

I did very much admire, I had profound esteem for, the first sentence of the Brooklyn decree encyclical, now famous, perhaps, as those of Berlin or Milan—"I am a Democrat." But, sir, I have not the same esteem nor admiration for the revised and amended edition of the encyclical, "I am a Democrat, without the income tax." In that expression, sir, there seems to be an indescribable bathos; a marked decadence of the original.

I could say with all sincerity, because I think it is prudent, just, and, especially at this time, a wise manner of raising public revenue, that "I am a Democrat, with the income tax;" but, sir, I infinitely prefer another declaration. I am a Democrat, with or without the income tax, without condition, without limitation. No mere detail of expediency shall sever me from the action of the majority of my party.

I wish, therefore, to offer a proposition, a proposition which may be thought harsh and unkind. It is not so intended. A proposition which has a precedent well known in the legislative history of the country, a history that some of us are old enough to recollect. During that long period of expectancy while the compromise measures of 1850 were pending here the precedent I speak of was made and formed. The proposition which I make is one which I do not conceal; it is born of necessity. It springs from the dividing line, between the sharp edge of that which is possible for us and utter failure.

At this juncture, sir, although I voted against all instructions, I feel tempted to offer some myself. Perhaps I ought not seriously to call them instructions. This proposition is suggested for careful consideration. If authority were needed, I might perhaps plead the privilege of seniority. I think the record will show that I occupied a seat on this side of the body many years before any sitting member here, many years before any sitting member on the other side except the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. I occupied a seat on this side of the Chamber when we counted just thirteen on the Democratic roll call.

There has been a good deal said here about a minority controlling the Senate. If you had seen that minority on one of its field days you would have thought it might have controlled two Senates had it been necessary. We did, after a manner and for a season. We were always beaten at the last. We were always beaten, but we were never cast down. I am not saying this with respect to any anticipated dissolution of the Democratic party. No man will see the destruction of the Democratic party in this country without witnessing at the same time the downfall of popular liberty. But I am asking Senators especially upon our side, although I enjoyed that service and the recollection of it, not to relegate this side to a minority so small again, and to consider very carefully their action here with reference to a continued representation of Democratic principles in this Chamber.

This suggestion of mine is born of necessity. It springs from the irresistible duress of a force inevitable. It is a present necessity, a burning presence with face of flint and eyes of flame, that may not be bidden down, that will not be evaded or avoided. It is the duty of our appointees upon the committee of conference to agree. That is their office and function. They were appointed to agree, not to divide or to sever; and as they were appointed to agree, I believe it is appointed, destined, predestined, that they shall and must agree. They are as free to agree as they are to confer.

Therefore I am in favor of preserving the present status and retaining the bill in conference. What will disagreement be? It will be, sir, to court in advance defeat, disaster, and discomfiture; it will be to turn back the hands on the clock of progress and reform for the period of another generation.

Disagreement is the unpardonable political sin, not to be forgiven in this age or the next. I have not allowed myself as yet to conceive or imagine that there is to be a final disagreement in conference.

Mr. President, my proposition is one which may cost some self-sacrifice, which will call for the exercise of pure patriotism, of self-denial, of disinterestedness, but it will cost no Senator anything of political consistency or any shadow of reproach. The proposition is, sir, that the majority conferees upon this committee tender to the Senate their resignation as conferees and let the Chair appoint their successors. Similar action must follow elsewhere. No one will be appointed here who is not a friend of the bill, the bill after its enacting clause and subsequent to its title, that bill which is to be written. As to conditions and terms of unanimity no one will be appointed from this Chamber who is not in favor of legislation, legislation now, to repeal the present law and to abolish protection and its monstrous brood of trusts and monopolies.

It is a mere usage of the Senate to appoint only members of the Finance Committee upon such a committee of conference. Any Senator is just as legally competent to serve in that position as those who are now serving. Those gentlemen have served honorably, nobly; they have done the country and the Senate great service, invaluable service; they have reduced the sum of discrepancy between the two Houses to the minimum of difference, and that is a very great work. There they stand like sentinels, and why like sentinels may they not be relieved? Why should they not welcome relief from this protracted vigil of labor and endurance?

I have no doubt of the fate of an enactment reported by the conference committee formed either in this way or the present mode. I have no doubt it will become the law. It will be a measure of reform, carefully framed within the lines of Democratic purpose and policy; it will be a measure for which every Democrat in either House may vote, and it will be a measure that no Democrat anywhere in the Republic need discourage or disavow.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the question before the Senate, as I understand it, arises upon the resolution offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] and the amendment proposed. I shall not attempt to inquire into the parliamentary proposition which has been debated to some extent. I prefer to let that matter rest for some little time to come. I find nothing definite regarding it in the Silurian epigrams miscalled the rules of the Senate. Whenever we are confronted with the actual question of order suggested by the Senator from New York, I shall call upon those whose long experience in the Senate enables them to tell us what the Senate has been in the habit of doing in that regard.

The resolution itself, dissevered from the amendment proposed this morning, will bear rereading in the light of the brief comment which I propose to make:

Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the Senate who are now considering the differences between the two Houses on House bill 4864, being an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," be and they are hereby requested to report to the Senate—

As I understand it, the Senator from New York designs to modify the resolution so as to make the report imperative. He has eliminated the request. Am I not right?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. The resolution continues:

to report to the Senate if they are likely to come to an agreement.

They are ordered to report if they are likely to come to an agreement; and, if not, to report to the Senate a disagreement. They are instructed to report to the Senate if they are likely to come to an agreement; and I presume the resolution means that if, in their opinion, they are not likely to come to an agreement, then they shall report a disagreement.

In a parliamentary sense it is absolutely impossible that the gentlemen who constitute the conferees on the part of the Senate can unaided report a disagreement. They may come into this body with the declaration "we can not agree with the gentlemen who represent the House of Representatives." But our conferees can not of themselves report a disagreement. The disagreement must result from the failure to act of those who represent both Houses, and must under all parliamentary rules not only represent the opinions of both sets of conferees, but must likewise bear the signatures of those assenting to it—a majority of each committee. I presume, however, that the object of the Senator from New York is to bring about such a condition of things that the various gentlemen composing the committee of conference on the part of the Senate shall arise here, or report here in some mode, their belief as to the probability of an agreement.

Mr. President, while it is true that a majority of the committee of conference is composed of members of the Democratic party, we must not forget that there is a minority representing the other side. We were told when this resolution was introduced—and in the nature of things we know it to be a fact—that that minority has not been in continuous consultation with the majority during the consideration of all the various matters of dispute which have had the consideration of the Democratic conferees, and as has been admitted and as must necessarily be true, there was no discourtesy involved or intended in that procedure; but until the Senate conferees and the House conferees meet together, regardless of party, how can it be said that there has been any conference whatever?

The impossibility, or the impropriety rather, of suggesting a report to the Senate at this time, consists not only in the fact that the Senate conferees have no power to make such a report, but likewise because, as we were informed by a distinguished minority member of the committee, the Republican representatives have not even had official notice as to the points of threatened disagreement.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. If the conferees have not yet had a meeting, is it not time they were discharged from the further consideration of the bill and new conferees appointed?

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Oregon will excuse me, if I said the conferees have not had a meeting, I did not intend to make such a statement. They have had many meetings, but they have not had meetings upon all the occasions when each of the various items which are the subject-matter of dispute were being considered, nor was it proper that they should, because naturally those who are responsible for the bill prefer to meet and discuss its merits before presenting it to the entire conference. There is no objection to that, I understand, upon any score or by anyone.

Again, if the members of the conference on the part of the Senate desire to be relieved or if they believe they should receive from the Senate any particular instruction upon any topic, they will come here and make the request. I do not propose to go upon record or to be anywhere regarded as manifesting any want of confidence in our conferees, in their ability, their integrity, or their desire to serve their party and their country, and I do not think that it will subserve any useful purpose to order them or to ask them in an imperative way to do a particular thing.

Our equals upon this floor, we have selected them for their peculiar qualifications, transcending that of the average Senator, to represent the entire body in this delicate and intricate work. The majority of the committee have been persistently and constantly engaged in endeavoring to effect an agreement. That we well understand. Not one word did any member of this committee utter, until this subject was introduced, to indicate that he was tired of his task or anxious that he should be relieved.

I do not agree with my able and eloquent friend from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] that the passage of this bill or the formulation of any tariff measure would be promoted by such radical action as he desires to have taken or as he has suggested; nor do I think that an instruction such as the Senator from New York proposes will have any other effect than to breed discontent and to make an agreement less probable.

I confess, like my friend from Indiana, that I look with a doubt at the outset upon the resolution when I know that it comes from my friend from New York [Mr. HILL]. I admit that if he offers a resolution in which I find actual merit the mere fact that he may differ from me with reference to this bill can not justify the withholding of my support. But certainly when we know that the objects of our friend, so far as the bill now before the conference is concerned, are essentially destructive, we should scan with more than ordinary care and attention any resolution which he tenders concerning it, and when we find our distinguished friends upon the other side of the Chamber likewise somewhat enthusiastic for the adoption of this resolution we must not be blamed if we are critical or suspicious.

I believe that, notwithstanding the delay, notwithstanding the manifest desire of the entire country that something shall speedily be done, it will be better that this resolution shall not be passed, and that this conference shall stand as it is now constituted for a while longer. I may be asked how long; I may be asked if the conferees have not had time enough to agree. It is easy for those who have no burdens upon their own shoulders, who are unaware of the difficulties of the conference room, who know nothing of those matters which are being considered by our committee day by day, to attack those who are intelligently doing their best and to cry for immediate action. I shall be pleased personally if they are able to evolve a tariff measure agreeable to the country, though they have to wait many days yet. The sooner the better, but it must be done.

Mr. President, the great question is, will action such as the Senator from New York suggests expedite the passage of this measure? That Senator declares that the adoption of this resolution will hasten the result. I think that in one respect he is right. I believe that the adoption of the resolution as he has written it, this instruction to the Senate conferees, will expedite the determination of this matter, because such an expression now means, in my opinion, the death of the bill and the defeat of tariff legislation at the present session. I am willing to wait a short time; I am willing to pause a moment more; I am willing to publicly take my share of responsibility for some further procrastination, rather than to take that action which, in my judgment, must bring about not only political chaos, but worse than that, the permanent injury, or the injury for many years, of the whole United States.

Mr. President, the importance of the present enactment of tariff legislation is not confined to the Democratic party; the business interests of this country are clamoring for it. The demand is for affirmative action, too, not negative action, and the mandate for the enactment of a bill is not confined to any particular section or any particular class of people. My friend concedes that. He has given this as one of his reasons for the passage of his resolution. But the means and methods which he has adopted here constitute, in my judgment, the strongest processes which human ingenuity can devise to prevent the accomplishment of the object closest to the heart of the Democratic party as well as to the business interests of the United States, namely, action upon the tariff at this session.

Mr. President, not only is business prostrated, but we have a Treasury threatened with depletion; we have a Treasury which can not be supplied because of the insufficient revenue derived from the tariff law enacted by the Republican party. We are not legislating merely to restore trade and prosperity throughout the land, but also to enable the Government to maintain itself, carry on its business, meet its obligations, and supply those deficiencies which have been created as the result of misguided antecedent Congressional policy.

Believing, therefore, that the immediate adoption of this resolution would, instead of hastening, retard the enactment of a tariff bill, I shall register my vote against it.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, as Congress is soon to adjourn and there is very important executive business which must be transacted, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HILL. Upon that I call for the yeas and nays, and I hope the motion will not prevail.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. BRICE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GORDON (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON], who has been called away by sickness in his family. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. If that Senator were present I should vote "nay," but in his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GORDON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and vote "yea."

Mr. HILL. I desire to know by what authority that transfer is made?

Mr. GORDON. I will state to the Senator from New York that I inquired before making that transfer, and was informed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] that he has some telegrams from the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], which I hope he will now read for the information of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. That will be entirely satisfactory; but I desired to know.

Mr. LINDSAY (to Mr. JONES of Arkansas). Read them.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have a telegram, dated July 30, as follows:

[Telegram.]

LAURENS, S. C., July 30, 1894.

Senator J. K. JONES, Washington:

Please telegraph me every day status of tariff bill, and please arrange a pair for me in favor of it.

Senator JAMES K. JONES:

I thank you for keeping me advised. I telegraphed you several days ago to pair me in favor of the passage of some tariff bill. I hope you will attend to this, if you have not already arranged it. Please telegraph me on receipt of this.

J. L. M. IRBY.

I have another telegram, which reads as follows:

[Telegram.]

CROSSHILL, S. C., August 10, 1894.

Senator JAMES K. JONES:

Pair me in favor of free sugar if a proposition of that sort comes up. Send answer to Laurens.

J. L. M. IRBY.

Mr. TURPIE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] is detained at his residence in this city by a very serious indisposition. If he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. BRICE. I will transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and vote. I vote "yea."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 11, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Rev. W. E. PAIRSON, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BARTHOLDT, for three days, on account of ill health.

To Mr. KEM, for ten days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BUNN, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. CUMMINGS, for this day, on account of sickness.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave of absence for the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. HARMER, for three days, on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that that was granted on yesterday.

WASHINGTON, ALEXANDRIA AND MOUNT VERNON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the House bill (H. R. 7006) to authorize the Washington, Alexandria and Mount Vernon Electric Railway Company to extend its lines into and within the District of Columbia, which was laid before the House on yesterday with amendments of the Senate thereto. In view of the fact that the Senate amendments were read yesterday and partially discussed, and that subsequently the bill with the amendments was printed by the order of the House, I now ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEARD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HEARD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House concurred in the Senate amendments was laid on the table.

NATIONAL RAPID TRANSIT RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. POWERS, by unanimous consent, submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary on the bill (H. R. 7567) to incorporate the National Rapid Transit Railway Company; which were ordered to be printed with the views of the majority.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6284) to prevent interference in the collection of State, county, and municipal taxes assessed against corporations and corporate property, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PUGH, Mr. COKE, and Mr. HOAR as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 4490) granting a pension to Henry C. Field.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 744) for the relief of Henry D. Babcock and wife, of Oregon; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 95) providing for an investigation relating to the effects of machinery on labor;

A bill (H. R. 4667) to provide for the opening of certain abandoned military reservations, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 6777) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington and Great Falls Electric Railway;" and

A bill (H. R. 7680) to authorize purchasers of the property and franchises of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to organize a corporation and to confer upon the same all the powers, privileges, and franchises vested in that company.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER], that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment No. 280 and agree to the same with an amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The Clerk again read the amendment as printed on page 8389 of the RECORD.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, before submitting any remarks I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who have spoken, or who desire to speak, on this question of the irrigation of arid lands, may have consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, it is customary with all of us, I presume, not to discuss great questions or even to consider them until they are thrust directly in our paths, and I presume that a large number of the members of this House have not given to the subject of irrigation any serious attention. I confess that until recently my own attention has not been called to the subject, and I am not now prepared to discuss it as I hope to be after I shall have taken time, as I will, to make a thorough investigation of it. But, Mr. Speaker, this question of irrigation is one which is pressing itself upon our attention more and more every day. So long as we had a large quantity of public land which could be cultivated with the natural water supply our people did not pay much attention to the question of irrigation. They took up and cultivated the good land, but now that land is nearly all taken up, and we have on hand a large quantity of land which is absolutely worthless unless water can be brought upon it by artificial means. Of course we who live in the West are more closely related to this question than those who live in the East and the South. It is a question of growing importance in my own State. Last March an irrigation convention was held in Omaha; about two months later another convention was held at McCook, and quite recently another was held at O'Neill, in our State. The people are becoming interested in the subject. They see what great improvement can be made in our arid land by the use of water brought upon it artificially, and they know how useless it is to attempt to cultivate land in the arid regions except by such means.

Mr. KILGORE. Do I understand that the proposition now before the House is to cede to the several States these arid public lands for the purpose of enabling the States to engage in the work of irrigation?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, I am willing that all such lands shall go to the States in which they are situated.

Mr. BRYAN. I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that this proposition is to give to the States for this purpose land which is absolutely worthless unless water is brought upon it artificially, for there is nothing that we can conceive of that is more utterly useless than a tract of land without water. Such land is absolutely useless for cultivation. There are millions of acres which unless we can by some means bring water upon them lie there absolutely bare of vegetation.

Now, this bill proposes to let the States take not exceeding 1,000,000 acres each of these lands upon condition that they provide for their irrigation. I am not sure whether irrigation by State authority is going to settle this question or not. It is a matter about which we must experiment. But certainly no one will object to allowing these States to take these lands, useless to us as a nation, and irrigate them, make them valuable, and then sell them to citizens who will establish homes upon them. This amendment provides that these lands shall not be disposed of in greater quantities than 160 acres to one person.

It provides that the lands shall only be given to the States when they have filed their maps and plans and shown just how they are going to get water to accomplish irrigation. It provides further that every dollar received from these lands by the States over and above the cost of irrigation shall be held as a trust fund for further irrigation. It seems to me that no objection can be made to this proposition.

Mr. Speaker, I was surprised to find in reading an address of Maj. Powell that there are in Asia to-day 70,000,000 people who are living on land irrigated by wells and that more than that number of people are living on land irrigated by the storage system—not to speak of those who have their homes upon land irrigated from living streams. It is also stated that the average value of irrigated land in the United States is about $83 per acre and the yield of such land is wonderful.

I am sure that if the members of this House will take a little time to investigate the subject of irrigation they will be glad to make this simple experiment in that direction. If it should prove a success, if the States to which these lands are to be ceded shall be able of themselves to provide a sufficient system of irrigation, it will leave the control of this business nearer home than if the General Government should attempt to do the work itself. I for one am anxious that this experiment shall be tried. I shall bid it godspeed, hoping the States themselves may be able to attend to the business efficiently and that the aid of the General Government may not have to be called in.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] two minutes more.

Mr. BRYAN. When we have made the experiment, we may find that this work of irrigation must be attempted on a larger scale than can be carried out by a single State. If the time should come when the General Government must take up this matter, then it will have to take it up as it takes up the improvement of the harbors and the great water ways of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I see in this movement an advantage which is, I think, of great importance to the people of our country. We see our cities crowded. The people crowded in those cities need some outlet, some means of making a living under more favorable conditions. Irrigation gives us intensified agriculture. It gives us the opportunity to spread our city population over our prairies—not as the people are spread out in cattle-grazing districts, but gathered together in villages where they can enjoy the advantages of both town and country life.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this measure gives a promise of very great good, because the more homes we can establish, the more independent citizens we can put upon our lands, the more stable is the Government under which we live, and the more general will be our prosperity. I want this experiment to be tried, and I hope that it will prove a solution of this question. If it should prove not to be a satisfactory solution, we can study the cause of failure and discover perhaps some other means of accomplishing the result. But this question is one of growing importance and must be met; and the plan here proposed is the simplest, it seems to me, that can be tried.

Mr. COOMBS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska a question.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS] one minute for that purpose.

Mr. COOMBS. I wish to ask, for information, how many States could avail themselves of this measure if it be adopted?

Mr. CAMINETTI. Thirteen or fourteen.

Mr. BRYAN. I can not give the exact number. In the western parts of Nebraska and Kansas there are arid lands; also in Wyoming and Colorado and the States west and south of them.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. There are twelve States to which the measure would apply.

Mr. COOMBS. Then this grant would embrace about 12,000,000 acres.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes, sir; if that is the number of States included.

Mr. COOMBS. In the amendments proposed to the Senate bill what provisions are there for condemning these lands as arid lands?

Mr. BRYAN. I am not informed as to that.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will examine the RECORD of this morning he will see the precise terms of the amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. I was advocating the amendment proposed in the House, which I think is a very satisfactory one, but I shall gladly support any changes which will give additional security to the people that the ceded lands will be properly used.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the reclamation of these arid lands, but I am utterly opposed to the method that is proposed by the Senate amendment for the accomplishment of that purpose. It is proposed here to donate a strip of this arid territory, about 100 miles long and 20 miles wide in each of thirteen States, and allow these States to proceed to their selection. The grant is not a grant in place, in bulk, but the selection may be made wherever the States see proper.

Now, it is a well-known fact that there is not a sufficiency of water in the arid regions to reclaim all of the lands; and yet under the provisions of this bill the practical operation of it will be that the States owning this grant will secure all of the available water for their reclamation, and all of the lands for which there is available water, and that the other and larger areas of the land, probably through the improper use of the water or the wasteful and extravagant use of it, or to the unskillful manner in which it is supplied to the lands, will be and remain arid for all time to come.

In my judgment the proper method to be pursued in regard to this matter is that the Government should take hold of the enterprise itself, make proper surveys, ascertain the quantity of available water and the possibilities of utilizing it, and then in a comprehensive scheme reclaim the largest possible number of acres that may be brought under such conditions as to be available for the husbandman's use. I am utterly opposed to parceling out the land in this way. I believe no good will ever come of it. It will be a repetition of the old swamp and overflowed land grant to the States, which amounted practically to nothing in the way of reclamation.

I know of one State to which 10,000,000 acres of this swamp and overflowed land was granted on condition that it would reclaim the lands; and yet under various acts of Congress, passed from time to time, they secured title to all of the lands without an attempt at the reclamation of an acre. And years afterwards the owners of these lands came to Congress urging that through the scheme of Mississippi improvements, through the building of levees, the Government should accomplish that purpose for which the lands thirty years before had been granted to the various States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want that kind of "bunco" game to be played on the Government again. I have no hostility to a scheme of the reclamation of arid lands. I believe in all that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] has said about the advisability and the necessity of doing this. But when done I want it to be done properly, and that the largest possible number of acres shall be reclaimed with the available water. I want it done under some systematic plan, to be determined by scientific men after careful search for water supply and other investigation of the subject.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not far more likely that the States which are immediately concerned and interested in this matter will attend to it properly than that it will be done by the Government itself when but few of the States are interested?

Mr. HEPBURN. It is far more likely the States will take all the advantage they can under the grant, and will reclaim the million of acres they receive, if it be possible to do so, even at the expense of the use of all the available water, which by a proper system of irrigation might be applied to the reclamation of a far greater area.

Mr. BRYAN. Are the States not just as much interested in the proper application of the available waters as the General Government?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think not under the provisions of this amendment. The area of lands to be irrigated by the States is limited to 1,000,000 acres. If they have the grant they will use the water on the lands belonging to them without regard to the condition of the lands belonging to the Government. Hence I think it unwise to place it in their power to accomplish such a result. I think it will amount to the use of the entire available water to the lands belonging to the States. I prefer that the Government should do it in a proper and systematic manner so as to utilize the largest possible area of these lands for agricultural purposes.

Mr. CAMINETTI. But would not this proposed action lay the foundation for the Government to do it hereafter?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think not. I believe the effect would be disastrous, because in the meantime the water supply would be exhausted.

Mr. HARTMAN. If the gentleman will permit me to make a statement?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HARTMAN. The gentleman says the States will consume more water than would be required for the proper irrigation of the lands to which they would become entitled under the operation of this provision. Does the gentleman not know that in every State we have an act of the Legislature which makes it impossible for any more water to be used than is absolutely necessary to irrigate the lands, and in fact that the waste of water is a public offense?

Mr. BRYAN. It is to the interest of the States of course to take care of the water supply.

Mr. HEPBURN. In response to the suggestion of the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HEPBURN. I should like to have a few minutes longer.

Mr. COGSWELL. I will yield additional time to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. In response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN], I have no doubt that after this system of canals or irrigating ditches is established—after the system has been adopted in some shape—then there will be a proper use of the water. But under the system proposed here is it not altogether likely that for the purposes of reclaiming the millions of acres which would belong to the State all of the water available for irrigation purposes will be used?

Mr. CAMINETTI. All the available water is now taken up. This provision would require the storage of water that goes off in the winter and spring without doing anybody any good. Once you store successfully that water you open the way for the reclamation of all of these arid lands. That is the advantage of the proposed system.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think it doubtful whether all the water would be profitably used. I have seen ditches 30 or 40 miles long that carried infinitely more water than would be regarded as necessary at the present time which had been dug by irrigation companies, by individuals, or communities, and if you allow this system, in my judgment it will take up all of the available water without reclaiming any very considerable area of these lands.

It is a different matter entirely, giving this grant as it is proposed, allowing selections to be made along the margins of streams, from what it would be if there were blocks of land, and only certain water could be brought to them. I assert that under this plan all of the water of any one of these arid States may be used recklessly and improvidently, perhaps, in the reclamation of the million acres granted by this amendment, leaving numberless other millions without any possibility of supply. It is not a wise thing to do in this way, in my judgment.

Mr. HARTMAN. The man who wastes the water lays himself liable criminally under the laws of the State.

Mr. HEPBURN. The bulk of the water will be secured. It may not be used, but it will be in the hands of individuals or corporations.

Mr. HARTMAN. It must be used or it can not be held.

Mr. COGSWELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ].

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Speaker, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. It occurs to me that it is a revival of the old swamp-land régime in another form only. This amendment provides that if any State within this arid region shall expend $3 per acre in the way of irrigation, the State shall then become the owner of the real estate within its borders, or rather the million acres. Now, to my mind, the passage of this amendment will result in a system of interminable lawsuits.

It will entangle the title to every acre of this real estate in such a way that it will be worth more than the land to find where the title is. Besides, in addition to this, the question of State water rights and national water rights arises, which will further complicate the title to the real estate, and will lead to lawsuit after lawsuit between citizens of one State and citizens of another, and the same will be true with the citizens of Mexico and this country. To cede to these States this arid land is to place in the hands of the Legislatures of the several States an opportunity to increase the already burdensome debts of these States and Territories.

No State can enter upon this irrigation system without first appropriating money for that purpose. They must first expend at least $3 per acre before they are entitled to an acre of this land. Now, the first thing you do for a State or Territory is to say to it: "You must make provision for $3,000,000 before you begin this work." I believe there are fifteen of these States and Territories.

Mr. HOLMAN. Thirteen States.

Mr. BRETZ. Including the Territories there are fifteen; which means an additional expense and burden upon the people of $45,000,000. Now, I hope this House will pardon me if I call attention to the financial condition of some of the States. And in doing so I desire first to disclaim any purpose to embarrass or criticise their unfortunate condition. I asked my friend on last evening if he thought there was a State or Territory in the West that was financially able to enter upon any such scheme as this, and now I desire to call his attention to the financial condition of some of these States, and ask him, in view of these facts, if it is just to those States to place in the hands of the Legislatures—without making any imputations whatever against their honesty—to place in the hands of these syndicates and monopolies and corporations that are seeking to get possession of these arid regions for the purposes of gain—if you think it is policy to put in their hands the opportunity of manipulating the election of members of the Legislature, with a view of saddling this additional debt upon the people?

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. BRETZ. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know as to other States——

Mr. BRETZ. I have but five minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. We will give you more time, I think. As far as my State is concerned, we could not do that, because we are constitutionally limited.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. So are all the new States constitutionally limited.

Mr. PICKLER. It is not compulsory on the States anyway.

Mr. BRETZ. I will take the State of Nebraska, for instance, with a population of 1,058,910 people. It has a bonded and floating debt of $15,536,772. Her people pay an annual interest upon this debt of $925,663. It has a per capita debt of $14.67. Take the State of Nevada——

Mr. BRYAN. Do you mean to state that that is the debt of Nebraska? There is no State debt in Nebraska.

Mr. BRETZ. Yes, sir; outside of individual debt.

Mr. BRYAN. You mean the county and general indebtedness. We have no State debt in Nebraska.

Mr. BRETZ. Oh, yes you have—$253,879.

Mr. MERCER. There is no State debt in Nebraska.

Mr. BRETZ. I take these figures from the census report.

Mr. BRYAN. It is the county and other indebtedness.

Mr. BRETZ. Take the State of Nevada, with a population of 45,761.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I will yield five minutes longer to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRETZ. The State of Nevada has a population of 45,761, with a bonded and floating debt of $1,337,501. Her people pay an annual interest upon this of $62,826. Its per capita indebtedness is $29.23.

Take the State of South Dakota, with a population of 328,808, with a bonded and floating debt of $6,613,707, paying an annual interest of $400,466. Its per capita indebtedness is $20.11.

Mr. PICKLER. That is on account of county indebtedness and everything. It is very small.

Mr. BRETZ. I take the statement of the debt as I find it, and I do not criticise the gentleman's State.

Mr. PICKLER. It does not begin to compare with the indebtedness of Indiana, not even in per capita.

Mr. BRYAN. I will state to the gentleman as a matter of fact that we have no State debt.

Mr. BRETZ. I will state to the gentleman from Nebraska that I am speaking from the record, and I know what I am speaking of. I take it from the record of the bonded and floating debt of that State. It is not individual debt.

Mr. BRYAN. It is not the State debt, but the county and city debts.

Mr. BRETZ. What difference does it make; it is the indebtedness of your State.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But the State has the property on which this debt is based.

Mr. BRETZ. Now, let me call your attention to the State of North Dakota.

Mr. GEARY. What makes you think it necessary for these States to incur any debt at all for the reclamation of this land.

Mr. BRETZ. Because this amendment says you must expend $3 an acre on it before you acquire title to a single acre of it.

Mr. GEARY. Let me tell the gentleman that they will do as they do in our State, form regular land districts, selling the land and levying assessments for the amount of the improvement. That would not come out of the State.

Mr. BRETZ. In your State there is a syndicate holding the water rights to over 2,000,000 acres of this character of land.

Mr. GEARY. Oh, no.

Mr. BRETZ. They own and control over 300,000 and nearly 400,000 acres of land. You have got within the borders of your State a gentleman who has 258,000 acres of your land.

Mr. GEARY. Who is that?

Mr. BRETZ. Not an acre of which is mountain or hill—the most fertile soil in your State.

Mr. GEARY. Where is that?

Mr. BRETZ. In your State.

Mr. GEARY. What is the name of the party?

Mr. BRETZ. I do not know.

Mr. GEARY. I will give you the name. That is the Haggin and Tevis tract. That was taken up twenty-eight years ago under the desert land act.

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield any further. Now, take the State of North Dakota. Yesterday evening some question was made as to its indebtedness. It was claimed that the State of North Dakota had no debt, but statistics show a bonded and floating debt of $3,842,790, and pays an annual interest of $224,096. The per capita indebtedness is $21.03. Do you think, gentlemen, that you can afford to have your State Legislatures increase that debt?

Mr. PICKLER. We have not the power.

Mr. BRETZ. Well, then, this amendment is useless and could not be made operative. Let me call attention to Montana, which has a population of 132,159, with an indebtedness, bonded and floating, of $2,918,892.

Mr. HARTMAN. What State is that?

Mr. BRETZ. Montana. Her people pay an annual interest of $144,162, with a debt per capita of $22.09.

Mr. HARTMAN. I want to interrupt the gentleman by asking him if I do not understand that he has got that statement of debt from the abstract of the census report showing the debts of the different cities and municipalities? Is not that right?

Mr. BRETZ. Let me state to my friend that I obtained this statement of the debt from the census.

Mr. HARTMAN. The debt of which the gentleman is speaking includes the municipal indebtedness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRETZ. I will say to my friend from Montana that in the Fifty-second Congress I happened to be on the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands. There was a great pressure then, just as there is now, for the Government to cede all of these arid lands to the several States and Territories. A bill to that effect was reported. I was opposed to it, and I then made some investigation of the subject, and this is the result of my investigation.

Mr. HARTMAN. Where did you get your information?

Mr. BRETZ. I do not remember now just where I got all of it, but I gathered it from the statistics of the country—the census abstract.

Mr. HARTMAN. I want to say to the gentleman that I am satisfied he believes those statements to be true or he would not present them to the House——

Mr. BRETZ. Absolutely so.

Mr. HARTMAN. But they are absolutely not true. They are not correct as to my State. The gentleman's figures include the municipal and county indebtedness.

Mr. BRETZ. Suppose they do. That is an indebtedness of your people.

Mr. HARTMAN. If we derive the revenue from the sale of these lands, how can this matter increase our debt?

Mr. BRETZ. But how can you derive the revenue until you have first expended at least $3 an acre upon these lands?

Mr. HARTMAN. We propose to expend the money that is necessary to reclaim the lands, and then we shall be able to sell them for more than enough to reimburse ourselves.

Mr. BRETZ. But you have got first to raise the money through your Legislatures. You have first to raise at least $3 an acre before you are entitled to an acre of these lands.

Mr. HARTMAN. Does not the gentleman think that we ought to decide that for ourselves without him?

Mr. BRETZ. I decline to yield, Mr. Speaker. Let me refer now to the State of Washington, with a population of 349,390——

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BRETZ. I decline to yield.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I am sure the gentleman does not wish to misrepresent.

Mr. BRETZ. I decline to yield. I would like to be courteous to my friend from Nebraska if I had the time but I have already trespassed upon the time of House and I must beg to be excused. Take the State of Washington, with a population of 349,390, with a bonded and floating debt of $3,145,658, on which her people pay an annual interest of $77,502; her per capita indebtedness is $9. Oregon, with a population of 313,767, and a bonded and floating indebtedness of $2,479,860, pays an annual interest of $82,140 and has a per capita indebtedness of $7.80.

Mr. HERMANN. What is that last?

Mr. BRETZ. I decline to yield. Wyoming, with a population of 60,705, with a bonded indebtedness of $1,647,381, pays an annual interest charge of $72,192, and has a per capita indebtedness of $27.14. Yet, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen are here asking that their Legislatures shall be authorized to lay further indebtedness upon their people. Take Idaho with a population of 84,385, with a bonded and floating indebtedness of $1,504,333; she pays an annual interest of $81,236, and her capita indebtedness is $18.89. The State of Colorado, with a population of 412,192, has a bonded and floating indebtedness of $8,411,027; she pays an annual interest of $381,089 and has a per capita indebtedness of $20.41. Kansas, with a population of 1,427,096, has a bonded and floating indebtedness of $40,629,022.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. May I correct the gentleman?

Mr. BRETZ. I beg to be excused. Kansas pays an annual interest of $2,385,975.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. He has got all the States in his list except Indiana.

Mr. BRETZ. Yes; but Indiana is not asking for a slice of this pie. The mortgage indebtedness of Kansas this is individual indebtedness) is $243,146,826, and her per capita indedtedness is $28.47.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Are you speaking of Kansas?

Mr. BRETZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Her per capita State indebtedness is not one dollar. The State indebtedness is only $1,119,658.

Mr. BRETZ. I beg to differ with the gentleman. I take the official records.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. You are including all municipal indebtedness. Besides, we have cash and productive assets held by the State amounting to $3,713,199.

Mr. BRETZ. I decline to yield.

The State of California has a population of 1,208,130. Her people owe a bonded and floating debt of $15,569,439, and they pay an annual interest of $1,008,684. The per capita debt is $12.89. The Territory of New Mexico has a population of 153,593. Her people owe a bonded and floating debt of $2,831,438, and pay an annual interest thereon of $171,194. Her per capita debt is $18.44. Arizona has a population of 59,620. Her people owe a bonded and floating debt of $2,937,971, upon which they pay $170,097 interest annually. Her per capita debt is $49.28. Utah, with a population of 207,905, owes a floating debt of $787,501, upon which her people pay an annual interest amounting to $33,880. Her per capita debt is but $3.69.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask these gentlemen who are so earnestly advocating this amendment if they think their people can stand an increase of this enormous debt? Do not you think it would be better for your people not to add $3,000,000 more burdens in each State and Territory included in this proposed amendment? A great number of irrigation congresses have met in various places in the great West in the last few years. A very noted one of these congresses was the one that met about three years ago at Salt Lake City. A very peculiar thing about that congress was that the delegates composing it were in some way connected with all the land syndicates of the West.

One of the most prominent characters in that congress was the general land agent of the Central and Southern Pacific Railroad Companies, and was also the land commissioner of the Oregon and California and the Houston and Texas Railroad Companies. This gentleman was there backed by all the power and influence of these great and powerful corporations, urging that congress to adopt memorials and resolutions to the Congress of the United States, asking it to cede to the several States and Territories all the arid lands within their borders. That convention, surrounded as it was, unanimously adopted a series of resolutions favoring the ceding of all the arid lands to the States and Territories, and accordingly sent resolutions with a lengthy memorial to the Fifty-second Congress.

Shortly after the Salt Lake City convention Governor Toole, of Montana, called a convention to meet at Helena, in that State, for the purpose of taking, as was stated in the call, the sense of the people of the State on the Utah resolutions. That convention was composed of representative men of the State from almost every locality in it. It was not packed by representatives of railroad and other land syndicates, but was composed of the best representative business men in the State. That convention, after careful consideration of the subject, resolved against the Utah plan of ceding the arid lands to the several States and Territories.

I cite these two conventions for the purpose of showing the difference of opinion in the West on this subject, and also to show that its chief promoters in the West are the men holding vast areas of land, who expect to hold still more if they can get Congress to cede the lands to the States.

I think Congress had better keep its hand on the pilot wheel a while longer. It has managed our public domain with reasonable satisfaction and justness to the home-seeker for more than a hundred years, and would do well, in my opinion, to continue to do so.

It is very strange how sensitive these gentlemen from the West are when anyone living elsewhere presumes to suggest anything concerning legislation affecting our public lands in the West. If we consult their ideas about the right of a member of Congress coming from some other section of the country, and having anything to say about legislation affecting the West, we soon learn that some of them, at least, regard it next to high treason for anybody to interfere in legislation affecting their part of the country. They say, "We want you to help us carry out our schemes at whatever expense in land or money, but you must not oppose us."

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] saw fit in his remarks to suggest I had never been farther West than Chicago, and did not know anything about their wants and needs. It is true I have never circumnavigated the earth, neither do I live under the seductive and persuasive influences of all the land-grabbers and land syndicates of the great West. I have no such environments, and can think and act independent of their influence.

The gentleman [Mr. HAINER] says I have never been West. That is true, and I am informed that before his election to Congress the gentleman had scarcely gotten beyond a day's journey from his creameries, and when it came time for Congress to meet he went to Lincoln, and was found there wandering around in an aimless sort of way looking for Congress. So that honors are about even; if any odds, slightly in his favor. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GEARY. Mr. Speaker, the argument of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] would be a good one if he was speaking for his own State, but it is a very singular thing that, with all the Representatives of the Western States present and willing to assume this obligation for their people, the objection should come from a man who knows nothing about the condition of those States. Can not we be trusted to represent the wishes of our own people here better than you can? But we know more about our ability to assume debts and obligations than any man from Indiana does.

Mr. BRETZ. I do not know whether you do or not.

Mr. GEARY. The country will presume that we do.

Now, the gentleman called my attention to the fact that we had in our State two or three syndicates which have gobbled up large areas of desert land under the old desert land law. I admit the fact of their procedure. But the manner in which they reclaimed those lands and made them available for population furnishes a reason why we are here now trying to profit by their experience in applying the same system which they applied—applying it not on behalf of a syndicate, but on behalf of every man in our State who wants to buy and settle upon and cultivate 160 acres of land. We found in California, as was found in every other State holding arid lands, that no individual settler, limited to a tract of 160 or 320 acres, could perfect and carry out a system of irrigation which would make his land of any value. But when we are permitted to embrace in a reclamation district or an irrigation district 4,000, or 5,000, or 10,000, or 20,000 acres, this large area justifies the adoption of a system that may make every acre of it available.

The purpose of this measure is merely to permit a State in which the lands are situated and which presumably knows more about the wants of its people than any outside authority, to segregate from the public lands within the State any such portions as may be designated as convenient tracts to be irrigated from a common source, making all that area capable of maintaining population.

The plan which would be adopted in California under the operation of this amendment would be this: We would form an irrigation district of 20,000, 30,000, or 40,000 acres; we would require our surveyor to report upon the most convenient mode of irrigating it; we would throw that land open to settlement with a water right secured to every acre; and at the very inception of the enterprise we would levy upon that land an assessment sufficient to complete this work.

In the course of one, two, or three years we would have utilized all the water available for irrigation. We would have taken the land upon which to-day nothing will grow, and by bringing water upon it, by wedding the elements necessary for its successful occupation, we would make it capable of maintaining a grand population. Let us in California settle for ourselves what we want. We do not ask for interference from Indiana or any other State.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS].

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Speaker, I realize the fact that the subject of irrigation is one of vast importance, calling for as prompt action on the part of the Government as can possibly be given it. The efforts before this time have been directed to propositions whereby the General Government should assume the management and expense of reclaiming the desert and arid lands. The proposition contained in this amendment is that the Government shall give to each of the States in which such lands exist a quantity not exceeding 1,000,000 acres, on the condition that they reclaim it and sell it to settlers in quantities not exceeding 160 acres to each. This proposition, which may be called an experiment, for it embraces only a very small portion of our arid lands, is a very attractive one, and if it had come before the House as a bill properly introduced, referred to a committee, and by it carefully considered and reported to the House, I should have given it my hearty support, and I now say to gentlemen who have this matter in charge that if that course is pursued and the bill brought up before the next session of this Congress I shall most heartily support it.

I am afraid of legislation of such magnitude which comes before the House in the shape of amendments to appropriation bills. I am afraid of such hasty preparation of matters of large importance. Errors may be committed that will defeat the very object that we have in view. I believe that the States in which these lands are situated are more interested, have a more intelligent interest in making them valuable than can possibly be held by the General Government. The question affects their prosperity and their home life. For this reason I am very anxious that the first step in that direction shall be wisely taken, and not lead to complications that will discredit the plan. I do not believe that in the few moments which can be devoted to this discussion proper care can be taken to avoid errors.

I notice that Representatives from the various States interested in the question are not united as to the details of the proposed plan. This fact adds to my misgivings.

I wish distinctly to state, and so plainly that I may not be misunderstood, that my objection to this experiment is solely based upon the form in which it comes before us. Government will probably never undertake to reclaim these now worthless lands; the States can do so, but let great care be taken that when Government makes transfers of any of them for that purpose, that such transfer shall be surrounded by such safeguards as will insure the accomplishment of the purpose, and not discredit the plan by hasty legislation that may lead to complications.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN].

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time this great subject has been considered by Congress. Not only during this session, but in former sessions, has this question been presented; and Congress, upon ample consideration, has decided, first, in favor of reclaiming these vast desert lands; and secondly, upon apportioning them to actual settlers. How these lands should be reclaimed, and by whom they should be reclaimed, are questions resolving themselves into problems which we have endeavored heretofore, and with some success, to meet—in committing the General Government to the reclamation of these lands.

Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been appropriated and expended in that direction toward the selection of reservoirs, toward the survey of the arid and semi-arid belt, and in other ways looking toward the ultimate reclamation of these lands. We have, however, failed in securing any further material assistance from the public Treasury. Other great works have invited the attention of the Government, and it has been found impossible to give sufficient means for the great purpose we have had in view. So that the committee has come to the conclusion that we should test the capacity of the different States in which these lands are situated to meet this question—that we should permit them to try the experiment for themselves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is anything that we should be cautious about in this legislation, it is in regard to the protection of the actual settlers on the lands to be reclaimed under the provisions of this amendment. With all the vast experience which some of the States of this Union have had in the past in connection with this matter, notably those States which derived lands under what is known as the "swamp land grant," or, as it might very much more properly be called, in view of subsequent events, the swamp land grab—it is natural that those of us who have seen the inconveniences and experienced the inequalities and the injustice which have resulted from such legislation, with reference to the distribution of public lands through State instrumentality under such grants, should desire to be cautious as to any future action that may be taken.

I have, Mr. Speaker, very serious misgivings as to the success of the method which is provided for in this conference report with reference to the disposition of these arid lands. I seriously question whether, under the language in which this proposed legislation is expressed, the States can adequately make the reclamation designed, and whether the States can fairly, under the machinery which they have heretofore used to apportion out State lands, justly apportion the lands which may be reclaimed under this provision to the deserving and landless of the country.

But it is the best we can do at the present time, and as an experiment—the General Government failing to take a more active part in the matter—I am willing for one to waive any objections

I may have to it, hoping in the results of the experiments to be made by the States that there will be developed such a means and such a mode for the solution of the great question that hereafter we may be able to consider it with very much more intelligence than we are now in possession of with regard to it. But I particularly caution this Congress and the members of the conference on the part of the House on this question that the safeguards to be thrown about the lands when reclaimed, and their disposal to actual settlers should be clear, explicit, and satisfactory. I ask the chairman of the managers on the part of the House to give his attention to the language of the amendment to which I wish now to call his attention.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. HERMANN. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. I will give the gentleman additional time for the interruption.

When the amendments were being considered by the conference committee, the conferees on the part of the House not being familiar with our land system, disagreed to that particular amendment of the Senate for the purpose of bringing it back to the House to discover the sense of the House upon the amendment, and also to enable gentlemen who are entirely familiar with the subject to so instruct the conferees in the shape of the language to be used, that no error could be committed. And I give the gentleman fair warning that if the sense of the House should be in favor of such legislation, he and those gentlemen who are familiar with this land system must prepare amendments so as to give the conferees of the House in dealing with the subject full information, and that such amendments shall go into the conference with us.

Mr. HERMANN. In view of the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, I feel that I am entirely justified in the suggestions I have made and those which I now propose to make.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. Let me make one more suggestion, because it seems to me the question has been like the farmer's cow, it has been feeding on both sides of the brook in this matter. I want to know exactly what the gentleman thinks of the shape of the amendment to be offered for the consideration of the Senate conferees.

Mr. HERMANN. The "brook" is a very wide one and a very dry one, and there is not much feed on either side of it. That is just the difficulty. If the gentleman will yield to me for five minutes longer——

Mr. SAYERS. I have not that much time at my disposal, but will yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HERMANN. In order to illustrate still further what I desire to call to the attention of the House and to the House conferees, in reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] now under consideration as an amendment to the section of the report of the conference committee, you will find embodied this proviso:

Provided, That said States shall not sell or dispose of more than 160 acres of said land to any one person.

This is upon the assumption that these lands when reclaimed are the most fertile and will yield abundant and lucrative harvests to the husbandman and will make profitable homes. I believe this to be true.

But it may be that before that provision can be carried out the title will have passed to the State on the reclamation of the lands, and my point is that there may still not be a sufficient safeguard as to the possible reckless squandering and wholesale disposition of the lands after the title shall be vested in the State and in violation of the spirit of this proviso. It may, therefore, be advisable to provide that no title shall vest until it is shown that the purchaser is an actual settler and on 160 acres or less of those lands. The necessity of such precaution is illustrated in the history of the swamp land grants to the States, and not only in that, but in various other grants which have been made to the States in the matter of railroad and wagon-road construction and for other purposes. I have in my mind at this time in my own district an illustration where 125,000 acres of land had been granted to the State for the purpose of the construction of a military wagon road, which grant contained several conditions embodied in the general granting act. Among the conditions it was provided that the lands should be disposed of in quantities not exceeding 160 acres and at a price not exceeding $2.50 an acre, and should be sold to actual settlers only.

But what are the facts? Every one of these conditions have been violated. The lands have been sold to individual purchasers not only in large quantities and in excess of the 160 acres fixed by the granting act, but the lands have been sold in many instances to persons who were not actual settlers and at prices far exceeding $2.50 an acre—in some instances as high as $10 an acre to my own knowledge. The title passed from the Government and it was not made conditional upon the performance of the limitations I have mentioned; and so the Departments of the Government exacted no proof as to compliance before patent issued.

The settlers have been told, "If you can not pay this price you need not take it;" but in the mean time the patent title has passed out of the United States into the State, and from the State into this particular wagon-road assignee, and now the road company say to these settlers on the lands, who are thus to be taken advantage of, "What are you going to do about it?"

For one I do not desire that such experience shall be entailed upon the future people of the reclaimed arid regions of the country. I think that in view of this experience we should so hedge in and so guard and so protect the interests of the homeless, landless people of the country, who will seek the rich empires of the West which are to be reclaimed, and they are the ones chiefly in whose interests, as I understand it, this legislation is proposed.

I think we should look into the past for the purpose of getting experience for the future. Therefore I would suggest to the House that this language may prove to be too vague, if not too loose, and if this measure is passed in its present form and the title passes to the State after the reclamation of the lands, it may be an inducement for the syndicate and the intriguer and the monopolist to go before the various legislative bodies and by deceit and misrepresentation and selfish interest secure legislation in the interests of large holdings, as has been done so often in other matters, and then, when our authority is gone, our title divested, and when it is too late, the people of the United States and Congress will be told, "What are you going to do about it?"

If I shall find the amendment insufficient to protect the interests of the actual bona fide settler I shall at the proper time submit a proper amendment or substitute. Let the bill so protected be passed, for our people will welcome it as the best we can secure, and while we are doing this it behooves us to guard every provision which otherwise may be construed adversely to the interests of the real beneficiaries for whom this legislation is had—the home-seeking and home-deserving people of the United States. Let this be the character of our heritage to the future, and we shall then have reason to feel that we have performed our duty faithfully, conscientiously, and guardedly by the whole country.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon said. Mr. Speaker, naturally, this is a question in which I feel great interest, because the people in a large part of the district which I represent feel a deep interest in it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS], who has just taken his seat, says to us wait until the next Congress; bring in something, and we will then give you appropriate legislation.

Mr. Speaker, we do not know whether any gentleman who is here now can promise us with any certainty as to what will be done in the next Congress. There are very few gentlemen who have a fee simple title to their seats in the next Congress. Promises may be made as to what will be done by gentlemen who, if they were here, would try to carry out their promises in good faith. But realizing as I do the uncertainty of nominations, to say nothing of elections, those of us who have a constituency that will be affected by this amendment much prefer to have action taken now, while we have men here who are entitled to act in this House, rather than take promises from men who may not be here at a session of the next Congress qualified to vote upon the question.

Mr. COOMBS. The same members will be here at the next session of Congress.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. The next session of Congress will be a short one, and a matter of this kind will be too important to consider at that time. There is no time like the present time in which to dispose of this question. It is not a question of robbing the public domain of vast acres, it simply permits the States which come within the provisions of this bill, provided they meet its requirements, to go forward and take such action as will add thousands and thousands of dollars to the value of these lands, and then the Government permits them to take the lands reclaimed and dispose of them, subject to the restrictions of this amendment.

The Government does not seem to care to do anything with this character of lands. That has been urged upon Congress time and again, and no action looking to any general reclamation of arid lands has been taken or favorably reported. This is simply a proposition to allow the States to do something of that kind. If they do not do anything, nothing will be lost to the Government. Until all the requirements of the pending measure are fully met the title to the lands will remain where it now is, in the Government of the United States. Gentlemen tell us what we need in the West, gentlemen who never saw the West, who never saw an acre of arid land, who do not know what it looks like.

I tell you, gentlemen, if you could see the thousands of acres of arid lands and fully know the worth of the same as they now are, and could see and understand the results that would follow irrigation; if you could see the vast improvements made by the process, I do not think there is any man who would oppose a measure that asks so little and is fraught with so much good and such great possibilities as would inure to the country by the reclamation of these lands. It is a matter of great importance, and it is a matter, while it immediately concerns the West alone, it will be of great benefit to the whole country. Those of you who live here in the East have not had to meet this great question and know nothing about it in the sense of knowing how it affects us practically.

The people of the States who could act under this bill know the wants of their States. They know the water sources and supplies, and they know how this water can best be preserved and utilized. There is no one more competent than the State itself to know in what manner this work should be done, and I assure you that under the care and guidance of the laws of the States affected, the question will be more carefully considered, more carefully looked after, and there will be less improvident use of the water, than there would if the General Government were to undertake the reclamation of the arid lands sought to be reclaimed by this measure.

It would be to the interest of a State to utilize every available gallon of water, and to make the best use of it that could be devised for the purpose of reclaiming such land as could be irrigated. It would be to the interest of the State to see that none of the water was wasted or improvidently used. Hence if it is left to the States, guarded by such careful legislation as could and would be enacted by legislators fully acquainted with the country and the people, the best results will be attained. Our own State has enacted laws relative to irrigation, and many of the other States have done the same thing. These laws have been enacted by men who are upon the ground, who understand the country and the climate, and who understand everything connected with the question.

I want also to say that certainly as far as our own State is concerned, its Legislature will, in my opinion, take such action looking to the reclamation of the lands granted that in a few years no one will doubt the action or question the wisdom of this Congress in passing this measure. This act, if passed, does not suspend the desert land act, nor prevent those who desire to take land directly from the Government from doing so, provided they comply with the law, rules, and regulations. It only enables the State to do what the individual by reason of poverty can not do, and after it has made the land fertile and the prospect of obtaining an easy living therefrom, then the man who could not accomplish the result alone may come in and purchase for himself and family a home, his success will be assured, and the State or General Government will in no sense be losers.

The Western States do not ask for a guardian in order to keep their Legislatures from bankrupting or involving them hopelessly in debt, as intimated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] would be the result should this bill pass. They will look after that for themselves; all they ask is a full and free chance to develop their own resources, and they will be fully able to go alone, even though it should be to the surprise of those gentlemen who oppose this measure to protect a State affected from becoming bankrupt should the General Government allow it to irrigate 1,000,000 acres of arid lands within its borders.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I would not have taken a moment's time of this House had not the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] referred to the inability of the States to take care of the arid lands should this amendment be adopted.

The citizens of Kansas are greatly interested in this question, and many conventions have been held for the purpose of adopting some policy by which these lands may be reclaimed and for irrigating lands in Western Kansas.

It would suit the people of Kansas better if Congress would appropriate a sufficient sum for making examinations and surveys in the western part of the State and for constructing reservoirs for irrigating lands in that part of the State; but if this can not be done the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] should be agreed to.

I was a little surprised at the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] referring to the indebtedness of the various States and his including Kansas.

Of course, the citizens of Kansas are in debt; they could not have made such great developments, they could not have opened and improved so many fine farms, constructed so many comfortable dwellings, provided so many pleasant homes for their families, and they could not have made Kansas the best State in the Union without going into debt.

But the gentleman is a little mistaken about our State indebtedness; according to the report of the Eleventh Census it only amounted to $1,119,658; the population of Kansas is given as 1,427,096, which would make her per capita indebtedness less than $1.

The State debt of Indiana, by the same report, is given as $8,538,059, her population 2,192,404, which makes her per capita State debt amount to nearly $4.

Then again, the cash and productive assets held by Kansas in 1890 amounted to $6,713,199, while that of Indiana only amounted to $5,362,892.

The citizens of Kansas are perfectly willing to have a comparison made between her and other States.

In the ten years from 1880 to 1890, as is shown by the report of the Eleventh Census, it appears that the following States made an increase per cent of assessed valuation, to wit: Indiana, 16.33 per cent; Massachusetts, 35.93 per cent; New York, 42.36 per cent; Pennsylvania, 54.05; while Kansas increased 116.58.

This same report gives the true valuation of the real and personal property of the several States and Territories, and also the per capita of total true valuation, which is as follows: Indiana, $956; Pennsylvania, $1,177; Massachusetts, $1,252; while that of the State of Kansas amounted to $1,261.

Upon a former occasion I called attention to the great growth of Kansas, and located her indebtedness and called attention to the indebtedness of other States.

While Kansas had in 1890 a per capita real estate mortgage indebtedness amounting to $170, yet Massachusetts had $144, Minnesota $152, New Jersey $161, California $200, Colorado $206, the District of Columbia $226, and New York the large amount of $268.

When you compare Kansas with Eastern States so far as per cent of increase in wealth or per capita of true valuation, the citizens of Kansas may well be and are proud of the showing made by their State.

When it comes to her wonderful products, there is no producing State in this Union that desires to stand the test of comparison.

When the gentleman from Indiana recalls the fact that Kansas has within her borders over 9,000 public schoolhouses; that there are a larger number of children between the ages of 5 and 18 years enrolled in our schools than any other State in the Union according to the population; when he remembers we have over 4,500 churches; when he remembers we have great colleges and universities which our citizens are maintaining, and when he remembers that our citizens are fast reducing their indebtedness, he will not question the ability of Kansas to take care of this land should it be intrusted to her.

There is nothing in the objection urged by some of the gentlemen opposed to this measure, that it is impracticable to irrigate much of the arid lands, for it has been already demonstrated by investigation by a number of eminent and scientific gentlemen, among them Prof. Robert Hay of Kansas, and fully established in his valuable report that it is practicable to obtain water supply to reclaim the greater portion of these lands.

There is about 734,000 acres of Government land still vacant in Western Kansas; I am unable to say how much of it comes under the provision of this act, but with irrigation Western Kansas can be made one of the most productive spots in the United States.

If you include Kansas and Nebraska you need have no fears in regard to their ability to comply with the provisions of the act, and the land within their borders will be reclaimed as soon as they are in any other State.

While this provision is not what the people want, it is a step in the right direction, and I hope the amendment will be agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, strange propositions are submitted to us in the discussion of great questions; but perhaps none is more strange than the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ], who I am reliably informed has never been west of Chicago and never even saw that metropolis until sent there as a member of a special committee within the past few months and who undertakes to oppose this measure, basing his opposition on the fact that the States of the West are very heavily in debt. Among other States which he saw fit to traduce in that manner is the State which I have the honor in part to represent. Why he has seen fit to lug in the question of State indebtedness no reasonable person can guess. In the West at least our debts, State and individual, represent actual assets in hand. We went in debt only for property we have and need. I do not know the source of the gentleman's information. I have, however, in my hand the report from the Eleventh Census on "Wealth, Debt, and Taxation."

On page 202 I find the record of the State debt of Nebraska, and submit this as an authority to the gentleman. I find that the entire debt of the State of Nebraska, less the sinking fund, was, in 1890, $439,799.09; and at the same time its available cash assets in its treasury was $956,865.96, or more than twice the amount of its debt, and I apprehend, if his figures were tested by the real facts in the other States, they would prove him to be equally in error as to those States.

But, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself and colleagues [Messrs. MEIKLEJOHN and MERCER], with whom I have just had a hurried consultation, I desire to call attention to a very serious defect in the proposed amendment. We take it for granted that the purpose of this amendment is to do actual good to the Western States and the States which have arid lands—lands which may with profit be reclaimed. That is the purpose of it. But the operation of the proposed amendment, I find, is limited to the States containing within their borders desert lands. Desert lands and arid lands are two very different and distinct terms. Desert lands are not necessarily arid lands; and arid lands are not necessarily desert lands, as the term is technically used, though the term arid includes desert. By arid lands we mean such as do not in an average year, without irrigation, produce any considerable agricultural crop.

Now, take the State of Kansas and the State of Nebraska, both of which do contain within their borders arid land, but not an acre of desert land. You would not affect these States with this proposed amendment. You would not aid in the reclamation of the best lands in the West by means of this amendment. You would not have your legislation apply to those States to which it might most profitably be applied, nor would it apply to one of the Territories which you propose to admit as States.

It seems to me that this amendment ought to be further amended, and should be made to include all the States or Territories which include within their borders arid lands; and for that purpose I desire, and if this is the proper time I submit an amendment, if it is in order now, to this section by inserting after the word "of" in line 2 of the amendment, which is on the Clerk's desk, the words "the arid and," so as to make it include not only desert, but also arid lands; and after the word "States," in line 7, the following words: "of Nebraska and Kansas and to each of the States which may be formed out of the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Utah, and also the States."

By interpolating the words which I have used here you will include all the States and Territories which contain arid lands.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. What is the difference between arid and desert land?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Desert land is that which is specifically named in the desert-land act.

Mr. PICKLER. On which no agricultural crop will grow without irrigation.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. They have been specifically set apart and ascertained.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Now, what is arid land?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Arid lands are those which in fact, and under the decision of the Department of the Interior, can not be profitably cultivated without irrigation, and which could be profitably cultivated with irrigation.

Mr. COOMBS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask another question?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. COOMBS. I desire to ask the gentleman if the irrigation congress that has been held out West lately passed any resolutions that would favor such a plan as this?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Oh, unquestionably. The West is a unit on this proposition.

Mr. COOMBS. I understand; but as to this specific proposition and this specific plan. I want to say to the gentleman that I have no antagonism to this irrigation problem. The only point I desire to make is that it should be taken up in the proper way, so that there may be no entanglement. You have pointed out some mistakes that have been made. Do not you think that on a careful examination others might be pointed out?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That may be, possibly. There is much force in the gentleman's suggestion. Doubtless there are other objections than that which I have pointed out and the gentleman from Oregon has pointed out. It is a vital question to the people of the West.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. When I yield to gentlemen they should not be interrupted. I have but a limited time to yield to several gentlemen.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Have you not lands in the State of Nebraska that can be entered under the desert-land act as it exists on the statute book?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Not one acre.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Where has it been so decided?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. We have none that is known as desert land.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But have not desert-land entries been made in your State?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Not an acre, either in our State or in Kansas.

I desire specially to call the attention of the House to the fact that the act of March 3, 1877, to which this amendment refers and which is made a part of it, defines desert lands to be such as will not without irrigation produce any agricultural crop; and the same act in terms, by section 3, expressly limits desert lands to the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, and the Dakotas, and the Territories of Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico. It does not include Nebraska, Kansas, or the Territory of Oklahoma.

In this view of the case, one which is compelled by a consideration of the act of 1877, I am reënforced by the opinion of the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office, who on August 8, 1894, wrote the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., August 8, 1894.

SIR: In reference to the subject of the amendment proposed as a substitute for Senate amendment No. 280 to the sundry civil bill, this day submitted for an expression of my opinion in letter from the clerk of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, I have the honor to state that the amendment proposed seems to be similar in its general purposes to the Senate bill No. 1591, "To provide for the reservation, sale, and settlement of certain lands in the several States and Territories," in regard to which the views of this office were expressed in a report of March 9, 1894, which is incorporated in the report of the Senate Committee on Public Lands of April 17, 1894, in reference to that bill.

The proposed substitute appears, on careful examination, to differ somewhat in its provisions from said bill, but as a result of such examination, I see no reason why the purposes sought to be accomplished by the bill referred to, which was favorably reported upon by this office in the report mentioned, may not be attained under the provisions of the proposed substitute, should it be adopted.

It is the opinion of this office, however, that should the proposed substitute be adopted, such amendment be made as will make it clearly and unequivocally applicable not only to existing States or the States to which existing desert land laws apply, but also to the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and to the States that may be formed out of the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Utah, when admitted, as provided for in fourth section of Senate bill 1591.

The draft of substitute is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

EDW. A. BOWERS,
Acting Commissioner.

HON. FRANCIS M. COCKRELL,
United States Senate.

There is neither reason nor justice in excluding from this act the States which may derive the greatest benefit from it.

I regret exceedingly that this great question is precipitated upon the House without a fair opportunity for discussion and perfecting a bill which will effectuate the great purpose which should be accomplished. We are in the closing days of a year's continuous session without even so much as a day being given to this important matter. I recognize, however, it is a movement in the right direction. A wise conservation of the water supply will make the untold millions of acres of arid and semi-arid lands in the West fruitful as the most fertile valleys of the East, affording homes for the homeless, extending and diversifying industries, and adding immensely to the permanent wealth of the nation. I desire that Congress do the right thing. I may be obliged to see this measure pass in a form which will be of no value to the greater part of the great West, which in spite of the neglect and discrimination so fashionable to be visited upon it by this Congress, will one day be in position to demand and command a fair hearing and a fair measure of justice.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, without entering upon a discussion of the merits of the question itself, I would hardly feel justified in allowing this occasion to pass without an explanation of the indebtedness of the district which I represent, the State of North Dakota, inasmuch as a statement has been made here by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] which, if allowed to go without explanation, would do our people great injustice.

In the first place, let me call attention to the fact that indebtedness itself, provided you have assets, is not necessarily a matter of reproach. For instance, as to private debts, the late census of the United States shows that the State of New York has the greatest mortgage indebtedness of any State in the Union, namely, $268 per capita. But that is not necessarily a matter of disgrace or reproach to the gallant and intelligent Representative from that State [Mr. COOMBS] who has been antagonizing us on this bill. The next greatest per capita indebtedness is right here in the District of Columbia, namely, $226; but it is not necessarily a fact which implies reproach or disgrace, or which indicates that the people of this District are not solvent or worthy of credit.

The same census shows that in the State of Arkansas the per capita mortgage indebtedness is only $13; but that is not necessarily an indication of wealth, of foresight, or of great business sagacity in the State of Arkansas. I have 6,000 constituents in my district who are entirely clear of debt; namely, the Wahpitas, the Sissetons, the Chippewas, and the Cut-head Sioux. They are entirely clear of debt, yet their credit is no better than the credit of the people of the District of Columbia with this enormous indebtedness of $226 per capita hanging over them.

In the organic law organizing our Territory, while we were in partnership with South Dakota, there was a provision, which amounted to a constitutional limitation, as to municipal and county indebtedness, fixing the limit at 5 per cent. We scrupulously and religiously adhered to that limit until we entered the Union, and then we put the same limitation upon our statute book, thus giving it the same force and effect. The maximum of those debts, seldom reached, is after all very moderate, only 5 per cent of the assessed valuation. So much for municipal and county indebtedness. Coming now to State indebtedness, at the time we dissolved partnership with South Dakota we assumed our share of the debt, which amounted to only $250,000. That did not represent an amount of money that we had fallen behind in the ordinary running expenses of the Territory. We had something to show for every dollar of it.

That debt was upon bonds that we had issued to erect our public, penal, charitable, and educational institutions. We had for it our magnificent State university at Grand Forks, our hospital for the insane at Jamestown, and our capitol and penitentiary in the city of Bismarck, worth fully the amount of the debt. The amount, $250,000, was all the indebtedness we assumed five years ago when we entered upon Statehood. Since then we have run up to the constitutional limit, which is only $500,000 more, for in our Constitution we inserted an article forbidding the State ever to incur an indebtedness more than $500,000 above what then existed. Why, sir, it is a mere bagatelle.

And, Mr. Speaker, for that $500,000, as for the $250,000, we have something to show. We have our two beautiful normal schools at Valley City and Mayville. We have our agricultural college, built with this money, at Fargo, and we have our school for deaf mutes at Devils Lake, our Soldiers' Home at Lisbon, and other institutions of charity and of education, that we are proud of and consider money well invested.

The wealth of the State is ample security for this debt, and our credit ranks with the very best.

The people I represent produce one-tenth of the entire wheat crop of the United States every year right in one Congressional district, and they do it in four months' work. Three years ago, when we produced 64,000,000 bushels of wheat which was sold at an average of over 80 cents a bushel, the people that I represented produced more wealth than any equal number of people ever produced in the same length of time in any Congressional district in the United States since Columbus discovered America, no matter whether they were engaged in banking, railroading, manufacturing, or gold mining. In the palmiest days of California's placer mining there was never a time when 180,000 people, only half of them engaged in that particular work, produced in four months $50,000,000 of value upon a single item of production.

Why, sir, in North Dakota we have $2,000,000 of school funds in our treasury now that we do not know what to do with, money which we received for only about 4 per cent of our school lands that we have up to this time placed upon the market.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Speaker, the arid-land question has been agitated for a great many years, not only in the western regions of our country, but in the Halls of Congress. Conventions have been held throughout the West upon this important subject, and the unanimous sentiment is now, after long discussion, that the question of the reclamation of these arid lands can be settled alone by the respective States. They have come to that conclusion, though they desired in the first place that the Government of the United States should undertake the work of reclamation and should then open the reclaimed lands to settlement.

The Government of the United States has been unwilling to do that, for the reason that it involved the selection of vast areas of land, the erection of irrigation works, reservoirs, distributing canals, etc., and the expenditure of a sum ranging from $10 to $50 per acre in the work of reclamation. The National Government is unwilling to undertake the work, though the States in the arid region desired it to do so, and thought it ought to do so.

Various measures have been introduced in Congress with reference to the granting of these arid lands to the various States. Measures looking to this end have repeatedly passed one House and failed of consideration in the other. Committees have passed upon the question in various forms. I think I am safe in saying that it is almost the unanimous sentiment of the various irrigation committees of this Congress and of past Congresses that grants of these lands should be made to the States, and that they should undertake the work of reclamation.

Mr. BOATNER. Is not the principle of this measure exactly the same as that on which the United States granted the swamp lands to the States?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes, the same principle.

Now, the objection is made that this proposition appears in an appropriation bill. Very well, it is here; and if it is a good thing why should it not remain in the appropriation bill?

But gentleman say there is not time for the consideration of the restrictions that should be imposed upon the grants. Now, I admit that it is a matter of the greatest importance that these restrictions should be carefully considered, and this may not be the time and place for their consideration. But I maintain that there should be no restrictions upon the grant, and that any restrictions whatever are likely to defeat the grant itself. The Congress of the United States is not able to frame restrictions upon this grant——

Mr. COOMBS. But I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this very amendment makes restrictions.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true.

Mr. COOMBS. And that is one point which I think ought to be considered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was going to consider that. It is true that this very amendment provides restrictions. I have not time to examine them; I do not know whether those restrictions are wise or not. My position is against any restriction. But this I do say, that if the grant should be made now, and it should be found that the restrictions are unwise, we can hereafter modify the restrictions. And I would rather now avail myself of the opportunity to make the grant than trust the matter to future Congresses, with the delays attendant upon legislative action.

Mr. HERMANN. How can the restrictions be modified after the title to these lands has vested in the several States?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The only way I would modify the restrictions would be by doing away with them absolutely, so far as I am concerned. I say this matter should be intrusted to the wisdom of the various Legislatures; and though gentlemen say that the Legislatures of these States have acted unwisely in the past—a matter which I am willing to admit—I say that they have passed through a severe education in regard to such matters; and I believe the Legislature of every State to which a grant is made will act wisely in imposing restrictions upon the settlement of these lands.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. If the States should disregard the restrictions, is there any remedy?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I presume there is.

Mr. PICKLER. This amendment provides that the lands shall not be ceded to the States until they have complied with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I understand, the grant is not to take effect until a certain amount per acre has been expended in the work of reclamation.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. But suppose that a State, instead of selling this land in 160-acre tracts, should sell the whole million acres in one body; is there any remedy?

Mr. SAYERS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS].

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, there is in these Western States an association called the Interstate Irrigation Association. They had a great convention at Omaha on the 21st and 22d days of March last. Able men were present from all of these States, and I desire simply to present to the House the conclusions at which they arrived, showing that they make no such recommendation as this amendment contemplates.

I send to the desk to be read the resolutions adopted by them.

The Clerk read as follows:

RESOLUTIONS OF THE CONVENTION.

Whereas American citizens wishing to secure homes have moved on these plains, bought and paid the Government for land, and expended money in improving it; and

Whereas it has been demonstrated by the experience of these men and by the signal stations of the Government that the amount of rainfall at proper seasons is insufficient to make agriculture successful: Therefore

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that it is the duty of Congress to make increased appropriations to test the practicability of the following methods of irrigation for these plains:

First, that the Government should, by experiments, determine whether the underflow and artesian water is of sufficient volume and can be brought to the surface at a cost to make it available for general irrigation purposes; second, that it should determine the extent to which reservoirs can be constructed for the purpose of storing storm water sufficient in quantity for irrigation purposes.

Resolved, That we fully indorse the following extract from the report of the special committee of the United States Senate made May 18, 1890, and that the same be made a part of the resolutions of this convention:

"If anything can be done to encourage the people of these great plains, it is important that it should be done speedily. There are over 1,000,000 people in the arid and semiarid belt, who have paid into the United States no less than $40,000,000 for public lands. The Government should demonstrate to them the practicability before they can have the courage or can command the means to prosecute the work on any considerable scale."

Resolved, That since forest culture can be made an effective agent in the reclamation of an arid region, we therefore recommend that every farmer on the prairies be urged to plant and cultivate the growth of forest trees.

Resolved, That we favor the creation of the office of State engineer in the various States, and legislation which shall encourage irrigation, construction, and development.

Resolved, That as authoritative meteorological data is of great importance to irrigation interests, it is the sense of this convention that it is to the best interests of the people of Western America that the present meteorological stations in the arid and semiarid sections of this country be maintained and their number be increased, and we respectfully urge the Secretary of Agriculture and our Representatives in Congress to use their best efforts to that end.

Resolved, That we ask the agricultural colleges in the various States to devote a portion of the funds received from the United States Government for agricultural experiment work, to experiment with and demonstrate the agricultural possibilities with and without irrigation in the plains region, and to investigate the various irrigation problems.

Resolved, That we urge the people of each county to organize county irrigation associations and put themselves in communication with the officers of their State associations, or with this association where there are no State associations.

Resolved, That the executive committee of this association be instructed to coöperate with the executive committees of the various State organizations in sending able delegates from each State to Washington to urge Congress to take immediate action upon the bills now pending in behalf of the irrigation of the Great Plains.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DOOLITTLE].

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated during the course of the argument upon this provision of the bill, by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ], that the indebtedness of the State of Washington considerably exceeded a million of dollars, I think the figures used being $1,700,000.

Now, I do not regard that statement in this discussion as being of any particular importance or consequence either one way or the other. If the indebtedness of that State should at any time amount to more than a million, or even two millions, of dollars the assets of the State of Washington are so greatly in excess of such a sum, that it certainly would cut no figure and would not lessen the credit of the people of that State or of the State itself. But I merely wish to call the attention of the House to the facts. I find that the constitution of the State of Washington provides that in no case shall the indebtedness of the State exceed $400,000, and the indebtedness of the State of Washington to-day for all purposes—the State indebtedness—is nowhere near the limit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so far as the proposition under consideration is concerned: In the first place, I have always believed that the General Government of the United States should itself undertake a system of surveys in these States that contain arid lands with a view to their ultimate reclamation. I believe that these surveys should be made for the purpose of ascertaining where reservoirs at the base of the mountain ranges can be profitably constructed and properly situated, so that the melting snows of the winter and the winter rains may be stored up for use during the crop season on the lands that require this sort of artificial assistance or irrigation to render them adaptable for agriculture.

Mr. CAMINETTI. If the gentleman will allow me, these reservoir sites are reserved now, under the public laws, and in many instances locations have been made by the General Government.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, to some extent; but they have not been made at the base of the mountain ranges, which would seem to be the proper points for their location in my State.

Mr. CAMINETTI. Oh, yes; they have.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Oh, no; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CAMINETTI. Why, I can show you that they have.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That may be the case in some localities; but there has been no such general system carried out, and the gentleman is simply mistaken. Besides, these surveys should be made for the purpose of ascertaining where artesian wells can be profitably put down in these States. In fact, the whole question should be taken up and considered by the General Government. No State can do it as thoroughly or satisfactorily as it is within the ability of the General Government to perform this necessary and exceedingly important work.

Mr. Speaker, since I have been here amendments have been offered repeatedly to bills which have been presented in Congress from time to time for the promotion of this work, but the people of this country, through their representatives, have not seemed willing to take it up.

Now, then, inasmuch as this amendment is offered, and I believe it to be a step in the right direction and that it will at least keep the minds of the masses of the people to some extent fixed on the subject, and that eventually good will come from it, I am willing to support it and am willing to take it as a step in the right direction, and as something which the people will regard in that light, and as paving the way for what may be done in the future to settle the whole question satisfactorily.

So far as the irrigation of the land conveyed to the States is concerned, I do not want the General Government, or any gentleman here if he has any apprehension on the subject, to allow his soul for a moment to be disturbed by the idea that the lands will not be properly treated and made productive, or that they will not be protected. It is in the interest of the States to do so; and to-day they have in their power, if this amendment becomes a law, the necessary means for the protection of the land, and there is no question in my mind whatever that they will be as well looked after in all respects by the States as it is possible for them to be managed by the General Government so far as honesty is concerned.

I have some misgivings, it is true, as to what will be done, whether any great good will come from the proposition. But at the same time I believe the people of the country where there are arid lands will be willing to accept this proposition and do all in their power to bring good out of it.

Mr. BOATNER. Has the Commissioner of Agriculture completed his rain-making experiments?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Well, sir, I am unable to answer the gentleman. I have not been in partnership with him in his experiments, neither have I kept cases for the Department referred to.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I can not expect to say anything to add to what has been already said by my colleague from the State of Washington. But to correct one or two figures that he made, I will say that the indebtedness permitted by our constitution limits us to $400,000, not $500,000.

I will further state in reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ], that the State indebtedness of the State of Washington is not given in the census. If the gentleman will take occasion to examine the indebtedness of States in detail, he will find that the State of Washington is not mentioned. If he will examine the municipal and county indebtedness, he will find that that indebtedness of the State of Washington, both municipal and county, is about $1,000,000. Consequently the gentleman must have made some error as far as the State indebtedness of Washington is concerned. I have made diligent search through this report, and find that the State indebtedness is not given in the record.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not certain, in common with some of my colleagues from the West, that this amendment will accomplish very much good. I so expressed myself in private yesterday, and it is my public opinion to-day; but what we are attempting to do is to take some step forward.

In the Fifty-first Congress a scheme was brought in appropriating a large amount of money, and including the reservation of all the lands west of the one hundredth parallel. It required a large amount of money. It was defeated because of the opposition to it coming from the West. It turned out that many of the people were occupying 160 acres of land, and they thought their water supply would be taken from them, and so they rose up, as the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] will well remember, and defeated the proposition that we then attempted to inaugurate for the purpose of irrigating the Western arid lands.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of the United States ought to donate to the several States all of the arid and desert lands within their respective geographical areas. As far as the State of Washington is concerned, this amendment does not amount to much. The two great counties of Kititas and Yakima have already, by private enterprise, constructed great irrigating ditches and brought the land under cultivation, or are rapidly doing so. There is a plateau arising above the Columbia River, upon its eastern side, to which a donation of this character might be of some benefit. Whether it will or not depends largely upon how these experiments are conducted. What we ought to try to do is to take some step forward in this matter.

Gentlemen have said that the States would fritter away their lands. I want to say that every one of the six new States that recently came into the Union has provided by constitutional enactment for the protection of the lands granted to the State. We have provided in the constitution of the State of Washington that no school lands or lands granted to the State for the purpose of building a State house and an agricultural college shall be sold for less than $10 an acre.

Mr. PICKLER. It is the same in South Dakota.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. It is the same in South Dakota. All of these States have realized the mistakes that were committed in the State of Indiana and the other older States of the Union, and they have tried to take advantage of those errors, and so they have provided that not an acre of this land which I speak of shall be sold for less than $10 an acre.

Now, Mr. Speaker, whether our municipal debt is a million dollars, or whether our State debt is nothing, I think that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] will be quite busily enough engaged if he attends to the State indebtedness of Indiana, and allows us to look after our own affairs.

Mr. BRETZ. We will attend to Indiana.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Whatever our indebtedness is, we will pay it. You have got all you can do in Indiana to pay your own debts.

Mr. BRETZ. We will pay our honest debts.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. You never have paid your State debts, not for fifty years.

Mr. BRETZ. We keep our credit good all the same.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. LUCAS].

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, the amendment offered by my colleague is one of such importance to the people of the great Northwest that I beg the indulgence of the House for a brief time that I may speak to it.

Some eminent writer, commenting on American institutions, said: "What Europe is to Asia, what England is to the rest of Europe, that, and all that, the Western States and Territories are to the Atlantic States." The same writer also said: "The heat, and the bustle, and the stir of life all increase as one goes toward the setting of the sun; so he who stands on the shores of the Pacific will be about the very center of the great pulse of life."

The great and absorbing question west of the Missouri River to the valleys of California, from the line of the British Possessions to the warm waters of the Gulf, is one of sufficient moisture for agricultural purposes. The soil is the richest and most lasting there is on the continent; the climate is not surpassed for health, vigor, and crops by any other portion of the Union. The people are of the hardiest, pluckiest, most determined, and industrious of our citizenship. They do not falter in the task of conquering and reclaiming the wild lands of the plains, if they can have an open field and fair fight.

In the absence of a sufficient rainfall they are handicapped in their efforts and labor against great disadvantages. By no means are they discouraged, conquered, and driven out, for they know that sometime in the future this great body of what is now semiarid land will be reclaimed by the gradual processes of an intelligent civilization. But this means years of toil and time, and it will be the third or fourth generation who will see the country blossom like a garden and yield magnificent crops in response to the touch of the farmer's hand.

It is needless to argue that civilization acts like magic upon what is marked upon all the old maps "The Great American Desert," for thousands of cities, villages, and farms are to-day found within this scope in a prosperous condition. Indeed, the splendid city of Omaha stands upon the eastern border of this (then) desert, and west of it, stretching for hundreds of miles are found young cities, towns, and farms unsurpassed in any other section; and all reclaimed land from the "Unknown Desert," within the recollection of most of the members of this House.

One of the potent powers in this revolution was the building of the Union Pacific Railroad by a subsidy from the Congress of the United States. That body of legislators builded wiser than they thought when they provided for that line of railroad across a trackless desert; for following its line came the hardy, sturdy, and dauntless pioneer who pitched his tent or built his sod shanty upon the unpromising hot and dry prairie, and with a courage and spirit that challenges admiration begun the work of making a home. For years this class of men have battled with drought, hot winds, and short crops in summer and keen, cutting blasts in winter, until they are well nigh worn out. True, many of them have lived long enough to see their hopes fulfilled, and are fairly well provided for in their afternoon of life.

But the obstacles they have met and in part overcome were many. The one most dreaded of all was a lack of moisture. The rainfall moves west very slowly, and as it nears the base of the mountains from the east—and the same is true west of the range—goes much slower, and less precipitation is observed. Perhaps at a given distance almost a failure may always be expected because of certain atmospheric influences that are not necessary to be discussed at this time.

The scope of country that is embraced in the arid belt comprises parts of the Dakotas, Montana, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, Wyoming, Nevada, California, Nebraska, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas—more than 1,000 square miles in area.

I know the opposition of the majority of this House to what they are pleased to call "paternalism." But I remind them of the fact that for years and years Congress has appropriated money, and large sums of money, not to furnish water to fertilize land, but to build levees and protection to restrain floods of water from destroying the utility of [magnificent plantations that lie along the great water courses of the nation; and in this good work they are always sustained by the people of the whole country. It is a proper function of Congress to protect the property of the people in such cases as much as to protect their liberty or lives when oppressed or in danger.

It is not a consistent objection to say it is "paternalism" to aid the great West in redeeming the millions of acres of land from its arid condition and making them the most fruitful and valuable of any in the nation. We come pleading a righteous cause, asking aid to inaugurate a system by which this may be done; we ask it because the undertaking is too great for individual means or effort. The question of irrigation will not down at the bidding of men; it is before the people, and has come to stay until a response is made that is fair, just, and right.

If the answer is not given in the affirmative, this year or next, it will be at a later day, for the young giant West is growing stronger each year. With the admission of all the new Territories to statehood, as I hope to see done before this Congress adjourns, stalwart Western men will be found upon this floor in the next Congress who will know the wants and necessities of their people and will have the courage to demand recognition. This is not intended as a threat, but a bit of prophecy that is certain to be fulfilled.

The millions of acres of land now in the arid district belongs to the Government. As conditions now are they will not be settled for generations to come, but will lie unoccupied, a waste and desert in the very heart of the nation, acting as a wall between the Atlantic and Pacific. As a prudential investment the Government can not do better than to take steps to redeem this vast body of land from its aridity and make it possible and practicable to have a prosperous settler upon every quarter section of it.

It is not necessary to argue the good results of irrigation farming, for so many examples may be found in the valleys of the West that there is no doubt about it. All the experiments so far have been made by individual or corporate means, and in most cases are crude and imperfect, and with either a great waste of water or a monopoly of ownership that is detrimental to the public good. This to my mind is an unanswerable argument in favor of the Government establishing a system that shall be just and fair to all interested, and the best location is upon a reservation to demonstrate the practicability of a successful system of irrigation.

The irrigation now in use is nearly all taken from streams and carried on a natural, inclined grade. Waste follows to such an extent that only a few are benefited and a comparatively small area provided for. What must be done to redeem the valleys and plains is to establish a system of basins and reservoirs by building dams at the mouths of canyons, drains, and water ways to secure and save up the snow waters and early rains from the mountains and hills until the dry season approaches, and then utilize the same for crop purposes. Another feature presents itself while considering the storage plan, and I call the attention of the gentlemen of this body who represent the great Mississippi Valley to it.

From the mountains of the great west flow rivers and streams in great number in the spring and summer months into a common stream, the Father of Waters, and when the volume reaches the Lower Mississippi becomes a terror of destruction to the plantations and inhabitants of that great valley, often requiring the expenditure of immense sums of money to protect life and property. By a diversion of these waters into basins, reservoirs, and ditches what to your section is a menace and constant danger each year will be made a means of fruitful fertilization for millions of acres of now worthless land.

If you say it is "paternalism" for the Government to exercise its power in developing and making valuable its own lands, I answer, it is a good, safe, and business proposition, worthy of the careful attention of this House. By the way, too, were we engaged to-day in this laudable enterprise, Mr. Coxey and his army would find plenty of work, and when the lands were redeemed they could find magnificent homes as well, and become producers instead of consumers of the people's charity.

The fact of the Government engaging in the work of providing irrigation for the people is not a new thing at all. Russia began it many long years ago; indeed, history shows that Peter the Great, the reformer and founder of that great empire, first introduced the system in his kingdom. The Emperor Alexander gave impetus to the work and established a system of engineering that facilitated the work. Alexander, the liberator, improved upon his predecessors and ordered his ministry to push forward the drainage and irrigation of the wet and barren soils of his kingdom. In that country dams, basins, and reservoirs are built of stone, concrete blocks, and clay, providing gates and sluice ways by which the stored waters are handled as safely and economically as the merchant handles vinegar or molasses in his store.

Spain provides by law an annual subsidy, which is declared to be a vested right, for all irrigation enterprises, the amount to be equal to one-half the cost of the work.

Germany goes further than Spain in its support of irrigation; while France does nearly as well. Even England lends a helping hand at this time to her subjects in this line of work. In fact, the books are full of examples where governments have taken hold of the work of irrigation to redeem their arid lands and bring them into productiveness for the benefit of the people.

To know that irrigation has been extensively practiced in the great and old kingdoms and empires that have risen and fallen in the past, and practiced successfully, argues strongly in favor of this Congress taking the initial steps toward adopting a system that will result in restoring to the public domain millions of acres of the finest agricultural land on the continent that is now and ever must be worthless and useless without moisture, beside being a menace and obstruction to the flow of commerce and civilization.

In this entire arid belt nature has provided in one way or another a sufficient amount of water, and all the necessary material for the construction of dams, basins, and reservoirs. All that remains is for man to provide plans, system, and methods for saving and distributing the necessary moisture at the times and seasons when needed.

In some portions of this territory water taken from the streams that flow through it will be sufficient. In other parts the waters that rush down from the hills and mountains in the springtime from the melting snows and heavy rains, if secured and husbanded, will be ample to irrigate the valleys and insure luxuriant crops. In other parts where there are no mountains, but wide and practically level stretches of plains of the richest soil, underneath the surface lies the great artesian water basin that will supply the entire surface if brought up through wells. In the State of South Dakota, which I in part represent on this floor, there are to-day more than one hundred wells spouting streams of water from a depth of 500 to 1,200 feet with a pressure of sufficient power to hurl a 3-inch stream more than 100 feet into the air.

All these wells have been put down by individuals or towns. Contiguous to many of them are large bodies of land belonging to the Government. I hold that it is competent, legal, and right, as well as a good business investment, for Congress to take hold of the work of reclaiming these lands and preparing them for homes for the people. It is as much the duty of Congress to assist in conquering this drought-infected section, to aid in making it habitable and productive, as has so often and liberally been done in providing against raging streams and floods to protect the adjacent country from inundation and destruction.

It is not paternalism for the strong arm of the Government to assist the people in overcoming these natural difficulties that are too momentous for individuals to do; if it is, then I favor it, no matter from what State or Territory the call comes, for I believe the Government "is for the people," as well as "of the people." The means to overcome these physical difficulties are within the reach of the people of this nation; the application and success is wholly a question of labor and money to pay for it with.

Maj. Powell estimates that there are 1,200,000,000 acres of land in the arid and semiarid districts, of which 700,000,000 has been disposed of to the five great transcontinental railway lines and private citizens, leaving still in possession of the Federal Government 500,000,000 acres. Does not this statement show that it is time the Goverment is moving in the direction of inaugurating a system or work by which these millions of acres shall be reclaimed and offered to the people for homes? The bill before us is not what the friends of irrigation prefer; they hoped to secure legislation broader and fuller in its provisions; but we are willing to accept this bill because it is a step in the right direction and is the beginning of a new era in the great Northwest and will bring about all necessary legislation in due time.

In view of the delays and uncertainties attending attempted governmental control and management of as stupendous a work as would be a national system of irrigation, I favor the present bill most heartily. I believe the several States will enter upon the work of reclaiming the arid lands within their borders with alacrity and industry that will produce beneficial results in a comparatively short time. I do not share in the fears expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], that the States will not manage the business of reclaiming these lands economically or successfully, nor in the fears of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], that waste and loss will occur because of jobs or conniving of State Legislators.

The importance of this advance movement is so great that the people of the States will not suffer unnecessary delay or endure anything that will retard the speedy compliance with the provisions of this bill by the Legislatures. If this bill becomes a law immediate action will be taken by the several States to carry into effect its provisions. It will be hailed as a godsend to the wealth and prosperity of each Commonwealth that now is handicapped with large bodies of arid and sterile lands. Active and intelligent measures will be provided by which acres and acres will be added to the productive and valuable part of the State. It seems to me that the bill is explicit and careful in its provisions, guarding all the rights of the Federal Government. The title can not pass to the State until reclamation is secured and then must be awarded to settlers in 160-acre lots for bona fide homes.

I do not recall a bill that has been before this Congress that is of more importance and benefit to the people, the States, and the nation. This bill makes it possible for 500,000,000 acres of land to be redeemed from a condition of utter worthlessness and turned into a more reliable state of productiveness than any other acres outside of the irrigation districts.

It may sound strange to our Eastern and Southern friends to say that one-half of the area of agricultural lands in the United States is dependent in whole or in part on irrigation, leaving out Alaska. There are 1,340,000 square miles in the arid districts where irrigation is absolutely necessary.

East of the arid district line is a doubtful belt of 100 to 200 miles wide that some years needs irrigation as badly as does the positively arid districts. This section Powell calls the subhumid region. It requires from 20 to 25 inches of rainfall for the production of a crop in the dry atmosphere of the Northwest, but if the water was distributed at the right times during crop season, 9 inches is abundant to produce a luxuriant crop. In an address delivered by Governor Markham, of California, on irrigation, he argues the question so ably that I use the substance of his remarks. He said: Close and observant communion with nature is one of the most potent forces to affect thought and character. In manufactures the vast number, at least in modern times, are mere directors of, or assistants to, ingenious machines.

In trade the mind is directed almost entirely to barter, carried on in limited inclosures. In the former the great mass are subservient to the will of the master; in the latter to the will of each other, and in each the condition of dependence and subserviency to the will of others is most pronounced. These conditions naturally tend rather to pliancy than to independence of character.

The agriculturist who owns his own land, and who from its cultivation derives a reliable and competent support for himself and his family, has attained to a most important and self-reliant condition of independence, and is the most reliable citizen: among this class are never found anarchists or tramps.

Proper irrigation of lands tends to multiply their products from two to ten fold, and in a like manner develops a love of home and a patriotic and strong character, such as is found among the agriculturists all over the country. In countries where the different great leading industries have a nearly equal strength the agricultural population has been universally recognized as the most reliable and uniform friends and supporters of good morals and good government. The highest stages of civilization are only reached under some force of good government. Good government does not necessarily consist of republicanism, democracy, monarchy, aristocracy, or oligarchy, but it consists of that form of government which in each particular case is best adapted to the mass of the people under such government, and this of necessity varies with varying conditions and peoples.

The United States of America, with its vast and rapidly developing natural resources, has so far made greater progress in civilization and ethics upon a republican form of government than it would have done under any other. But this does not prove that the same form would be best adapted to every other country, nor does it necessarily prove that it will always be best adapted to this country. But as civilization and ethics are most likely to be advanced by just and stable government, and as a self-supporting, independent, and contented agricultural population is one of the most important factors in obtaining and sustaining such government, therefore whatever tends to numerically increase that class is an important desideratum. As the irrigation of lands, where irrigation is required, multiplies its productiveness from two to ten fold, and will reclaim millions of now useless acres, it will also increase the contented population in the same proportion.

The great modern agencies of progress are the railroad, the telegraph, the press, and education. The efficiency and availability of all of these are largely dependent upon the density of population. The value of railroads to communities is almost entirely determined by their number and by the cheapness of rates of transportation. In sparsely settled countries these rates are necessarily high; in densely populated and highly productive countries these rates naturally are low. The rates required to compensate telegraph service are dependent upon the same principles. The press is dependent for its efficiency and success upon the amount of its support, and only attains its maximum efficiency in centers of dense population.

The practice of irrigation tends to vastly increase the density of the farm population, and to the increase of urban population as well. Our statistics of the great modern nations show that one farmer is the basis of support in other occupations of from five to seven persons. The education of the youth is chiefly accomplished through the agency of instruction in the common schools. In sparsely settled countries these agencies are wanting in sufficient support and of convenient access. The higher departments of education are of inestimable value to both civilization and prosperity. The high school, the seminary, the college, and the university can only be most efficient when population is sufficiently dense to afford a large attendance from their immediate localities.

It is a striking fact that advanced learning in the United States has drawn a very large proportion of its most illustrious graduates from those who were bred upon the farms. But in civilization and advancement the fine arts and literature are not to be overlooked. While their influence is widely felt, there is no system by which their influence can be measured. Their success depends upon their votaries wealth, leisure, and taste. Leisure can only come with wealth or comfortable living. In the great Northwest all the conditions for comfort and moderate wealth, except moisture, is found. To supply this one thing insures prosperity and happiness among the people and affords the chances for leisure, of wealth, and a devotion to art and literature; and other acquirements are in like manner multiplied.

In the grand constant march of all mankind from the cradle to the grave with labor, sorrow, and pain, music, painting, sculpture, and literature are great sources of the purest pleasure, the most lofty contemplation of ideals, and the solace of the realization of the beautiful. They draw the mind of man from mortality and sorrow, and refine and ennoble him.

From the basis of these suggestions and arguments, we believe we are fully justified in concluding that a duty is imposed on Congress to make available all possibilities that will lead to such results. I believe that the practice of irrigation of the arid and semiarid lands, in its results to our common country, direct and indirect, can be properly classed as one of the important factors in the progress and development of our country; and will open up wide fields of splendid lands for homes for people who are crowded in the cities of the East. To reclaim these lands will provide homes for millions of people who are now homeless and landless. This bill is a long step in the right direction, and I trust will pass the House without opposition. [Applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE].

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I stated yesterday—that I am opposed to legislating upon appropriation bills. This proposition ought to be considered by the proper committee of this House, and subjected to the same treatment as other measures are under our rules; but as it has been attached by the Senate to one of the most important of the great money bills of this House which must be acted upon by us, I think it should at least be fairly discussed and properly understood. The Senate amendment is in my judgment extremely dangerous, and should not be adopted.

On yesterday I pointed out some of the objections to it, but since the gentleman from South Dakota has abandoned it and is satisfied to adopt the substitute which I offered, it is not now necessary to discuss it further. I would prefer to see no legislation at this time and in this way, but if the question can not be postponed for a more careful consideration then we should proceed with all the caution and care that is possible under the circumstances, for the legislation is important and far reaching. The amendment does not appear to be understood by some who have opposed it. It has been likened to the swamp-land grant of September 28, 1850.

That was a grant in presenti and passed the title as of the date of the grant. This is no grant at all, but only gives authority to the Secretary of the Interior and President to make contracts binding the United States to donate the land to the States when reclaimed. That act passed the title to the whole of the swamp and overflowed lands which were unfit for cultivation and unsold at that time to the States. This grants nothing and authorizes no conveyance until reclamation.

There was no limit to the swamp land grant as to the area to be taken or the time when it should be selected. Under this bill the area to each State is limited to 1,000,000 acres and the time for reclamation ten years after contract. Under the swamp land grant the States were left free to dispose of the lands before reclamation and without any limitation as to the quantity that could be sold to one person. Under this amendment the States must reclaim the land before they get it and must provide for its settlement and occupancy by bona fide settlers, and can not sell exceeding 160 acres to any one person.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] appears to be under the impression that it would not apply to the State of Nebraska. It is intended to apply to all the public land States in which there may be desert lands. The desert land act of March 3, 1877, is by section 3 limited to certain States, but this provision is general.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McRAE. Certainly.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. If your construction of the amendment is correct, why does Mr. Bowers, the acting Land Commissioner, in his letter of August 8, 1894, to Senator COCKRELL use this language?

Mr. McRAE. I understand what it is without reading it.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. In which he says that an amendment should be made to the amendment so as to include Kansas, Nebraska, Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Utah.

Mr. McRAE. I can only answer you as I have answered your colleague—that I think he does not fully understand the scope of this amendment. The reference to the desert-land law in this amendment is only for the purpose of securing a legal test for determining the character of the land in question which is furnished in section 2 of the act of March 3, 1877, and I will now read it:

SEC. 2. That all lands exclusive of timber lands and mineral lands which will not without irrigation produce some agricultural crop shall be deemed desert lands within the meaning of this act, which fact shall be ascertained by proof of two or more credible witnesses under oath, whose affidavits shall be filed in the land office in which said tract of land may be situated.

If there is land of that character in the State of Nebraska or in Kansas it will be the subject of contract under this amendment, because by this we remove the limitation as to the States placed in section 3 of the act of March 3, 1877, which excluded Nebraska and Kansas by failing to mention them.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. McRAE. Certainly.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. Do you think the Commissioner misapprehends the meaning and intent of your amendment?

Mr. McRAE. I say he does not understand the full scope of the amendment, if he thinks it would not be general.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. Then, if your construction is right, what objection would you have to naming Kansas, Nebraska, and the Territories of New Mexico, Oklahoma, Arizona, and Utah in your amendment?

Mr. McRAE. If you name one State you should name them all. I am opposed to special legislation for one section of the country which does not apply to another section.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. Would not that include them all?

Mr. McRAE. I do not know. I have no definite information as to where our desert lands are, so far as State lines are concerned. I find that the gentleman who wrote the act of March 3, 1877, and the Congress that passed it, did not include your State nor Kansas, presumably because there was supposed to be no such lands in either, and yet I find you here asserting that there are desert lands in those States. I assume that you are correct, and I have proposed the amendment so as to give you the benefit of the law. Let us not commit the same mistake that was committed when that act was passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield ten minutes more to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. May I inquire of the gentleman——

Mr. McRAE. I hope the gentleman will not consume the whole of my time.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. If your amendment includes Kansas and Nebraska have you any objection to naming those States?

Mr. McRAE. I have no objection if you name all the States to be included, all those in which there is any desert land or supposed to be any; but I do object to naming those States the gentleman has mentioned and no others.

Mr. MEIKELJOHN. What States would you include?

Mr. McRAE. I do not know. That is the very reason I do not want to name any—because I do not know what States to name; and by making it general, you give every State the same opportunity and do not exclude any from the provisions of the law.

The only purpose of referring to the desert land act in this amendment was to fix a legal test by which the Interior Department can determine the question of whether the land is desert land or not and to give the Interior Department authority to decide what is reclamation. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] asserts that if this is adopted the lands will be taken up along the rivers, streams, lakes, springs, and other bodies of water. The Commissioner of the General Land Office has issued instructions under the desert land law to which reference is made in this amendment, as follows:

First. Lands bordering upon streams, lakes, or other natural bodies of water, or through or upon which there is any river, stream, arroyo, lake, pond, body of water, or living spring, are not subject to entry under the desert land law until the clearest proof of their desert character is furnished.

Second. Lands which produce native grasses sufficient in quantity, if used by grazing animals, to make an ordinary crop of hay in usual seasons are not desert lands.

Third. Lands which will produce an agricultural crop of any kind, in amount to make the cultivation reasonably remunerative, are not desert.

We know that if this amendment is adopted what construction will be put upon the term "desert lands," and the States can not take the streams and lakes, but they must take land which is desert, as defined in the section which I have read, as construed by the Department. We intend to adopt the accepted construction of the act of March 3, 1877, for the ascertainment of the lands that may be disposed of under this provision if it should become a law.

The vacant lands in the public land States and Territories, exclusive of Alaska, containing 369,529,600 acres, is about 560,000,000 acres. Perhaps one-half of this land will require irrigation in order to produce agricultural crops. The late very able Director of the Geological Survey says that the stream waters are sufficient to irrigate and reclaim about 100,000,000 acres.

We know from authentic sources that less than 5,000,000 acres of desert lands have been reclaimed by irrigation. We know also that it requires time, labor, and large expenditures to completely reclaim it. This vast barren waste ought and can be transferred into productive and prosperous homes for our constantly increasing population. The progressive civilization of the American people will not allow this great empire to remain a wilderness much longer. The title to it to a great extent is in the United States.

Three plans have been proposed. One is to leave the whole matter to private enterprise; another is to have the General Government undertake the reclamation an development by direct appropriations; the other is to grant the lands to the States and trust them. Since 1877 we have been trying the first plan under the desert land act, and while a considerable area of land has been reclaimed the results have not always been satisfactory. Much fraud has been practiced upon the Government and great wrongs have been perpetrated against the settlers by syndicates who own or control the water and the right to charge the owner of the land for its use.

To check and avoid this as far as possible the Government has wisely reserved from sale and entry the most important reservoir sites, and now holds them for public use. No one proposes to stop or in the least interfere with individuals who may wish to proceed under the present law, but there are many who are demanding something more than this. I do not hesitate to say that I am opposed to any plan that looks to the taxation of the people at large to construct and maintain irrigation works. I do not believe that Congress has any such power in the first place, and if it has it would be manifestly unjust to the people at large to tax them for such a purpose.

When the magnitude of that proposition is considered I assume that the prudent, conservative men of all parties will oppose it. I think the Representatives here from the desert-land States have already reached the conclusion that the United States will never undertake to do more than make surveys, reserve reservoir sites, and protect the forests at the heads of the streams. There is a strong sentiment in favor of granting all the remaining public lands to the States, and while I believe this will be done at no very distant day, the country is not yet ready for it.

The people in the desert-land States with practically one voice have asked through their Representatives and Senators for the chance of reclaiming some of these immense deserts. Conventions have been held and resolutions passed; irrigation associations have been organized, and the study of this great problem has commenced in earnest. The people of the West have a deeper interest in the matter than any other part of our country and, so far as I am concerned, I think it our duty to allow this experiment to be made. I do not share the fear that has been expressed that the Legislatures of the States will not honestly administer this trust.

The people who are to occupy and cultivate the land must elect the Legislatures, and I have sufficient faith in the honesty, patriotism, and energy of the self-reliant population of the great and growing West to trust them fully in this matter. But we have so guarded the authority as to prevent the consummation of any fraud upon the Government unless there is a concurrence in such fraud of both the State and Federal authorities. If this amendment is permitted to remain as offered, then ample power is reserved to the Interior Department to prevent fraud in any shape. In conclusion upon this point I desire to quote from a late able Representative from Texas, Mr. Lanham, whom many of us remember so kindly. He said:

> A sufficient answer to the inquiry as to the ability and competency of the States to deal with this question is the fact that they are States, clothed with all the paraphernalia of statehood, invested with the power and charged with the responsibility of conducting their own affairs and conserving the liberties, property, and happiness of their people. If they can not be safely trusted in all that concerns the well-being of their citizens within the sphere of State legislation, then their existence as States is a blunder and a reproach and they ought to be remitted to mere dependencies upon the Federal Government. They are presumed to be intimately conversant with their own immediate necessities and conditions, and confidence must be reposed in the virtue and intelligence of their people.

If anything at all is to be done upon this subject, let it be done in the direction and along the lines indicated in this amendment. Make no grant that will take all of the desert lands away from actual settlers or put it beyond their reach. Make no grant that will put it in a state of reservation until the work of reclamation begins, but if you find a great, progressive, enterprising State like California, which has developed a grand system of irrigation and which has taken the lead in the movement, that is willing to undertake this work of reclamation, then I say we should aid her by remitting the price of the land, which is only $1.25 an acre. That is all the help that is contemplated by this amendment. The State is required to submit to the same tests of reclamation that the individual settler is required to submit to.

All the advantage the States get over the individuals is that they are exempt from the payment of the purchase price. If we will preserve the forest reserves along our great mountains of the West, so as to conserve the water flow and forever preserve for public use the immense reservoirs that have been reserved by the Government, we will in the course of time be able to hold for the arid region much of the water which now comes down in floods through the Missouri and the Mississippi to annually overflow and wash away the crops that the people of the South grow.

If we can properly distribute the water that is now wasted and use it upon the vast arid region that is now without any water supply, we will have done that which will bless millions who are to come after us.

Whatever may be the fate of this amendment, I appeal to Congress and to the country generally to give careful consideration both to the preservation of our forests and to the protection of our reservoirs sites, which will enable us to house and hold for the public the immense volume of water now wasted and use it for irrigation. Any system which will make it possible to have it carried upon the arid lands and keep it from overflowing Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, and Mississippi will be hailed with delight by that section of our common country, as well as the desert land States.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five mintues to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, for a number of years this question of the improvement of our arid lands has been discussed in the House, and the idea has been often expressed, which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] has just reiterated, that the General Government will never engage in the work of irrigation. Taking that as the prevailing sentiment, gentlemen here who are interested in this subject have gone off on another proposition, which is to let the States take these arid lands and do something with them.

It seems to me, gentlemen, that this simple experiment of giving to each State where these lands are situated a million acres of them, to see what can be done in that way to improve them and make them productive, is one to which the House ought to consent. I have no fear of these syndicates that are talked about. I wish more men and more syndicates with money would come West to help us to reclaim these arid lands and develop that region. There is no danger in that direction. We have provided ample safeguards to take care of the land.

Mr. HERMANN. This bill guards against that danger at any rate, so that it is perfectly safe in that respect.

Mr. PICKLER. I think it is. And, besides, Congress is in session every year, and if it should be thought desirable to impose further restrictions it can easily be done.

Gentlemen have said to me that we have plenty of land in the United States, and that we do not need these lands. Now, here is a question which calls for a solution. In the next ten years what are you going to do with the vast numbers of people who will be seeking homes upon the lands of the West—people equal in number to those who have within the last ten years occupied the States of Washington, Montana, North and South Dakota, and the Territories of Oklahoma and New Mexico? How are these people, who during the coming ten years will be desiring cheap homes, to be accommodated?

Mr. HERMANN. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that, as shown by statistics, this nation in 1915 will have 100,000,000 of inhabitants.

Mr. PICKLER. I thank the gentleman for interrupting me to give that information, for it enforces the point I was making. We shall during the next five or ten or fifteen years need these lands; and it is going to require these years to solve this question, even if we take this initial step now, as I believe we ought to do.

Mr. Speaker, I shall take the liberty of printing in the RECORD in connection with my remarks a bill introduced by me into this House and referred to the Committee on Public Lands—a bill authorizing the President of the United States to appoint a commission of five persons to investigate not only the subject of irrigation, but the whole subject of the public domain, embracing agricultural lands, mining lands, grazing lands, desert lands, etc., and report to the Secretary of the Interior, by whom the report shall be laid before Congress. I ask for this bill the attention of the gentlemen interested in this question.

I have been forced to the conclusion that on this subject we have too many theories, and I believe we shall never arrive at a practical and effectual solution of the question with regard to the disposition of the great public domain of the West in the interest of the people of the whole nation until such a commission has been appointed and has made a thorough examination and report. This bill proposes to give this commission a year for the performance of this service, allows them a secretary, and gives them authority to examine witnesses. In my opinion it is time that we should have such an examination. In the interest of the people of the country we should determine what we are to do with our public lands—how we are to dispose of our mining lands, how we are to utilize our desert lands, how we are to irrigate this great public domain in the West.

I believe, as I have said, that a proper solution of this question will never be reached until we have the report of a nonpartisan and unbiased commission, based upon a scientific investigation of the whole matter. Such an investigation will give us data that will lead to something practical. Let us determine how to dispose of our public domain in the interest of the whole people. In the meantime the measure now before us is merely a step in that direction. The lands we are talking of are not in their present condition worth anything to the United States Government, and nothing to the people. It seems to me it would be well to take the step here proposed. The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7950) to provide for the appointment of a commission to examine and classify the mineral, timber, agricultural, grazing, and desert lands west of the ninety-eighth meridian, with regard to their practical irrigation and use, and disposition of the same by the Government.

Whereas there is in the Western portion of the United States 529,000,000 of acres of mineral, timber, agricultural, grazing, and desert lands of unoccupied public domain; and

Whereas the constantly increasing population of the country is ever demanding new homes for our people in the great West; and

Whereas large portions of these lands are useless for agricultural purposes without irrigation; and

Whereas the interest of the whole people of the country demands the utilization of these lands: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That there be an appointment, by the President of the United States, of five commissioners, not more than three of whom shall belong to the same political party, and two of whom shall reside west of the ninety-eighth meridian of longitude, whose duty it shall be, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe, to make a thorough examination of the mineral, timber, agricultural, grazing, and desert lands west of the ninety-eighth meridian of longitude, and ascertain and report what practical means can be employed by the Government, and what legislation, if any, is necessary for the utilization of these lands in the interest of the people of the whole country; that said commission shall report as to the best practical disposition of the mineral, timber, agricultural, grazing, and desert lands, and approximately the number of acres of each, and also the number of acres that can be irrigated, by all means of irrigation, including that by artesian wells, and the approximate cost per acre of such irrigation.

SEC. 2. That said commission shall take into consideration the question as to the disposition of said lands by the Government for the best interests of the people, as to the practicability of ceding them to the States and Territories wherein situated, as to what practical assistance, if any, the Government shall render in establishing a system of irrigation by which land susceptible of irrigation may be reclaimed, and to examine and report as to the advisability of the Government assisting in the irrigation of said land, whether the same shall be ceded to the States and Territories or the title remain in the Government, and fully investigate and report as to the duty of the Government to utilize for settlement and occupation the unoccupied public domain of the United States west of the ninety-eighth meridian, and to report what steps it should take to accomplish the same. And said commission shall fully examine and report the most practical treatment and disposition of the different classes of said lands herein set forth by the Government in the interest of the people.

SEC. 3. That said commissioners shall be paid each the sum of $10 per day while actually employed and their actual expenses, under such rules as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe. Their accounts shall be audited by the Secretary of the Interior and paid monthly. Before entering upon their duties each of said commissioners shall take an oath to faithfully perform the duties of his office. The oath of office of said commissioners shall be filed by them in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. They may take the testimony of witnesses as to the character of any of said lands, and receive any other evidence relating to said matter, and shall have power to summon witnesses to appear before them, and to administer oaths. All testimony taken by said commissioners shall be reduced to writing. The commissioners shall employ a stenographer, who shall be clerk of said commission and shall receive the sum of $6 per day and expenses when actually employed, and his account shall be audited by the Secretary of the Interior and paid monthly.

SEC. 4. That said commissioners shall, immediately upon their appointment, enter upon the discharge of their duties, and shall not later than one year thereafter submit a full and complete report of their examinations and findings concerning the lands aforesaid, and the Secretary of the Interior shall submit said report to Congress at its next regular session after the same is filed in his office: Provided, That if Congress shall be in session at the time of the filing of said report by the commissioners in his office, the Secretary of the Interior shall report the same to Congress within thirty days after the same is filed in his office. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this, there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $40,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me unfortunate that so important a subject of legislation as this should be precipitated upon the House on an appropriation bill by an amendment of the Senate. The whole question of irrigation is exceedingly important, and should receive not only the careful attention of the appropriate committee of this House, but should be brought in here and considered without connecting it with other questions. In the limited time now given to the House for the consideration of this paragraph upon an appropriation bill, it is impossible for us to give the subject that consideration which its importance demands.

Feeling, as I do, that it is exceedingly important some action should be taken after due consideration on this subject, I am somewhat in doubt as to what course ought to be adopted with reference to the amendment now presented from the Senate. I am satisfied that the amendment as it comes to us from the Senate is so loosely constructed, with so many loopholes, that it would be very dangerous for this House to concur in it. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota or the gentleman from Arkansas—I am not sure which—is much more carefully drawn, and protects the interests of the Government perhaps to the extent that may be necessary.

Mr. DOCKERY. Has this proposition been considered by a committee of either House?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not understand that it has, unless the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Arkansas may have been formulated by the Committee on Public Lands. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas whether that is the fact?

Mr. MCRAE. It has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then it does not come from any committee?

Mr. MCRAE. No; the part I have taken in the matter was at the request of the conferees of the House who were not satisfied with the Senate amendment. The Senate bill on this question is before the Committee on Arid Lands.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has the Committee on Arid Lands made any report on this subject?

Mr. MCRAE. Not so far as I know. They have reported another bill, but not embracing this proposition.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is always extremely dangerous for the House, by an amendment on an appropriation bill, to undertake to legislate, without the appropriate committee having carefully considered the subject-matter of the amendment. It is entirely possible that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota may be safe and well-guarded. But yet, Mr. Speaker, I can see from the criticisms which have been already made by several gentlemen around me, during the course of this discussion, that there are some provisions that should be in the amendment which are not included in it.

If it is the design of this House to enter upon legislation of this character and in this way on an appropriation bill—and I regret the necessity that exists for any such method of legislation—I am certain that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota is much more acceptable than the Senate amendment. For example, I notice in the Senate amendment that the question as to what are "desert lands" is to be determined by two affidavits, or the affidavits of two individuals, and is to be conclusive. Now, evidently such legislation as that is so loose that it ought not to be enacted or undertaken by any legislative body.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota, on the contrary, accepts the definition in the desert land act of 1877, and that definition is undoubtedly safe, as I understand the act; and I would like to have information from the gentleman from Arkansas, the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, on that point. I understand that the act of 1877, known as the desert land act, provides that lands that will not produce a crop without irrigation shall be deemed desert lands, and that fact is to be determined prima facie by the affidavits of two different persons; but the Commissioner of the General Land Office finally determines the question.

Mr. MCRAE. That is correct.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, that is the act of 1877. The amendment of the Senate omits entirely the provision giving to the Commissioner of the General Land Office the final decision of the question as to what shall be deemed to be desert land. I do not find in the statutes any mention of the words "arid lands." The term used is "desert lands," and the statute defines distinctly what are desert lands. Now, if this should be amended by inserting the words "arid lands," will some one tell me what lands will be included that are not now covered by the statute of 1877 to which I have just referred?

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I will say in response to the gentleman from Maine, that I have no knowledge or information as to what the term arid lands might cover in its legal sense. In this amendment we have used the term desert lands because we have a desert land law which has been in force for nearly twenty years. And we purposely avoided using the term "arid lands" because of the fact that we did not want to deal with a new character of lands.

Mr. DINGLEY. So it seems to me that if the word "arid" was introduced in connection with these lands that we should probably include in the bill another class of lands not now covered by desert land legislation.

Mr. PICKLER. If the gentleman from Maine will permit me, the term "arid" includes exactly the same lands that the committee of this House has jurisdiction of. We have a committee known as the Committee on the Irrigation of Arid Lands, and these words apply exactly to the land over which this committee has jurisdiction.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is the inquiry I desired to make to some gentleman familiar with the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will be glad if the gentleman could yield to me for five minutes longer.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. I mention this, Mr. Speaker, simply for the purpose of illustrating the importance of a more careful consideration of such far-reaching legislation. I do not know whether the term "arid lands" means exactly what I understood the gentleman from Nebraska to indicate, that is to say, lands that can be made profitable by irrigation, or not.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. If the gentleman will allow me?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman, I think, did not understand me. As a matter of fact any and all lands will produce better under irrigation than without.

Mr. DINGLEY. Evidently.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. But I had reference to such lands that in the majority of years will not produce crops without irrigation. We have, for instance, in my own State, especially in the western part of it, a large area of country which can not in ordinary years produce crops. These lands it is necessary to irrigate in order to produce anything.

Mr. DINGLEY. That was my understanding of the general term used; but I was desirous of ascertaining what was included under the term arid lands, because whatever legislation is proposed on this subject ought to be exceedingly carefully considered, and much more carefully considered than is possible now under these circumstances.

But it seems to me that if it is not proposed to go further than the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER], I do not know that there would be any serious danger in permitting that simple experiment to be made.

It is an experiment that is well guarded, I admit, in the amendment that has been offered. I understand that it has been approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; but, as the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] has already substantially said, I deprecate any attempt to include lands that are not now covered without more careful consideration. While, therefore, I am entirely willing to accept the amendment that has been proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota, I trust that we shall be very careful in the consideration of the provisions that may be included within the terms of that amendment. Certainly, if we are to go beyond that, I hope we shall not undertake it without more careful investigation. And I desire to say, before sitting down, that in my judgment the amendment sent to us by the Senate is open to too many objections, is insufficiently guarded, and on no account ought to be accepted by the House.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the conditions themselves obviate the very question raised by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY.] In the first place, there is no considerable appropriation requested. Only $1,000 is asked in the way of an appropriation. In the second place, in the arid region, or in the West, you may say, practically, every acre of ground that will produce good crops without irrigation is taken up. Along every stream of the irrigating region, the ground which an individual can irrigate is taken now; but there are millions of acres as bare as this floor, where the ground, by diverting water at a great expense, and spreading over it, can be made very fertile, productive, and profitable.

I see by the Colorado papers that there are hundreds of families from the western portion of the State of Nebraska and Western Kansas on their way to Colorado now, hunting lands that can be irrigated—driven out by the uncertainty of rain and frequent recurrence of the drought. They can not take up available lands under the Government license, but they must go into the State and buy Colorado's school lands, or lands that have been sold to other individuals, for building canals, and in this way cheap lands can be obtained. They are going to the San Luis Valley, where the great Travelers' Insurance Company and other syndicates have expended millions of dollars in building canals, taking their remuneration in these lands. They came to us saying, "You have valuable State lands here. We will build canals; we will take our pay in these lands, and we will sell them to settlers, with permanent water and ditch rights." They sell these lands very cheap, expecting to make their profits or to remunerate themselves by selling an interest in these ditches. To-day the roads are lined with men from Western Nebraska, Western Kansas, and elsewhere looking for ground that can be irrigated.

In the great valleys of Colorado, if you give the State these lands, the Government of the United States will lose nothing. A sheep can not live comfortably on 10 acres of such ground, in the absence of irrigation. Not a bunch of thrifty grass, not a shrub, not a living thing grows there, but the moment the water is put upon it everything luxuriantly thrives. The men living around the irrigated regions always move that way. All farmers long for irrigation as soon as they learn its advantages. The man who once irrigates never goes back to the humid climates. In the rain belts of the East the vegetation comes up in the spring. In July and August it withers.

Go to the irrigated lands of the West and you will see the herbs, the grass, and everything perfectly green up to November. Then the farmer takes off the streamlet and says, "Put on your winter clothes for the icy blasts." Growth never stops there until he says so. They can grow from four to six tons of hay per year to the acre, cutting it three or four times. Three-fourths of these sterile lands are lying there waiting for some great power to come in and build canals. The Travelers' Insurance Company and other great companies have been there and spent their millions. The ditch from which my immediate neighbors water their lands cost $200,000. They furnish the farmer water for $1.10 an acre per year. They can furnish 1,000 people more cheaply than 500 people can furnish themselves individually. And if you put this land where the States can build the canals, it can furnish a thousand people more cheaply than 500 can furnish themselves.

In other words, no individual can build these canals; some corporation, public or private, must.

The Government will lose nothing by this plan. The land is now absolutely valueless. Where my ranches are I had an opportunity of settling and paying $1.25 an acre for land. I would not have taken the land if I could have had the whole 60,000 acres that is on the mesa. Soon afterward a canal was built, the land tested, and at once it began to sell for from $12 to $50 an acre. In addition to this, the owner rented the water at from $1.10 to $1.25 per acre, or paid $10 an acre for a permanent water right, and then submitted to a tax of 25 cents an acre, the acre proportion of the expense of keeping up the canal.

You think this is hard—expensive. Who of your agriculturists would not give $1.10 per acre to have enough and no excess of moisture furnished him? Who would not pay $1.10 per acre per year to be insured against drought, to be insured against injured grain and bleached hay in harvest time? The one item of a field-cured stubble for winter pasture is worth the price of the water. In the "dry and thirsty" arid region the stubble, the grasses upon the plains, cure in autumn and do not decay, but remains nutritious throughout the winter.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will my friend permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. BROSIUS. From whom do you obtain the water with which you irrigate your land?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. The water comes down the Uncompahgre River. The land is 150 feet above the bed of the river. This water is carried through a canal to a mesa embracing about 60,000 acres.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. I want time enough to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BROSIUS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado have two minutes longer, in which to answer that question.

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. But I want to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. SAYERS. How much time do you want?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. I want enough to answer the question.

Mr. BROSIUS. I think that this will throw some light upon this question, if the gentleman will state where the water comes from which he pays $1.10 an acre.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. It comes from the Uncompahgre River and is carried over the Spring Creek, California, and the Cushman mesas, from 50 to 150 feet above the bed of the river. No individual could ever think of building a ditch for himself, because it would cost from $30,000 to $40,000. Parties came in early after the Ute Indians ceded this land to the Government in 1882 and started a canal. They borrowed the money from the Travelers' Insurance Company, and put in about $200,000 in building a hundred miles of canal and distributing laterals, carrying the water from 50 to 150 feet above the river bed. We pay an annual rental of $1.10 an acre to secure the carriage of this water through the company's canal, on the same principle as railroads are paid for carrying goods over their highways.

Much of the school lands ceded to the State by the Government in the San Luis and Arkansas Valleys have been reclaimed by the State. It has negotiated certain portions of the lands for the watering of the remainder. The State is more wieldable than the Government, has a special interest in this reclamation, and has some practical knowledge of the subject. This is more than can be said for some of the nation's representatives who assume to edify their Western neighbors not only on irrigation, but on their dangerous financial condition.

Irrigation, where feasible, has been a great boon in all ages and climes. It is an automatic fertilizer, constantly depositing virgin soil conveyed as muddy water through the irrigating streams settling upon the surface as the water soaks into the ground. It is a security against drought from scarcity of rainfall and a preventive of sour root from excessive dampness. The dryness of the air prevents poisonous mildew and enables the husbandman to put up his crop without any injuries from dampness.

Much of the drought-stricken portion of the eastern rain belt will, like Jacob of Canaan, have to send their sons into the irrigated region for bread this year. The great production of the Orient is through irrigation. In China families of from four to six persons are maintained on a single acre of ground. By constant fertilization, intensive cultivation, and continuous irrigation in China from three to four crops are gathered from the same piece of ground per year, making it productively equal to three or four acres of ground in the rain belt. I was surprised the latter part of June, in the humid climates of the East to see the grass and clover wither and turn brown, the sap in the trees turn downward, the tips of the poplar and horse chestnut harden and finish the annual growth, while in the irrigated portion of the country the sap in all vegetation has had an uninterrupted upward flow, the cottonwood, maple, and fruit trees yet tipped with tender unripe shoots, and will so continue until the husbandman, who directs the fall decay as well as the summer growth, withdraws the fructifying streamlet and bids them prepare for the winter blasts.

Without intending irreverence or any disrespect for more sacred things, I must say the agriculturist of the irrigated region seems to have outstripped the Contriver of the universe in applying moisture for vegetable thrift, or it is more probable that through the husbandman nature offers this greater reward as a meritorious tribute to the ingenious and industrious application of natural laws to these more successful ends. No one not having spent a crop season in an irrigated country can have any true conception of the great benefits of irrigation over the haphazard rainfall for the maturing of crops.

Why should not Western Kansas and Western Nebraska thrive by irrigation? Who knows what can be accomplished until the experiment is made? Different conditions require different treatment everywhere. In the great Arkansas and San Louis Valleys in Colorado the husbandmen have turned loose the waters of the Arkansas and Rio Grande Rivers over the surface of their rich black loam soil with such a marked success as to make these valleys the granaries of this part of the West for wheat, oats, and barley. Just across the main range of the Rocky Mountains of the same State, in the great Uncompahgre, Gunnison, and Grand Valleys, cereals would not thrive from trickling the waters over the main surface.

The land is impregnated with lime, oxide of iron, and other natural fertilizing minerals. If the ground is inundated with water a silica slime forms upon the surface which is very detrimental to vegetable life. The farmer uses what he calls a marker, a machine trenching the land like a corrugated roof, creasing the surface about every 2 feet, through which the water runs, and from these it percolates throughout the whole surface. With this subirrigation these latter valleys have become in a period of twelve years, since the land was ceded to the Government by the Ute Indians, one of the most successful grain, vegetable, hay, and fruit producing counties in the United States. The peach, prune, apricot, plum, cherry, pear, apple, and all fruits common to a temperate climate thrive to perfection there.

The minerals that are unfavorable to a submerging of the whole surface of the ground is the chief support and producer of the stone fruits. These arid lands are a barren waste until artificially watered. Some great national method of reclamation should be devised. Water them and raise the price to the settler to $11.25 per acre, $1.25 for the land and $10 per acre for water right, payable at the rate of $1 per acre per annum, with such a rate of interest as the bonded indebtedness of the Government draws or some other more liberal and feasible plan to the settler. We know this plan or any other national one will have to have years in which to mature. The present plan is but an experiment—a reminder. I am in favor of any reasonable step which will keep even the subject before the public. The great agricultural production of the future in the United States will be, must be, through irrigation and the subject finally must be dealt with as a national question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I move the previous question upon the Senate amendment and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Dadota as a substitute, and also the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the demand for the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I desire to withdraw my amendment, and offer this amendment as a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from South Dakota moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, to which the gentleman from Nebraska has offered one amendment. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska moves as a substitute for section 4, the following:

SEC. 4. That to aid the public-land States and the States which may be formed from the several Territories in the reclamation of arid or desert lands therein, and the settlement, cultivation, and sale thereof in small tracts to actual settlers, the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered upon proper application of the said States to contract and agree from time to time with each of the States in which there may be situated lands which are either arid or desert as such desert lands are defined by the act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of desert land in certain States and Territories, approved March 3, 1877," and the act amendatory thereof, approved March 3, 1891, binding the United States to donate, grant, and patent to the State free of cost for survey or price such desert lands, not exceeding 1,000,000 acres in each State, as the State may cause to be irrigated, reclaimed, and cultivated by actual settlers, within ten years next after the passage of this act, as thoroughly as is required of citizens who may enter under the said desert-land law.

Before the application of any State is allowed or any contract or agreement is executed or any segregation of any of the land from the public domain is ordered by the Secretary of the Interior, the State shall file a map of the said land proposed to be irrigated, which shall exhibit a plan showing the mode of the contemplated irrigation and which plan shall be sufficient to thoroughly irrigate and reclaim said land and prepare it to raise ordinary agricultural crops, and shall also show the source of the water to be used for irrigation and reclamation; and the Secretary of the Interior may make necessary regulations for the reservation of the lands applied for by the States to date from the date of the filing of the map and plan of irrigation, but such reservation shall be of no force whatever if such map and plan of irrigation shall not be approved. That any State contracting under this section is hereby authorized to make all necessary contracts to cause the said lands to be reclaimed, and to induce their settlement and cultivation in accordance with and subject to the provisions of this section; but the State shall not be authorized to lease any of said lands or to use or dispose of the same in any way whatever, except to secure their reclamation, cultivation, and settlement.

As fast as any State may furnish satisfactory proof, according to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, that any of said lands are irrigated, reclaimed, and occupied by actual settlers, patents shall be issued to the State or its assigns for said lands so reclaimed and settled: Provided, That said States shall not sell or dispose of more than 160 acres of said lands to any one person, and any surplus of money derived by any State from the sale of said lands in excess of the cost of their reclamation shall be held as a trust fund for and be applied to the reclamation of other desert land in such State. That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to examine any of the lands that may be selected under the provisions of this section, there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $1,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is first on this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. A parliamentary inquiry. I would like to ask if most of this is not simply a repetition of the other? What is the effect of this?

Mr. SAYERS. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to know what this is.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from Nebraska in his remarks indicated the character of the amendment he was going to offer. He sent that amendment to the Clerk's desk for the information of the House; and now, just as we are going to take the vote, he sends up another paper in place of the one that he informed the House he was going to offer, and he should take the consequences if he has not informed the House about it. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the previous question was ordered, and debate can not now interfere with its operation. The question which the gentleman from Nebraska has addressed to the Chair is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair is asked what is the object of the amendment. The House is as fully informed as the Chair as to what the meaning and the intent of the amendment is. The Chair did not know what it was until it was read, and every gentleman had the same opportunity to know the effect of the amendment as the Chair.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BRYAN. If the purpose of the amendment is simply to remove the doubt as to whether Nebraska and Kansas are included, I do not see that there can be any objection to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to ask whether the House has not the right to know before voting on a proposition what that proposition is?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask whether it is not a fact that all this substitute does is to include arid lands with desert lands?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a matter of argument, not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PICKLER. Then I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] have one minute to explain his amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

Mr. PICKLER. Does the gentleman want us to vote in the dark?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair calls the gentleman to order. Debate is not in order.

Mr. PICKLER. Then the Speaker holds——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not hear the gentleman debate the question after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. PICKLER. But I am making a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PICKLER. I wish to know whether the Chair holds that the House has to vote blindly on a proposition without understanding it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not hold any such thing, and no such question is presented to the Chair.

Mr. PICKLER. It seems to me that that is just what the Chair is holding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. The amendment has been read to the House. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken; there were—ayes 42, noes 100. So the amendment of Mr. HAINER of Nebraska was rejected.

The question being taken on the original amendment, the Speaker pro tempore declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. COOMBS. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 159, noes 9. So the amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to have considered amendment No. 277.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

(277) That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, empowered and instructed to purchase for and in the name of the United States, for the site of the Government Printing Office, by direct negotiation with the owners, the south half of square 673, containing about 213,815 square feet, and bounded as follows: Two hundred and seventy-three and one-fourth feet fronting on North Capitol street, along the same from the intersection of L street therewith to what is called Pierce or Babcock street; thence east extending through the said square for 782½ feet to First street; thence south along First street for 273¼ feet to L street; thence west along the same for 782½ feet to point of beginning; or, failing to secure such described property by negotiation with the owners or a satisfactory title thereto, as may be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States, he is hereby empowered and directed to secure the same by condemnation proceedings, as provided in chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia: Provided, That the said south half of square 673 shall be acquired at a cost not exceeding the amount appropriated in the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 30, 1890, to provide accommodations for the Government Printing Office, which is hereby made immediately available for the object of this act; and the Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized and directed, upon the requisition of the said Secretary, to pay over to the owners of the said described property such purchase price, or in the event of the condemnation of the same, into court, the condemnation price thereof, in either case not exceeding the sum of $250,000.

That the Joint Committee on Printing, as soon as such site shall be acquired, shall cause to be prepared the requisite plans for a Government printing establishment, fireproof all the way, which shall be fully equal to the prompt and efficient performance of the work now required by the Government, and such plans to be so arranged as to admit of progressive extensions, as the growing demand upon the establishment may, from time to time, require; and for the preparation of such plans the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock to-day all debate shall be considered as closed on the pending amendment and all amendments that may be offered, and that the previous question shall be then considered as ordered upon the amendment and such amendments as may be pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto may be closed at 4 o'clock this afternoon, and that at that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the amendment and any pending amendments.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I think it is rather too early to undertake to limit debate on this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Say 5 o'clock, instead of 4, if that is agreeable to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to have it earlier than 5 o'clock, because we want to have a full House here to vote on this question, but I am willing to agree to half past 4.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. This being Saturday, I do not think the gentleman will have a quorum here even at 4 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas, that the previous question be considered as ordered at half past 4 o'clock this afternoon on the amendment and all amendments thereto?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This matter is not debatable. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to get an agreement with the gentleman in charge of the bill as to the distribution of the time.

Mr. SAYERS. The time will be distributed impartially between the conflicting propositions.

Mr. COX. Who will represent the Government?

Mr. SAYERS. I will, if the gentleman will permit me. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As to the division of the time, the Chair suggests that the gentleman from Texas or some other gentleman who opposes the amendment should control the time. It would be difficult for the Chair to do it, because he would not know on which side gentlemen seeking the floor might be.

Mr. SAYERS. I think I can furnish a satisfactory solution of this question. I understand that there will be two amendments offered to this proposition. What I propose is to give gentlemen favoring the Senate amendment half an hour, and the same time to the gentlemen who favor each of the other amendments. In other words, I will divide the time equally among the supporters of the three amendments—the Senate proposition and the two others that are to be offered in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas him self to parcel out the time?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. As I understand the matter, there can be but two sides to this, those who favor the Senate amendment and those who oppose it.

Mr. SAYERS. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that there are two other amendments that are proposed to be offered which are antagonistic to each other as well as to the Senate amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. The result will be that two of the half hours will be used in opposition to the Senate amendment and only one in favor of it, but I have no doubt the gentleman from Texas will see fair play.

Mr. SAYERS. I will.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I wish to ask the gentleman whether his attention has been called to a statement from the Public Printer in the morning papers which seems to make it our imperative duty to do something to protect the employés of the Government Printing Office temporarily?

Mr. SAYERS. That has already been provided for in the partial agreement.

There being no objection, the request of Mr. SAYERS was agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS (to Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa). Are you supporting the Senate amendment?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I purpose to support the amendment. I understand that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] will make a motion to recede and agree to the Senate amendment, and if that is the case I think it would be proper that he should control the time on that side.

Mr. SAYERS. Then the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] will apportion the time in support of the Senate amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it the purpose of the gentleman in charge of this bill that at half past 4 o'clock, the previous question having been ordered, a vote shall then be taken?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the question because there are several pairs in my hands, and I want to arrange them.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there to be divided?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hour and forty-five minutes, of which thirty-five minutes will be allowed to each of the three sides. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] will have thirty-five minutes, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] thirty-five, and the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. SAYERS. I will reserve the balance, twenty minutes of which I propose to yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ].

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I now submit my motion that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same. This is a very important question and ought to receive careful and deliberate consideration. The members of the House know that the amendment which has just been read provides that the south half of square 673 shall be purchased as a site for the Government printing establishment. Members are also aware that in the appropriation bill approved August 30, 1890, nearly four years ago, the sum of $250,000 was appropriated for the purchase of a site for a new Government Printing Office.

As was remarked a moment ago by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLACK], the Public Printer, in the Post of this morning, has called our attention to the fact that the present structure is not only too small for the business of the establishment, but that the lives of the employés are daily and hourly in danger. If such a calamity should happen there as happened recently at the building on Tenth street known as Ford's Theater, the blood of those employés of the Government who might be its victims would be upon our hands.

I rejoice, then, that the Senate has taken action upon this question. For four years the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House and Senate have failed to agree. During these four years—and if I make any mistake I hope my friend from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] will correct me—the committee of this House, I believe, has recommended the purchase of only one lot. I do not wish to be understood as casting any censure upon these committees; I simply state the fact that they have not agreed upon any proposition, and that the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has made only one recommendation, which has been rejected by the House.

Now the Senate has placed on this appropriation bill the amendment which has been read and to which my motion relates. It provides for the purchase of the south half of square 673. This property contains 213,815 square feet, and is offered to the Government at the rate of $1.17 per square foot. I have been told and believe that no other property in that neighborhood can be purchased for less than $2 per square foot. If it shall be determined to purchase this property, we will then not only have sufficient space for the accommodation of the proposed building, but the price paid for it will be within the limit of the appropriation already made. That ground is 16 feet higher than the site of the present Government Printing Office, and therefore not subject to moisture.

It is surrounded by commodious streets, so as to exclude the danger of fire from adjacent buildings. It has on its eastern border the Metropolitan branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The Public Printer tells us that the cost of carrying supplies to the Printing Office and taking the product from it is annually very large. I do not think I overstate it when I say it is in excess of $25,000 or $30,000 per annum.

This property, as I have said, is within two or three squares of the present location of the Printing Office. All the employés of that establishment have their homes in that neighborhood; and when we are determining where the new Printing Office shall be located it ought to be a matter for serious consideration that we do not put them to the trouble and expense of changing their homes.

Mr. JONES. Will my colleague allow me a question?

Mr. WISE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. As I understand, the property now under consideration is three or four squares beyond the present Printing Office?

Mr. WISE. I have so stated.

Mr. JONES. At present the only way by which members of Congress can reach the Printing Office is either by walking or by hiring a private conveyance.

Mr. WISE. I was coming to that point in a moment.

Mr. JONES. I would like to know whether this proposed site will not be still more difficult to reach?

Mr. WISE. You will have the same means of reaching this proposed site that you have of reaching the present.

But I will say, in reply to the gentleman, that an electric street railroad is already being laid down on North Capitol street, and will be completed in a short time, by means of which the gentleman will have street-car connection by electricity with the site for this building in favor of which I am now speaking. He will also have connection from that locality with all of the Departments by the street-car line on New York avenue.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been stated by the Public Printer that not less than 170,000 square feet of space would be sufficient. Here we would have 213,815 square feet. Not only sufficient for all the present necessities of the Government, but enough for future enlargement, with railroad connections, and with broad streets surrounding it on all sides. At the present site you have no railroad connection, and there is no possibility of obtaining it; and, as I have before said, the Public Printer this morning told the members of this House that the cartage of supplies to the present building involves an expenditure of not less than from $25,000 to $30,000 per annum.

Mr. JONES. I would like to know if the letter of the Public Printer, to which the gentleman has referred, was not written—although it appears this morning—before the appropriation of $75,000 was made on yesterday to strengthen the present building?

Mr. WISE. I have no knowledge as to when the letter was written; but I do know the statements that it embodies, and I am satisfied of their accuracy.

Mr. JONES. On yesterday we appropriated $75,000 for the strengthening of the present building.

Mr. WISE. I am aware of that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the members of this House to some statements and remarks which have been made by members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate with reference to this very important subject. Senator VEST, although at present opposed to the purchase of this site, in his speech on the 15th day of July, 1892 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 6873), speaking of this location, the southern half of square 673, says:

which I believe to be in every respect the most available and best adapted and cheapest of all the property that is offered to the Government.

Again he says:

In the communication from the Public Printer, referred to in the letter I have read, he states that at least 170,000 square feet is necessary for this building (the printing plant), and that as much more as can be purchased at suitable terms would be better.

And Senator VEST also says that—

In building an enormous establishment of this sort, to be suitable for the purposes of the Government for all time to come, there should be parking; that there should not be simply a naked structure running up to the lines of the street.

In another speech the Senator said:

The Government of the United States, in putting up any permanent structure, should never for an instant contemplate the erection of a building without any parking around it, and without all the facilities that would come from a large area and increased space.

Again he says:

The first consideration in regard to erecting a public building in the District of Columbia and elsewhere should be as to the area covered by the building.

I have no hesitation in giving it as the deliberate judgment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that the interests of the Government will be subserved by accepting the proposition as to the sale of the south half of square 673.

Senator MANDERSON, who is also a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, and who has examined the various sites that have been offered to the Government for the printing establishment, says:

There are advantages connected with the south half of square 673. It is not made ground, it will undoubtedly afford a good foundation for this building, and I do not know that it is too far removed from the Departments on the one hand and the Capitol on the other.

And he further says:

Another proposition urged against the spreading of the Government Printing Office at the present site, or near it, was that it was impracticable to obtain that which above all other things is needed for an economical administration of the printing affairs of the Government—a railway that shall carry in the crude material and that shall take out in mail cars from the distributing warehouse, the finished product.

These, Mr. Speaker, are important considerations.

Now, I have explained to the members of the House that not only have you in this location a sufficient space, at a smaller price than that for which any other property can be purchased in that locality, but you have also railroad connection, which Senator MANDERSON tells us is so important for the cheap administration of the Government printing establishment, and which would in a few years save to this country money enough to pay the price that you will have to pay for the site proposed in the Senate amendment for this establishment.

May I ask how much time I have remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used sixteen minutes and has nineteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WISE. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment with the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of amendment 277, and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be erected, as soon as practicable, of brick and metal, a substantial and commodious fireproof building, with fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for use as a Government Printing Office, at a cost not to exceed $1,250,000, upon plans to be agreed upon by said Secretary, the Supervising Architect, and Public Printer. That said building shall be erected upon the south end of that part of public reservation numbered 2, in the city of Washington, D. C., bounded on the east by Sixth street, on the south by B street southwest, on the west by Seventh street, and on the north by B street northwest: Provided, That all appropriations made for the purpose of constructing said building shall be expended under the supervision and control of the officer in charge of the construction of the building for the Library of Congress, and in accordance with the laws governing the disbursements of the appropriations for said Library building, and he shall annually make a report to Congress of his proceedings under this act: And provided further, That while said officer is engaged in the construction of said Printing Office his army pay and allowances shall be the same as for officers of his grade on the active list: And provided further, That the sum of $250,000, to provide accommodation for the Government Printing Office and the construction of the needed storage and distribution warehouses in connection therewith, in the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government approved August 30, 1890, and suspended by act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, approved March 3, 1891, is hereby made available for beginning the work on said building and for each and every purpose connected with the same.

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have a resolution read that was adopted by the House on the 9th day May last.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the pending bill (House bill 5438) be recommitted to the Committee of Public Buildings and Grounds with instructions to amend the bill so as to provide for the establishment of a Government Printing Office on land now owned by the United States in the city of Washington, D. C.

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with that resolution and the direction of the House the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds made an investigation of the reservations in the city of Washington, with a view of reporting a bill in accordance with that resolution. I may say here that the committee are divided upon the question of taking any public reservation whatever. I was directed, however, by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report this bill. It is not the desire of the majority of the committee, but I favor the site.

I do not take it that it is necessary for me to say anything in regard to the site. I presume every member of this House is fully acquainted with its location. It is the site that is commonly known as the Fish Commission site—a reservation large enough to put two or three public printing offices upon. It is located just south of the Pennsylvania Railroad depot, and can be approached on the west side by the Seventh street cable line, is but a few steps from Pennsylvania avenue, is accessible on three sides, without subjecting anyone to any danger incident to the railroads. It is immediately adjacent to the Pennsylvania Railroad track, so that all of the appliances and material used in the Printing Office can be transported without extra cartage. It was the unanimous view of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that if a public reservation should be taken at all, that was the best and most available site to be had in the District.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I desire to add anything else.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Before the gentleman sits down, will he allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BRETZ. I will.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not know but what the gentleman has fully stated it, but I did not catch it. Was it not the decision of a majority of the committee that no public reservation should be taken for a Public Printing Office?

Mr. BRETZ. I have so stated.

Mr. PENCE. What committee does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which has jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. PENCE. Is that since the action of the House declaring for a reservation site?

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is since the action of the House.

Mr. BRETZ. This bill is on the Calendar by direction of the House; and three or four members of the committee favor it. I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana has used nine minutes of his time and has eleven minutes remaining.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, we have now reached that point in the consideration of this question that I apprehended would be reached after the action of the House on the report made by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. That committee, having been charged with the duty of selecting a suitable site upon which the Government Printing Office was to be located, performed that work as faithfully as they knew how, and made a report to the House. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who had never given the matter one moment's thought, who had never investigated the subject from any standpoint, ran the House off on a proposition to locate this Government Printing Office on one of the public reservations in the city of Washington.

As has been stated by my colleague on the committee [Mr. BRETZ], the committee felt compelled, under the instructions of the House, to report a bill. The committee, however, are opposed, with the exception of two members, I believe, to invading any of the parks or public reservations of the city of Washington for any purpose whatever, except that for which they are now used.

We are face to face now, Mr. Speaker, with a proposition that involves the expenditure of a million and a half of dollars. We are confronted with an amendment upon an appropriation bill, put on by the Senate, not with the purpose perhaps of handicapping the House and preventing free expression on this question—I do not charge that—but they have made it impossible that this question should have that consideration to which it is entitled.

The Mahone property, proposed by the Senate amendment to be purchased was examined by the committee on the part of the House and the Senate. The joint committee made a thorough examination, so far as they could, of that property, and were unanimously of the opinion that the location was not suited for a public printing office, and that the character of the land itself was such as to positively forbid the erection of a Government Printing Office on that property.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand this proposition now under consideration was put on the bill by the Senate?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true.

Mr. KILGORE. And it has not been considered in the House since the time referred to by the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No.

Mr. KILGORE. How much is it proposed to appropriate for the purchase of that land?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. KILGORE. When the amendment was pending was it considered in the Senate by the Senate Committee on Finance?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I presume so.

Mr. KILGORE. And reported by them to the Senate?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand that to be the situation.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand it was thoroughly considered up at Chamberlin's grocery and was unanimously agreed to there.

Mr. BROWN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can not yield any further.

Mr. BROWN. I know the gentleman would not like to make any incorrect statement. I understood the gentleman to say that this Senate amendment carried an appropriation of $250,000 to buy this Mahone property.

Mr. SAYERS. Is not that true?

Mr. BROWN. It is not.

Mr. WISE. The appropriation was made in 1890.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is begging the question.

Mr. WISE. It is not begging the question.

Mr. BROWN. It does not carry a dollar of appropriation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I decline to be further interrupted.

I will now answer the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Virginia. They have undertaken to say that this proposition of the Senate makes no appropriation. That may be true, Mr. Speaker, but it reëstablishes or revives an appropriation made three or four years ago of $250,000, and that is made applicable to this purpose.

Mr. COX. It takes that much money.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It takes that much money out of the Treasury.

Mr. BROWN. The gentleman is mistaken about that. It does not take that money.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This property, as I have stated, was examined by the committee and reported against without a single objection on the part of the committee. The reasons for that were, in the first place, its location is very inconvenient. It is very remote from the Capitol and from transportation to and from the location by street railroads and otherwise at this time.

Mr. PENCE. That is the Mahone property.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I mean the Mahone property, of course. But the main reason which influenced the committee in reaching the conclusion they did was that we had information that can not be questioned, in my judgment, that this lot, or that portion of this section known as the Mahone property, the southern portion of it, included in this amendment, is a filled lot, nearly the whole of it. It can not be questioned for a moment that the old Tiber Creek at one time, if the official maps of the city are to be believed, ran immediately, or almost immediately, through the center of it. When the sewer was built the bed or channel of the creek was straightened, and that the sewer now runs through one end of this lot; and nobody will deny that proposition.

Mr. WISE. I deny it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then you deny the official maps of this city.

Mr. WISE. I have got an official map.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So have I. [Laughter.]

Several MEMBERS. That is a "show down."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Virginia has "called me," I propose to "show down." [Laughter.]

Now, here is the official map of the city, that has been on file in the Committee of Public Buildings and Grounds. If any gentleman will examine this map he will see the old Tiber Creek, as indicated in this map, runs almost immediately through the center of this lot. This map was made before the sewer was built. The creek, as shown at the time this map was made, was a surface creek, and it can be exactly told where it was.

Now, here is another map, prepared by a gentleman who is competent to make a report, and I expect my friend has got a copy of it. It shows the sewer which now exists. Here is the property that is proposed to be bought. This here (indicating) is the creek, and there is the sewer as it now exists; and I will guarantee it is correct.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. The money is yours.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no feeling in this matter; none whatever. I want a Public Printing Office; and it has been my desire, if I ever had an honest desire in life, to secure during this session legislation upon this subject. I have devoted much time to it, and now we are called upon to act upon this important proposition, involving, as I have said, $1,500,000, never having been reported by any committee of this House; and it is totally unfit for the purpose for which it is intended.

Now, I prefer, of course, the lot reported by the Committee of the House. I believe that is the place where this office ought to be located. I believe all the requirements would be met there. I believe that many thousand dollars annually would be saved in transportation to and from and transportation of materials, and all of that.

Mr. HUNTER. Where is that lot?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Near the Baltimore and Ohio depot here.

We have now reached that point in the proceedings where it appears to be impossible to get an expression from the House and Senate that would permit the erection of a building upon the site reported by the committee. I want to say that I shall feel very much disappointed; I shall feel that this House of Representatives have acted upon this question without proper information and investigation if they are persuaded by the lobby or by any other influence that has been swarming around this Capitol seeking favorable action on this amendment.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Just for a question.

Mr. COX. What is the reason that the property which belongs to the Government and on a part of which the present Printing Office is built should not be used instead of making this expenditure for new property?

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I have already indicated to the House, I am about to take a position on this question that does not fully meet my judgment. Before I take my seat I shall offer a substitute for the amendments of the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Indiana. It is one to which I can not give my full approval; but I have reached the conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that it is the very best that can be done, and I believe every member upon this floor will agree with me that it is absolutely necessary that some action should be taken on this question before this Congress adjourns. I am going to offer a proposition authorizing the purchase of additional land adjacent to the present Government Printing Office and authorizing the construction there of a building which it is believed by the Public Printer will give immediate relief to the overcrowded condition of the Printing Office, and probably obviate the dangers that now surround the situation in that establishment. I say this proposition does not meet my full approval. I do not believe that a great Government establishment such as our Printing Office is and is to be, should be located in such a place as that where the present office is located. On a former occasion I stated to the House the reasons for the view which I hold on that subject.

But, sir, we must recognize the fact that we can not have our own way about everything. We have not been, and we can not and shall not be, able to induce the House of Representatives to agree with us as to the proper location of this building and as to the importance of that question. The letter from the Public Printer referred to by the gentleman from Virginia this morning is conclusive to my mind that immediate action should be taken with respect to this matter. The gentleman has referred to that letter, and has made the statement that the Public Printer has declared that $20,000 or $25,000 is expended annually in carting materials to and from the present Public Printing Office. That is explained by the fact that a former administration of the office rented a storehouse in the city of Georgetown, and the supplies have been carted back and forth between Georgetown and the Public Printing Office.

That is how this heavy expense for transportation has been incurred, and it would have been perfectly fair in my friend from Virginia to have stated the facts. The Public Printer in that letter, while making reference to the past expenditures for the transportation of supplies, states that a storehouse has now been secured in the immediate vicinity of the office, and that much of the expenditure for that purpose will be avoided in the near future. He states further that, if the proposition which I am about to submit shall be adopted, he will give his personal bond that he will save enough money in one year's operation of the office to erect the building that he proposes to erect on this site, and that after that building is occupied, the overcrowded condition of the Government Printing Office and the danger to the lives and limbs of the occupants will disappear.

Mr. Speaker, that is about all that I care to say on this subject. I have stated that this proposition does not meet the approval of my judgment, because it means the permanent location of the office where it is now.

Mr. HUDSON. Who recommends this proposition?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The present Public Printer. The adoption of this plan undoubtedly means, as I have said, the permanent location of the Government Printing Office down there. It involves an expenditure of a million and a quarter or a million and a half of dollars. This is to be, perhaps, the greatest public printing office in the world, and it ought to be erected at a more accessible point. It ought to be erected where visitors to the city of Washington could reach it without inconvenience, because it is always an object of interest to visitors.

It ought to be erected where members of the House and Senate could get to it without a day's travel. It ought to be erected upon a more suitable site, where the foundations would be better, where the atmosphere would be better, where the comfort of the employés would be advanced. But it seems to be impossible to secure that. A fit of economy has seized some gentlemen in the House, and they are not willing that a great establishment like this should be located in that section of the city where common sense and business principles would require.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. What section is that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the Printing Office ought to be upon some of the squares along Pennsylvania avenue. When I speak of common sense and business principles, I mean just that application of them which a prudent business man would make to his own affairs. Such a man, in spending so large an amount of money, would not stop to consider ten thousand, or twenty thousand, or fifty thousand dollars in securing a proper site; he would first select a suitable site and secure it and then put a building upon it.

Mr. TUCKER. I desire to know whether, if the proposition which the gentleman states he is going to introduce by way of amendment is adopted, it will, in the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, kill the proposition for the erection of a new Government Printing Office?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly; I think there is no question about that, because the amendment itself contemplates that the whole of the site shall be covered by a new building suited for the purposes of the Printing Office.

Mr. TUCKER. If the amendment which my friend advocates should be adopted, then I understand that there is to be no more proposed legislation for a new printing building during this Congress?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Nor for many years to come, in my opinion. I think it settles the whole question.

Mr. PENCE. As I understand the gentleman's proposition, it is one on which the Senate voted only two or three weeks ago.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PENCE. And voted it down. Is not this the same proposition?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PENCE. Then, if we plant ourselves on that proposition and the Senate is against it, how are we going to get any new building at all?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, that is a matter for the conferees; I can not answer that question.

Mr. PENCE. I am losing my faith in conferees. [Laughter].

Mr. BANKHEAD. I believe there will be no trouble in the two Houses getting together on the question.

Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk the amendment which I desire at the proper time to offer, but I do not wish it to be read now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is aware that the previous question will operate at half past 4 o'clock, and that any amendment which it is desired to offer must come in before the previous question begins to operate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am reserving enough time in which to have that amendment read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman understands that it must be read in his thirty-five minutes?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes, sir. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fourteen minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I reserve that time.

Mr. DUNN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] one question. Is it not a fact that if land next to the present printing establishment should be purchased and a building such as is contemplated by the Public Printer should be erected, the present building can be utilized for many years to come?

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have nineteen minutes remaining. I yield that time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, if there is one duty to which every member of this House should give his attention, it is the settlement of this controversy about a public printing establishment. You have no duty more solemnly pressing upon you at this moment than that. With a vast body of men and women in the present establishment working day and night under the shadow of death, and with the horrors of the Ford's Theater disaster still sounding in our hearts, we should give attention to this matter. For one, as a member of the committee before which this question came, I have addressed myself to the subject with no little care.

Let me call attention to two or three matters which are embarrassing the minds of some members. First, there is no appropriation covered by the Senate amendment. Many gentlemen think that carrying this amendment will appropriate $250,000. That is not so. This appropriation was made in the sundry civil act approved August 30, 1890.

Mr. HUDSON. I should like to ask——

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I must decline to yield. I supposed I would have an hour to discuss this question, instead of a few minutes.

Mr. HUDSON. I only wanted to ask a question.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Very well, ask it.

Mr. HUDSON. Would not the passage of this amendment take $250,000 out of the Treasury?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Why, the money is already appropriated.

Mr. HUDSON. Will it not take that much money out?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. This is no appropriation; the money is already appropriated, and this amendment simply determines where it is to be spent. Will you stop to weigh human life with money?

Since 1889 the importance of this question has been urged upon the attention of Congress. We have allowed it to go undisposed of. Three committees have failed to dispose of it. First a commission composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Architect of the Capitol, and the Government Printer grappled with the question, and failed. Then the Printing Committee grappled with it, and failed. Then the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds grappled with it, and this body rejected their report. Now what do we see?

A representative of the minority of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds offers an amendment to take for this purpose a public reservation; and the chairman of that committee does not support the bill coming from his committee, but offers another amendment—to buy property to extend and build upon the present site. Is that solving the problem? You have it within your power to-day, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, to agree to the amendment of the Senate. Then the question is solved; life is saved, and this question is removed from public discussion.

The gentleman from Alabama refers to a "lobby." Aye, I know that there is a lobby. There are half a dozen different projects here pressing themselves on Congress; and whenever anything is about to be agreed upon the whole pack of the lobby outside jumps on it, hoping that it will be beaten, and that their special infant will finally have access to the national pap and get nourishment according to their desires. Gentleman had better not introduce such themes.

Now, let us see, first, what is the condition in regard to the lot covered by this amendment; and, in discussing this topic, I will touch arguments which have been advanced here in this debate. Gentlemen object that the lot covered by the Senate proposition is not a safe lot, because the course of Tiber Creek was through that lot.

In the first place, no gentleman here will dare contend that there is better or more solid ground in the District of Columbia than there is on this lot outside of the track of the Tiber. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has referred to a map of that part of the city. I hold in my hand the report of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1892, and I call your attention to the map of that region here exhibited, and you will see on that map that between one-ninth and one-tenth only of that lot is traversed by the Tiber Creek at all. Take the map among you and look it over. You will find that all the rest is solid ground; and remember that this lot has in round numbers about 5 acres. It lies right adjoining the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad—behind it; there is room to build all of this establishment, and what this Government will need in the coming centuries, on the lot, and we have railroad communication from it directly, through the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, with the world outside, and in that manner can stop the enormous expense for cartage, which can not be curtailed if you take the old site, I will say in passing. So much about the Tiber. It simply passes through the back corner of the lot and then comes up a street, and is formed there into a sewer, making the lot still drier and better in other respects.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the price——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do not you think $250,000 is too much money?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is the price fixed on the lot.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is it not too much?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. No, sir; and I think the gentleman from Georgia will credit me with sincerity.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. It amounts to a little over $1.16 per square foot; call it $1.17 Right across North Capitol street you can not buy a lot for less than $2.50 per square foot, and on the other side you can not buy a lot for less than $1.50 per square foot——

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Some gentlemen will ask—possibly the gentleman from Texas—why it is that they want to sell under the circumstances.

Mr. KILGORE. Yes; why are they so anxious to sell?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I can not yield to the gentleman, for my time is very brief.

Mr. KILGORE. You have already anticipated the question.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Very well; if I have, I will answer it. If the House wants to go into a fuller discussion of the matter let us have more time for that purpose.

But I will answer the gentleman's question as to the reason why the parties wish to sell. To begin with, there is a mortgage of $125,000 on the lot, quite an important item. By selling now, even at a low figure, it is like a sale at wholesale as against one at retail; and you and I know that when a man has a mortgage on his property he will sell it at a reasonable advance rather than retain the burden of it on his own shoulders any longer than is necessary. So much for that.

Reference was made by the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that there was no street car connection with this lot. That is true now. But you have railroad connection, and a connection is now being completed by electric cars, and you who ride around the New Jersey avenue line can see the coming connection with the proposed line to the Capitol.

Another thing—on one side is a row of houses, nearly all of them owned by the employés of the Government Printing Office. Move the Printing Office to your reservation, and you take these people from their homes. The reservations! Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, that reservation covered in your bill is overflowed at times during the year. That is a decisive objection to using it for this purpose.

Where this army of men and women work we want health and safety for them, and not put them where they are to be subjected to danger and death from floods or from sickness. Aside from that we will need all of our reservations. At this day and hour when you can buy property at $1.16 a foot that answers the purpose, and will answer it for centuries better than any possible selection that we can make on your Government reservations, which were laid aside and dedicated to the public for their use forever, I say we had better pay the $1.16 a foot. So much for that.

Germane to the question as to whether that is a suitable lot or otherwise I call the attention of the House of Representatives to the fact that it is 16 feet higher than the old site, which it is proposed by some to take. It is as near every Department of the Government as the old site is. It is only about 350 yards from the present site.

Now, remember that the matter that is being pressed by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is the old site. Let us look at the question of cost to the Government for that. We own there now 60,000 feet where the old site is, and it is proposed to buy 52,000 feet additional. In this report from the Government Printing Office the old proposition was to take 152,000 feet in order to get sufficient accommodations. Less is insufficient. To do that you will pile up a bill so big that it would stagger any Congress to appropriate the money unless it was an absolute necessity. Now, mark it, 60,000 feet we own. Then purchase 52,000 feet and your scheme contemplates 112,000 feet in all. It is estimated that you will have to pay about $3.25 per foot for what you buy. If so, the 60,000 feet we own is worth that sum; that is to say, $3.25 a foot. Three dollars and twenty-five cents a foot for the 52,000 to be bought would be $175,000.

Three dollars and a quarter for what we own, which we will now save if we take the present amendment, would be $195,000; total cost for the ground, $370,000. By taking this amendment you get it for $250,000 and get 100,000 more square feet. The gentleman from Alabama would pay $100,000 more money and get 100,000 square feet less. Besides, you will, in the near future have to buy 100,000 more feet, making the total cost at least $350,000 more. Is that business and common sense: and is it the way you would treat your own business? There is not a man in this House, if he were going to put up a printing office for his own use, but what would take this amendment, and feel he was making the biggest profit in the transaction and doing the wisest thing.

Now, mark you, the original scheme was to have 170,000 square feet for the old site. This plan now is to have 112,000 square feet. That is 58,000 feet less than the amount that is recommended for a proper building for the Government Printing Office. Remember, too, that if you depend on the old site you can get no railroad connections without using the public streets. Now, for one, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I do not intend to stand here and be influenced by Tom, Dick, and Harry, who hope to be pulled in, in the sweet by and by. I see now before me a solution of this problem, and if we let it go by God Almighty and humanity will indict the House of Representatives for deliberate murder, for murder is coming.

Three different commissions have condemned that site as unsafe. With these three condemnations, with every Government Printer saying, "I want to be rid of the responsibility," will you sit idly here and deal in quibbles, when you have it before you, at half past 4 this afternoon, to settle this question once and for all?

How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield three minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH], and reserve the remaining three minutes.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Speaker, I intend to support this amendment. I do it because I believe the location selected is the best, because I believe it will be cheaper to the Government in the end; and I desire to say to some of my colleagues from Virginia that I can not be frightened from the position which I take because this is called the Mahone lot. I shall vote for it whether it is called the Mahone lot, the Windsor lot, the Snowden lot, or by what other name it may be called. I vote for it, sir, as a Representative of Virginia, because I believe in so doing, I am best serving the Government which I represent; because I believe I am best serving the people of my State and the people of every State in this Union. I vote for it because I believe that the building now occupied by the Public Printer is in a dangerous condition; and I fear every day lest we hear that that building has gone down, as Ford's Theater went down, killing hundreds of the people employed in that Printing Office.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MEREDITH. Certainly.

Mr. DUNN. Are you aware that there is $75,000 appropriated to make that building secure?

Mr. MEREDITH. I am aware of that fact; but I am aware also of the fact that a crack has been recently discovered in one of the walls, and that with the immense amount of machinery and material in that building, and the thousands of people who are there every day, it is in a dangerous condition, and I feel afraid whenever I walk through it. I was there this morning. I go there frequently, as I have to.

I had a conversation with the Public Printer this morning, or heard a conversation in my presence, and he called attention to the fact that a crack has been recently discovered in one of the walls; that he is having it watched, but that he believes that the people employed under him in that building are in danger; and this House would be particeps criminis not to do something by which the danger could be avoided and averted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] reserves the remaining three minutes of his time.

Mr. BRETZ. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eleven minutes.

Mr. BRETZ. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, it is admitted that we need a new Printing Office. I presume there is no difference of opinion in this House as to that fact, but I do insist that those who stand here and say that we shall never have a new Printing Office until we buy somebody's lot can not clear their skirts if this building should fall down before a new one can be provided.

What I object to is, that people who are interested in building sites come here and lobby and lobby and keep Congress from erecting a public building when it is in our power to do so, and do it at once.

We decided here a few months ago by 39 to 149 in favor of putting this building upon public ground. The gentleman from Alabama complains, and says we did it without a moment's thought; but after the House has had time to think it over the gentleman himself abandons the plan that he proposed then and comes in with a new plan for a public building. The committee, in compliance with the resolution of this House, has reported in favor of a site upon public ground.

There is land that is not needed for a public park; land not used for a public park; land upon which there is a small building, now known as the Fish Commission, which is more conveniently situated than any land that is proposed here. It lies midway between all these Departments; it adjoins the Smithsonian Institution and the Museum, and is more accessible to the Capitol and to all the Departments than the present site. It lies beside the railroad track, and it would save a great deal of money to erect a building on this land, near to the Departments, and save the cost of carrying books backward and forward and to and from the present Government Printing Office site.

I think, in view of the fact that we have land available for this purpose, we should not vote to buy anybody's property, and yet those who claim to be afraid that the building will fall down, who claim to be afraid that we will have the blood of employés on our hands, will stand and quibble and quarrel about somebody else's land, and refuse to use the land we have. I insist, Mr. Speaker, if this was private business, if we were acting for ourselves, we would not stop to hunt up somebody who wanted to sell his land to us, but we would erect a building upon our own land, and make it secure for our printers, and not go on, Congress after Congress and year after year, in order to furnish a market for somebody's land.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has convinced us that the site chosen by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is not a good one and would be expensive, and the gentleman from Alabama has convinced us that the site desired by the gentleman from Iowa should not be taken. But, sir, this House on a previous occasion, after a discussion longer than that of this afternoon, decided by a vote of nearly four to one in favor of using public ground instead of buying either site.

And, sir, if we instruct our committee to select Government land to be used for a building, and they come back without obtaining an agreement with the Senate, and after that this building falls and any employés are killed because we have refused to take the Mahone site, the Senate will be to blame and not we. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not see that there is any necessity for spending a great amount of time upon this subject. We have several propositions before us, all of them but one looking to the purchase of land for the building of a Printing Office. Now, if I was to favor any proposition for the purchase of any land for the erection of such a building I would certainly be in favor of purchasing the ground next to the present Printing Office, which, I understand, belongs to the Government. But why is there any necessity for our going to that expense?

A good many gentlemen of this House have an economical streak upon them, and ought to exercise it in this case, I think. We have property belonging to the Government, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana proposes to erect the Government Printing Office upon property which is now owned by the Government and which is of no use as a public park, and from its location the property never will be used for that purpose in my judgment. It is high, it is healthy, it is convenient; and it seems to me like good business sense would say take that property and erect our Government Printing Office upon it and settle this question.

I suppose the real estate agents in Washington want to sell some property to the Government; but I suppose those of us who do not live in Washington or in the District of Columbia have no special interest in subserving the interests of the reale-state agents in Washington. Hence I would favor the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] has two minutes remaining.

Mr. BRETZ. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY].

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I visited every point in Washington that has been recommended as a site for a Public Printing Office. I find, sir, that the Government is in possession of property that is of ample elevation above tide water to give us a suitable site for this building.

The argument presented upon this floor, that because we now have a Public Printing Office around which printers have located, we ought to continue it there, is to me a reason why there ought to be a change. If men have been long enough in public positions to secure homes in the neighborhood of the office where they are employed, then I, as an opponent of civil service reform, think it is about time that we change the situation and let somebody else be accommodated. [Laughter.]

There is plenty of property in Washington more available than the lot suggested by the Senate, property which can be bought for 90 cents a foot. There is a lot within 1,500 feet of this Capitol that can be bought at that price, and which is far more desirable than any property mentioned. Still, sir, I am of the opinion that as long as the Government owns property that is suitable for this purpose we ought to utilize it, and not look around for property to expend the money of the Government upon. I have no fear about the old Public Printing Office. I have been in the old building a good many times, as probably have most gentlemen here, and I think this cry about its being unsafe is merely a cry gotten up for the purpose of forcing a purchase upon the Government rather than because of any real apprehension as to the safety of the building.

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I offer the substitute which I send to the desk.

The proposed substitute was read, as follows:

That in order to procure a suitable site for a building to be used as a Government Printing Office the Secretary of the Treasury and the Public Printer are hereby authorized and directed to purchase from the owners thereof the following-described real estate, situate in Washington City, D. C., namely: Beginning at the southeast corner of square 624, at the intersection of North G street and North Capitol street; thence running north 175 feet 3 inches to an alley 30 feet wide running east and west through said square 624; thence west along the south line of said alley 336 feet to a point immediately south of the southwest corner of the site of the Government Printing Office as now located; thence directly south to a point on the northern side of North G street, and thence east along the southern boundary of said square on North G street to the place of beginning, except an alley 14 feet wide running north and south from the alley 30 feet wide, hereinbefore named, to North G street, which alley is hereby declared to be closed, and shall be appropriated and used as a part of the site of the building to be located on said real estate.

In case the Secretary of the Treasury and the Public Printer shall, within thirty days after the passage of this act, be unable to purchase this land at a reasonable price, they shall make application by petition to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, at any general or special term thereof, for the condemnation of such land and for the ascertainment of its value. Such petition shall contain a particular description of the property, with the names of the owner or owners and their residences, so far as the same can be ascertained, together with a description of the land proposed to be condemned, and thereupon the said court is authorized and required to cite all such owners and all other persons interested to appear in said court within a reasonable time to answer the said petition; and if it shall appear to the court that there are any owners or other persons interested who are under legal disability the court shall cause public notice to be given of the time at which the said court will proceed with the matter of condemnation; and at such time, if it shall appear that there are any persons under disability who have either appeared or not appeared, the court shall appoint guardians ad litem for each of such persons, and the court shall thereupon proceed to appoint three capable and disinterested commissioners to appraise the value of the respective interests of all persons named in plaintiff's petition. Such commissioners shall thereupon, after being duly sworn for the proper performance of their duties, examine the premises sought to be condemned and hear the persons in interest who may appear before them and ascertain their appraisement of the value of the interest of all persons respectively in such lands; and when such report shall have been confirmed by the court, the President of the United States shall, if he thinks the public interest requires it, cause payment to be made to the respective persons entitled, according to the judgment of the court, and in case any of such persons are under legal disability, or can not be found, or neglect to receive payment, the money due to them shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to their credit, unless there shall be persons lawfully authorized to receive the same under the direction of the court; and when such payments are so made, or the amounts belonging to persons to whom payment shall not be made are so deposited, the real estate described in the petition shall be deemed to be condemned, and taken by the United States for public use.

The sum of $250,000 appropriated by the act entitled "An act making appropriation for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1890, is hereby reappropriated and made available, and, in addition thereto, the sum of $75,000, or any part thereof, appropriated in this act for the repairs of the present Government Printing Office building, is hereby made available, together with the further sum of $51,000, for the purchase of said land and the erection of a building or buildings thereon for the use of the Government Printing Office and for each and every purpose connected with the construction of such building or buildings.

The Chief of Engineers of the Army is hereby authorized and directed, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Public Printer, during the present fiscal year, to erect a building or buildings for the use of the Government Printing Office, plans for which are to be prepared by him, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Public Printer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have read now a letter from the Public Printer.

The letter was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1894.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your verbal request, communicated to me to-day, that I should explain the necessity for speedy action looking to the erection of a new Government Printing Office building, I have the honor to state that in each annual report made by me to Congress I have urged the importance of such action.

During the first session of the Fifty-first Congress an appropriation was made of $250,000 for the purchase of a site for such a building, and a commission, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Architect of the Capitol, and the Public Printer, were authorized to select a site and effect the purchase. For reasons heretofore reported by me to Congress, the negotiations for the purchase of the site selected was suspended indefinitely, and the sum appropriated remains unexpended. No other site for a Government Printing Office has yet been selected by authority of Congress.

Meantime the necessity for a new building, or the extension of the present structure, becomes each day more apparent. The urgency relates to the inconvenience, disadvantage, and consequent expense of doing the work in the present building, as well as to the ever present danger of its destruction by fire, with all its valuable property, and the probable loss of human life. That plan which would afford relief in the briefest time and at the least expense, seems to me in the present exigency most practicable. With these ends in view, I suggest the expediency of an extension of the present site to G street on the south and to a point corresponding with the west boundary of the building.

The estimated cost of a fireproof building, six stories high, on the extended site would be $126,000, and the site itself, with all the improvements thereon, $175,000, making in all $301,000. Should the appropriation of $250,000 authorized by the Fifty-first Congress be made available for the extension herein proposed, the additional sum of $51,000 would be all that would be needed to furnish the relief which the extraordinary exigencies of this office demand.

Very respectfully,

F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

Hon. J. D. SAYERS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask to have read the papers I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 31.

Hon. T. E. BENEDICT:

Please send me at your earliest convenience a plat showing the land adjacent to the present Printing Office which you believe it would be wise to purchase for an addition to the Printing Office; also a statement of its probable cost, the total probable cost of necessary buildings to be erected thereon in order to completely accommodate the requirements of the office; the amount necessary to be appropriated at this session to erect within this fiscal year a sufficient building to relieve the present structures from danger to human life and property.

JOS. D. SAYERS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations.

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C. August 2, 1894.

SIR: In reply to your telegram of the 31st of July, requesting me to send you a plat showing the land adjacent to the Government Printing Office, which I believed it would be wise to purchase for an addition to same, with a statement of the probable cost, and an estimate of the total probable cost of necessary buildings to be erected thereon, in order to accommodate the requirements of the office at the present time, said building "to be erected within this fiscal year." I have the honor to hand herewith diagram of the block bounded by North Capitol, G, First, and H streets northwest, in which is situated the Government Printing Office. (See Exhibit A.)

On the plat I have indicated in blue field all the land owned and occupied by the office. South of the office, across Jackson alley, are two lots separated by a 14-foot alley. These lots can be purchased, I am informed, and parties having options on same are ready to sell to the Government at prices agreed upon with F. W. Palmer, esq., late Public Printer.

Lot 1, Exhibit A, on North Capitol street, containing 22,813 square feet of ground area, I am informed, will cost $82,468.90, or $3.615 per square foot.

Lot 2, on G street adjoining, containing 30,845 square feet of ground area, will cost $92,072.32, or $2.985 per square foot.

I am confident that the purchase of lot 1, on North Capitol street, would afford all the land needed to give present relief now required in working accommodations here, and also afford assured safety and comfort to the office employés. A five-story iron and brick building, with basement cellar, erected on same, covering the lot except a parking space of 25 feet left vacant on North Capitol and G streets, the building to cover the 14-foot alley running north and south from G street to Jackson alley, thus adding 2,453 square feet to the proposed purchase. This 14-foot alley should be declared closed by act of Congress.

I suggest a building 150 feet 3 inches in length north and south and 75 feet in width east and west, with wings reaching to the Government Printing Office warehouse across the 14-foot alley, each wing 44 by 50 feet (see diagram, Exhibit B), said building, when erected, giving about 77,000 square feet of working space. I estimate such building, if erected under contract, of brick, with steel and iron beams, brick arches, iron rafters, and thoroughly fireproof, to cost not exceeding $200,000, including elevators and bridge connections with the present Printing Office over and across Jackson alley, or a total not exceeding $282,468.99 in cost of land and building. I urgently recommend that this plot of land be purchased and such a building be directed to be erected during the present fiscal year, that the working needs of the office be met, and the safety and comfort of the employés secured.

I have in previous annual reports and in recent communications to Congress and members thereof stated in detail the urgent need of immediate relief in the directions here indicated as a measure of business and economical results, from which Congress and the country will at once receive the benefits, and the total cost saved to the Government within two years. I now urge the matter as a demand made by a common humanity that my working force may not be required longer to work in part under conditions here which are an outrage upon our fellow-beings for which we are in part responsible.

This is the only plan I can suggest for relief. It can be made immediate if accompanied by the necessary legislation to execute it this fiscal year. The same results can not be obtained elsewhere for four times the cost. Any other plan would require all the new expense of power, electric lights, steam heat, sewer, gas, and water connections, which can be secured here without duplicating expensive plants and connections.

Very respectfully,

TH. E. BENEDICT, Public Printer.

Hon. JOS. D. SAYERS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Mr. SAYERS. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eleven minutes remaining.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCKAIG].

Mr. MCKAIG. Mr. Speaker, like our distinguished chairman [Mr. BANKHEAD], I look forward to the speedy erection of a new Government Printing Office with a great deal of pleasure. When I was upon the Printing Committee in the Fifty-second Congress we had this matter under consideration both in the House and in the Senate committees, and we then obtained some figures upon which I based my judgment in voting for the site now occupied by the Government Printing Office. I believed then, as I believe now, that the purchase of additional land adjacent to the present building and the early erection of a new and commodious structure upon the same would not only assure the safety of the employés, but also subserve the interest of economy.

There seems to be an impression here that the present Government Printing Office is an old broken down building, when in fact you have $150,000 worth of fireproof structure there today in good serviceable condition. The foundations of all those buildings are in good shape; but a portion of the superstructure of the present Public Printing Office is in bad condition. On this question I have gleaned some data which I wish to submit to the House.

Three propositions are before Congress for relieving the present overcrowded and dangerous condition of the Government Printing Office.

The first is that of the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which provides for the purchase of additional ground contiguous to the present site and the preservation of the fireproof portion of the present building, which contains over 70,000 square feet of floor space, and the building of a suitable fireproof addition to it large enough to accomodate the demands of the office for at least twenty-five years to come.

The second is that for the purchase of what is known as the Mahone site, which on a small vote was substituted by the Senate for the committee proposition. A motion to reconsider this vote is now pending in the Senate.

The third is that of the House, to erect an entirely new building on one of the public reservations of the city.

The following is a comparison of the cost under the three propositions:

COMMITTEE SITE.
Building	$126,000
Ground	175,000
Total	301,000
MAHONE SITE.
Building	1,500,000
Ground	275,000
Sewers, water and gas mains	75,000
Total	1,850,000
HOUSE PLAN.
Building	1,500,000
Sewers, gas and water mains	75,000
Total	1,575,000
Saving by the committee plan over Mahone site	1,549,000
Saving by the committee plan over House plan	1,274,000

Now, here are some facts to which I wish to call the particular attention of the House. By the selection of a new site the Government will abandon and render useless the following:

Over $150,000 worth of fireproof buildings, nearly new, and absolutely safe and perfectly adapted to the purposes	$150,000
A complete motive power plant of boilers, engines, coal vaults, etc.	50,000
A complete and nearly new electric light plant, with miles of wiring through the fireproof buildings	20,000
The finest electrotype foundry in the world	20,000
A complete system of water and gas supply, and perfect sewerage, which it will cost to duplicate on a new site	75,000
Complete and commodious stables and wagon houses	10,000

So that if you choose any of the sites spoken of here to-day you abandon some $315,000 worth of good property belonging to the United States Government.

Besides, if the present site be retained, when you erect additional buildings, you erect them alongside of property you already have in possession, and as only a portion of the present structure is dangerous, you would be able to move out of the dangerous part in the course of something over eight months, according to the statement which comes from the Public Printer himself, whereas if you purchase property in another part of the city, and undertake to erect the buildings specified here, you can not put them up within less than three or four years at the lowest calculation.

The committee proposition has the indorsement of everybody conversant with the needs of the public printing, including the Committee on Printing, the Public Printer, and the Foreman of Printing, all of whom have made a careful and exhaustive investigation of the matter from every point of view.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I have been quite amused at the description of the land which the Senate amendment proposes to purchase—what is known as "the Mahone lot." In 1861 I happened to be called to Washington. I know what was the condition of that lot at that time. If you had a dead dog and wanted to bury him you would not be obliged to use a shovel; you would simply have to throw him into the lowest part of hat lot, and he would bury himself in a short time. [Laughter.]

That is the character of the ground upon which gentlemen want us to erect a Public Printing Office, and in doing so to abandon the commodious buildings we already have, which, if the property alongside be purchased, can be utilized for years to come. All we want to-day is groundwork for our heavy presses; the additional building can be utilized for the lighter work. Thus a great many thousand dollars can be saved by retaining the present site and buying additional property alongside of it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, for many years the necessity, urgent and immediate, for a new Government Printing Office has been presented. In the Fifty-first Congress, when I had the honor to be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, after waiting the greater part of the long session for action on the part of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the necessity for immediate action seemed to us so imminent that our committee secured an appropriation of $250,000 to buy a site. We thought it wise that a new site should be bought. We did not know where it would be, and did not care, so that it should be fairly located and should be purchased quickly. We constituted a commission to locate and buy the property. That commission performed its functions; but in that Congress and the last Congress the House and the Senate refused to ratify the location made by the commission; and we still have no site selected.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Did the House refuse?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, the matter failed; the two Houses did not ratify it.

Now, I still believe that there ought to be a new Government Printing Office. We have about 70,000,000 people in this country. We are not going to have fewer, but more. This Government Printing Office is now, and will always be, the greatest office on earth. We have in round numbers about 3,000 employés there.

Now, having fully considered the present site (located off of a railway, so that material arriving by rail must be carted to it, and you can not get a railway to it), I have come to the conclusion, as I did in the Fifty-first Congress, that you had better not build an addition to the present structure. It would give temporary relief; but inside of a very few years you would again have the crying necessity for a new Government Printing Office. I submit that you should buy a new site and erect an office sufficient for present needs, and in such a situation as will allow all the improvements to be made that may be required in all future time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana has one minute of his time remaining and the gentleman from Iowa has three minutes.

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Speaker, all of this controversy between the two sites proposed to be purchased can be obviated by adopting my amendment. As I said before, that is the unanimous conclusion of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. If we take a public reservation at all, it is their conclusion that this is the best site to be adopted.

This site is 14.7 feet above tide water, and a good foundation can be had. There has been some question raised as to what we would do with the property down here, the old site that we propose to abandon, if this is adopted. That is easily answered. We are renting buildings all over the city for public purposes, and it can be used for Government purposes for which we need such buildings, and thus save rent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I yield the three minutes remaining to me to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, the question now before the House, as we all know, was brought here by an amendment upon an appropriation bill. The two several propositions which have been submitted to-day have been submitted for the express purpose of defeating that amendment of the Senate.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, it will be very unwise for the Congress of the United States to take any one of the public reservations belonging to the Government in this city for building purposes at this time, and especially so with reference to the very valuable piece of property that my friend and colleague from Indiana proposes to use.

Mr. BRETZ. You have given it to the railroads.

Mr. BROWN. I have given nothing to the railroads.

Mr. BRETZ. Well, they are occupying it.

Mr. BROWN. Well, I hope my friend will not take up my time.

This question is between what is known as the Mahone site, on the one hand, and all of the other propositions which have been submitted, on the other. There has been an attempt to cast discredit upon the Mahone property on several grounds. It has been already stated, and all are agreed, that this site contains about 5 acres of land; that less than one-fifth of it, through which the Tiber Creek runs, is called "made earth;" but no one disputes the fact that there is an abundance of natural earth there on which to erect a building five times as large as the one that will be necessary for the Printing Office of this Government for many years to come; and besides it is now ready for building. It will not cost a twenty-five-cent piece to clear it ready for building uses and purposes.

As to the cost of it: My friend says that this bill carries an appropriation of $250,000 which must be expended in the acquisition of the site. My friend, usually correct, is very much mistaken in this instance. This amendment does not carry a dollar of appropriation.

Mr. BRETZ. Well, the money will have to be paid for it.

Mr. BROWN. Now, I hope my friend will observe the courtesies of debate and remain quiet.

Mr. BRETZ. All right; I will.

Mr. BROWN. It will be the first time if you do. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYNUM. How are we to pay for this?

Mr. BROWN. I will show you. How are you to pay for the additional 50,000 feet that you propose to acquire at the present site?

Mr. WISE. And which is not enough.

Mr. BROWN. Which is not enough. These gentlemen talk as though the property was absolutely worthless at the present site.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWN] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] are technically correct when they say that this calls for no appropriation. An appropriation of $250,000 was made in 1890, and that appropriation has since been suspended. This amendment revives the project and takes out of the Treasury of the United States that sum of money to pay for the lot.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with a little addition to this we can purchase enough property adjoining the present office and erect a building that will do this Government for years, according to the report of the Public Printer, who knows more about the needs of that office than any member of this House. I hope the members of the House therefore will not be frightened by the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Indiana into the acceptance of the Senate amendment.

This building can not be erected to-day or this week. If you are desirous of granting relief and for a less amount of money, if you want to do the best thing for the Government of the United States, then take this sensible and practical course, send Mahone back to Virginia to pay off his mortgage in some other way, and if the Government has no suitable lot of its own for this building, buy the ground adjacent to the present site of the Government Printing Office, erect an addition to the present building, and thus utilize the $300,000 worth of good buildings and grounds you already have, and you will get relief much quicker and much cheaper than by investing in this Mahone property.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee). By agreement of the House the previous question is now ordered upon the three propositions. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same; and that motion takes precedence over the other two. The question will first be taken upon that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WISE. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 127.

Mr. WISE. I will call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, 34 members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ].

Several MEMBERS. Let it be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to it with an amendment he has offered.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I understand that is the amendment to erect a printing office on a Government reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment has been read. It is to erect a building on a public reservation.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. BRETZ, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRETZ. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 105.

Mr. BRETZ. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that 34 gentlemen, not a sufficient number, seconded the demand.

Mr. BRYAN and Mr. FITHIAN demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers on the yeas and nays were refused, 18 members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

Accordingly the motion of Mr. BRETZ was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to it with an amendment which he has offered.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let us have that amendment read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been read, but it can be read again if there is no objection.

Mr. BYNUM. I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, we ought to understand what we are voting on. I hope it will be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment has been read and debated. It can now only be read by unanimous consent. The Chair will submit that request. Is there objection to the reading of this amendment?

Mr. COGSWELL. I object; and I ask that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] have a minute to explain it. It is an extension of the present site.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made to the reading of the amendment. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] asks that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] be allowed one minute in which to explain it. Is there objection?

Mr. GROW. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made, and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. GROSVENOR. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is the amendment about to be voted upon?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment has been read and debated for twenty-five minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If I can get a minute——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BROWN demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 138, noes 41.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BANKHEAD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House ask for a further conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] asks that a further conference be asked with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. SAYERS, Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts, and Mr. COGSWELL, as the conferees on the part of the House.

And then, on motion of Mr. SAYERS (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
JOS. H. O'NEIL,
WM. COGSWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, in order to facilitate the passage of the bill and remove one controverted question from it, I move that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 277, which is the amendment of the Senate in regard to the purchase of property for the site of the Government Printing Office.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask whether the Senator having the conference report in charge will not consent to let it go over, at least until the routine morning business is concluded? There are bills to be reported by committees and other routine business to be transacted which can be disposed of in half an hour. I make that suggestion, but I understand there is a special order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. The conference report is privileged; but the Senator from Delaware desires to submit a motion to go into executive session, I understand.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will yield to me in order to make a motion pursuant to an order of the Senate, I will do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GRAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose my proposition will be considered as pending when the consideration of the conference report is resumed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the pending question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have submitted a motion that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 277.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator's motion will be in order when the conference report again comes up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Ohio when the motion of the Senator from Delaware is disposed of. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-one minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of the Committee on Public Lands, I report back adversely the bill (H. R. 7499) to grant to the city of Port Angeles, State of Washington, certain lands within the town site of Port Angeles, Wash., for cemetery purposes. The bill is reported adversely thereon because the same matter has been passed upon in the sundry civil appropriation bill. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

He also, from the committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2307) to require the prompt prosecution and speedy determination of the claim of the United States against the estate of the late Leland Stanford; which was read twice by its title.

COMMISSIONERS OF TERRITORIAL COURTS.

Mr. PLATT. From the Judiciary Committee I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 4605) granting chief justices of United States courts in Territories power to appoint commissioners to take proof in land cases, etc. I ask for the present consideration of the bill. It is short, and will, I think, create no debate, and it is important that it shall be passed at the present session.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the United States commissioners who have been, or may hereafter be, appointed by Territorial courts or judges thereof shall have and may exercise all the powers now conferred, or that may hereafter be conferred by law, upon commissioners of United States circuit courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill prescribing the powers of commissioners appointed by Territorial courts or judges thereof."

Mr. PLATT. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. PUGH, Mr. HILL, and Mr. PLATT were appointed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to report a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate, what revision of, or amendments to, the rules, if any, should be adopted to secure a more efficient and satisfactory disposition of the business of the Senate; and for this purpose the said Committee on Rules is authorized to sit during the coming vacation, and any expense incident thereto shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. I wish the Senator from Kentucky would add one amendment to the resolution, that the committee shall also report to the Senate a code of joint rules for the government of the two bodies.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the committee should deem it expedient?

Mr. FRYE. If they should deem it expedient.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am entirely in favor of such an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. HILL. I hope the resolution will be passed without objection on the part of anyone. It is very necessary.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to suggest to my colleague upon the Committee on Rules that as his resolution creates a charge upon the contingent fund of the Senate——

Mr. BLACKBURN. It will have to go the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. HARRIS. It necessarily must go to that committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that that reference be made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

PIER AT MOUTH OF CHICAGO RIVER.

Mr. CULLOM. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 6038) to repeal House resolution No. 104, first session Fifty-first Congress, granting to Secretary of War a permit to license to use a pier at mouth of Chicago River. It is a brief bill, and I ask that it be considered at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; let it be read. It is a short bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. CULLOM. This bill is recommended by the Secretary of War. I desire to state that it pertains exclusively to the question of leasing a pier extending into the Chicago River. The Secretary of War was authorized to lease it under an act of Congress passed in 1890. The people of Chicago, and I think the shipping interests generally of the lakes, are opposed to the act, and the Secretary of War has never exercised the authority granted to him under it, except that a lease has been made to the Western Seamen's Friend Society for the use of a part of a pier. That privilege is excepted in the bill. So I think there can be no objection to the measure.

Mr. COCKRELL. For what length of time does that lease continue?

Mr. CULLOM. It is not stated, I think. The Chief of Engineers says in a report to the Secretary of War:

The use of a part of the outer 225 feet of this pier, which projects into water beyond the Illinois Central Railroad Company's dock, has been granted to the Western Seamen's Friend Society by the Secretary of War for a sailors' snug harbor, refuge, or home, but not yet used.

Mr. FRYE. These leases are made for an indefinite length of time, with the right reserved on the part of the Secretary of War to rescind them.

Mr. CULLOM. Both the Secretary of War and Gen. Casey desire that that permit shall not be interfered with. Otherwise they are absolutely in favor of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPUTY CORONER FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1007) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint a deputy coroner, and for other purposes, to report it favorably without amendment, and as this is a very urgent matter, and it will take but a moment to pass the bill, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RANSOM introduced a bill (S. 2303) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Contentnea Creek at Grifton, Lenoir County, N. C., and to establish it as a post-road; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PASCO introduced a bill (S. 2304) to establish a term of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Ocala, in the southern judicial district of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 2305) to provide for the collection and disposal of garbage and dead animals in the District of Columbia, etc.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PEFFER introduced a bill (S. 2306) for the relief of settlers on public lands lying in the semiarid regions; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. PEFFER. Inasmuch as the bill concerns a matter of great importance and is quite brief, I ask that it be read in full.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas, by reason of long continued drought and heat in the semiarid regions of the United States, large numbers of settlers on the public lands are occasionally obliged to leave their homes temporarily in order to support their families, thus jeopardizing their titles to the lands they occupy: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the laws of the United States so far as they are applicable to public lands lying between the meridians of 22° and 30° of longitude west from the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, be and they are hereby so amended as to allow settlers to make final proof and entry of their homesteads at the end of two years continuous settlement and improvement, under and subject to such rules and regulations of the Interior Department as are now in force or may be hereafter prescribed to prevent fraud.

SEC. 2. That provisions of this act shall apply to cases of settlers now on such lands, as well as to those who may hereafter make settlement.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and I wish to say through the Senate to that committee that there are now large numbers of people resident upon homesteads in the semiarid region and that by reason of long-continued and excessive dry weather during this year and also during a portion of last year many of them will be compelled temporarily to leave their homes, and to that extent they of course jeopard their titles to their claims. This condition extends over a very large tract of country north and south, and through a stretch perhaps 150 miles in width, and it is a great hardship upon those people.

I have here a petition which I want to have go with the bill to the committee. It is a petition signed by 194 citizens, most of them homesteaders, of one county in Northwestern Kansas—Sherman County—in which they set forth their present condition. The petitioners refer in the petition to their own county, and they state that during the present year and during last year their crops have been largely a failure, and they ask for legislation of this kind. In behalf of them and thousands of other persons similarly situated, I ask that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands with the bill, and I hope the bill will be given early attention.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill, with the accompanying petition, will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BATE introduced a bill (S. 2308) for the relief of Juan S. Hart, administrator of Simeon Hart, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

STATE, COUNTY, AND MUNICIPAL TAXES.

Mr. HOAR was, on his own motion, excused from further service on the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 6284) to prevent interference in the collection of State, county, and municipal taxes assessed against corporations and corporate property, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT was, by unanimous consent, authorized to appoint a conferee on the part of the Senate in place of Mr. HOAR, and Mr. PLATT was appointed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Calendar for immediate consideration the bill (S. 1453) for the transfer of a portion of the exhibit of the Department of State at the World's Columbian Exposition to the Columbian Museum of Chicago.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was willing to yield for morning business, but before we proceed with any cases on the Calendar I must insist in disposing of the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill. It is absolutely necessary and essential that the report of the conference committee shall be acted on.

RECENT ELECTION IN ALABAMA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to morning business. The resolution which I offered proposing an investigation of the Alabama election, inasmuch as the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has not yet returned, I ask may go over, and that it be considered as a part of the morning business to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none.

BRIDGE OVER CONTENTNEA CREEK, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2303) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Contentnea Creek, at Grifton, Lenoir County, N. C., and to establish it as a post-road, to report it favorably without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted this day by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], to report it favorably, without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate what revision of, or amendments to, the rules, if any, should be adopted to secure a more efficient and satisfactory disposition of the business of the Senate, and for this purpose the said Committee on Rules is authorized to sit during the coming vacation, and any expense incident thereto shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and report also a code of joint rules for the government of the two Houses, if, in their opinion, it is expedient to do so.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does it require unanimous consent to take up the resolution for consideration at this time?

Mr. COCKRELL. It does.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent, the Chair will state.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I object to the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the resolution will go over under the rule.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

Mr. PALMER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7574,) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," approved June 27, 1890, to report it favorably without amendment. The bill is of very great importance, and if it will not interfere with the order of business the Senator from Missouri has in charge, I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the bill lead to any discussion?

Mr. PALMER. I think not.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of an act entitled "An act granting pension to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," approved June 27, 1890, be so amended to read as follows:

SEC. 3. If any officer or enlisted man who served ninety days or more in the Army or Navy of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, and who was honorably discharged, has died, or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow without other means of support than her daily labor, or minor children under the age of 16 years, or a child or children who then are, or shall subsequently, prior to attaining the age of 16, become insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, such widow shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his military or naval service, be placed upon the pension roll from the date of the application therefor under this act, at the rate of $8 per month during her widowhood, and shall also be paid $2 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under 16 years of age, and also for each insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless child of such officer or enlisted man, of whom she has the care and custody, irrespective of age; and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children as above described, or if such soldier or sailor left no widow, such pension shall be paid to such child or children until the age of 16, and, to such insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless children, the pension, whether heretofore granted or hereafter to be granted either under this or any former statute, shall continue during the life of such children or during the period of such disability: Provided, That such condition of insanity, idiocy, or permanent helplessness shall have originated and existed prior to the arrival of such child or children at the age of 16 years: And provided further, That said widow shall have married said soldier or sailor prior to the 27th day of June, 1890: And provided further, That in case of the death of a soldier or sailor herein described from causes not chargeable to his service in the Army or Navy, leaving a widow to whom he was married subsequent to the 27th day of June, 1890, and leaving, by a former marriage, a child or children under the age of 16 years, or insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, such child or children shall be pensioned in like form and manner as if no widow had survived. All pensions under this section shall commence from the date of filing the application therefor."

Mr. HARRIS. Let the remainder of the bill be printed in the RECORD as though it had been read, and let the bill go over. It seems to be an amendment of the general pension laws, and ought to be looked to and not railroaded through in this way.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is the bill not reported from the Committee on Pensions, I ask the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HARRIS. It is reported from the committee, I understand.

Mr. PALMER. It is reported from the Committee on Pensions, and has been very carefully considered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will allow it to go through. We want to do all the business——

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill go to the Calendar. I want an opportunity to look at it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Time is short, I will say to the Senator, and we are going home in a few days——

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know that time is short. The time is as long as we choose to make it so far as that matter is concerned. But the bill will go over for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

LONG ISLAND LIFE-SAVING STATION.

Mr. RANSOM. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 387) to authorize the construction of a life-saving station at or near Rocky Point or East Marion, Long Island, N. Y., to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. If it leads to any discussion I must object.

Mr. RANSOM. I will withdraw the bill if it does.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill may be considered, and that the report be concurred in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the conference report. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. The conferees on the part of the Senate and House reported a disagreement on amendment No. 11, which relates to public buildings in Cheyenne, Boise City, Helena and Spokane; upon amendment No. 110, which is the Ford's Theater disaster amendment, as it is called; upon amendment No. 118, which relates to the quarantine station at Southport, N. C.; upon amendment No. 119, which relates to the quarantine station at the mouth of the Columbia River; upon amendments Nos. 127, 128, 133, and 134, which relate to the electric lights in the Senate, about which there will probably be no disagreement in the future; upon amendment No. 145 for the resurvey of lands in Grant and Hooker Counties, Nebr.; upon amendment No. 238 relating to the appropriation for the dry dock at Puget Sound; upon amendment No. 261, relating to the Bureau of American Republics; upon amendment No. 270, relating to the librarian in the law library of Congress; upon amendment No. 277, relating to the Government Printing Office site; upon amendments Nos. 278 and 279, relating to the Atlanta Exposition; and upon amendment No. 280, in regard to arid lands.

In regard to the arid-lands amendment the House have proposed a substitute, and in regard to the Government Printing Office the House have proposed a substitute. They propose to recede from their disagreement to the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out the Senate amendment and substituting another. It is the same way with reference to amendments No. 278 and No. 279, relating to the Atlanta Exposition.

I ask that the conference report may be concurred in, and then the question in regard to the amendments disagreed to will come up.

Mr. DUBOIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri what became of Senate amendment No. 11, I think it is.

Mr. COCKRELL. That I stated as the first item of disagreement. That was disagreed to and is still disagreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. If a vote is now taken on the amendments that were agreed to it will leave the disputed amendments open.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want the Senate simply to concur in the report of the committee of conference, and that settles the amendments which have been agreed to in conference, and leaves all the others open.

Mr. SHERMAN. To that I have no objection at all.

Mr. HILL. I desire to know what becomes of the amendment of the Senate relating to one month's extra pay for the employés.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was agreed to be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the conference report.

Mr. CHANDLER. I notice that the item for the Bureau of American Republics is one upon which there is a disagreement.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is amendment No. 261, and is in disagreement.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that that amendment was reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, and it is very important that that amount or some portion of it shall be granted if that Bureau is to be maintained in accordance with the existing understanding with the other American republics.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I wish to occupy the attention of the Senate for a single moment. When this bill was under consideration in the Senate I made certain inquiries concerning the paragraph to be found on page 102, which reads as follows:

Support and medical treatment of destitute patients: For the support and medical treatment of ninety-five medical and surgical patients who are destitute, in the city of Washington, under a contract to be made with the Providence Hospital by the Surgeon-General of the Army, $19,000.

I inquired how it happened that it required $19,000 to take care in that hospital of ninety-five medical and surgical patients, using the precise language of the bill. I further inquired concerning that item, how it happened that the General Government was required to pay this entire appropriation, why it was not, as in similar appropriations, arranged that the treasury of the District should pay one-half and the Treasury of the United States one-half.

No direct answer was made to my inquiry; but a day or two after, at a time when I was necessarily absent from the Chamber, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] made a statement to the Senate in reference to this matter, somewhat criticising the language I had used. I understand he made the statement at the request of the authorities of the Providence Hospital. I do not find fault with anything that was said by the Senator from Ohio, but I want now to say, inasmuch as I have received a great many letters concerning this matter, and there seems to be very peculiar sensitiveness somewhere in regard to it, that I was not mistaken in making the inquiry, basing it upon the language of the bill itself, "for the support and medical treatment of ninety-five medical and surgical patients."

As I understand the matter, instead of ninety-five patients being cared for, the hospital provides ninety-five free beds for the treatment of medical and surgical patients, which is a very different matter altogether. If that language had been used in the proposed act, and it had said "for the maintenance of ninety-five free beds for destitute medical and surgical patients," I never would have made the inquiry I did.

I am still of opinion, Mr President, that requiring the General Government to pay this entire amount both to that hospital and to the Garfield Memorial Hospital is a dangerous departure from the custom of the Government heretofore, and which it has applied in the matter of appropriations for the other hospitals and charities of the District.

This is all I care to say upon the matter. However, I wish to say one word in reference to an amendment that was put upon the bill on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], providing $2,600 for an elevator in the Home for Incurables, but which I find has been stricken out by the conferees. It is just possible that Senators generally have little knowledge of the Home for Incurables in the District of Columbia. The building is situated on Georgetown Heights, directly back of the beautiful residence of Mr. Blount. The land was donated by a charitable lady whose name, I think, up to the present time has been withheld from the public.

Money was collected to construct the building, and a board of directors, largely, I think, composed of ladies, one of them being the daughter of a distinguished Senator, have looked after the poor people who are sent there to die. They have never asked nor received one penny either from the General Government nor from the funds of the District of Columbia; and when they come here upon the presentation of a case as made by the Senator from Alabama, asking a pittance of $2,600 to put an elevator in that beautiful charity so that the patients on the second and third floors may be permitted the privilege of stepping upon the ground a few times before they leave earth, it strikes me as being a very remarkable circumstance that the conferees on the part of the Senate agreed to allow that item to go out of the bill.

I am not going to make any motion concerning it. I apprehend that all the matters connected with the hospitals and charitable institutions of the District will be reviewed before another Congress, and I hope that in the future appropriations made by Congress the Home for Incurables will not be ignored, as it certainly has been ignored by the action of the conferees upon the bill under consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, one word. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will see that these items are brought up for consideration in connection with the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will gladly do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was the principal point made in this case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 277, which provides for purchasing a site for the Government Printing Office.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 277. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. COCKRELL. The House of Representatives agreed to recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment with an amendment; and I ask that the amendment agreed to by the House of Representatives may now be read. Then the Senate will see what is before it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to its being read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 277 to the said bill and agrees to the same with an amendment, in which said amendment the concurrence of the Senate is requested, as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That in order to procure a suitable site for a building to be used as a Government Printing Office the Secretary of the Treasury and the Public Printer are hereby authorized and directed to purchase from the owners thereof the following described real estate, situate in Washington City, D. C., namely: Beginning at the southeast corner of square 624, at the intersection of North G street and North Capitol street, thence running north 175 feet 3 inches, to an alley 30 feet wide, running east and west through said square 624; thence west along the south line of said alley 336 feet to a point immediately south of the southwest corner of the site of the Government Printing Office, as now located; thence directly south to a point on the northern side of North G street, and thence east along the southern boundary of said square on North G street to the place of beginning, except an alley 16 feet wide running north and south from the alley 30 feet wide, hereinbefore named, to North G street, which alley is hereby declared to be closed, and shall be appropriated and used as a part of the site of the building to be located on said real estate.

In case the Secretary of the Treasury and the Public Printer shall, within thirty days after the passage of this act, be unable to purchase this land at a reasonable price, they shall make application by petition to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, at any general or special term thereof, for the condemnation of such land and for the ascertainment of its value. Such petition shall contain a particular description of the property, with the names of the owner or owners and their residences, so far as the same can be ascertained, together with a description of the land proposed to be condemned, and thereupon the said court is authorized and required to cite all such owners and all other persons interested to appear in said court within a reasonable time to answer the said petition; and if it shall appear to the court that there are any owners or other persons interested who are under legal disability, the court shall cause public notice to be given of the time at which the said court will proceed with the matter of condemnation; and at such time, if it shall appear that there are any persons under disability who have either appeared or not appeared, the court shall appoint guardians ad litem for each of such persons, and the court shall thereupon proceed to appoint three capable and disinterested commissioners to appraise the value of the respective interests of all persons named in plaintiff's petition. Such commissioners shall thereupon, after being duly sworn for the proper performance of their duties, examine the premises sought to be condemned and hear the persons in interest who may appear before them and ascertain their appraisement of the value of the interests of all persons respectively in such land; and when such report shall have been confirmed by the court, the President of the United States shall, if he thinks the public interest requires it, cause payment to be made to the respective persons entitled, according to the judgment of the court, and in case any of such persons are under legal disability, or can not be found, or neglect to receive payment, the money due to them shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to their credit, unless there shall be persons lawfully authorized to receive the same under the direction of the court; and when such payments are so made, or the amounts belonging to persons to whom payment shall not be made are so deposited, the real estate described in the petition shall be deemed to be condemned, and taken by the United States for public use.

The sum of $250,000, appropriated by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1890, is hereby reappropriated and made available, and in addition thereto the sum of $75,000, or any part thereof, appropriated in this act for the repairs of the present Government Printing Office building, are hereby made available, together with the further sum of $51,000, for the purchase of said land and the erection of a building or buildings thereon for the use of the Government Printing Office and for each and every purpose connected with the construction of such building or buildings.

The Chief of Engineers of the Army is hereby authorized and directed, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Public Printer, during the present fiscal year, to erect a building or buildings for the use of the Government Printing Office, plans for which are to be prepared by him, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Public Printer.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to inquire what it is that has been read?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] asks the Senate to agree to the proposition made by the House of Representatives in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senate numbered 277, which was passed upon by the House of Representatives, although it was not put in formally after the disagreement occurred. I am satisfied that the proper way to dispose of this matter is to drop it from the conference report. It is a great abuse on the part of the Committee on Appropriations and also on the part of the two Houses to put in appropriation bills long legislative provisions; and that remark applies to either the proposition of the Senate or the proposition of the House of Representatives on this subject. It is very common now to insert long legislative provisions in appropriation bills; it is a habit which has grown up very largely of late years, although it has always existed more or less.

The appropriation for the purchase of what is called the Mahone tract was adopted by a very large majority of the Senate, and the identical proposition which is now presented to us has been rejected by the Senate. So that the House is definitely in favor of one proposition and the Senate is definitely in favor of another. It would seem to me, therefore, that it is but right and proper under the circumstances to drop both propositions at this time and allow this important sundry civil appropriation bill to pass and become a law without this controversy interfering with it.

I am glad to notice that the Committee on Appropriations have inserted a provision for improving the present building so that it may be put in a safe and secure condition, and that the Public Printer is authorized, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, to rent necessary buildings for the use of the Printing Office, and that $75,000 has been appropriated for those purposes. I am told by the Senator having charge of the bill that that amount has been reduced to $60,000, or something like that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will ascertain in a moment and inform the Senator. He refers to amendment numbered 276.

Mr. SHERMAN. At all events, ample provision is made by a specific sum to protect the present Printing Office against danger from fire or against falling. There has been great fear expressed by the officers in charge of the Printing Office and by many of the people who work there that the building is unsafe and may fall at any time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will state to the Senator that the appropriation was finally agreed to as put in by the Senate of $75,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. So that there is no haste now and the $75,000 is to be disbursed under the charge of the Chief Engineer of the Army, and no doubt the present building can be put in a condition of safety.

I am utterly opposed to the proposition of the House of Representatives, and I am surprised that there should be any favor shown either in the House or in the Senate for a building upon the old site, a crowded locality, surrounded by buildings. Several buildings will have to be torn down in order that the ground may be occupied again by other buildings, and it will be in a narrow, cramped place, insufficient in extent.

Whether the Mahone lot, or what is called the baseball lot, or the lot near the Capitol is taken, some place ought to be taken which is entirely detached, and not surrounded by other buildings. So I think it would be a great deal better to leave this matter entirely to the judgment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and have them consider it. Therefore I move that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 277.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Ohio spoke of the Senate having voted amendment numbered 277 into the bill by a very large majority. The Senate sometimes changes its mind. In the first session of the Fiftieth Congress the Senate inserted upon a deficiency appropriation bill a provision for the selection of ground around the Public Printing Office the same as the amendment now proposed by the House, and insisted upon it, but the House would not agree to it. Again, in the second session of the Fiftieth Congress, the Senate by a decisive majority agreed to another amendment on the sundry civil appropriation bill to select the ground around the present Government Printing Office for the completion of the necessary buildings for the accommodation of the Public Printer. We twice insisted upon that proposition, but finally had to yield.

The Senate subsequently changed its mind and selected another location. The House of Representatives has now come back to the original proposition which the Senate made. I think it is a very wise and just conclusion to which the House has come. It has agreed to select the ground around the present Government Printing Office so as to have all the buildings together.

The controversy will arise, if we recede from this amendment, what will become of the House amendment? Will it fall? The Senator doubtless means that it shall fall; and I do not say that that will not be the effect, for I think it will be the effect. If the Senate amendment is disagreed to the entire provision is stricken out. So that the question comes before the Senate purely as to whether the Senate will accept the amendment of the House of Representatives and locate the Printing Office on the lands adjoining the present site, or whether we shall insist on purchasing the Mahone lot, as it is called, in order to renew the struggle again and keep the question open for all eternity.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I think I can discuss this question without the slightest personal feeling in the world. I have nothing but the kindliest sentiments toward Gen. Mahone. I admire the persistency with which he has pursued his object in regard to this matter. If it were an original question I might support the purchase of the Mahone lot, that is to say, if the Government had no printing office location and owned no property which could be used for that purpose now.

I have endeavored, as I said to the Senate before, as the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to look upon this question simply as I would look upon a question of business for myself. I do not think that I have a right to use the money of the people in order to subserve the personal objects or aims of anybody.

A good deal can be said for the Mahone lot and a good deal against it, but one thing is absolutely certain—and I told the Senate so when this matter was up before—we can agree upon nothing except upon the proposition that is now before the Senate. I mean the House amendment.

I found from the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds—I can speak of this, because it is a joint committee—that they were unalterably opposed to the purchase of the Mahone lot. A majority of them were also opposed to improving the present site of the Printing Office. They finally offered to us a proposition to purchase the lot upon which the Senate stables and the engine house are located, just below the Capitol. That was rejected by the Senate, and so we are remitted to the single question of whether we shall compromise upon the improvement of the present site, where the Government already owns more than 60,000 square feet of property, and where it has a building, a part of which can be used efficiently for the purposes of a printing office, or allow this matter to remain open for another ten years, as it has been for ten years past. That is the whole question.

The Senator from Ohio raises the point that this is general legislation on an appropriation bill. The Senator ought to have raised that point the other day when he and others by their votes inserted a provision for the purchase of the Mahone lot in this same appropriation bill. But, Mr. President, that question ought not to be raised, in view of the facts which surround this case. I have letters in my possession, one of them published in the report made by me as chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, from Mr. Palmer, the former Public Printer, in which he declared that the H street wing of the present building was unsafe and imperiled life day by day and night by night.

I have another letter from the present Public Printer, Mr. Benedict, in which he repeats the statement, and says he will not be responsible if that building is left in its present condition. We have spent thousands of dollars in trying to make it safe. I have gone over it from top to bottom, and I know we have braced it with iron girders and with all kinds of contrivances and means; yet under the working of the heavy machinery and the rush by employés, which may take place at any time to that part of the building, great loss of life may occur any day. Do we want another such scandal as we had in regard to the old Ford's Theater which fell? Do we want Congress again lampooned and public officers indicted for murder?

Mr. President, it is not a personal question; it is a question of plain, common business sense. We can by the present expenditure of $75,000 prevent in the course of eight or twelve months, as Gen. Casey informs me, any danger; we can at the same time perfect the plan for a large Printing Office suitable to this Government, and we can do it as a private man would do it, upon business principles, by using property which we already own. The employés of the Government Printing Office are located all around this building. That is one inducement to accept the House amendment.

The Senator from Ohio tells us that it would be putting the Public Printing Office into a narrow and cramped place. I have been with the Joint Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds over that square, and know that we can obtain all the ground we want at reasonable prices, with wide streets upon three sides; for five or six thousand dollars more, to give us an open space of 40 or 50 feet upon the other side.

The present Printing Office is located in a part of the city entirely healthy, whatever may be said to the contrary. It is conveniently located, because it can be but a very short time until there will be a railroad on North Capitol street, and then there will be direct access between the Capitol and the Printing Office.

Sir, I have no more doubt that the proper thing for Congress to do now is to adopt the proposition of the House of Representatives than I have in regard to my own existence.

What will be the result if this amendment is rejected? The question will be left open; Congress adjourns in a few weeks, at any rate, if not in a few days, and this standing scandal and reproach upon the Government of the United States will be left here. Is it possible that we are to add to the charge of incapacity, already so freely made, the shameful one that we are unable to provide a Printing Office for the employés of the Government of the United States, in the face of what is known to every intelligent man that by day and night we are in danger of bringing upon ourselves the charge of a crime because we leave that building in its present condition?

I have done and said all I could. I have foregone personal feeling and personal association, and withstood personal appeal in order to do what I honestly believe is the duty of Congress in this present conjuncture, and I appeal to Senators to look at the facts as they stare us in the face and to do the only thing which is possible to be done to give immediate relief at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have put myself on record so often in favor of the amendment which has come to us on this bill, indorsed by the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives, that perhaps it is unnecessary for me to add a single word; and yet I shall detain the Senate a moment by recalling to their attention once more the advantages which the present proposition has over any other proposition which has been presented to Congress, and the urgent necessity of some action, not next year, but this moment, that Congress and the country may be saved from what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has properly characterized as a possible crime.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] calls attention to the fact that the Senate had passed favorably by a large majority the proposition to purchase the so-called Mahone lot, while the House of Representatives had taken different grounds and had advocated some different proposition. The House of Representatives, Mr. President, has heretofore put itself in opposition not only to the Mahone lot, but I think in opposition to the enlargement of the existing plant, and through its committee of the present Congress recommended that the Government Printing Office should be located upon one of the public reservations, something which I apprehend Congress would never permit to become an accomplished fact. The House of Representatives has receded from that contention and has consented to an appropriation for the purchase of ground adjacent to the existing printing house, so that we may get speedy relief from the emergency and the imminent danger which exist to the lives of the 3,000 men and women employed in that great workshop.

The present Public Printer in a recent interview called attention to the danger which surrounds the employés in the printing house. The employés themselves have petitioned Congress for relief, setting forth in language more eloquent and more impressive than I can use, not only the necessity but the duty of Congress to come to their rescue.

I have heretofore called attention to the fact that on the point of economy no proposition has ever been presented to Congress which compares with the proposition to purchase land adjacent to the present printing house.

I shall not say that if I could see relief possible, within the next year even, in the direction of a magnificent printing house on a great square of ground which would compare, for instance, with the Congressional Library which is being erected, I should not be willing to vote for the motion of the Senator from Ohio and defer this matter a single year; but the attitude of the House of Representatives and the divided sentiment of the Senate persuade me to believe that unless we make some provision this year in this bill for a printing house the matter will be delayed very likely a great many years to come.

The House of Representatives has come to the position which a very respectable minority of the Senate held when the vote was taken a few weeks ago. There is a chance now for an agreement between the two Houses; there is a chance to obtain relief in a direction which is recommended by at least two Public Printers—the one now in possession of the office and the one who has recently retired; a site recommended by the present accomplished foreman of printing, who knows more about the Printing Office than any other man living and who has as deep an interest in this matter as any man can possibly have; a site which I know commends itself to the practical printers of the city of Washington and to the men directly connected with the Government Printing Office. We have there nearly $300,000 worth of property, as good as money can construct, which will be saved if we make this appropriation.

It seems to me that good business judgment; it seems to me that the dictates of common sense; it seems to me that the demands of humanity, so far as the employés are concerned, call upon us to-day to recede from the position which we have heretofore held and agree with the House of Representatives in making this appropriation for this very desirable purpose.

Mr. President, I can not add anything to what was so forcibly said by the Senator from Missouri; I can not add much to what I have heretofore said on this question, which touches my heart very deeply, and which appeals to my sense of justice and of humanity as has no question which has come before the Senate during my term of service heretofore. I hope the motion of the Senator from Ohio will not receive a majority vote of the Senate, and that we may agree with the House of Representatives in making this appropriation and in relieving ourselves from the stigma which already rests upon us, in refusing to these 3,000 men and women the protection which they have a right to demand from us, protection to their lives and to every interest which is dear to humanity.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, if I understand the parliamentary status of the pending question it is this: In the sundry civil appropriation bill the Senate incorporated an amendment proposing to purchase a given plot of ground as a site for the Government Printing Office. The bill went to the House of Representatives with that and many other amendments, and that House amended this particular amendment by agreeing with the Senate that they would in this bill select a site for a Printing Office, but designating and prescribing and proposing to take another and a different lot. In that condition of affairs the bill went to conference; it comes back from the conference committee, and, if I understand the pending question, it is upon the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that the Senate recede from its amendment upon the printing lot question. If that be the parliamentary status of the question, I propose to raise a question of order upon the motion of the Senator from Ohio. Is that the parliamentary status, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). That is the question, as the Chair understands it.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well. Then I raise the question of order that when the House has amended the Senate amendment and the bill has gone into conference, in that condition the Senate can not dispose of the House amendment by simply receding from its original amendment to the sundry civil bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The conference committee of the House of Representatives have never acted upon this proposition. The House of Representatives have expressed an opinion. That is all. There is no amendment pending to the proposition in the formal sense of the word "amendment."

Mr. HARRIS. It is a fact, however, that the House of Representatives amended the Senate amendment. Is that not true?

Mr. SHERMAN. No amendment has been offered to it, as I understand.

Mr. HARRIS. Then, does the Senator from Ohio deny that the House amended the Senate amendment by designating another and a different lot for the Printing Office site.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do say so, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who sits near the Senator from Tennessee, and who has charge of the bill, stated substantially the same. This is an amendment which has not been acted upon by the conference. Therefore, in order to remove the dispute from the conference, I propose on behalf of the Senate that the Senate recede from the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. As the conference report is at the desk let the Secretary read the action of the House of Representatives in respect to the Senate amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. That has been done in full already. However, it may be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 277 to the said bill and agrees to the same with an amendment, in which said amendment the concurrence of the Senate is requested, as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that amendment has not been presented to or been acted upon by the conferees. The matter is entirely open between the conferees. No action has been taken by the conferees upon the subject and it is still pending in that position. The Senate has an unquestionable right to recede. It has been done over and over again.

Mr. HARRIS. It is an amendment with an amendment which is reported by the conference committee. Is not that the status of it?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. HARRIS. If it be the action of the House, amending a Senate amendment, I assert with absolute confidence that the Senate can not dispose of the House amendment to its amendment by the method suggested by the motion of the Senator from Ohio. If it be an amendment proposed by the conference committee, then it is a matter within the discretion of a majority of the Senate. I should be glad to ascertain the exact fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that as the Chair understands the proposition the sundry civil bill passed the other House; it came to the Senate, and an amendment was put upon it providing for the purchase of a certain lot. The bill went back to the House of Representatives, and the House agreed to the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Chair will pardon me, the House agreed to the amendment by striking it all out and inserting something else.

Mr. HARRIS. That is an amendment to a Senate amendment, and the Senate can not dispose of the House amendment by simply undertaking to recede from the amendment to which the House has attached an amendment. There is an authority in Jefferson's Manual——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state, if the Senator from Tennessee will permit, that the Chair understands that the House agreed to the Senate amendment with an amendment. Then the question would be upon agreeing or disagreeing to the House amendment and not upon receding. The Chair is of opinion——

Mr. ALLISON. I am not very familiar with the rules, but I do not see how the House can agree to an amendment by striking it out. That seems to be an anomaly. It can not agree to an amendment by striking it out and putting on the bill a proposition entirely different.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to suggest to him how I think the House can do exactly that thing? The Senate amendment presents a new feature, a new subject-matter, and the Senate incorporates it in a House bill. The House agrees to it to the extent of saying "This is a proper subject-matter to be dealt with in the bill, and by the bill, and we submit an amendment which designates another and a different lot to be selected in place of the one the Senate amendment selects."

made by the Senator from Tennessee. The conferees themselves have reported a disagreement upon amendment numbered 277. The action of the other House has not yet been presented to the conferees. I ask for the reading of the report of the committee of conference, where it states distinctly the action of the conferees on amendment numbered 277.

Mr. HARRIS. I quite understand. The Secretary need not read from the report to establish the fact that this is a question of disagreement between the two Houses. But the Senator from Ohio can not remove the disagreement by undertaking to recede from a Senate amendment that has been stricken out and a different lot selected by a House amendment, which is the only question now pending before the conferees of the two Houses.

Mr. SHERMAN. While these amendments are pending between the two Houses, either House can recede. The right is inherent in a legislative body, if a proposition which it has made is disagreed to or some substitute offered, to recede from that proposition and say, "if you will not agree to it, well and good."

Mr. HARRIS. Either House may recede from its own amendment, but the amendment of the Senate is not now a pending question before the conferees, except so far as it presents the issue between the two lots. The Senate can not recede from the House amendment. The Senate has no power over that amendment except to agree to it, or disagree to it, or amend it. The Senator from Ohio proposes to recede from the origin of this question, when the matter has advanced a step beyond his power to control it, except by such compromise as a committee of conference may agree to, and as the two Houses may agree to. He can not get rid of the question by a motion to recede from the Senate amendment, which was the original starting point and the beginning of this question.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I desire to state what I understand to be the parliamentary condition of the matter. The Senate placed in the bill an amendment proposing to purchase the Mahone lot. The House disagreed to the amendment. The disagreement was submitted to a conference, and the conference committee has reported a disagreement as to this amendment. The bill is in the possession of the Senate, and being in the possession of the Senate, and the report of the conference committee being of a disagreement as to this amendment, the matter is before the Senate, it appears to me, for its action.

The action of the House upon this amendment was not submitted by the conference committee. It comes here as a separate proposition. It had not been read to the Senate when the Senator from Ohio moved to recede from the Senate amendment to the bill, a motion which I claim was in order, the bill being before the Senate by a report of the conference committee disagreeing to the amendment.

Now, if we admit the right of the House, which I think is extremely doubtful, acting by itself and not through the report of a conference committee, to entirely change a Senate amendment and send it as a separate proposition to the Senate for its action, it does not necessarily follow that such consideration has to precede the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

That motion was in order the moment the Senate conferees had reported a disagreement as to the amendment under consideration. The communication from the House of Representatives was not read to the Senate until the Senator from Ohio made his motion and it was under discussion. To hold that a member of the Senate would be precluded from moving that the Senate shall recede from its amendment, because the House has taken some action concerning the amendment independent of the conference committee and communicated it to the Senate, it seems to me is not correct.

Mr. PLATT. Amendment numbered 277 to the sundry civil bill was put in by the Senate and was disagreed to by the other House. Then the bill went into conference. The conferees agreed on certain amendments, but disagreed as to that amendment of the Senate. The conference report then went to the other House, and the House accepted the report and undertook to amend the bill in a different way from what the Senate had amended it. In other words, they undertook to strike out of the bill the amendment which the Senate had put in the bill and to insert the amendments which they propose. I insist that that can not be done by the House in the present stage of the bill. The only way in which the Senate amendment can be shifted around into another amendment is through the action of a conference committee recommending it and the report of the conference committee being concurred in by both Houses.

I do not believe that the House had any right to do what they have done, to strike out the Senate amendment. How could they do it? They could disagree to the amendment, but they could not strike it out and put in another amendment. The only way that that is ever done in Congress is through the action of a conference committee recommending to both Houses that it be done, and both Houses then concurring in the report of the conference committee. But whether that be so or not——

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Connecticut knows that a conference report can not be amended in either House.

Mr. PLATT. This is not an attempt to amend a conference report. The conferees have disagreed; they are unable to agree as to a Senate amendment.

Mr. FRYE. It is an attempt to amend the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Then when the bill got into the other House the House struck out the Senate amendment and put in an amendment of their own.

Mr. FRYE. That is another matter.

Mr. PLATT. That is, they said they agreed to the Senate amendment with another amendment, which was an entirely different affair, and proposed to purchase another lot of land upon which the building should be erected. I do not believe that can be done. But whether it can be done or not, the Senator from Ohio moves to recede from the Senate amendment, and I believe that is a perfectly proper way to dispose of the whole matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the sundry civil bill passed the House of Representatives and came to the Senate. An amendment was placed upon it providing for the purchase of a certain lot for a Government Printing Office. The bill went back to the House. There was a general disagreement to all of the Senate amendments, and the bill and amendments went into conference. After the conferees had been in session, the bill was reported back to the House, and the amendment now under consideration was offered in the House as an amendment to the Senate amendment. The Speaker put the question as follows, as shown by the RECORD:

> The question now is on the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to it with an amendment which he has offered.

Thereupon the House did recede from its disagreement and agreed to the amendment with an amendment. The Chair thinks it was entirely competent for the House to do that, and that the question is upon agreeing or disagreeing to the House amendment. After the House has amended the Senate amendment the Senate can not recede from its own amendment and thereby avoid a vote either on agreeing or disagreeing to the House amendment. The Chair therefore thinks the motion to recede is not in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. The parliamentary question is on insisting upon the amendment. If this technical point is made, and I think this is the first time it has been made in the parliamentary history of this or any other country, I will move an amendment to the pending motion that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House except as to the amendment numbered 277.

I desire the question to be put in that way. The Senator from Missouri, I understand, moves that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the further conference asked by the House. That is the only form in which the matter can be put. Now, instead of that I move that we insist upon all the amendments except amendment numbered 277. We certainly have that right. The Senate of the United States is an equal deliberative body. We have the right to assist in making laws. We have the right to make propositions to the other House. We have made a proposition to the House of Representatives and they have declined it. Another proposition, entirely different, is proposed to be adopted. If we are denied the privilege of withdrawing our own amendment, then as a matter of course there is no free conference to be had.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and accede to the request of the House of Representatives for a further conference.

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose to amend the motion by moving that the Senate insist upon all of its amendments except amendment numbered 277.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, the Senator from Ohio does not want that amendment to go into conference.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want that amendment to go into conference.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator desires a separate vote on that amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Allow me to say one further word upon the question, for it is a most important one. Let me illustrate it by the tariff bill. The Senate made 634 amendments to the House bill. The report of the conference committee was of an entire disagreement. Is it claimed that when that proposed legislation went to the other House the House could have gone to work and amended every amendment of the Senate in that condition of the bill?

There was but one question before the House, and that was whether it would agree or disagree to the amendments of the Senate. It can not be true that when there has been a disagreement, either as to the total number of amendments to a bill or a portion of them, and a conference committee reports a disagreement, the House to which it is reported can then go to work and amend the amendments of the other body. It would be a precedent to be set in our legislation from which innumerable evils would flow. Just think what would have happened to the tariff bill if, when a disagreement had been reported by the conferees, the other House, instead of insisting upon its disagreement, had gone to work and deliberately attempted to amend every amendment of the Senate and sent the bill back to us in that condition, and the Presiding Officer had then held that every right had been taken away from us except to say whether we would agree to the Senate amendments as the House had amended them! It is entirely new in parliamentary practice, and to my mind is not allowable for a moment.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I think the decision of the Chair is exactly in accordance with parliamentary usages and law. I beg to call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut to the facts. The Senate amended the appropriation bill by inserting a provision for the purchase of what is known as the Mahone lot. After a full and free conference the conferees failed to come to an agreement, and that amendment among others went back to the House of Representatives for its action. There was one of two things only that the House could do by its vote. It could either nonconcur in the Senate amendment or agree to it with or without an amendment.

Now, Cushing, as Senators will find on page 871, lays down the rule, which has been universal, that one house may recede from its disagreement to an amendment or the disagreeing house may recede from its disagreement to the amendment and agree to the same absolutely or with an amendment. An amendment may be a substitute or it may be of any character whatever, so that it relates to the same subject. There never has been any question as to the power of either House to do that. The Senate having adopted the amendment, if the House had rejected it and it had come back to this body, we could not have amended it in the Senate, because it is our amendment; but the other House had a perfect right to substitute for the amendment anything upon the face of the earth which is kindred to the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. There can not be any doubt that the bill is before us and that we can withdraw an amendment proposed, if we choose to do so. Is it possible that parliamentary law is reduced to an absurdity? The object of a conference is to bring about an agreement. When the Senate makes a proposition to the House in the form of an amendment, that proposition is independent of all the rest. If they say, "No; we will not accept that amendment; we will provide some other site for the printing house," etc, and send the measure back to us, the bill is before us and we can recede; we can insist and ask for a further conference; we can adhere; we can do anything.

Therefore, I say it is an entire reversal of all ideas of parliamentary law, the intention of which is to bring the two Houses together, for us to say that we can not withdraw from a proposition which has been made. The House is allowed to act upon it; it has made its alternative proposition, and the bill is sent back to us on a disagreement between the two Houses. We say, "Very well; if the other House can not agree to that proposition we will withdraw it." That is all there is to it.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to state the whole case as I understand it. The House, as it had the undoubted right to do, declined to accede to our amendment and sent back an amendment to it in the nature of a substitute. When the matter reaches this body the first proposition necessarily to come before us is for the Senate to insist upon all of its amendments disagreed to, and send the bill back for a further conference with the other House. If the Senate does not see proper to do that, then for the purpose of bringing the two Houses together, the first vote, and the only vote that can be properly taken, is upon the new proposition from the other House. If the Senate accedes to it, then the amendment becomes a part of the measure. If the Senate by a vote says, "Nay; we can not take your substitute," then a motion that the Senate recede from its original amendment is unquestionably in order. I believe that the precedents are all one way, not only as to the motion to recede when that stage has been reached in the Senate, but after the bill has gone into conference and is actually being considered by the conferees; the Senate can recede from an amendment placed by it upon the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill is not in conference. It has been reported from the conference and is before the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand that perfectly, but I say that under the rule the House had the right to make the proposition. The motion of the Senator from Missouri is to insist upon the amendments and send the bill back to conference. The next motion, and the only one that could be voted on in order, would be upon the question of agreeing to the House proposition. If that is voted down, then a motion to recede would unquestionably be in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I agree fully with the statement made by the Senator from Maryland, with one exception. A motion to recede is, for obvious reasons, always first in order, and need not wait until after some other action is taken or is declined to be taken by the Senate itself.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Missouri made a proposition a moment ago. I do not care anything about the form of procedure, provided we can have a vote. I desire to have a separate vote upon the printing house site proposition, so as to determine whether the subject-matter had not better be postponed until next session, that we may have a full and fair examination of the question.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not apprehend that any trouble would come up. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments numbered 11, 110, 118, 119, 127, 128, 133, 134, 145, 238, 261, and 270, and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes thereon. That will leave out these other propositions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can call for a division of the question. I will ask for a separate vote on amendment numbered 277.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us get through with these amendments. I do not include amendment numbered 277, in regard to the Printing Office, or amendments numbered 278 and 279, as to the Atlanta Exposition. Neither do I include amendment numbered 280, which relates to arid lands. Let us first insist upon the other amendments, and then the remaining amendments will be open.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate insist upon all of its amendments except the four amendments named, and accede to the request of the House of Representatives for a further conference on the disagreeing votes thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask in the case of amendments numbered 278 and 279, relating to the Atlanta Exposition, that the Senate disagree to the amendment proposed and agree to the conference asked. That will leave amendment numbered 280 open.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate disagree to the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives and accede to the request for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I make the same motion with respect to amendment numbered 280, in relation to arid lands. That leaves amendment numbered 277, as to the Government Printing Office site, alone undisposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Missouri proposes to insist upon that amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the motion of the Senator from Missouri as to amendment numbered 277?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the amendment as to a site for the Government Printing Office. The Senate understands the matter, and it is for the Senate to determine what it will do in the premises.

Mr. SHERMAN. What does the Senator from Missouri propose to do?

Mr. COCKRELL. I intended to move that the Senate disagree to the House amendment and agree to the further conference asked. But, then, that is a matter for the Senate to determine.

Mr. LINDSAY. What is proposed to be done by the House amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. It provides for the purchase of land adjacent to the present site and for the erection of buildings thereon. A motion to agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives would take precedence.

Mr. SHERMAN. If necessary, I will move that the Senate insist upon amendment numbered 277, which will raise the question at once.

Mr. ALDRICH. There are two questions. There will have to be a motion made to recede from the Senate amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. If we disagree to the proposed amendment and insist upon our amendment, it does not change the attitude of the matter a particle, in my opinion.

Mr. SHERMAN If the Senator moves to insist upon the amendment and that question is determined in the negative, then as a matter of course the conferees will have no right to insist upon the amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. In order to save trouble, I move to recede from the amendment. That brings the question right up, and then there need be only one vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is precisely the motion which the Senator from Ohio made, and it was decided to be out of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. By whom?

Mr. FRYE. By the Chair.

Mr. ALDRICH. Without an appeal?

Mr. LINDSAY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. That brings up the direct question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

So the Senate receded from its amendment numbered 277.

Mr. COCKRELL. That places the matter in conference. I ask now that the Senate further insist upon its amendments, and agree to the further conference asked by the House.

Mr. CULLOM. It places what matter in conference?

Mr. ALDRICH. It takes it out of conference.

Mr. COCKRELL. I mean that it places the bill in conference.

Mr. HARRIS. Before the bill is finally disposed of I should be glad to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as to whether the disagreement in respect to the appropriations for the relief of the sufferers by the Ford's Theater disaster is upon the principle of granting relief at all or as to the amount of relief that the Senate has agreed to incorporate in the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. The disagreement is first on the principle that if we recognize this liability it will make the Government liable in cases of accident to railway mail employés, etc., and extend the principle of liability of the Government to its employés beyond anything that has ever been done. It is also urged on the part of the House conferees that the House have had no opportunity of making an investigation into this matter and no time to consider it. They have had no committee that has had jurisdiction of it, and they want time to consider it. Then they object in one or two instances where they think that there were no relatives so near to the deceased as to entitle them to any compensation in the event that compensation should be paid.

They are very stubborn in their opposition to this provision, which is No. 110, on page 59.

Mr. HARRIS. As chairman of the committee having charge the subject-matter of the sufferers from the Ford's Theater disaster I deem it proper to say in this connection that the sufferers in the Railway Mail Service or any other Government service bear no sort of parallel to the case presented to the two Houses of Congress in respect to this case. The Government owned the Ford's Theater. The Government placed five or six hundred of its employés there to perform their official duties. The Government undertook to change that structure, and by reason of that undertaking and in its execution the building collapsed and a number of men were killed instantly by the disaster. A number of other employés were more or less seriously injured, and many of them very seriously.

I shall not undertake to assert that there would not be a legal liability under exactly the same facts occurring between employé and employer if they were private individuals and could sue each other, but I need not assert the legal liability that exists for the injuries thus sustained. Whether there be a legal liability or not, no fair-minded man can hesitate to believe and act upon the opinion that there is the highest order of equity in favor of a fair and reasonable compensation for the injuries sustained by reason of that accident. The committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman are unanimously of that opinion, without the shadow of doubt or dissent.

As to the amount of compensation in the death cases, there may be margin for differences of opinion, but that a fair and reasonable measure of compensation is demanded by every consideration of equity and justice no fair-minded man can doubt, in my opinion.

From the unfortunate position that I occupy as chairman, I am the recipient of the statements of the suffering widows and orphans whose fathers and husbands were killed by that disaster. Most of them are to-day suffering in penury and want. Delay is exceedingly hurtful, if it may not be even more fatal than hurtful. The Senate amendment merely provides for the death cases. The cases of injury require a much larger scope and a more accurate investigation than where the persons were killed upon the instant.

Therefore, the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman reported an amendment and asked the Committee on Appropriations to incorporate the appropriation to provide for the widows and orphans of the persons who were killed there. In respect to the injured parties the committee propose to scrutinize and carefully investigate and finally determine according to their honest judgment what measure of compensation should be granted in each individual case.

This much I have deemed it due to the position I hold to say to the Senate, and having said it, I hope our conferees will give it such weight as in their judgment they think fair and reasonable and right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair.) How shall the conferees be appointed?

Mr. COCKRELL and others. By the Chair.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference, and Mr. COCKRELL, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. ALLISON were appointed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. ALDRICH subsequently said: I am satisfied, upon an examination of the rules, that I could not properly object to the first reading of the joint resolution which came from the House of Representatives. Therefore I withdraw the objection to the first reading, and object to its second reading.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be considered as read the first time, then.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 217) to continue the provisions of existing laws providing temporarily for the expenditures of the Government was read the first time by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the second reading of the joint resolution.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were, in line 5, after the word "Congress," to insert "that may be in force at the end of the second session of the Fifty-third Congress;" in line 6, after the word "Columbia," to insert "the same to be compiled under the direction of the attorney of the District of Columbia;" in the same line after the word "that," to fill the blank by inserting "five hundred;" in line 7, after the word "Senate," to fill the blank by inserting "one thousand;" and at the end of the joint resolution add, "but the usual number shall not be printed;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be printed and bound into one convenient volume, at the Government Printing Office, all the various acts of Congress that may be in force at the end of the second session of the Fifty-third Congress relating to street railway franchises in the District of Columbia, the same to be compiled under the direction of the attorney of the District of Columbia; and that 500 copies of the same shall be furnished for the use of the Senate, 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of, and distribution by, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; but the usual number shall not be printed.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. GORMAN. I report from the Committee on Printing a resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and is hereby, authorized to sit during the coming recess for the performance of any and all duties devolving upon it.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 14, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Rev. W. E. PARSON, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the consideration of a joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 217) to continue the provisions of existing laws providing temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the joint resolutions approved June 29 and July 31, 1894, providing temporarily for the expenditures of the Government, be, and the same are hereby, extended and continued in full force and effect to and including the 24th day of August, 1894.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state for the information of the House that the resolution and the amended resolution, which have been adopted, extending the appropriations will expire to-morrow, and I do not believe it is possible for us to agree upon the sundry civil bill to-morrow in time to reach the President. I therefore ask the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Why not make it the 14th instead of the 24th?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Does the gentleman think the extension of ten days is long enough?

Mr. SAYERS. Abundance.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Give yourselves plenty of time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is that an extension of the appropriations for ten days.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BAILEY). This completes the call of committees for reports.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, has the regular order been called?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent for the passage of the Senate joint resolution, which I send to the desk (S. R. 68), for the relief of William D. Mack, a clerk in the Record and Pension Division of the War Department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. DOCKERY. Let it be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That William D. Mack, a clerk in the Record and Pension Office, and a veteran of the late war, who lost both feet in a railroad accident while returning from the anniversary ceremonies of the battle of Gettysburg, on July 4 last, is hereby exempted from the operation of so much of the act approved March 3, 1893, making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, as limits the amount of sick leave with pay that may be granted by heads of Departments, and that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to said William D. Mack such portion of his salary as has been withheld from September 11 to October 14 (thirty-four days) on account of injuries received in the said railroad accident.

Mr. BURROWS. I will say to the House that this is the matter to which I directed attention some time since—the case of a man employed in the War Department who, on the 4th of July, going to Gettysburg, accidentally lost both of his feet, and was put in a hospital, where he was confined for one month beyond the term of sick leave allowed under the law. The amount involved is $132. When I called attention to the case before it had not been considered by the House Committee on Military Affairs, but since that time they have considered it, and have reported it favorably, and I will have the report read if it is desired.

Mr. COX. What does the gentleman say is the amount?

Mr. BURROWS. One hundred and thirty-two dollars.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. ALDERSON. I object, Mr. Speaker. I think that can take the regular course.

DEPOSITIONS DE BENE ESSE.

Mr. TERRY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation a bill H. R. 7957 as a substitute for the bill (H. R. 7048) to amend section 864 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to taking depositions de bene esse. The substitute was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed, and the original bill was laid on the table.

JAMES A. SEXTON.

Mr. GOLDZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill (S. 2281) to authorize the Postmaster-General to credit account of James A. Sexton with amount of funds stolen.

Mr. COX. Has that bill been considered by any committee?

Mr. GOLDZIER. Yes, sir; by the Committee on Claims. The bill has passed the Senate, and the report of the Committee on Claims is on file.

Mr. COX. Who reported that bill from the Committee on Claims?

Mr. GOLDZIER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICHARDS], who authorized me to call it up.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the report in that case read.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let us first have the bill read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to credit the account of James A. Sexton, postmaster at Chicago, Ill., in the sum of $3,737.05 for postal funds stolen from his office December 12, 1893.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this Senate bill?

Mr. KILGORE. I object, Mr. Speaker, and demand the regular order.

Mr. GOLDZIER. I trust the gentleman will not insist on his objection. This bill is recommended by the Department.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The Clerk proceeded under the rule to call the committees in the second morning hour.

Mr. BUNN (when the Committee on Claims was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Committee on Claims be informally passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that this is the call in the second morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HEARD. Well, I protest that, this being a day to which the District of Columbia is entitled under the rule, there is no second morning hour, and I therefore call for the regular order, which is the consideration of District business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman had made his point of order in the beginning the Chair would have sustained it, on the ground that the practice heretofore has been as the gentleman suggests, but unless the Committee on the District of Columbia claims the day, the regular order would be the call of committees in the second morning hour. Paragraph 2 of Rule XXIV provides that—

On all days other than the first and third Mondays in each month, as soon as the business on the Speaker's table has been disposed of, there shall be a morning hour for reports from committees.

Then, in paragraph 4, it is provided that—

After the morning hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees (or the call completed), the Speaker shall again call the committees in regular order for one hour, upon which call, each committee, on being named, shall have the right to call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day.

The Chair thinks under the rules, therefore, there is a second morning hour on every day, except the first and third Mondays; but the practice has been that whenever the Committee on the District of Columbia desired the second or the fourth Mondays of the month, it has been accorded to them after the first morning hour and the second morning hour has been dispensed with.

Mr. HEARD. Well, Mr. Speaker, I failed to make the point at the beginning because in the confusion which existed on the floor I did not observe that the call of committees for reports had been completed, and in fact reports continued to be made by unanimous consent after the completion of the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon that statement the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] to call up for consideration matters reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUNN. A parliamentary inquiry: The call will rest with the Committee on Claims in the next morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call will properly rest with the committee which was entitled to be called first this morning.

FREE LIBRARY IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 6642) to establish a free public and departmental library and reading room in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HEARD. If no motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill, I hope we may proceed with its consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. KILGORE. I object.

Mr. HEARD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills on the Union Calendar from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. HATCH in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6642) to establish a free public and departmental library and reading room in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and is hereby, established in the city of Washington a free public and departmental library and reading room, being also a circulating or lending library, for the use of the citizens of the District of Columbia and of the employés of the several Departments and offices of the Government in Washington. The general management of the library shall be committed to a board of trustees, consisting of eleven citizens of the District of Columbia, to be appointed by the President of the United States.

SEC. 2. That said library shall be located in the new post-office building of Washington, D. C., and the architect of the same is hereby directed to provide in his plans and specifications rooms in said building suitable for and adapted to library and reading-room purposes, adequate to the accommodation of not less than 75,000 volumes.

SEC. —. That whenever provisions for the library are completed such books, periodicals, and papers in the existing libraries of the several Executive Departments and offices of the Government in the city of Washington as in the judgment of the head of the Department, bureau, or office affected are not required for the special official use of said Department, bureau, or office shall be transferred to the free public and departmental library and reading room, for its use, and it is hereby made the duty of the head of each Department, bureau, or office in which a circulating library is maintained for the use of employés of the Government to deliver all such books, periodicals, and papers, without delay, to the free public and departmental library and reading room, and thereafter no general circulating library, but only such library as is required for its special official use, shall be established or maintained by any Department, bureau, or office of the Government in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. That the Librarian of Congress is hereby authorized and directed to turn over to the free public and departmental library and reading room such duplicate copies of books in his charge as are not required for the use of the Library of Congress.

SEC. 5. That upon the completion of rooms for the library herein provided for the said board of trustees shall appoint one librarian and such assistant librarians and other employés as the said board may deem necessary.

SEC. 6. That all citizens of the District of Columbia, and all officers, clerks, and other employés of the Government on duty in the city of Washington shall be entitled to the privileges of the free public and departmental library and reading room, free of all charge, including the use of the books contained therein, as a lending or circulating library, under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the board of trustees: Provided, That the library and reading room shall be kept open from 9 o'clock ante meridian to 10 o'clock post meridian each day excepting Sundays and holidays, on which days said library and reading room shall be kept open from 3 o'clock post meridian to 10 o'clock post meridian.

SEC. 7. That of the expenses incurred in the maintenance of the free public and departmental library and reading room, including all salaries of employés, one half shall be paid by the United States and one-half by the District of Columbia, and it is hereby made the duty of the Commissioners of the District to include these expenses in their annual estimates submitted to Congress.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 14 of section 3, after the word "library," insert the words "of miscellaneous books," and in line 1 of section 4, after the word "the," insert the words "Joint Committee on the Library upon report by the."

Mr. HEARD. I desire to offer from the committee some formal amendments.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is understood that this does not dispense with the general debate. The gentleman does not desire that?

Mr. HEARD. Oh, not at all.

The amendment of Mr. HEARD was read, as follows:

In line 1 of section 6, strike out "citizens" and insert "residents."

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let us understand whether the bill has reached the amendable stage.

Mr. HEARD. I will say to the gentleman that the object of this amendment is simply to change the word "citizens" to the word "residents." If there be any objection I will withdraw it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I want it understood whether general debate is closed. I do not understand that we have yet reached the amendable stage.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Missouri to send this amendment to the desk to be read simply for information.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, as has doubtless been observed by members who have listened to the reading of this bill, its object is to establish a free library in the District of Columbia. It will no doubt surprise a great many members when I state that there is no free library in this city. I suppose it is probably true that there is not in the United States another city of equal population—certainly not one of equal importance—that has not a free public library. The object of the bill is to establish such an institution.

Permit me to state the provision made by the bill for the accumulation of books for this library. There are in, I believe, three of the Executive Departments of this Government located in Washington, what are known as departmental libraries, consisting largely of books of a technical character, for specific use in the conduct of affairs of such Departments. There are also in these three libraries a considerable number of books relating to general subjects, the use of which is enjoyed free by the officers and employés of those Departments respectively, but by them only.

Now, one design of this bill is to authorize the withdrawal from these several Departments of those books which do not relate to the specific business of the same; and to these it is proposed to add such duplicate volumes as can be spared from the Congressional Library. These contributions are to be made the nucleus of this free public library.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand the gentleman to say there is no library in this city to which residents or citizens can have access?

Mr. HEARD. I understand that to be the case, so far as the masses of the people are concerned.

Mr. KILGORE. Do they not have access to the Congressional Library?

Mr. HEARD. They do not; at least, not everybody.

Mr. KILGORE. Can not any reputable man or woman go there and get a book out of that library?

Mr. HEARD. My understanding is that within certain limits the public can have the use of the books in the Congressional Library, as the gentleman from Texas knows; but that privilege is not general, and the hours for the opening and closing of the Library practically forbids its use to a very large proportion of the inhabitants of the District who would like to avail themselves of the privilege.

Mr. KILGORE. Would it not be better and cheaper, though, to change the hours of opening and closing the Library and extend them, rather than to go to the expense which would be necessarily incurred in starting an entirely new establishment? Besides that, we are now having constructed a new Library building in which there will be no difficulty in accommodating everybody who desires to enjoy that privilege, and without the expense of establishing another, or the necessity for encroaching upon any of the space in the Post-Office building, which ought to be devoted entirely to some other matters.

Mr. HEARD. Well, Mr. Chairman, these are important questions, of course, which are to be considered in connection with the bill. I want to say, however, that so far as keeping the Congressional Library open longer hours than at present is concerned, in order to accommodate the people, there would be this advantage in favor of the proposed bill: that under it one-half of the expense would be paid by the District of Columbia, and only one-half by the General Government; whereas if the other plan were adopted it would all be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the saving that would be effected by this plan would be a lessening of the expense that has now to be met by the General Government in keeping up the departmental libraries to which I have referred, the uses of which being so narrowed they would require less attention, or fewer attendants to care for them than at present.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand it would not add a dollar to the expense to keep the Congressional Library open a little longer hours each day; that is to say, a little earlier in the morning and a little later in the afternoon. Besides, that is already provided for, and if there are books in the departmental libraries which could be withdrawn without detriment to them, they could go into the Congressional Library when it gets into operation in the new building, and thus afford additional accommodation for everybody who chose to avail themselves of it.

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman from Texas, though, as every other member of the House, knows that there is at present a great want of room in the Congressional Library.

Mr. KILGORE. Oh, I understand that, of course; but we expect to move out of it before very long.

Mr. HEARD. If the gentleman will hear me a moment. The gentleman's idea, as I understand it, is that when the new building for the Congressional Library is completed there will be ample opportunity to store there the books that have now no place because of the want of room in the present library, and in addition the accumulation of books which are not needed in the departmental libraries, and in that event the accommodation could be given to the people without appropriating any portion of the space in the new post-office building.

Mr. KILGORE. And plenty of time.

Mr. HEARD (continuing). Now, it has been suggested by some, and urged with a good deal of force, that instead of setting apart space in the new post-office building, it might be better to set apart a section in the new library building. That is, of course, a matter that the House will consider before it disposes of the bill. On the other hand, it is contended that a location nearer to the center of the city would be more advantageous and accessible to the reading public than up here in the new building.

But, as I say, these are all matters of detail to be determined hereafter. The main proposition is to fix upon the plan which the bill embodies, or some better one, to give to the people of this city the privileges of a free library.

Mr. KILGORE. If the gentleman will allow me a moment.

Mr. HEARD. Certainly.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand the post-office building now being constructed is for the purpose of accommodating everything relating to the city post-office, and to other post-office matters besides, so as to accommodate those offices that are now in rented buildings. If that building is to be partly occupied by a new public library, it seems to me it would not commend itself as a matter of economy, in view of the fact that we are renting other buildings which would continue to be rented under that arrangement.

Mr. HEARD. Within the limits to which the library would subject that building, which would be comparatively small, it would undoubtedly absorb some space. But it would not be a very material encroachment upon the building. It was the design of the law to provide a building for the use of the city post-office and other departmental work in the District. That is true. It is contended, however, and with some force, that the reduction of the space now occupied in these different Departments where libraries now exist would compensate largely for the use of the space in the new post-office building to be used for the library, which is estimated to be only 6,000 square feet. The House is to consider, therefore, whether the benefit to be conferred will justify a further appropriation for the space designed to be occupied in that building.

But aside from the question of whether the library should be located in one building or another, the greater question of importance is whether there shall be established for this people in the District of Columbia a public library. That is a matter entirely for the judgment and action of Congress, and as to where it shall be established, whether in a building entirely apart or in the post-office building, or in the library building, that is a matter for further consideration.

Mr. KILGORE. My theory is that the one great library ought to be ample and sufficient, by arranging the hours, to meet all the requirements to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. HERMANN. Let me ask the gentleman from Missouri whether it is contemplated by the bill now before the House that the entire amount of money for this proposed library shall be appropriated by the General Government?

Mr. HEARD. Not at all.

Mr. HERMANN. How much of it?

Mr. HEARD. I will say that the provision here for the donation of the books is simply that there shall be transferred from the departmental libraries those books relating to general subjects not necessary in the proper conduct of Department business—in other words, not applying specifically to Department work—and that large number of books, estimated I think at 25,000, that are now in the Congressional Library, which can be transferred, as we are informed, to the proposed new library without detriment to the present Congressional Library.

Mr. HERMANN. So we are to understand that there is to be no additional appropriation, as I understand it?

Mr. HEARD. Not for the purchase of books.

Mr. HERMANN. But that the books are on hand, and that they are to be distributed——

Mr. HEARD. Distributed where they will do the most good. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is represented to the committee by citizens of the District that there are many people here who are ready and willing to liberally donate books and money for the purchase of books for the establishment of a public free library, to which the masses of our people may have access at all reasonable hours.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HATCH). The gentleman from Missouri will suspend. The Chair will request visitors in the galleries to cease audible conversation. There is so much conversation in the galleries that the public business can not be transacted.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Under what obligation is the Government to make any appropriation by which to furnish reading matter to the citizens of the District of Columbia?

Mr. HEARD. None, I will say, more than that they are all citizens of the United States——

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. It does not furnish reading matter to the people all over the United States.

Mr. HEARD. Certainly not.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I ask this for information.

Mr. HEARD. But the gentleman from South Carolina realizes, of course, that a different relation exists between the people of the District toward the Government than that which the Government sustains to people outside of the District in many material matters. We have here a sort of partnership government; that is to say, the Government of the United States being liable in part for the money necessary to carry on the expenses of the District.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. That ought not to apply to free reading matter.

Mr. HEARD. It is not proposed in this bill to tax the Federal Treasury one farthing for the purchase of these books; but it is simply that these books are now in libraries where, so far as the Department libraries are concerned, those persons in the Departments alone can get access to them, and in the Congressional Library, by reason of the rules for its conduct, only a limited portion of our people have access to it. Since these books in the Department libraries and in the Congressional Library are limited in their circulation, it is simply proposed that these books may be placed, by the voluntary action of the Government, where they will be of benefit to the people of the District.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Then the bill carries no appropriation?

Mr. HEARD. None whatever for the purchase of books.

Mr. HERMANN. But the real expenditure is to follow, and that will consist in the maintenance of the library?

Mr. HEARD. Certainly; there will be required a librarian and such attendants as are necessary.

Mr. HERMANN. And also a library room?

Mr. HEARD. Why, yes; this bill suggests the application or use of certain space in the post-office building. As to whether that will be donated or not is a question for Congress.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. If that is not donated, do you not have to buy land and erect a building?

Mr. HEARD. There is no provision whatever for it, and if at any time in the future the provisions of this bill are carried out and the library located in the new post-office building, it will be within the power of Congress at any time to remove it.

Mr. HULL. As a further answer to the gentleman from South Carolina, this is the only way in which the city of Washington can get a library.

Mr. HEARD. I intended to present that question. I thank my friend from Iowa. I will say to my friend from South Carolina, and I ask his careful attention to this point, that another reason is, that independent of this partnership relation which exists here in this District——

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. That partnership does not extend to reading matter.

Mr. HEARD. Aside from the obligations fixed by law to meet our percentage of the cost of carrying on the government, there is this fact, which is superior to that, which my friend should not lose sight of.

That while Congress has absolute power to tax these people, to take from them any amount of money we please and put it in our Treasury, and absolute power to expend it even if we think fit on a worthless water tunnel costing them a million of dollars, and from which they get no good, they have no power to appropriate their own money to build a library, hospital, or anything else in the world.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Then pass a law giving them a representative here.

Mr. HEARD. You would have to overturn the existing system to do that; and with one representative what power would they have here, except by the grace of the entire Congress?

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Then you may as well provide a library in every township in the United States.

Mr. HEARD. My friend says that you might as well undertake to provide a library in every township in the United States. There is no analogy, I beg my friend to consider, between this city and the townships and towns in the different States, for the reason that all townships and villages which have erected libraries for their own benefit have their own laws and regulations about these things, and can provide for them.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. And they pay the money for it, without looking to the Government for it.

Mr. HEARD. I understand that.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Let the people here do the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina must not interrupt the gentleman from Missouri without his consent.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, my friend is not annoying or disturbing me; I only ask that he permit me to explain the matter to him, and reply to the questions as he puts them.

Mr. HERMANN. If the gentleman will permit me, there is one point he has not made clear. In your answer to a former question by me, as to whether one-half of the expenses of maintaining this library was to be expended by the General Government. I see a very favorable provision here that one-half of the expenditures shall be paid out of the funds of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HEARD. I so stated.

Mr. HERMANN. Excuse me; I did not catch that in your statement.

Mr. HEARD. I want to say to my friend from South Carolina that it is within the competency of Congress to make these people maintain this themselves, if you want to do so; but I do not believe it to be right to do so. I think if there is a proper charge in the entire list of the expenses of this District that should rest in part on the Government it is one for the establishment of proper library facilities. In other words, I do not know a community whose legislative body would slight the duty of providing for the information and improvement of the minds of the people.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Then you might as well make an appropriation of money for the purpose of building their churches and building their private buildings, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Do not we at present appropriate for the schools?

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Then you might as well appropriate for the churches, and so on.

Mr. HEARD. Now, let me say to my friend, that in almost all the States of the Union, and certainly in all the public land States, generous donations have been made by the Federal Government for the establishment and maintenance of educational institutions, such as schools, universities, and agricultural colleges. All have received munificent provisions from the public Treasury, but in this District not a dollar has been given for this purpose.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. No money for public schools?

Mr. HEARD. I say for the establishment of public schools in these public land States—for the support of schools, colleges, and universities.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me for interrupting him, I would like to make an inquiry. Do I understand this is a proposition that one-half of the expense of the maintenance of this public library for the District shall be borne by the Government?

Mr. HEARD. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. And it is proposed that rooms shall be assigned for that purpose in the post-office building?

Mr. HEARD. That is the proposition of the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Are there any rooms there available for that purpose?

Mr. HEARD. I will state to the gentleman from Maine my understanding is, and I think the gentleman understands, that when that building was first designed to a certain height for the use of the city post-office, that Congress concluded to add probably three additional stories, with a view to obtaining a good deal of office room above that which was demanded for the purpose for which it was originally designed. Now, I suppose, and I have no purpose of concealment, that that space could be used for housing departmental business which is now carried on in rented buildings.

Mr. DINGLEY. This Government is paying $180,000 a year for such rent of buildings.

Mr. HEARD. I understand. I apprehend every member of the House is informed upon that subject—that the Government is now paying large sums for rented places in this District. The question is, therefore, whether the public benefits that are proposed in this measure are such as to justify Congress in appropriating space in this building which would be in excess of the space vacated in the Departments from which these books would be removed, and that is a question about which every gentleman will have his independent opinion.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Is it not true that if this space is occupied in the post-office building much space will be vacated in the Departments?

Mr. HEARD. I have aimed to make that clear, and the loss or gain in space is the difference between the space which this bill seeks to accord in the new building and the space which will be surrendered in the different Departments.

Mr. DOCKERY. What space will be vacated in the Department libraries?

Mr. HEARD. I understand that there are in each of three of the Departments about 10,000 volumes which are not required there, and which would be transferred to this building; and the portion of space occupied by these volumes in the Departments, which is very considerable, would be surrendered.

Mr. DOCKERY. My understanding is that these are generally books which are in actual use in connection with the conduct of the business of the Departments. I understand that to be the fact, except as to the Interior Department, where they have some books of a miscellaneous character.

Mr. HEARD. My information is that there is an average of 10,000 books of general reading matter in three of the different Departments.

Mr. GROUT. There is a total of 20,000 circulating volumes in those Departments.

Mr. HEARD. I thought there were thirty thousand. I accept the correction.

Mr. HULL. Twenty thousand. The subcommittee, consisting of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CADMUS] and myself, made special inquiry of all the Departments and ascertained that they had about twenty thousand volumes which were not necessary for the operation of the Departments, circulating library books.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, it is not intended by the authors of this bill to withdraw, nor does the bill itself contemplate the withdrawal, from any of the Departments of any books which are necessary for the convenience and proper conduct of the business of such Departments. Now, Mr. Chairman, if any gentleman desires to present objections to this bill I hope he will proceed, in order that we may reach a vote as soon as possible.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I shall be glad to have five minutes.

Mr. HEARD. I cheerfully yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in that time, if I can get the attention of the House, I want to say that if there ought to be a public library for the District of Columbia, and I am convinced of that fact, I stand ready to help to lease a building or to construct a building to put it in; or I stand ready to take from the new Library building such room as is not now needed and will not be needed for fifty years to come for the Library of Congress, and give this proposed public library quarters there. Mr. Chairman, the new post-office building is not yet completed and will not be for a year or two. I know something about that building.

Under the lead of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the site was bought and the construction of a five-story building was authorized. Then the matter went to the Committee on Appropriations, and, in connection with the late Supervising Architect, Mr. Windrom, and under the lead of that committee Congress provided that there should be a modern building erected, eight stories high, with elevators and all modern conveniences, and the intention of Congress was that that building, covering the great space that it does, should take the Post-Office employés, the employés of the Geological Survey, the Patent Office if there was room enough, portions of the Land Office if there was room enough—the intention, I say, was that all the employés and records of this Government now scattered in different parts of Washington in old fire-trap buildings, for which we pay in the aggregate $180,000 a year rent, should be put into this modern fire-proof building, so that there might be security for valuable public records, and so that we might get rid of this burden of rent.

Congress, after the fullest consideration, entered on that policy, and while I have the honor to be a member of Congress, if my vote can prevent it there shall be no legislation, whether under the guise of providing a city library or any other form, which will divert one foot of that great building from the purposes for which it was intended by Congress.

I have nothing to say in the way of antagonism to a public library, but, in my judgment, this great building just east of the Capitol, which will be completed about as soon as the post-office building, will accommodate the Library of Congress for one hundred years to come, and this public library, if it is necessary, can be housed there.

But I ask this House not to take any portion of this great modern building which is being constructed for the purposes I have recited, namely, to contain the Government employés and the valuable Government records now scattered about the city in leased buildings. I ask this House not to divert a foot of that great building from the purposes for which it was intended originally, and for which its construction was authorized.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman allow an inquiry?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly, if the gentleman will yield me a little further time.

Mr. HEARD. I yield the gentleman a minute or two longer. I want to ask him a question. Would my friend be in favor of a bill allowing for this institution the necessary space in the new library building when completed?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, if I have the honor three years from now to be a member of Congress, when Congress will be Republican in both the House and the Senate, with a Republican President, and when the building will be ready, I shall then be ready to legislate on the subject, and legislate favorably, if in the meantime other arrangements are not made.

Mr. HEARD. I appreciate the gentleman's obliging disposition, but he puts the matter off too long.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I have no objection to doing that if there be a crying necessity for it. I am willing to build at the joint expense of the Government and the District of Columbia a structure for this library, if its importance can be demonstrated. But I am not willing to take this building of which I have been speaking, even before it is completed, and devote it to a purpose that Congress did not contemplate when it made that building exceptional by making it eight stories high, with its enormous rooms dedicated to the purposes indicated. I hope this bill, in that feature at least, will fail.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] such time as he may desire within the limits of my own time.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not care whether it is a Democratic House or a Republican House, when the cause of education knocks at the door of Congress and the hand of labor knocks, I will help to open the door. Thomas Carlyle said: "Why is there not a majesty's library in every county town? There is a majesty's jail and a gallows in every one." This city has a jail and a gallows; yet with 225,000 people it has not a free public library.

Now, the people ask for this. A bill comes in taking steps to establish it. It asks no dollar now from the public Treasury. We have a city full of books and yet not one book free to "the common people," as Abraham Lincoln loved to call them. There will be room in the great Congressional Library when finished; there will be plenty of room in the post-office when it is finished; and one great advantage that the last-named building has is that the people who go to the post-office will be convenient to the free books and the free reading room proposed in this bill.

Let the masses of your people who have not money to buy books or pay for their use find in a building provided by this District government an inviting room where they can go and read and study. If you would strengthen your Government, if you would give power to your people, if you would make your National capital what it ought to be, pour intelligence like a flood of light fresh from Heaven into the minds of the masses of your people. I will not remain silent while I can give voice or vote for a free public library and a free reading room for the working people of the District of Columbia. [Applause.]

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. HEARD. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BARTLETT obtained the floor.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] for or against this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am against it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I hope when the gentleman concludes he will yield me a few minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have promised to yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. That is all right.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am opposed to this bill for two reasons, and it has seemed to me fitting that as chairman of the Library Committee I should say a few words to the House upon the measure now offered for consideration. And I will say at the outset that I am just as much in favor of the spread of education and of granting all the facilities for education to the laborer and the mechanic as the gentleman who has just eloquently addressed this House. But there are special reasons, it seems to me, why this bill should not be passed. You must bear in mind that the functions of public libraries are two-fold.

In the first place and in the main a public library is a library of research. It is intended to be the receptable and repository of original records, of rare volumes coming hither from all parts of the world, of which each library can secure only one copy. And it is the design of public libraries that they should be established for the promotion of special investigation in the line of science or art or literature. It is intended that all these great original records and these rare volumes should be kept there for the inspection and study of the scholar, the student, the author, the inventor.

All the great public libraries of the world are libraries of research—not open for the carrying away of volumes, but open to the reading public, the books to be read within the walls of the library—not to be taken away, because in the first place they are too precious; and in the second place, the demands of those coming there daily within the hours of 9 and 4 could not be met if the volumes were removed.

So I conceive, Mr. Chairman, that it is the duty of this House, if we establish any libraries anywhere, to build libraries for research, and not circulating libraries. The other cities throughout this country provide their own libraries, and I can see no good reason why the District of Columbia should be treated differently from any of the others in this regard. It is no part of the Governmental function to start a circulating library. It is no part of our duty to maintain libraries for the accommodation of working girls or for shopkeepers in order that they may be able to take cheap novels to their homes and read them at night. It is no part of our duty as a part of the lawmaking power to take the action proposed here.

Now, I wish to call attention to the fact that the city of Washington and the District of Columbia will be more amply provided with all that is necessary for study and research when the new Library Building is completed, which will be in about twenty months, than any other city in the country——

Mr. GOLDZIER. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BARTLETT (continuing). And for that reason I do not think that the District can with any show of justice come and ask the passage of any such bill as this, which will involve eventually a large appropriation of the public money.

There is another consideration. Of whom is the reading public of the District of Columbia composed? You must bear in mind that the Congressional Library is open to anyone whomsoever, even to remove books, on the order of a Representative or a Senator and various other Government officials. The reading public here principally consists of the employés of the Government, and the departmental books are accessible to each and every one of these employés. It would hardly be worth while to establish a circulating library for the small body of citizens who would use it.

But there is another salient objection, and that is to the fourth section of the bill, which provides that the Librarian of Congress shall deliver all the superfluous volumes in the Congressional Library to this new circulating library.

Mr. Chairman, there is a prior claim on the Librarian of Congress and on this Government for these volumes, and I call your attention to Senate resolution No. 12, which passed the Senate and which has been reported favorably by the Committee on the Library of the House. That embodies a claim of the city of Beaufort, S. C., for the destruction of its library by fire during the civil war. All gentlemen present in the House know my attitude on war claims, and all of them know that in the main I am opposed to such claims.

But I believe that a claim arising from the destruction of a library during the war, and especially under the circumstances connected with this Beaufort library, is a claim in equity which should be met and redeemed. Our forces in the year 1861 went down to Beaufort and took possession of the town, and the library was removed and sent to the collector of the port of New York, at that time Mr. Hiram Barney. The library was advertised for sale, and the sale was only stopped by the intervention of the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase.

The library was then removed to the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, and it remained here from January, 1863, until January, 1865, when it was destroyed by fire. Secretary Chase, in his letter forbidding the sale of these volumes at public auction, says: "I never thought of selling it. We do not war on libraries." Gen. Halleck, in his instructions to our armies at the inception of the civil war, gave special instructions in reference to the preservation from injury, or the preservation intact in every way, of all the precious instruments of science, such as astronomical instruments and all public libraries. That was the rule of our civil war. Now, we can see that under these circumstances we are bound to give back these volumes destroyed through our agency in the civil war to the Beaufort library.

It was first alleged that 2,000 volumes had been destroyed. I find, however, on inquiry of Mr. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress, that there were over 11,000 volumes in the Beaufort library. The total number of surplus volumes in our Congressional Library amounts to between 11,000 and 13,000. I concede that it would not be quite desirable perhaps to take all of that number and give them to this Southern library to replace those that have been destroyed—that is to say, it would be fair and just, but not entirely wise, to strip ourselves of every superfluous volume. But at the proper time, when the resolution comes before the House, I propose to offer an amendment that we give them anywhere from 2,000 to 5,000 volumes out of the number of volumes on hand, whatever may be agreed upon in the judgment of the House, and that we retain the remainder.

This provides for one of the class of claims in equity which must be met, and we have no right, when we owe these books to these libraries in the South, to appropriate the volumes to the District of Columbia and deprive ourselves of the means of replacing those which were lost or destroyed by our agency. So I shall move, if we proceed to vote upon this measure, to strike out section 4 of the bill. I think the surplus volumes should be kept as a reserve and that from two to five thousand books should be delivered to the Beaufort library or any other library in the same condition. I know, however, of no other measure of like tenor before our library committee. But we should not appropriate all the books to that library, but we should keep on hand a number sufficient to meet any exigency that may arise in the future.

These are some of the reasons why I object to this bill at this time. I conceive that the whole measure is unwise, since I have no doubt but that all the reading public in the District will be amply provided, in the way of study and research, through the medium of the Congressional Library.

I know that the Astor Library in my city, one of the greatest libraries in the world, is only open for the reading and examination of books during certain hours of the day. Not one volume can be taken out. Our rule here is much more lax, and books can be taken out. On our order, or on the order of a Senator, anyone who wishes to examine a book can obtain the relief he desires. I submit that on the whole this bill should not be enacted.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I want to say in addition to what I have said, and partially by way of comment upon what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] submitted, that I suspect that every member upon the floor of this House indorses Carlyle's statement, possibly, as unreservedly as he does. I suspect that every member upon the floor of this House stands ready, acting for the District of Columbia, to give the employés of the Government and those who are not employés of the Government in this District, as good or superior advantages for library privileges as are enjoyed by citizens in our respective communities which we represent. When we go that far perhaps we have performed our duty.

Now, let us strip this question of the fireworks with which the gentleman from Iowa can so well surround all questions that he discusses. I can not compete with him in that, and shall not try; but let us get back again to the proposition. Here is a building that is to cost $3,000,000, and when completed, two or three years from now, will take the valuable records of this Government, in which all the people are interested, laboring people and everybody else, out of insecure rented fire traps, and with the employés in charge thereof, and put them in a modern fireproof Government building, saving thereby every year $180,000 that we now pay in rent for these insufficient, dangerous, leased buildings.

That is what Congress intended to do and what I want done. Who objects? The Committee on the District of Columbia objects. They say, No; let a portion of these Government records, belonging to the people, still remain in perilous rented buildings, and take a portion of that space in the Government building and give it to the city library. And by inference at least those of us who do not agree to that proposition are said to stand in the way of enlightening labor. I do not accept the designation, even by implication. I stand ready here to devote a portion of the new library building, or to build or lease a building, if it is necessary, for a city library. There is the building occupied by the Geological Survey, which is quite sufficient for a city library.

If we must have it and ought to have it, lease the building and put it in. I do not believe, however, that it is necessary to lease a building. Sometimes in the name of intelligence we run wild and run into extravagance. Here is a great public library belonging to the Government, the greatest in the United States to-day. Any man, woman, or child can make an insignificant deposit and take the books from that library and read them.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. It takes a five-dollar bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. We can cheapen it, if we desire to do so. We are just completing the expenditure of $10,000,000 for the most magnificent library building on this earth, where the same thing can be done, and where there will be room enough, not demanded by the books we now have in the Library of Congress, to accommodate half a dozen city libraries. But all that will not do. They propose to take a portion of this city post-office building for this purpose, and by implication set down those of us who object as favoring ignorance. I will not accept the designation, nor will I be placed in a position of obstructing the course of intelligence when, exercising my duties as a member of Congress, I vote to keep a Government building for Government purposes.

I do not know that anything else can be said about it. Madam Roland is reported, just before she fell under the guillotine, with all her attachment to liberty and intelligence, to have said, "O Liberty! Liberty! what crimes are committed in thy name!".

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition to create a partnership between the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia in the matter of establishing a free circulating library. I understand it comes to the House indorsed by the unanimous report of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and as such I feel some hesitancy in offering any objection to the measure. But upon an examination of its provisions I am constrained to call the attention of the House to some objectionable features. In the first place, a partnership is proposed between the Government of the United States and the District. What is the Government to do? The Government provides the building. The new post-office building is to be turned over for the use of this library.

Mr. HEARD. Do I understand my friend to state that the building is to be turned over to it?

Mr. DOCKERY. Such part of it as is not used by the post-office.

Mr. HEARD. A very insignificant part.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, whatever remains of the building not in use by the city post-office is to be used—and if I am not correct I would be glad if the gentleman would correct me—whatever space not necessary for the city post-office is to be turned over for the use of a free library.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. It is calculated and reported by the committee that in that building there are 340,000 square feet, and this library would occupy only 6,000 feet. It is not to turn over that building, but only a small part, sufficient to accommodate the library.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then the bill proposes to turn over sufficient space in the city post-office building for such a library.

Then the Government of the United States is to turn over, according to section 4, certain books in the Congressional Library; and then the United States is to pay one-half of the cost of maintenance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it is wise or judicious for the United States to enter into a scheme of this sort with the District of Columbia. If there is a necessity for a free circulating library in this District, then that necessity ought to be fully met by an appropriation from revenues of the District of Columbia; and in reaching my judgment as to such necessity I should be governed very largely by the desires and wishes of the people who pay the taxes.

Now, then, if we are to go into partnership with the District of Columbia, it seems to me that the first section of the bill ought to be amended, because it provides for a board of eleven trustees who shall be appointed by the President of the United States from the citizenship of the District of Columbia. If the United States is to be an equal partner, it seems to me that at least half of the eleven trustees authorized to be appointed for this board should be taken from the citizenship of the United States outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Chairman, those who are familiar with the legislation which led up to the authorization of the construction of the post-office building know that the additional stories were placed on it and were authorized to be constructed, either for the storage of documents belonging to the United States, or for the use of clerks of the Government of the United States. It has been already stated on the floor of the House in this debate that the Government is paying an annual rental of over $180,000 for buildings used for governmental purposes; and it seems to me that this space ought to be reserved for Government uses and thus economize on our rental account. The fifth section of the bill, it seems to me, if it is to become law, is too broad. It provides—

That upon completion of rooms for the library herein provided for the said board of trustees shall appoint one librarian and such assistant librarians and other employés as the board may deem necessary.

That is a very large grant of power: "One librarian and such assistant librarians" as "the board may determine to be necessary."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in conclusion, that I am opposed to any proposition that involves one dollar of expense to the Government for a free public library. I believe these departmental libraries ought to remain where they are, with the possible exception of the miscellaneous books, and if we are to have a District library, I might be willing to turn over miscellaneous publications to that library, the building to be erected and paid for and the operating expenses of the library to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I permit no man in Congress or in any portion of this world over which the flag of our country floats to go beyond myself in encouraging education, or in furnishing facilities to all classes of people within the borders of our country to secure liberal educations and to post themselves upon all subjects, scientific and otherwise. But while that is true, yet I can not favor the adoption of this bill for several reasons. Probably my limited time will not give an opportunity for stating all of them; but it does seem to me that as legislators, representing every portion of this country, we should have in view the interests of the people of all portions of our country as well as the interests of the citizens or residents of the District of Columbia.

There are several libraries within the city, as I understand from statements made upon this floor and from the statements contained in the report furnished by the Committee on the District of Columbia. Some of these libraries are departmental ones, containing books specially adapted to the use of employés and officials in these Departments, as well as certain miscellaneous books; and, as has been stated, each of these libraries is free and open to every employé of the Department in which the library is established.

We have, in addition to those, the Congressional Library, and, as has also been stated, under certain conditions every citizen and resident of the District of Columbia is entitled to the privileges and benefits of that library as now established. And, although the room in the building where that library is now located is possibly not sufficient at this time to accommodate all who desire to avail themselves of those privileges, yet when the Congressional Library building, costing the Government millions and millions of dollars, is completed, and it is now nearing completion, there will be, as I am informed, ample room in which to place all the books and in which to consolidate, if need be, all of the libraries of the city in that one building.

Then it will require but little time and no expense for Congress to provide by law that every citizen and resident of this District shall have the benefit of all the books and periodicals which will be contained in that Congressional Library building. Possibly the expense of establishing this proposed free circulating library would not be very great to begin with, but we do not know what the expense would be eventually; and, apart from that consideration, why not let the people of the District of Columbia—the actual residents of the District—establish a public circulating library here for themselves, as the residents of every other city, town, and village in the United States have the right to do and are doing. The citizens and residents of this District can now do that voluntarily. There is no law, as I understand, against their voluntarily establishing such a library, is there?

Mr. HULL. There is no law; but the gentleman's suggestion is an absurdity.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The gentleman from Iowa replies that there is no law against their establishing such a library if they desire, but that my statement is an absurdity. Well, sir, if it is an absurdity, so far as the residents and citizens of the District of Columbia are concerned, it is equally an absurdity to say that the different cities, villages, and towns throughout the United States outside of this District should establish libraries for themselves, and yet they have done it and are doing it still.

Mr. HULL. They do it through the action of their local governments, but where is your local government here?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The gentleman admits that there is no law against the citizens and residents of this District voluntarily establishing such a library for themselves; and if there is no law against it they can do it; and I imagine that the only reason why the Government employés are named as beneficiaries under this bill is to induce Congress to shoulder half the expense attending the establishment of this proposed library for the benefit of the people of this District.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. And those employés draw from the Government about $21,000,000 in salaries.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairmnn, as is suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina, the Government employés draw $21,000,000 of Government money in salaries, and I doubt not that all of the employés of the Government would be willing to join with the actual citizens of the District in contributing to establish such a library and reading room for the benefit of them all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while since I have been here I have always spoken and voted in favor of making liberal appropriations for all proper and legitimate purposes, yet in this particular case and under the existing circumstances, I am not in favor of the Government entering into a partnership with the District of Columbia to establish a free library and reading room here. At the same time I say give the citizens of the District by legislation, if the same is necessary, all the authority they want or need to establish such a library and reading room themselves, and let them conduct it as they see fit. I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I regret to see a disposition here on this occasion, as I have seen it on so many other occasions, to assume a position antagonistic to the District of Columbia. It is to be regretted, it seems to me, that the Congress of the United States should fail to duly appreciate its relation to the District of Columbia. I have never been a member of the District committee and have had no special relations with any of the special interests of the District. In dealing with this subject I occupy simply the position of a representative citizen of the United States of America.

Mr. Chairman, the capital of any great State in this Union without a free public library would be a stigma upon the intelligence and civilization of the State, and there is scarcely a great city in the country that to-day has not one or more free libraries created, promoted, sustained by taxes drawn by operation of law from the taxable property of the constituency. We have here the capital of a nation of sixty-five or seventy millions of people, a nation that ought to be proud of its capital, a nation that ought to be ready and able and willing to challenge France in her beautification of her beautiful Paris; to challenge Belgium in her adornment and development of her beautiful Brussels.

In this mightiest of all the republics of the world the capital city should be fostered, builded, and furnished with every appliance of civilization in competition, in successful competition, with the capitals of all the nations of the earth. If the Government of the United States can not build an appraiser's warehouse in New York; if we have come to a point where we can not erect a public building for the transaction of the public business of the city of Chicago; if, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], we have reached a condition of practical insolvency, I think we had better resign and go out of business as a nation.

Mr. QUIGG. Or else change the Administration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But while we are in business, I protest against advertising to the world that we are incompetent or unwilling to do that which civilization demands of every government.

Here in this great city, with nearly 275,000 people, with its outlines of beauty, its capacity for beautification such as no other city in the world has, we learn with mortification and shame as American citizens that the people residing here have no public library. And then somebody talks about having the people of the District, the employés of a great government, the men who are here temporarily, "chipping in" something to buy the books for a public library—the Government of the United States going out upon the streets, hat in hand, "Coxey 'wealer" fashion, to petition the temporary lodger in the city to help buy books for the edification, enlightenment, and education of the people of the country.

I certainly feel it my duty to see to it that the people of this District have as good a chance for education as have the people of the other cities of the United States.

I do not discuss the details of this bill. It may be wise to strike out the Congressional Library and insert the new post-office building or provide a new building specially for the library. But what I stand here to insist upon is that it is due to the honor, the integrity, the grandeur, and the civilization of the people of the United States that now, when this appeal has been made to Congress, we shall recognize the propriety, the imperative duty, of Congress to legislate in favor of this great library enterprise. What are the people of this District? What is this District? Is it antagonistic to the Government of the United States? It is our District; it is the property of the people of the United States, politically speaking. It is under the jurisdiction of Congress. Congress provides and must provide all its legislation.

We have disfranchised the people of the District. They have no power to legislate; no power to establish a free circulating library. They are, as might well be said, the wards of the Government of the United States. Now, will the Government of the United States treat the people of the District of Columbia in a manner that no great city of this country or of Europe treats its constituency?

Take the city of Birmingham, in England—the low wages district. You find there a magnificent library, open to every man, woman, and child. Take the city of Inverness, in Scotland. Take all the large cities—I need not discriminate or speak of one above another—and you find ample provision in this respect. Yet when you come to the capital of free, enlightened America, we have a restricted library, a library with a restricted liberty as to its use by the citizen. When you come to inquire for a great, free, people's library we have it not.

I deny that this Government stands paralyzed in its functions. I deny that even in the hands of the present Administration this Government is unable to do that which is fair and just and right. And I am in favor of this library bill upon the system most conducive to a wise administration, and I think the people of the country will indorse the action of Congress in that behalf.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Mr. Chairman, this bill is one which excites my earnest sympathy; and I am really surprised, although I know the jealousy that exists in this House against anything which looks like a local appropriation or a local expenditure in the city of Washington, that this measure has not met with more sympathy than has been manifested on this floor.

I have a vivid recollection of the time when I was a boy and when the war had destroyed the opportunities for schools and the materials for reading and for libraries—I recollect the boon it was to me when I could get hold of some old odd volume that had survived the wreck and destruction of war.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] has no sympathy with a provision for a library which shall circulate books among the people. He has no sympathy with a library open at convenient hours, making it accessible to the working people, to those who are confined during business hours, and to the school boys and girls who have to come after school hours to get their books or to do their reading. He says that a great library should be simply a collection of antique works of reference, or rare volumes for the literary connoisseur. I say, sir, that the great function of books is to be read, and to be read by as many people as can be reached by them.

Mr. Chairman, this proposition has nothing of the character which gentlemen have sought to impress the House that it possesses. We already have in Washington a public school system, and a good one. It is paid for out of the funds of the District and of the United States. It is paid for by District appropriations. And a free library is nothing in the world but a supplement to the public school system. It is nothing in the world but the poor man's college. How is he to get access to the great volumes of thought? How is he to have the time and the opportunity to seek the wellsprings of knowledge, of truth, of information? He can get them in this way and in no other way.

Gentlemen may sneer at the proposition that it is a far better plan to establish libraries than to build jails; nevertheless it is a truth that a taste for reading and the opportunity for reading—the access to books—is one of the greatest benefits that we can confer on the great masses of our fellow-citizens; and one of the greatest benefits that we can put in the way of growing boys and girls, who come out of the tedious routine of mere school studies, is an opportunity of looking into these great vistas of enlightenment, of beauty, and of wisdom, that are opened to them through the doors of the free public library.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the House a moment to what is proposed to be done and for whom this action is proposed to be taken. We have in the Congressional Library at present about 15,000 volumes that the Librarian says are worse than useless; that they simply incumber that much space. Mr. Spofford says that it would be embarrassing to the Congressional Library proper, a great library of reference, to have it also a circulating library, in the sense of a free library, with the right to remove books, with reading rooms, etc.; that the Library would be better off without them. So we have 15,000 volumes that are of no service in the present Library, and can be applied to the purpose contemplated by this bill.

When I walk to the door of that great collection and look into it and consider that I have access to hundreds of thousands of books, when I have now no time to read them and but little appetite for them, and consider what they would have been to me when I had both time and appetite for them, I will not stand here throwing any objections in the way—mere technical objections—to prevent the people of the District of Columbia from having that privilege so much desired, and which they can only have through our action. It is not a peculiar privilege. Every progressive city throughout the country—I mean one after the other as they come to the question—either have established public libraries or are establishing them as the time goes by.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. What right have you to give the surplus volumes in the Congressional Library to the District of Columbia when we owe them to the town of Beaufort, in South Carolina?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I am exceedingly glad the gentleman has called attention to that point. I desire to answer him now. I have sat here, Mr. Chairman, and heard the gentleman from New York, time after time, get up and object to and combat every just claim for compensation that came from the South against the United States Government regardless of its merits and wholly regardless of whether he knew anything about it or not.

Mr. BARTLETT. Not for a library, however.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. But now, when by interposing such an objection he can embarrass the location of a free public library in Washington, for the first time since the gentleman has been a member of this House such a claim finds favor with him, and he proposes to pay the town of Beaufort, not in money for the books taken and destroyed, not by buying and giving them others to replace them, but by taking away the books now in the library here and sending them down there. That is a system of "robbing Peter to pay Paul" that I do not favor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in addition to the 15,000 volumes already in the Library, there are some 20,000 volumes of books for circulating purposes, books of general reading, in the libraries of the various Departments. We are not creating a new thing. We furnish now in the Department of the Interior, in the Treasury Department, and in the War Department free circulating libraries, and are paying the expenses of maintaining them. You have already bought the books and are paying the expenses of running the libraries, although no one has access to these libraries except the clerks in the several Departments. This bill does not touch a single technical book there. They are expressly excluded, but the general circulating books it is proposed to take away and put them in some place here where the people of the District can reach and read them, and where the working people and the school children can read them. The sole purpose, in other words, is to make them accessible to our people, and this is the best way we can do it.

Again, Mr. Chairman, these books are encumbering the Library and occupying a large space. Determined objection has been made to using any portion of the new post-office building for this purpose, but when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was asked whether he would vote for the bill if we substituted the new Library Building instead of the post-office building we could get no assurance from him on that head. It is the pretext of men who want to vote against the measure. If that is the great objection it can easily be obviated. It is by no means material. The recommendation of a portion of the post-office building was made because of the fact that it was a central location and easily accessible from all parts of the city.

We wanted to make a library that would be accessible to the working people, a useful library for the general reading public most convenient of access, and for that reason this site was selected. This post-office building has 340,000 square feet of room. It is proposed to take for this library a small portion of this immense space, about 6,000 square feet, which can readily be spared for the purpose; but if the House is opposed we will not combat an amendment to put the library in the new Library Building, although I think the other location is far more desirable.

Mr. Spofford thought it was better to keep it entirely apart. That was one reason why it was intended to keep it apart. Doubtless it could be added there; but because the new post-office was more central, and for the other reasons, we preferred to accept that.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I understand you to say that this bill will give the citizens of the District of Columbia a right which they could not otherwise have. Please explain; is there any law that will prohibit the citizens of the District of Columbia from having a free circulating library as they do in other cities and towns? What law is there which prevents them from exercising that right?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. In the first place, they can not have access to these volumes of United States books.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Do they not have such access now?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. They do not, in a way that is of use to them.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I understand they do.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. They do not in a way that a free circulating library and reading room would reach the people who would be most benefited by it. They can not take away books without complying with certain regulations which make them inaccessible to those that need them most.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I understood the gentleman to say they were prohibited by law?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I said nothing of the sort. I said that there was no law which made these books properly accessible to them. I said that there was no provision of law which did for them what is done in other cities, in making a free library and reading room, and I said that they could not make a public library and reading room for themselves, to be paid for out of the public funds, without an act of Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, who are particularly to be reached by this bill? There are in the District of Columbia about 63,000 children of school age. There are over 30,000 of these over 12 years of age. They are at that time of life when access to a free library and to these sources of knowledge will assist them in the forming of a literary taste and keep them from forming other tastes that are injurious, instead of promotive of their welfare through life. This large class should be taken into consideration. There are in the District about 23,000 adults engaged in lines of work classed as manufactures, omitting all the other numerous forms of labor. A free public library and reading room, under such regulations as would permit proper access to and use of the books and reading room is highly important to them, and the present library does not at all accomplish it.

But gentlemen say, "Why should the United States do this?" Why should the United States have a fire department here? Why should the United States have public schools here? Why should the United States have anything else that belongs to a city? We should have it because the Congress of the United States is the city government of this city, and because this city is set apart as the capital of the United States, under peculiar conditions. It has no local government. We should have it because we should do for Washington what every progressive local government does for every progressive city in this land.

It is said that the United States should not make any appropriations for libraries here. How many of you on this floor have school systems aided by the United States? How many of you have agricultural colleges? The United States has granted 80,000,000 acres to the States for public schools, 1,500,000 acres for State universities, and this is a people's university that we are asking this House to provide. The United States has given nearly 10,000,000 acres of land for agricultural colleges.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will my friend allow me to suggest that the United States is now and has been for a long time paying half the expenses of maintaining the public-school system of this District?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Undoubtedly, and for that reason this is no novelty. A proper free library is simply a supplement to the common-school system of the country.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is something of an offset against the donations of land to the States.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Not at all. The United States is simply contributing its part of the taxes, substantially. It gave away these countless millions of acres for schools and universities and colleges. A free public library is nothing but a common-school extension. I remember in our part of the country, with the independent ideas of our old-time people, when they stoutly maintained that it was no part of the functions of a government to assist any public school; but that idea has passed away, and this idea of opposing governmental aid to an educational institution like this is just as much a mossback prejudice as ever was the prejudice against public schools.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said that we are the government of Washington. This is the capital of the United States. I know that it is a cheap form of supposed political capital to get up and to object to every expenditure made for public purposes here of which the United States will pay a portion. But I believe the gentlemen who think that that line of talk and that that sentiment meets the approval of their constituents are far wrong.

There is scarcely a citizen of the United States who does not come through Washington at different times. I believe that the people of this country appreciate and take pride in this beautiful city—this Paris of America.

This is the capital of our country. I believe the people of the country desire to make proper expenditures for all that the Government should do here; and I do not believe that they desire to have this city without a free public library such as every second and third-rate progressive city of the land is establishing under government agencies for the development of the city and the enlightenment of its people and the perfection of its citizenship. This is a question of educating our citizens, giving them habits of reading, and keeping them out of objectionable places. This is in the line of progress, of good government; and I trust the bill may pass.

How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida has thirty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I yield my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I confess that I have been very much surprised at the course the debate on this bill has taken. I supposed that on the general proposition of establishing a free public library there would be absolutely no dissent on this floor.

Mr. Chairman, if any city of the United States outside of Washington with one-tenth the population of this city, was charged with being entirely out of a free circulating library, it would be considered a disgrace to the city. In my State, a city of 1,500 inhabitants without a free circulating library is considered an anomaly. In cities of 5,000 and over, by an act of the General Assembly, they are authorized to vote taxes to support one.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. But the State does not pay half the expense.

Mr. HULL. I will come to that, if my friend will wait. In my own city, where we had less than 30,000, we had a circulating library containing more books than will be contained in this proposed library, with all the volumes that the Government proposes to turn over to it.

Mr. GEAR. We have had it since there were less than 15,000.

Mr. HULL. We had a free library when the city had less than 10,000 inhabitants; and we started it at the expense of all the city. Now, why is Washington without one? Simply because Washington has not the means that every village and town and city of the United States has to establish one for itself. It must come to Congress.

Why, gentleman talk as though this was an unheard-of proposition for the Government to pay half the expenses of this library. The Government pays half of all taxes here and owns more than half of the property. I will say to my friend from South Carolina, who suggested that the employés were drawing salaries such that they could afford to establish a library of their own, that the Congressional Library spends thousands and thousands of dollars practically for the benefit of Members of Congress and judges of the Supreme Court for the law library, as I understand that is a part of the Congressional Library, and for a few people with abundant leisure who can come to the Congressional Library and read.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. They all have the same right. These employés can come there, too.

Mr. HULL. The Congressional Library is open at the same time these employés are compelled to be at their desks. Not only that, but I will say to my friend from South Carolina that the Government has been paying about $10,000 a year to keep up a medical library alone; and we are now paying $8,500 each year for it.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. The Government has been doing a good many things that I do not think right, and I expect it will continue to do a good many things I do not think right.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Chairman, the only way the people of the District of Columbia can obtain a library is through the action of Congress. Debate has not taken the position or line or shape that I thought it should do, but has been simply a question of location. Let us establish a library. The place to open it can be changed.

Now a word as to another question. My friend from Illinois [Mr. SMITH], whom I esteem highly, made an argument that if it was necessary for the people to have a library, for them to come together themselves and vote upon it and establish one. I want to say that I do not think there are more than one or two places in the country where a library has been established by voluntary contributions. Have you any such libraries in Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. We have.

Mr. HULL. I ask the gentleman if they were not established by the proper authorities, in the form of local government, and not by voluntary contributions.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. If I can have just a moment, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that there are quite a number of public libraries in my district. I am proud of the fact, and the vote shows the necessity of it, I suppose.

Mr. HULL. But my question is whether they were established by your local government?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. By individual contributions.

Mr. HULL. Your local government did not establish the libraries?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The local governments did not establish them. We got together and formed associations that contributed money to procure rooms and furnish periodicals.

Mr. HULL. Are they incorporated?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Some of them are and some are not.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I think that is very much against the gentleman's district. According to my friend's statement they have a few public spirited people there who are willing to establish libraries, but the local governments of the cities, towns, and localities are not public spirited enough to establish such libraries under the forms of law. Now they must be incorporated as private corporations or else there is no authority to take care of the books. In this case the city of Washington coming to Congress for this library is simply coming to its town council. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] talks as though this bill proposed to appropriate the entire surplus space in the new post-office building. Why, sir, it appropriates only 6,000 square feet, and we gain more than twice as much space in the Departments.

Mr. HEARD. It appropriates less than one-fiftieth part of the total area of the building.

Mr. DOCKERY. It appropriates——

Mr. HULL. I know what the gentleman is going to say; he said it before. [Laughter.] It appropriates space enough to accomodate 75,000 volumes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I never said that before. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL. Yes, you did. You read the section. It appropriates just enough space to accomodate that number of volumes, which is estimated by competent authority to be 6,000 square feet. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the proposition to establish this library should not be combatted by anyone. So far as the point of the Government being in partnership in the matter is concerned, that is no argument, because the Government of the United States is in partnership with the District of Columbia on all lines of local improvement.

It is not so in our home localities. It is not so in the home of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT], or in the home of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]; but it is so here.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. If the people here have not the right to do this, suppose we just pass a law giving them the right to organize their board and go ahead and establish their library without any appropriation from the Government. I would be very glad to do that. Let them go ahead and build their own building and furnish their own library.

Mr. HULL. Certainly. But it should be remembered that nearly one-half the patrons of this library will be Government employés.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. And I would like to say at that point that these Government employés are the best paid people in the world.

Mr. HULL. No, they are not. The gentleman from South Carolina, himself, is better paid than any man who sits at the clerk's desk in this country. [Laughter.] We who sit in this Hall are all better paid, and yet we have a library provided for us, and not only that, but we do not even have to carry the books home; we have them sent to our rooms.

But, Mr. Chairman, the point I want to get at is that these Department employés are at their desks from 9 in the morning until 4 in the afternoon, the very hours when the Congressional Library is open, and therefore it is of no benefit to them.

The fact is that a free public library, to be of any use to the masses of the people must be open at night, and it would be foreign to the purposes of the Congressional Library to make it a circulating library. In such a library as is here proposed the hours when it would be of the greatest benefit to the poor boys and the poor girls, and the working people of the District, would be from 7 to 10 o'clock in the evening. We have libraries for Congress, we have libraries for our judges, we have libraries for our doctors; now, my good friend from South Carolina, join with us in helping to establish a library for the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. How about the people all over the country?

Mr. HULL. As to my part of the country, it would be a disgrace to any town of a thousand people in the State of Iowa not to have a public library.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. But they have them at their own expense.

Mr. HULL. If we were legislating for the gentleman's district, if the Government of the United States owned one-half the property in his district, if we were in partnership with his constituents in their public schools, in their street improvements, in all their public improvements, then it would be entirely proper that we should be in partnership with them in their library, but we have no such connection with them.

This proposed library, as was well stated by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. COOPER], is really to be an extension of the common-school system, to bring within the reach of every child and every family the means of literary culture. In my judgment it is a disgrace to this nation that Washington, with nearly three hundred thousand people, has not a library for the common people of the District. Now, if it is wrong to take a part of this new post-office building for this purpose, let gentlemen who are opposed to that feature of the bill move to substitute something else. If this library should be put in the Congressional Library building an amendment will carry it there.

So far as I am concerned, I believe that it should be nearer the center of the city, and should be kept open at night for the accommodation of the people of this District. As I have already said, more space will be gained in the Departments than is proposed to be given to this library in the new post-office building. We do not trench upon any purpose for which the building is being erected. We take 6,000 square feet, less than one-fiftieth part of the space in the building, a space which will not be needed at present, and before it is needed for other purposes I trust that the District of Columbia will have a building where this library can be kept.

And I wish to say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] that if we will establish this library, if we will do as we ought to have done ten years ago, inaugurate a free library for the District of Columbia, there will be many wealthy people who will contribute to build it up and make it a library that the people of the United States can have pride in.

I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT].

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I shall detain the committee but a moment, for the gentleman who has just occupied the floor [Mr. HULL] and others have stated many of the reasons that have occurred to me why this bill ought to become a law. I am glad to see here a bill looking in the direction of establishing a free public library and reading room for the common people of the District.

The fact is that no such reading room or library now exists. Gentlemen have said that we have the Congressional Library to which the people have access. It has been replied that that Library is open only during certain hours. It is open only from 9 to 4 daily, except when Congress may sit later, and then the moment the two Houses adjourn the Library is closed. That Library is in no way accessible to the 33,000 children over 12 years of age who need library facilities, for during these hours they are in school. It is in no way accessible to the 23,000 working men of the District who ought to have library facilities, for during those hours they are at work. It is accessible merely to certain privileged classes; and let me read an enumeration of those classes, that it may be seen how restricted are the operations of this library:

No book shall be taken from the Library except by the President, the Vice-President, Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress:
Heads of Departments:
The justices, reporter, and clerk of the Supreme Court:
The judges and clerk of the Court of Claims:
Representatives at Washington of foreign governments:
The Solicitor-General and Assistant Attorneys-General:
The Secretary of the Senate:
The Clerk of the House of Representatives:
The Solicitor of the Treasury:
The disbursing agent of the Committee on the Library:
Ex-Presidents of the United States:
The Chaplains of the two Houses of Congress:
The Secretary and Regents of the Smithsonian Institution:
The members and Secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission:
Chief of Engineers of the Army.

There is a provision, Mr. Chairman, by which on the order of a Member or Senator a book can be procured, but not for the use of the individual presenting the order; always for the use of the Senator or Member.

This is shown by the following:

INSTRUCTIONS OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE OF CONGRESS ON THE LIBRARY TO THE LIBRARIAN.

The Library Committee have instructed me to ask you to enforce strictly the law in relation to the use of the Library.

No books should be given out upon the orders of members in favor of those who are not members.

This is directly contrary to the law, which confines the delivery of books to members themselves and other specified persons. If a member sends an order for a particular book which he wants, he is entitled to it; but if it be an order in favor of another person, or for such other person's use, it can not be delivered according to law.

Such are the limitations upon the use of this great Library, which it has been argued here serves the purpose of a popular library. It is far from doing so in fact.

Mr. Chairman, we should remember our relations to the District of Columbia. It is objected to this bill that by it the United States go into partnership. But the fact is the United States has already taken this District into partnership in everything pertaining to District affairs—everything, the police department, the fire department, the public schools, etc.—and the measure now proposed is only another step in the process of education.

It seems to me the judgment of every candid man will say that there should be some place provided for workingmen and others who desire the use of an institution of this kind in the evenings. You license saloons all over the District, but you provide no places that may afford a healthful and elevating counter attraction. It is true there are the theaters, but they are only a sort of midway plaisance. It is the duty of the American Congress to establish a free reading room, and have it open during the evening hours, to which men with their daily labor completed may repair and enjoy the companionship of books. You should do this for the benefit of the young working men and women of the District. You should at least place over against the saloons which you have licensed and tolerate as legal establishments, and on account of which you have received the cash, the competition of a free reading room, the antidote for ignorance and dissipation. How can we do less and do our duty? On reflection, all will agree that the people of this District ought to have the library provided by this bill.

Just a word as to where this library should be housed. Objection has been made to the place designated in the bill—the new post-office building. This objection was first suggested by my friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]; but when he undertook to state the objection it was apparent to all that it was sentimental rather than substantial.

The objection, as stated by the gentleman, is because this building was dedicated in the first instance to the uses of the post-office in this city; and on second thought was to be sent up eight stories, to store public records belonging to the various Departments and make room for the overflow of clerks from the Departments.

Well, I will admit that these are all good uses, but are they better than that proposed by this bill which asks for only 6,000 of the 340,000 for a free library, called by some one a minority of the people? What is there so sacred about this new post-office building, "this modern building," as the gentleman designates it, apparently as a reason why it should not be used by this proposed library as to make it improper for this university of the people to have a place in it?

There seems to be no good reason against the use of this building for this purpose; not only this, but the fact that it is built for local purposes, viz, to accommodate the city post-office, is really a reason why this library should be accommodated there also; inasmuch as it is conceded that not one-fourth part of the space within it will be needed for post-office purposes. It is also centrally located, and a place of continual public resort, as every post-office is, and the library there would be more easily available than in almost any other place that could be named.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly arose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 6642, had come to no resolution thereon.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That after the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order in the House to move that the order heretofore made requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on H. R. 4864 be rescinded; that the conferees heretofore appointed on the part of the House be discharged from further duty in that behalf, and that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments to said bill in gross, and agree to the same. That after two hours' debate on said motion (which shall be indivisible) the vote shall be taken without delay or other motion; general leave to print is hereby granted for ten days.

Resolved, second, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to present for consideration, without reference to a committee, separate bills placing upon the free list sugar in all its forms, coal, iron ore, and barbed wire. Each of said bills when presented shall be considered in the House. Thirty minutes' debate shall be allowed on each bill, and at the end of such debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered thereon, and without delay or other motion the vote shall be taken.

Mr. CATCHINGS. On the adoption of the resolution I demand the previous question.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to raise a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED. One portion of the order presented by the Committee on Rules proposes to take action upon a bill which, in my judgment, is not before the House at this time, and consequently it would not be in order for the House to pass the resolution now submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi, and I will state briefly to the Speaker my reasons for occupying that position.

When the two Houses differ in reference to a matter of legislation it is at their option to leave the matter there, and the bill is lost; or one of the Houses, having possession of the papers, may ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes, in which case there is either an agreement or a disagreement. If there is an agreement by the conference committee the bill then goes to the assenting House; not to the House that asked for the conference, but to the House that assented to the conference. In case of a disagreement, the bill goes to the body first asking the conference, the reason of this difference being very simple and founded on a principle of parliamentary law.

In the case of an agreement the bill goes to the assenting House, and not to the House asking the conference, because the assenting House is supposed to be the most reluctant or the more reluctant to come to an agreement. Hence, unless it passes that House, it is no use to present it to the other. Therefore, in the case of an agreement, the papers go, as I have said, to the assenting House.

In the case of a disagreement the papers go to the House which first asked the conference, upon the ground that the House having asked the conference is the House most desirous of accommodating the difference between the two Houses, and therefore that House is intrusted with the papers because all parliamentary law favors an agreement.

The papers can not remain with both Houses, because they must be in parliamentary sense, as they must be in physical sense, in one place only at one time. Otherwise the result would be that the two Houses might take entirely different action on the same subject, which would be the frustration of all agreement, or extreme confusion.

If you take this case as it stands at present, we might have the spectacle—provided the Senate possessed as little firmness as this body seems to possess—we might have the Senate presenting the spectacle of a recession from its amendments to the House bill, at the same time when the House was receding from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate; and then which bill would be law would be excessively puzzling except to those persons who cut Gordian knots and do not untie them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the position in regard to this bill? But before going to that I desire to fortify myself by reference to a ruling of Mr. Speaker Colfax on the 1st day of June, 1864, in the first session of the Thirty-eighth Congress. Mr. Washburn undertook to submit a conference report on House bill 426. Mr. Colfax, the Speaker, inquired which House asked for the conference; and was informed that it was the House of Representatives. And the Speaker further inquired if the Senate had acted on the report, and was told that it had not. The Speaker then ruled the motion out of order. This entirely irrespective of the question where the bill physically was.

This case is authority for two propositions: First, that the conference report must be acted upon primarily by the body which assents to the conference; and, second, that even if the papers are before the House, unless they are rightfully before the House, the House has no authority to act. These two propositions are perfectly plain and clear in parliamentary law. The status of the bill in case of agreement, and in case of disagreement, is also equally clear.

I admit—because I should not undertake to speak to this House without stating what I knew upon the subject—I admit that the action of the two Houses, no dispute being made, is often irregular; but never, so far as my knowledge goes, when the point has been raised and the question presented to either of the bodies. It may be that such irregular action has been taken, but so far as the limited research I have been able to give, that is my opinion.

Now, that being the case, what is the condition and situation of this bill? The House passed the bill and it went to the Senate. The Senate added six hundred and odd amendments. It voted to insist upon those amendments, and to ask a committee of conference before the House had had an opportunity for action. That is rather a new method, but it has been established, apparently, within the last six or eight years. The bill then came over to the House, and the House assented to the conference.

The bill and the papers came here. The conferees reported a disagreement, and the House and Senate then acted upon that disagreement, and continued to disagree. The legal result was that those papers went to the Senate. I have been told that upon agreeing to the proposition for a conference the Senate returned the bill with the message. If that was done it was irregular, because no papers need to be sent to any House unless that House is to take action upon those papers.

Recollect that the key to the whole situation is the rule that no House can act upon papers which are not before it, and not properly before it. It is impossible that it should be otherwise. If it were possible that it should be otherwise, we might have the two bodies acting at the same time upon the same or similar papers, which could only lead to confusion and to discredit to the business action of both bodies. The papers then, it being a case of disagreement, are properly before the Senate, because that body was the body that first asked for a conference.

There can be no better illustration of the wisdom and soundness of this than the actual position of public affairs at this moment. The Senate said: "We will pass your bill if you will admit our amendments:" That was upon July 2, a month and ten days ago, if I have the date right. The House refused the amendments of the Senate. There has been one conference, which has resulted in a disagreement. Another conference is now pending and inexistence. The bill must be in the hands of the Senate, although it may be in the custody of the conferees.

Nevertheless that is where the bill is, and the Senate to-day is proposing action upon it, and the House to-day is proposing action upon it, the House having repented of its bill and the Senate having repented of its bill also, and there being at this moment no assenting agreement possible between the two bodies, because each one of them is very properly ashamed of its own offspring and disgusted with the offspring of the other. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Now it is proposed that one body, the body which has not the papers, shall proceed to take action and actually climb over every legal obstacle in order to get at the nauseous meal which has been set before them, the nature of which they themselves have described.

Upon my word, I never heard of such a spectacle in parliamentary history, or any other; but I will not dwell upon that, because my point is entirely upon the parliamentary situation. I say that there can be no better example of the absurdity of the doctrine which that rule contemplates to uphold than just this present. It is intended that the laws of this land shall have the assent of both Houses. Thus far this bill has had the dissent of both of them. Thus far it has the opposition of both Houses, and this House is endeavoring to take a snap judgment, ready to take what it has so utterly denounced on all occasions for fear of worse.

Mr. DUNN. For fear of McKinleyism.

Mr. REED. The Senate, on the other hand, is contemplating some sort of action on this question. Now, suppose that should happen to be simultaneous. Suppose that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DUNN] who just interrupted me should succeed in his effort to swallow what he has been unwilling even to look at. [Laughter.] Suppose he should adorn his record by this interesting back-down. Suppose he should be wreathed and garlanded by this action. He was rather late in getting upon the roll of honor. He seems to be ahead in getting on the roll of dishonor. [Laughter.] Suppose the Senate at the same moment should demand the bill for the purpose of taking other action upon it. What situation should we be in?

But, on the other hand, upon the proposition that the House which ought to take action upon the bill is the House which has the papers, why, the whole matter is perfectly simple, and it passes from one House to the other.

I am quite well aware that one precedent, and very possibly more, might be found, in which the Senate or the House may have taken some action like this without having the question raised; but if that is so, that is no authority, no more than it would be authority, for instance, to claim that I might attempt to send this rule back to the Committee on Rules, upon the ground that two Democrats have already been allowed to do it. The Speaker would say if some Republican asked it—very possibly the Speaker would say, that the question had not been raised; and thereupon rule according to his idea of parliamentary law. Authorities are to be found only in cases where the question has been brought up; and even the statement of a judge, made in deciding another case, never controls the case that is up, unless that was the case which was decided.

I do not know that I shall succeed in convincing gentlemen who come here to record caucus action; very possibly not; but I shall certainly put them in the condition of the heathen after having listened to the missionary—they will not have any chance of redemption. [Laughter.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to decide the question. In order that the House may fully understand the exact question that is——

Mr. REED. Permit me a single word; to present one citation that I wanted to make.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. It is from Jefferson's Manual, which is the rule of the House.

In the case of a conference asked after a vote of disagreement the conferees of the House asking it are to leave the papers with the conferees of the other body; and in one case where they refused to receive them they were allowed to lie on the table in the conference chamber.

The SPEAKER. In order to fully understand the exact question presented by the gentleman from Maine it is necessary, first, to look at the exact condition of this bill, and, second, to the exact proposition that has been recommended in the report which has been read.

The House passed a bill. It went to the Senate. The Senate amended that bill and requested a conference. The House acceded to the request for a conference. The conference was held and a report of disagreement reported to the respective Houses; the House received the report, and asked a conference and transmitted the papers to the Senate.

When it reached the Senate, that body did something more than agree to the request for a conference. It was then in the power of the Senate to have receded from its disagreement in toto, and the bill would have become law; but the Senate did not do that. They insisted upon their amendments and returned the bill to the House. Now, of course, under the parliamentary law, where a bill is theoretically it ought to be practically and physically. The gentleman from Maine cites a case where the point was made upon a report presented in the House that the Senate had acceded to the request for a conference and it was not in order to present the report in the House until the Senate had acted. That seems to be the scope and effect of Jefferson's Manual. But the rule which is now before the House proposes to change the rule in Jefferson's Manual so far as this proceeding is concerned. So that the question arises, not whether under Jefferson's Manual this course may be pursued, but whether if the House chooses to change that rule its act is legal, binding, and valid.

There is no question that the House has the right to change or abrogate or alter any rule in Jefferson's Manual so far as it applies to its proceedings, but the question to consider now is as to the validity of the act, conceding that the rule authorizes the act to be done. So that the precedent cited by the gentleman, where the Speaker under that rule refused to receive the report, does not cover this question. Now, as to the effect this rule would have if adopted, I have found but one precedent, and that was in the Forty-second Congress at the second session. I have the history of that bill, Senate bill 508. It passed the Senate on May 16, 1872.

On May 31 a message was received from the House stating that the House had passed with amendment the bill of the Senate 508. On June 1 the Senate disagreed to the amendment of the House to said bill, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appointed conferees. On June 4 a message was received from the House stating that the House had insisted upon its amendment to Senate bill 508, and had agreed to the conference. On June 10, 1872, on motion of Mr. Harlan, one of the conferees on the part of the Senate, the committee of conference on said bill was discharged from its further consideration, and the Senate receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agreed to the same; and the House Journal shows that on June 10, 1872, when this action was taken in the Senate on motion of one of the conferees, and during the existence of the conference committee, the bill was in the House.

Now, that case is on all fours with this. In that case the Senate passed the bill; in this case the House passed it. In that case the Senate disagreed to the House amendment and asked for a conference, and the House acceded to the request for a conference. Under the rule laid down in Jefferson's Manual if an agreement to report had been made it must first have been made in the House. But there was no agreement. The conferees in that case, as in this case, had failed to reach an agreement, and in the Senate, on motion of Mr. Harlan, one of the conferees, the conferees were discharged and the Senate receded and the bill became a law.

Now, the object of all conferences between the two Houses is to get the minds of the Houses together to pass the bill. The Senate conferees are insisting upon the Senate amendments. The House conferees are insisting upon the rejection of those amendments. That conference committee is now in existence, and it has been held in the case just indicated that, pending that condition of affairs, the House which has rejected the amendment may recede from that action and permit the bill to become a law. In this connection, as showing the difference in the character of proceedings where there are disagreements between the two Houses, and the proceedings had generally in either House, I ask the Clerk to read from a decision of Speaker Carlisle.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Speaker overruled the point of order, upon the ground that the proceedings, when there has been a disagreement between the two branches of a legislative body, are different in many respects from the proceedings in other cases. The paramount object of all such proceedings is to bring the two branches to an agreement. Therefore either may, without reconsidering previous votes, take action in a directly opposite direction. For instance, the House may refuse to concur in an amendment, and may afterward insist again and again upon its disagreement to the amendment, and yet it may ultimately, without reconsidering any of these votes, recede absolutely from its disagreement, or recede from it with an amendment, as its judgment may dictate. And, while it is competent under the recent practice of the House to instruct conference committees, still the House in that case, as in the other, may ultimately recede from its disagreement to the very amendment in regard to which it had instructed its conferees to insist on a disagreement; and that may be done with or without a conference report upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. REED. I will yield the floor until the gentleman from Mississippi explains this matter.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I prefer that the gentleman should take his time now. [Cries of "Vote!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. I think your feeling, gentlemen, is perfectly natural. The job that you have got to do is such that the sooner you get over it the better you will feel. [Laughter and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" on the Democratic side.] But at the same time you will have to listen to a plain statement of what you are doing, and you will recognize it yourselves, and it is because you recognize it in advance that you are crying, "Vote!" "Vote!" "Vote!" Your class of people in the latter day will be crying, in similar fashion, for the mountains to fall on them. [Laughter.]

The first proposition which you are called upon to vote is that you will take action upon papers which are not before you, that you will violate the principles of parliamentary law in order to do a thing which you yourselves have proclaimed to be disgusting. You are going to trample upon the barriers which preserve the rights of the people of this country, in order to perform an act which would be distasteful to gentlemen who were differently constituted from yourselves. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

You are going to do it in defiance of all your protestations, in defiance of all your declarations. You are going to die not only in the last ditch, but in the very lowest part of the ditch. [Laughter on the Republican side.] You realize how distasteful and dissatisfying all this is, and you put into the order some trimmings. You are satisfied that what you are going to do needs seasoning, and you propose to garnish it with suitable seasoning, too. You are going to enact a bill which you believe not to be an honest bill, and you are going to accompany it with a parade which you also know is not honest. You are going to desert the "roll of honor" [laughter] in order to trick yourselves out with the gewgaws that are contained in this proposition. You are going to give us free sugar—yes, in your minds. [Laughter.] You are going to give us free coal—oh, my friends! And then you are going to give us free iron, and you are going to do it in a bold and manly way, like the backdown you are making here. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

You are going to have no committee of this House, not even your own pliant committee, to stand between you and the noble purpose that thrills your souls. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] You fear that a bill for free sugar will be contaminated by passing through a committee which may have become an appendage of another portion of what has been discovered to be the legislative branch of this country. You are going to march to free coal over the dead bodies of the Ways and Means Committee. You are going to have free iron ore in defiance of the rules of this House, in defiance of the rules which you have always proclaimed were necessary for the due transaction of public business. You are going to give half an hour to the discussion of free sugar in all its branches! You are going to give fifteen minutes on a side to discuss the question of coal! You are going to give fifteen minutes on a side to discuss the question of iron! You are going to give an hour on a side to discuss six hundred amendments, no one of which has been touched by this House, one-tenth of a second for each amendment! [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Now, how do you like the whole programme? You are going to vote it; say how you like it. [A voice on the Democratic side, "First rate!" and laughter.] Providence loves a cheerful devourer. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, how much time has the gentleman from Maine used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee). The gentleman has used eight minutes. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] so much of my time as he may wish. [Loud applause on the Democratic side as Mr. TURNER rose to address the House.]

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I begin by making a confession. I confess that in this rencontre I engage with the gentleman from Maine on a field of honor in which he has won already many prizes. And I am encountering, sir, one of the oracles of parliamentary law. If I were inclined to cherish animosities, if I were disposed to visit upon the head of my tormentor the direst punishment that I could devise, I would point the finger at the gentleman from Maine and say, "This is his own work," or, as the boys in the street would say, I am commending to his own lips the medicine which he has so often devised for us.

After having argued with so much force and ability the parliamentary situation in his opening remarks on the point of order (and the gentleman from Maine always states his propositions with great force and ability) and after the Speaker had overruled his punctilio, the gentleman from Maine now reargues the question, and assumes that this bill is not in the custody of the House, and that what we are about to do is illegal. I cite against the gentleman's last proposition the decision of this House just taken.

But if he wishes to retry the question, in the nature of an appeal on the discussion of this rule, I desire to say to him that he has assumed a great deal when he said that the transmission of this bill to the House, with the last message of the Senate, was an inadvertency or was an illegality. Why does the gentleman assume that that was a wrongful procedure? It was the action of a coördinate branch of Congress——

Mr. REED. I will state——

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman will pardon me until I have finished my statement.

Mr. REED. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman without his consent.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I will consent with pleasure in a moment.

I state that the gentleman assumes this bill came back to the House when the Senate sent its message here agreeing to our last conference; and yet he assumes further that that action of the Senate was wrongful or inadvertent or a mistake. I ask the gentleman why he makes that assumption?

Mr. REED. I answer in the first place that I did not assume the bill came back. I simply stated that I was informed that it came back. And if it did come back, I assumed that it was an error, for this reason: The bill was sent to the Senate because the Senate must take action on it; it was not sent back to the House properly, because the House had no action to take. There is the point I made exactly. And the gentleman from Georgia is large enough to answer the point made by me—not one that he makes himself.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman overestimates my importance, Mr. Speaker. I must look at things plainly, and take that view which occurs to a plain man. The sending of this bill back to the House by the Senate, with its message informing the House of its action, was, in fact, as I understand, accompanied by the bill in question. The gentleman says that there are irregularities in the precedents on these occasions; yet he would not dare take the further step of assuming that such irregularity would vitiate the action taken.

The gentleman from Maine contends that we take the risk of an absurd predicament if we insist on the course we are pursuing, and that one House might concur in an amendment and at the same time the other House might recede from the amendment. This is a forcible statement of the philosophy on which the gentleman bases his opinion. But the gentleman from Maine knows that in cases in which no conference has been ordered, and where one House has one of its bills returned with amendments, the same absurd predicaments could occur by one House concurring in the amendments at the same time that the other recedes from these amendments. Either House could in this supposed case act, or both could have acted, at the same moment and in opposite directions.

And this same condition of affairs might arise in conference cases, if Mr. Carlisle is to be regarded as an authority on parliamentary law. And so the gentleman's plausible contention evaporates. Let me suggest to him that the two Houses are in close proximity, and each generally knows what the other is doing. Argument must always yield to common sense. [Applause.]

Now, the gentleman from Maine has inveighed with some force against the limitation which we propose now to place upon this debate. And on a recent occasion, when the Committee on Rules reported to the House a special dispensation—which was never in very great favor with me when the gentleman from Maine occupied the chair, I admit—the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] complained that two hours was a very limited time in which to debate six hundred and thirty-four amendments. That gentleman did me the honor to read, with very much better emphasis than I could have commanded, some rather indignant remarks of my own when the five hundred and odd amendments of the McKinley bill were in similia casu in this body.

I hope the gentleman quoted the remarks with a distinct personal approval of them. Let me say to the gentleman that I had to "eat dirt" so many times under the administration of the gentleman from Maine, that it has got to be less nauseous to me than it used to be. [Applause.] And I want to commend to my friend from Michigan, as I have already done to the gentleman from Maine, the full measure of even-handed justice. If it took only two hours to impose the burden of the McKinley bill on the American people, in the name of all that is fair ought it to have taken any longer to remove these burdens from the people? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

And, sir, my honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], whose beaming face now confronts me across the aisle, took occasion to use some of the eloquent words uttered by Mr. Garfield, I believe, to the effect that the Democratic party would always be found on the old abandoned camping grounds of the Republican party. Mr. Speaker, we have for a long time been pursuing the trail of the Republican party, and in order that we may overtake them, we are compelled to go over the ground tramped by their feet.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine took occasion to say, by implication at least, that the limitations imposed on this debate by the special order reported by the gentleman from Mississippi do not allow adequate debate on the various items included in the rule. Each one of these items has been in discussion in this Congress for weeks in this body at least, and for months in the other.

Mr. REED. When?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman's party associates in the Senate had three months of unlimited debate upon them.

Mr. REED. But you said in this House.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I said in this body these were under discussion for weeks.

Mr. REED. These amendments?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. These amendments were under discussion for weeks, if anybody had desired to do so.

The gentleman from Maine, I am sure, does not wish to be specially technical. The gentleman knows that I mean that the subjects of these propositions involved in the separate bills to be offered were here, liable to discussion, for weeks, and for months in the other branch of Congress.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that we could not possibly have discussed those amendments before they were made?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Does not the gentleman know that the whole tariff question was open here for debate for a whole month?

Mr. REED. No, sir.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Why does the gentleman say so?

Mr. REED. Simply because we were cut off and limited in our discussion of these matters, and we did not know what the Senate amendments would be, and I never heard of a man who could discuss an amendment which had never been made.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Now, the gentleman does not understand me, or is taking a very technical position.

Mr. REED. It really does not strike me that way.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman knows that I am referring to the subject-matter of these propositions, and the gentleman knows that they were subject to his assault here at any time for a month, and the gentleman knows that the same matters were undergoing discussion, exclusively by his party associates, in the Senate for months. I therefore assume, Mr. Speaker, that the discussion of these matters had been adequate and sufficient. And I am glad of the opportunity to be able to dispose of these matters, under all these circumstances, after a very limited debate.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Carlisle sugar-trust schedule had not been made when the bill was under discussion in the House.

A MEMBER on the Democratic side. How did you get the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has seven minutes.

Mr. REED. I am very glad that the gentleman from Georgia has addressed the House. I am always delighted when I know that the heaviest artillery has been fired, because I can then look over the field and estimate accurately what the damage will be. The fact that the gentleman from Georgia is unable to say more in defense of his side shows how weak the condition of that side is; for if anybody could say anything that would get them out of this difficulty he would do it. Now, the gentleman undertook to say, and he created a great deal of applause on his side when he said it, that if it took two hours to pass the McKinley bill, two hours to get rid of it ought to be enough.

Now, that was a beautiful antithesis, but the difficulty with it is like the difficulty always with the Democratic position. It has no foundation in fact. [Laughter on the Republican side.] When the McKinley bill came back finally, in the latter part of September, it had six hours of discussion, and the gentleman on the other side and his friends were clamoring for more. He says he has got used to eating dirt. I am afraid he has got too used to it. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I am afraid he has got to like the flavor of it, and perhaps what he is going to do now under this bill will become tasteful to him also.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman in his line of remarks, although the gentleman is amusing himself somewhat at my expense.

Mr. REED. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I would ask the gentleman to what action does he refer when six hours were given for debate?

Mr. REED. I refer to the time when the McKinley bill was finally passed.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. But the time to which I refer——

Mr. REED. The time as to which the comparison was made was six hours.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman perhaps is accurate in his recollection, but I want to appeal to his memory further. In the rule which the gentleman's committee framed for agreeing to nonconcur in the five hundred and odd amendments of the Senate to the McKinley bill was not the time limited by that rule to two hours?

Mr. REED. I can not say. I frankly state that I do not know.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I think that was the limitation, and I will endeavor to look it up.

Mr. REED. I do not remember; but I do say here that not one of the six hundred and odd amendments of the Senate to this bill ever had a moment's discussion in the House. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], with that skill which has stood him in such good stead at the bar no doubt, undertakes to confuse that with the general discussion.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. There is a question of fact between the gentleman from Maine and myself——

Mr. REED. But my time is passing.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I have not been captious with the gentleman. The gentleman knows I was referring to an incident that occurred here the other day when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] arraigned me for an incident on the occasion when we reported a rule limiting debate to two hours on a motion to nonconcur in the Senate amendments to the Wilson bill.

I meant to say just now that that rule was dissimilar to the one reported by the gentleman's committee. I ought at least to say when the Senate amendments to the McKinley bill were brought up for concurrence or nonconcurrence, that the time then was limited to two hours and not six.

Mr. REED. Then, if the gentleman made that statement, or intended to make that statement, it was not understood; and I suppose both the applause of the Democratic party and my remarks will be withdrawn. [Laughter.] I am glad also to see that the gentleman from Georgia recognizes the inadequacy of the decision that was made upon the point of order and comes to the rescue. But I am sorry also to see that he does not seem to quite fill the hiatus.

It is quite proper for me, even after the decision of the Speaker that this was in order, to represent—it is very proper for me to represent to the House the absurdity of the position in which they are placing themselves. A bill passes from one House to the other. It is never in both. It is not like Mahomet's coffin, suspended between heaven (which is the Senate at present) and the earth. [Laughter.] It is always in one body or the other; and it is there for a reason. It is there in the natural course of events. Now, the proper place for it is in the Senate, because there is the last place anything was done to it. It was the last place where they were expected to do anything. When they sent a message stating that they had agreed to our request for a committee of conference that did not bring the bill with it.

The Speaker was kind enough to say in his decision that this rule overruled Jefferson's Manual. But this rule can not overrule Jefferson's Manual so far as that relates to both Houses. It takes both Houses to do that; and according to the parliamentary law which obtains between the two Houses to-day that bill is in the Senate, and you are performing upon it in the House.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. REED. I reserve that.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I would be very glad if the gentleman would indicate whether he will use the remainder of his time, because he is so formidable that I dislike very much to have him follow.

Mr. REED. That the gentleman from Georgia may have a free course and be glorified, I will give that one minute to him.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing necessary for me to say in closing the desultory remarks I have endeavored to submit on this occasion except to refer to the criticism which the gentleman from Maine has made on the authority, or rather of the reasoning, of the Chair. He has commented with some sharpness on the statement of the Speaker, that it would not be competent for this House to repeal or modify one of the joint rules.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There are no joint rules.

Mr. REED. The gentleman misunderstands me. I did not say the joint rules.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Then I will be glad for the gentleman to correct me.

Mr. REED. What I said was that the regulations of parliamentary law which subsisted between two Houses can not be abrogated by one of them. There are no joint rules.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman from Maine knows we have no joint rules agreed to by the two Houses, but would invoke vague, mystic, and irregular tradition, which he says has varied on different occasions.

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. If, Mr. Speaker, we had a code of joint rules, agreed to between the two Houses, and formally settled and codified and expressed in all the forms and sanctions of law, I have no doubt in the world that either House would have a right of its own motion to repeal, modify, or abrogate any such rule; and if it could do so under the constitutional authority to formulate rules for its procedure at the beginning of each session of Congress or at any other time, why could it not modify and repeal or abrogate this tradition or practice to which the gentleman from Maine refers?

It seems to me that if there is any such thing as a reduction to an absurdity the gentleman from Maine has involved himself in that predicament. Why, sir, the rules between the two Houses would have no higher or stronger footing than a treaty between two different nations; and yet either one of those nations, according to all authority, could by the independent act of its own lawmaking department repeal the treaty; and so either House of Congress can repeal even a formal joint rule previously agreed upon by the two Houses. I wish to say——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 188, noes 3.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. Let us have tellers.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Speaker appointed to act as tellers at the desk Mr. OUTHWAITE and Mr. HOOKER of New York.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 176, nays 97, answered "present" 11, not voting 67; as follows:

Mr. MCDOWELL. I am paired with the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. BRICKNER. If he were present, I would vote "no."

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DRAPER. Were he present, I would vote "aye."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether my colleague from Ohio, Mr. OUTHWAITE, has voted?

The SPEAKER. He has.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am paired with him, and I was about to withdraw my vote unless his vote was recorded.

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that Mr. MCKEIGHAN and Mr. KEM of Nebraska have been excused on account of sickness. If they were here they would vote "present." [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. On this vote the yeas are 176, and the nays are 97, present and not voting 11. The ayes have have it and the resolution is agreed to. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I submit the motion which I send to the desk.

Mr. DINGLEY. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is so much confusion that it is difficult to hear.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order. The gentleman from West Virginia moves that the order heretofore made requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on bill H. R. 4864 be rescinded; that the conferees heretofore appointed on the part of the House be discharged from further duty in that behalf, and that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments to said bill and agree to the same. On this motion two hours are allowed for debate under the special rule. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] will control one hour of the time and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] the other.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, in order to preserve any rights that may be involved, I make the point of order that the bill to which this resolution refers is not before the House. The Speaker has already ruled on it, but I make the point now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state in connection with the point made by the gentleman from Maine that the bill is in fact on the table.

Mr. REED. Of course, any fact can be stated in connection with the matter, but the bill is still in conference.

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the table. The Chair only desires to let that fact go along with the gentleman's point.

Mr. REED. That the bill is physically here?

The SPEAKER. Yes; that it is here.

Mr. REED. I do not see how it can be here under parliamentary law. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I have made the motion which I have sent to the Clerk's desk not on my own responsibility or from my own volition, but as the official organ of the caucus of my associates on this side of the House and by their direction. I shall say very little myself on this occasion in advocacy of the motion; and I shall be sincere and frank in what I shall submit to this House.

I do not pretend that I am gratified at the outcome of this prolonged controversy. I do not pretend that up to the very last moment I had not cherished the hope and the faith that we should reach another and a better conclusion of this conflict between the two Houses of the American Congress.

I had hoped and believed, until there seemed no ground scarcely for hope or belief, that in such a contest this House, backed by the American people and enthusiastically sustained by the Democratic party, would be able to achieve some honorable compromise between the two Houses which we could have accepted, not from a sense of duty, but with a sense of satisfaction and a feeling that we had responded to the mandates of the American people.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have simply realized in this great fight the fact so well stated by the great leader of the tariff reform fight in Great Britain—that when the people have gained a victory at the polls they must have a further stand-up and knock-down fight with their own representatives. And we have realized, if nothing else, the warning lesson of the intrenchment of the protective system in this country under thirty years of class legislation, until the mere matter of tariff schedules is a matter of insignificance, and the great question presents itself, is this to be a Government by a self-taxing people or a Government of taxation by trusts and monopolies? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If we have taken out of this fight no other lesson than that, it has been to us a great, an inspiring, and valuable lesson. If we have not been able to get all that the mandates of the people told us to get, all that the high enthusiasm of the people expected us to get, we have brought this dangerous fact face to face with American freemen, and we have made some breach, I hope, in the protective system through which the hosts of American freemen will continue to march. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I shall not say to the people of this country, I shall not say to my colleagues here (from whom even at the expense of what may seem ill taste on this occasion I can not withhold the expression of my unspeakable gratitude for their personal friendship and their loyal and enthusiastic support)—I shall not say to them that white is black or that false is true, or that protection is a just and honest system of taxation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Nothing which is not done right ever lasts. No work that is not thorough ever remains undisturbed. You can settle no question like the great question of taxation permanently and safely except upon the eternal basis of right and of liberty. [Applause.]

I shall not attempt, as I said at the outset, to explain the merits or to dwell upon the demerits of the six hundred and odd amendmends to this bill which this House is about, of necessity, to concur in. Perhaps I could not do justice as yet to the merits of the amendments. My attention has necessarily been so constantly and so steadily directed to their demerits that it would require some experience to learn what the merits are. [Laughter and applause.] But whatever the measure of shortcoming of this bill in its present form—whatever be its demerits in mere schedules—this I do believe, that it is not as bad as the McKinley bill. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

This I do know, that in part of it it does afford some relief to the taxpayers of this country, and does clip the wings of the gigantic monopolies that are now oppressing them and blocking legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side; derisive cries on the Republican side.]

Take even those portions of the bill over which this contest between the two Houses has been waged. Take iron ore and coal, upon which we have confronted, and to a certain extent unsuccessfully confronted, the great railroad syndicates of the country; yet we have reduced them both nearly 50 per cent below the McKinley bill. [Applause.] Take the sugar schedule, over which the greatest of all the contests between the two Houses has been waged. Vicious as it may be, burdensome to the people as it may be, favorable to the trust as it may be, it is less vicious, less favorable to the trust, less burdensome to the people than is the McKinley law, under which this trust has grown so great as to overshadow with its power the American people. [Applause.]

If for no other reason, then, those who believe that when they can not take the full step which they desire, when they can not do that which the people commissioned them to do, they must take the best they can and step as far as they can, may find some justification for a choice between the two bills.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption just here?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUDSON. I should like to ask the gentleman whether he has investigated fully so as to be able to state definitely that this bill as amended by the Senate will furnish sufficient revenue to meet the entire expenses of the Government?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, that is a question which no man, perhaps—certainly not I—can answer in accurate terms. But I have no difficulty whatever in saying that, when the schedules of the bill with the Senate amendments get into normal operation, it will produce sufficient and more than sufficient revenue for the support of the Government.

I should add to the answer that perhaps in the beginning the bill will not produce as much revenue as will result from it later on under its ordinary working, because I am informed, whether it be true or not I do not know, that the sugar trust, in anticipation of the passage of the bill, have imported many millions' worth of raw sugar.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the passage of this bill, in your judgment, save the country from the further issue of bonds?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I think I have already covered that question in my previous answer. It may be in the first few months of the operation of the bill, because of this great accumulation of raw sugar to which I have just referred, that the revenues of the Government will not be sufficient to meet the expenditures of the Government. But it is my belief, in view of the large amount of imported goods, and also in view of the fact that there will be larger importations when the tariff rates are definitely known and fixed, that if the necessity has not already been incurred it will not exist under the operation of this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me just on that point? I understood him to say that the sugar trust had already imported a hundred millions worth of sugar. If so, inasmuch as only $109,000,000 worth of sugar was imported last year, will not all of the revenue that we get from sugar, under the operation of this bill, for the first year be missing?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I did not intend to give the figures that one hundred millions of raw sugar had been imported. I stated that I had been informed that the sugar trust had imported a very large amount, and I have even heard it stated that it reaches that amount. It has been put at 448,000 tons by gentlemen who profess to know.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Yes; but I do not want to take up much of the time, as I have promised to yield to my associates.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will not all of the duty on that sugar named go into the hands of the trust, and not into the Treasury under the operation of this bill?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Well, the gentleman from Maine can answer that question for himself. I would rather that he would answer it.

Mr. HEARD. Will my friend yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Certainly, for a question.

Mr. HEARD. I want to know from the gentleman from West Virginia if it is not true that whatever may be this bonus to the sugar trust in view of the passage of this law, if it would not reap a still larger bonus under the operation of the McKinley law, if that were still left in force?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. They would not do so immediately, but under the operation of that law from year to year they would certainly reap a larger sum.

Mr. Speaker, in answer to all of these questions, I have simply to say that under the rule just adopted by the House, immediately following the passage of this bill we propose to present and pass a bill putting sugar on the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The question is now made as to whether this is a Government by the American people for the American people, or a Government of the sugar trust for the benefit of the sugar trust. And this House will show the people, I doubt not, what its position is on that question, and the Senate will show the people its position.

I will reserve the residue of my time.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat reluctant to address the House, because my feelings are divided between two emotions. One is an emotion of regret for the Democratic party and for its position, and the other is a feeling of equal regret for the country and its position, too. So far as the gentleman from West Virginia is concerned and his compatriots, there is not the slightest necessity of my commenting on the difference between this scene of sorrow and the triumphal procession which carried him out of this House. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] He is not so joyous now, having been carried out in another branch, and more effectually. [Renewed laughter.]

It is unfortunate for the gentleman from West Virginia that he and his compatriots have had to contend with gentlemen of so much more capacity and skill. Undoubtedly the House conferees meant well. Undoubtedly their intentions were honorable; but they were no match for the gentleman whom they met in the other branch. They were not skillful as these men are. Why, our conferees came back to us, gentlemen of the House, without so much as the name of the bill that they transported across this building a month ago. It will be known in history as the "Gorman-Brice vice the Wilson bill, dead." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Aye! dead on the field of "dishonor." [Renewed laughter and applause.]

The gentleman from West Virginia and his compatriots appear before us now, not as the triumphal reformers, marching to glory at the sound of their own sweet voices. They are little babes in the wood, and it will be found pretty soon that they were left there by their "uncle" in the White House. [Great laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

And I can hear the coming sound of the pinions of the little birds bearing the ballots that are to bury them out of sight. [Laughter on the Republican side.] But their fate is of small consequence. Their disappearance is the least and smallest particle of this event. I told this House, speaking on this tariff question, that one of the great misfortunes of this attempted action would be the fact that whatever basis was reached, it would not be a permanent basis on which this country could do business, that that was only an effort on their part to do something, an effort which they were going to continue; and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] signalizes his departure from history by talking about this being a step in the onward march.

So, not even content with this Senate bill, not even content with what attacks it makes upon our industries, these men, at the moment when they seal their personal discredit by submitting to the bill, announce to us that it is only the herald of future attacks upon the business industries of this country. Great God! Has not this country suffered enough during the last twelve months, that these men should come and assure it that their ravages are to continue? I tell you, when the people of this country get an opportunity to express their opinion of you, you will listen to it more intently than you are listening to me, and with sadder hearts than you have to-day even.

Not content with what you have done, you have threatened the people of this country with yourselves again. [Laughter on the Republican side.] We shall not write your epitaph. That has been done by a nearer and a dearer. That has been done by the man whose name must be affixed to this bill before it can discredit the statute book. His name must be to it. He tells you that this bill is an instance of perfidy, injustice, and dishonor. We have got nothing to do in the next campaign except to read the testimony of your Chief Magistrate, under whose protecting wing the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives have lived, so that we did not know at any moment whether they were a committee of the House of Representatives or a committee of the Executive. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Out of your own household has come your condemnation. Nay, out of your own mouths has your condemnation come. For we shall read that bold and uncompromising declaration of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that we were to sit here until the end of our term to put down the sugar trust. What do we have instead? Why, we have a proposition to fire one of those pop-gun tariff bills for which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] was deposed from the Committee on Ways and Means. [Laughter on the Republican side.] His successor, after filling the atmosphere with his outspread wings, finds his nest in some other bird's premises. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Why not resign if you were to adopt the action of the other person? I congratulate the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] upon his personal triumph. I wish I could congratulate the country upon something, and I will—upon the speedy departure of incompetency. [Applause upon the Republican side.]

[Mr. MCMILLIN withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I hope the gentlemen on the other side will now consume a part of this time.

Mr. REED. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who but a few short months ago confidently led the Democratic forces, bannered and shouting, on to the battle of tariff reform, finds himself to-day, before the battle is fought or the victory won, ignominiously deserted and abandoned to an inglorious fate. Remembering what occurred then, and looking upon this spectacle of to-day, one is forcibly reminded of the words of the chairman in his opening speech, which, in the light of the present, reads like a prophecy. On the 8th of January last he said:

> We knew and expected some friends would fall away from us whenever we presented any definite measure of legislation. We knew from all experience of the past that not all who march bravely in the parade are found in line when the musketry begins to rattle. [Applause.]
> This is always the case. Reform is beautiful upon the mountain top or in the clouds, but ofttimes very unwelcome as it approaches our own threshold.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

Thus the gentleman from West Virginia, when he lashed the laggards into line, seemed even then to have a foreboding of the treachery and humiliating disaster which has befallen him to-day.

Where is that army of tariff reformers, which in the beginning "marched so bravely in the parade"? Utterly disorganized and scattered, looking more like the remnants of Coxey's army than the gaudily appareled forces of tariff reform. Where are those enthusiastic free traders, the young gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER], and the new fledged Populist from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN], through whose physical exertions the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] was enabled to reach an eminence in debate excelled by few and envied by none? Even they have deserted their leader, and their names are no longer borne upon the "roll of honor," but will be found among the list of deserters.

No wonder the gentleman from West Virginia is disheartened, and he is justified in disclaiming all responsibility for the disastrous outcome of this first campaign for tariff reform and in charging it to the treachery of those upon whose fidelity he had a right to depend.

But the retreat has been sounded, the terms of capitulation accepted, and it only remains to consummate the formal surrender. After all this parade and bluster and show of resistance on the part of the House to the demands of the Senate, it is finally agreed to abandon the House bill and accept the bill of the Senate without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t." It is proposed to accept this Senate bill, with its abandonment of the recognized principles of tariff reform and its acknowledged subserviency to trusts and combines, and with all its errors and inconsistencies, take it down at one gulp.

To this complexion has it come at last.

The reason for this sudden abandonment of the House bill and the unconditional acceptance of the Senate measure will probably never be known, but that there was some overmastering influence contributing to that end can not admit of doubt. Last Friday morning, August 10, the House never seemed more determined in its opposition to the Senate and apparently was never more sanguine of ultimate success. It had the approval and powerful influence of a determined Executive, the loyal support of the party at large, and the almost united Democratic press of the country.

On the morning of that day the supporters of the Wilson bill presented a solid front, united and determined and apparently never more confident of victory. Thus the Democratic members of the Senate and House stood confronting each other in persistent antagonism, when suddenly the whole camp was thrown into consternation by the announcement of a purpose by one of the conferees at the meeting of the Senate on the following day "to turn the calcium light on the doings of the conference."

> Ah, then and there was hurrying to and fro,
> And gathering tears and tremblings of distress,
> And cheeks all pale, which but an hour ago
> Blush'd—

No, not that; here the simile ends.

What there was in this threatened exposure to create alarm I do not know, but that it was followed by an immediate cessation of hostilities, culminating in abject submission by this body and the adjustment of all differences between the two Houses by taking the Senate bill, is now a matter of history. Under the leadership of the Speaker of this House, who up to that moment, if rumor can be credited, had been adverse to caucus action, a call for a Democratic caucus was at once circulated, and on the following day, August 11, public announcement was made that at 10 o'clock Monday morning, two hours before the regular meeting of the House of Representatives, there would be a Democratic caucus to consider the question of tariff legislation.

Before the meeting of the Senate on Saturday and the arrival of the hour for the threatened exposure it was an open secret that a call for a caucus was to be promulgated and that the House would surrender to the demands of the Senate. All this was publicly known before the meeting of the Senate on Saturday, and it is needless to say that the threatened exposure was never made. Silence was purchased by agreeing to a bill which had been publicly branded by your President as a measure of "party perfidy and party dishonor;" but better that than the threatened "exposure." [Applause on the Republican side and derisive cries on the Democratic side.]

Let us consider for a moment what is involved as a matter of principle in the proposed substitution of the Gorman bill for the Wilson bill.

First, it is a sacrifice of the doctrine of "free raw material" for which you have so strenuously contended. The Wilson bill was claimed to have been constructed on the basis of free raw material, and the persistent contention has been that this principle was essential to any true measure of tariff reform. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], in the advocacy of his bill, said:

> We begin our task by an effort to free from taxation those things on which the industrial prosperity and growth of our country so largely depend.
> Of all the reductions made in this bill there are none in their benefit to the consumer, none in their benefit to the laborer, that can be compared with the removal of the taxes from the materials of industry. We have felt that we could not begin a thorough reform of the existing system, built up, as I have shown, story by story, until it has pierced the clouds, except by a removal of all taxation on the great materials that lie at the basis of modern industry, and so the bill proposes to put on the free list wool, iron ore, coal, and lumber. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In violation of this principle, the Senate bill removes most of these articles from the free list and subjects them to taxation, destroying one of the essential and fundamental principles upon which the Wilson bill was constructed.

In the second place, your proposed action is a surrender of the ad valorem method of assessing duties, concerning which the author of the House bill said:

A most important change in the bill proposed from the present law will be found in the general substitution of the ad valorem for specific duties. This must always be the characteristic of a revenue tariff levied upon a large range of articles.

It will be observed that these two principles are substantially eliminated from the Senate bill and taxed raw material and specific duties substituted therefor.

The adoption of the Senate bill is therefore a complete abandonment of the fundamental principles of tariff reform. The Senate bill has been constructed upon entirely different lines. It was framed upon the broad bedrock foundation of the necessity of securing 43 votes, and all minor considerations had to give way to this great underlying principle.

Coal is taxed in order to secure the necessary votes of the self-styled embassador from the sovereign State of Maryland; protection is accorded to the industries of the State of Maryland as the price of her votes; seventy-five millions of people are to be burdened with a tax on sugar in order to hold the votes of the sugar-producing State of Louisiana, and the sugar trust had to have its demands satisfied in order to insure liberal contributions to the Democratic campaign fund; while Republican Senators had but to threaten interminable debate to secure full protection to the industries of their State.

In this way the Gorman bill was constructed and passed and it is this measure so framed, you now propose without amendment or debate to indorse and approve. How you are able to do this with any sense of self-respect, it is difficult to understand. You voted for the Wilson bill under protest, declaring you did so because it was a movement in the right direction, a step toward free trade; and now you accept the Gorman bill without regard to the principles upon which it was constructed and without knowing whether it leads towards protection or free trade and in the face of an acknowledged abandonment of all principle. Such unexampled party stultification can not be too severely condemned. The measure you are about to adopt has been fittingly characterized by one of your own organs, the Louisville Courier-Journal, in the following vigorous language:

If in the Democracy of this country there is a depth of contempt which had not before been stirred by Democracy's alleged representatives in the United States Senate within the past six months, it has certainly been reached by the action of the Finance Committee in the latest "compromise" bill agreed on. Instead of a bill redeeming the pledges they were commissioned to redeem a mongrel piebald of patches and pusillanimity, a grotesque hodgepodge of pretense and pettifogging, a nondescript abortion of incompetency, selfishness, cowardice, and treachery is the outcome.

Again, a gentleman of your own party, a member of this House (Mr. HARTER of Ohio), speaking of this very measure which you now propose to adopt, said:

If passed and branded as a Democratic measure, it will stamp us as a lot of imbeciles, and our managers in both Houses as driveling idiots.

This is not my language, but the declaration of one of your own party adherents. But this is not all. The President of the United States, the chosen and acknowledged leader of your party, in that now famous epistle to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, makes use of the following language:

There is no excuse for mistaking or misapprehending the feeling and temper of the rank and file of the Democracy. They are downcast under the assertion that their party fails in ability to manage the Government, and they are apprehensive that efforts to bring about tariff reform may fail; but they are much more downcast and apprehensive in their fear that Democratic principles may be surrendered.

Every true Democrat and every sincere tariff reformer knows that this bill in its present form—and as it will be submitted to the conference, falls far short of the consummation for which we have long labored, for which we have suffered defeat without discouragement; which in its anticipation gave us a rallying cry in our day of triumph, and which in its promise of accomplishment is so interwoven with Democratic pledges and Democratic success, that our abandonment of the cause or the principles upon which it rests means party perfidy and party dishonor.

And yet, this Gorman bill, which your President declares to be a measure of "party perfidy and party dishonor," you propose to take without question or compunction. If anything could add to your humiliation, it is the fact that you accept unconditionally the terms of surrender prepared and promulgated at the very beginning of the contest. It was said in another place:

Gentlemen, there is our bill. It is the result of great labor and infinite pains. It has met with the approval of both the free trade and protection elements of our party. It is adapted to conditions not theories. It is not perfect, but it as nearly perfect as we can hope to make it at this session. In any event, such as it is, there it lies. You are at liberty to take it or to leave it.

Let me quote for your edification another passage from the letter of the President. You propose to tax coal and iron ore in violation of your doctrine of raw material, while leaving the farmers' wool on the free list and exposing that great industry to swift and sure destruction. You will have some difficulty, I apprehend, in explaining to the woolgrowers of this country how wool in your philosophy is raw material and coal is not. You will have some trouble in making the common people understand why you protect coal and expose the woolgrowers to a ruinous foreign competition.

Let me say here, you will not deceive the people by supplementing your action of to-day on the Gorman bill by passing measures for free coal and free iron ore, for the people understand as well as you that this is done with no expectation that these measures will pass the Senate, or be enacted into law, and you must therefore go before the people in the attitude of protecting coal and iron ore and putting wool on the free list. The inconsistency of such action is forcibly expressed by the President as follows:

One topic will be submitted to the conference which embodies Democratic principle so directly that it can not be compromised. We have in our platforms and in every way possible declared in favor of the free importation of raw materials. We have again and again promised that this should be accorded to our people and our manufacturers as soon as the Democratic party was invested with the power to determine the tariff policy of the country.

The party now has that power. We are as certain to-day as we have ever been of the great benefit that would accrue to the country from the inauguration of this policy, and nothing has occurred to release us from our obligation to secure this advantage to our people.

It must be admitted that no tariff measure can accord with Democratic principles and promises, or bear a genuine Democratic badge, that does not provide for free raw materials. In these circumstances it may well excite our wonder that Democrats are willing to depart from this the most Democratic of all tariff principles, and that the inconsistent absurdity of such a proposed departure should be emphasized by the suggestion that the wool of the farmer be put on the free list and the protection of tariff taxation be placed around the iron ore and coal of corporations and capitalists. [Applause.]

How can we face the people after indulging in such outrageous discriminations and violations of principle?

But, independent of all this, I am curious to know how the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], after recording his vote for the Gorman bill, which places a tax on coal, will explain to his admiring tariff reformers throughout the country his speech delivered in this House only a few months ago in opposition to taxing coal. I propose to place in the RECORD by the side of that vote the gentleman's own condemnation of it, with the note of applause which greeted this declaration on the Democratic side. In the debate on the Wilson bill the gentleman said:

The Democratic party has advanced immensely on tariff reform in the last ten years, and I hope that I have at least kept up with the procession. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I have been unable to find a justification for a duty upon coal either in the platform of the Democratic party or in the platform of the Republican party. In their platform the Republicans declared in favor of levying such import duties as would compensate for the wages of labor in this country as compared with the countries that come into competition with us in our own markets. Gentlemen seem to have failed also to observe that together with the advanced position taken by the Democratic party in the platform adopted at Chicago it expressly declared in favor of free raw materials.

I have the platform before me in which I find this declaration:

"We indorse the efforts made by the Democrats of the present Congress to remove its most oppressive features (referring to the McKinley bill) in the direction of free raw materials."

No man can contend successfully, in view of the facts brought out before the Ways and Means Committee, in view of the facts accessible to anyone who will examine the subject, that we can not mine coal more cheaply in the great coal fields of this country than it can be mined in England or in Nova Scotia, about which gentlemen seem to have gotten up such a scare.

The point in controversy is, Shall we continue to tax the people of this country to enable railroad corporations to haul this coal to the remotest sections of the Union? [Applause.] The only question involved in this coal tariff is the question of railroad transportation.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is right.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. If you want to put more money into the treasury of the railroad carriers, vote for this duty upon coal.

It is the common knowledge of every man who reads the newspapers of the country that the price of coal is often put up and put down as the railroad corporations choose.

And I hope that I have not served in Congress ten years and not grown some. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am not pleading the baby act. But when I come to make a tariff bill for all the people of the country, I have no right to look especially at the interests of my own district. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, on the 9th of January, the gentleman from West Virginia used the following language:

Yet, here is a duty of 75 cents per ton, which is in excess of the entire cost of production, either in the United States or elsewhere.

In the testimony before the committee on Ways and Means it was proved that in my own district the cost of mining was from 40 to 60 cents a ton; that in the district of my colleague [Mr. ALDERSON], in what is known as the Pocahontas region, the cost of mining is from 25 to 30 cents a ton. That is what is paid to the miner. We are not only the great iron-producing country, we are the great coal-producing country of the world. If the regular book of the coal trade—Saward's Coal Trade, 1893—is reliable, and I suppose it is, we have 192,000 square miles of territory underlaid with coal, of which 120,000 square miles can to-day be profitably worked—three times, more than three times, greater than the coal area of the rest of the world. With such exhaustless supplies, so close to the surface that the cost of mining has been reduced to a minimum, to less than is possible in Nova Scotia, to less than is actually paid in England, the question of a tariff on coal is neither a question of protection nor a question of revenue, but simply a question of subsidy to the great railroad corporations of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Upon neither Democratic ground nor Republican ground can you justify a tariff on coal, unless you believe that the people of the United States should be taxed to pay subsidies to the great railway carriers of the country.

Yet in the face of this declaration, that a duty on coal is "neither a question of protection nor a question of revenue, but simply a question of subsidy to the great railroad corporations of the country," the gentleman from West Virginia will to-day stultify himself by recording his vote in favor of this "subsidy."

Other gentlemen on that side of the Chamber were no less emphatic in their denunciations, particularly the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], who, with much of error in his speech, uttered some wholesome truths which gentlemen on the other side would do well to consider. The distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] used this language:

I desire to enter a Democratic protest and demurrer against any Democrat standing upon this floor and demanding protective duties for the district that he represents. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The attempt by this amendment is to retain the duty; or a part of the duty, upon coal. Now, coal is the principal product of my own State that is affected by this bill, and I can not be silent and permit my own position upon this subject to continue in any doubt either upon this floor or among my constituency at home. I am opposed to keeping the duty upon coal. With great deference to those who differ with me, and without in the slightest degree impugning their motives, I challenge the right of any Democrat to stand upon this floor and vote for free trade in everybody else's district and then vote for protection in his own. [Applause.]

I am not a Democrat on everything else and a Republican on coal. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If raw materials are to be put upon the free list, I want them put in the very places where I can stand in the thick of the contest and bear the brunt of battle with my colleagues on this floor. [Applause.] I have followed the members of this committee far beyond the outposts, and I shall never desert them now when the poisoned shafts are flying from the very citadel of protection. [Applause.]

Now, I utterly deny that it comes within our province as Democratic representatives to stand here and demand protection for the industries of our respective districts.

If such a course is justifiable, then there is an end of all Democracy and tariff reform. If we are all tariff reformers for everybody else's district except our own there will be no revenue reform at all; and we may as well resolve ourselves into a mercenary mob, ready to retreat whenever our interests are involved, instead of presenting an unbroken front upon the solemn pledges that we made to the people. [Applause on the Democratic side].

The Gorman bill also proposes to tax iron ore in violation of the accepted doctrine of the Democratic party, and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] is about to record his vote in support of it. When he has done so, will the gentleman reconcile that vote with the following remarks made by him on the 25th day of January last, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, every reason for putting coal upon the free list applies with equal if not stronger force to removing the duty from iron ore. If duties are laid for revenue we could not select any duties more hurtful to American industries or more injurious to American labor than duties levied upon production. Just so far as you increase the cost of the article by a tax laid upon the materials of which it is composed you limit its market, you limit the consumption, and you take away from labor the opportunity for employment.

Upon no ground of protection can the duty on iron ore be any longer justified in this country.

If we are to gather revenues through a tariff system, we should levy those taxes for purposes of revenue and not for purposes of protection, and in selecting the articles on which to lay taxes for the sake of revenue we should select results and not processes, finished products and not the materials which go into those products. Every tax which we impose upon the material doubles and increases when it reaches the consumer; every tax that we impose upon the material increases the cost of the product and lessens the employment of the labor that produces that product by narrowing its market.

There is no possible excuse, then, either on the ground of revenue or protection, for continuing any duty upon iron ore; first, because it is not a proper subject of taxation under a revenue tariff; and, secondly, because we have to-day reached such a degree of capacity for its production, and possess such exhaustless stores that we can defy all the world; and a tariff upon ore, the raw material, has no other home effect than to operate as a protection to foreign manufacturers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have selected these few citations from Democratic speeches made in this House when the Wilson bill was under consideration, not only for the edification of gentlemen on the other side, who are about to stultify themselves by voting for this measure, but that the country may know something of the hypocrisy and double-dealing of which the Democratic party is capable. But let me say to you, gentlemen, you will deceive no one. The people of this country "see clearly through this day's business," and in November next will record their verdict against a party capable of such duplicity and cowardice.

What will be the fate of this bill at the other end of the avenue, it is impossible to forecast, but the President of the United will belie his reputation for courage and tenacity of purpose if he does not promptly stamp it with his veto.

When this bill is laid before the President for Executive approval and he has sufficiently examined it to be assured of its identity as the very measure which he himself has already publicly repudiated, I can imagine him taking the Wilson letter in one hand and reading his own words, "This is an act of party perfidy and party dishonor," and then dropping his pen from the other, exclaiming with ineffable scorn, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing." [Prolonged applause on the Republican side].

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield now ten minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PENCE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia has thirty-one minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, the Populists of this House voted for the Wilson tariff-reform bill mainly because it had free sugar and the income tax in it. We thought then, and we still think, that there had been a good deal of a sham battle between the two old parties in this country on this question. Certainly the mock fury of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] just now exhibited, as in attempting to advocate his own principles he time and time again swears the Democratic President, Mr. Cleveland, as the chief witness, proves to us that we have been right all the while.

The chief interest in this discussion during the last hour has been, first, that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] proposes in the next campaign to introduce as his chief witness Mr. Grover Cleveland, the President of the United States, and quotes some words of his respecting the tariff question which appeal for the enactment of some particular tariff law.

Let me remind the gentleman [Mr. REED], because he has been out of the law practice longer than I have, that when he introduces his witness, he becomes his witness for all purposes. And there are other purposes for which he may not want to use him; although I am free to admit that in the one year that I have been here I have not yet witnessed an occasion where there has been any serious disagreement between them, excepting as they attempt to arrange the details of a mock conflict, a sham battle, under the smoke, powder, noise, and confusion of which they propose to deceive and mislead the people in the next campaign.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has used more earnest words about the President than I ever did, although I voted for the present President at one time, voted for him twice, in fact. Once he won, and the other time he lost, and the next time I left him.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And then he won. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENCE. And then he won again, against my will and the will of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. He speaks of him as "earnest, devoted, and sincere" in his support of the bill that he himself, the gentleman from Michigan, is opposing. He speaks of the "courage of his convictions," says we know something of his "courage and his devotion to principle." Is this the language that the gentleman is to use about the present President of the United States in the coming campaign? I imagine not.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know, I do not suppose anybody knows, unless you do, what the President will do with respect to any tariff-reform bill. [Laughter.] [Mr. TRACEY occupied the chair as Speaker pro tempore.] I beg the pardon of the Chair. I meant another Representative from New York. I am wrong. [Laughter.] I believe though, in common with the American people, that the President of the United States is conscientiously committed to a reform of the tariff laws of this land, and he believes that one of the greatest reliefs that can come to the masses will be the repeal of the McKinley law and the enactment of some law in its stead; and believing that, I believe he will sign this bill, although he has heretofore said that it is covered with "perfidy and dishonor."

Mr. BOUTELLE. A little thing like that will not stop him. [Laughter].

Mr. PENCE. I hope the gentleman from Hawaii will not take any of my time. [Laughter].

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] complains of the bill the House is about to adopt, because it is "an utter abandonment of Democratic principles." When he comes to read the proof of his speech, he will find that is exactly what he said, although he said it when he was not reading from his manuscript. I took it down for that reason. If it is an abandonment of Democratic principles, what is it, under the issues that have been before the people so long, but an adoption of your own Republican principles?

Why is it you complain so seriously because a Democratic House is taking a McKinleyized-Wilson bill? There is no reason left for you to complain, except for campaign purposes. You speak of it as an "unconditional surrender." I remember hearing those words last fall, or reading them. I remember that the lips of him who stood so long a leader in the Senate, now sainted, honest old Zeb Vance, of North Carolina, announced to you and your leader, and to the like of you in the Senate last fall, that unconditional repeal in the fight then on in the silver question meant unconditional surrender. You faced it then. You face it again.

Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to agree with the course of the majority here to-day, although it may be the best that my fellows and I can do. But we can not hesitate to recognize the magnificent courage as well as ability of the men who have led this fight, above all the man who is standing here to-day with blindfold off, who is a great deal bigger than he was the other day when he stood here blindfolded. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] may not live to see the end of the fight for tariff reform. He may not live to stand again and sound the call to the clans for the roll of honor and every man to answer, but if I live to be a hundred years old, when I remember him it will seem to me that as he stands to-day, accepting the inevitable as he does, I shall feel like he stands, quoting the words of Edwin Arnold when he said:

Charge, charge once more
Then, and be dumb.
And let the victors, when they come,
When the forts of folly fall,
Find your body by the wall.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has thirty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. REED. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the question before this House, the real, practical question, has been somewhat overlooked, if not actually misstated. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] has declared that the question for the House to consider is whether the Senate bill, in which we are asked to concur, is an improvement on the McKinley act from a Democratic point of view. I do not agree with the gentleman from Tennessee. There is a higher, a more vital point at issue here; and that is whether the American Congress is to legislate, or whether some unknown, unmentioned force can block the wheels of legislation and make the representatives of the people cower in the dust and surrender, they know not to whom. [Loud applause.]

Last winter we passed a bill through this House under the leadership of the gentlemen from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON]; a bill for tariff reform, which in my humble judgment meant the industrial emancipation of this country and the ultimate industrial conquest of the world by American labor and American genius. That bill passed through this House, amid such a scene of triumph and joy as never has been witnessed in the history of a legislative body. On that momentous day the gentleman from West Virginia, borne upon affectionate and loyal shoulders, was the central figure of a demonstration which evidenced the depth of feeling throughout the American people, long pent up, at last fondly considered triumphant over all obstructions.

To-day no more pathetic figure in the history of the world can be observed than that same leader, shorn of his support, walking down these aisles, disdaining to prevaricate or misrepresent the actual condition which confronts us, confessing that he has been deserted by those in whose support he had every reason to confide, and asking us to record our betrayal of every principle which this House under his leadership has maintained.

We are told by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], and we are told by some nameless rumor the source of which it is impossible to ascertain, that we must pass the Senate bill or nothing. On what is this statement based? Who says that, authorized to speak for the coördinate branch of Congress? What has the Senate of the United States declared? Why, sir, the record shows that a conference committee has been appointed: it is in existence to-day, and it is extending now, so far as official action is concerned, an open invitation to the Representatives of this House to meet them in conference and seek to reconcile their differences.

But we are told that three, four, five, six, seven, or eight individuals have managed to make such a combination in the other House that any change in its terms will be fatal to the passage of the measure. If that be so, in the name of the American people, in the name of liberty and honor, let us know who they are. [Applause on the Republican side and in the galleries.] We owe a duty to the American people above and beyond fixing schedules. If any given body of men in these United States has grown so great that they can forbid the operation of this Government, it is due to the American people that their names should be disclosed. If Democratic principles are to be basely surrendered, then we who have been loyal to our platform should ask judgment against those who have betrayed us.

If the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia prevails and these Senate amendments be concurred in by this House, under the influence of terror and fear, we never can criticise the men who have forced us to this surrender. It is no longer a question of concessions, a question of compromise. It is a question of honor and of honest dealing with the constituencies which have chosen us. We owe it to the American people, when two Houses charged with legislation disagree, that the disagreement should be attested by open official action. Those whom we accuse of taking a position hostile to the Democratic party are entitled to the judgment of the people. If they be right, they will have judgment in their favor; if they have deserted their party, judgment will be taken against them. We accuse them of treason under our breaths, and now we are invited to make them our leaders. If we accept their treason as our standard, they are not discredited as much as we are. Their success makes their treason respectable.

We are hopelessly discredited because our cowardice makes our surrender disgraceful. [Applause on the Republican side.] We are asked to surrender the privileges and prerogatives of the House without striking a blow in their defense. We are asked to surrender to some persons whose identity is not known, the right to frame tariff legislation for the American people.

And what are we to gain by this abject and ignoble course.

Why, we are told that we may get a concession of 5 or 10 per cent from the consent of the protected interests of this country! Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to state here that in my humble judgment the measure which we are now asked to pass through this House and to make the permanent law of this country is a more obnoxious protective measure than the McKinley act, which it is designed to supplant. [Cries of dissent on the Democratic side and jeers.] Mr. Speaker, I am addressing myself to the intelligence of the House; its ignorance I can not enlighten in twenty minutes. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SNODGRASS. It is over there [indicating the Republican side].

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman from Tennessee says that over there is the intelligence of the House. I hope that the vote on this motion will not prove it. Mr. Speaker, I repeat that this is a more obnoxious protective measure than the McKinley act, and I hope to prove it. What is the principle that underlies the McKinley law? What is our objection to it? We are opposed to protection because we believe that by making production expensive it restricts the total productive capacity of the country and to that extent limits, impedes, and restricts its material growth. But when protection is given equally to all, when every man gets the protection that he demands or thinks he needs, each man finds his product restricted in proportion to his neighbor's.

Under such conditions men exchange their goods upon a fictitious basis of high values, but all are affected alike by what I conceive to be that economic enormity. Now, under this act, by the concession of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] himself, it is only in spots that there is any reduction made from the provisions of the McKinley act from the burdens of taxation laid upon the people by that law.

Now, when protection passes by favoritism, there is no defense for it either among Republicans or among Democrats. When we declare that all protection is in its nature robbery we utter a profound truth, but those who openly support protection on the other side, at least believe in its value, but we who know what protection really is, when we give it to a few individuals and deny it to others, or when we bestow it among our citizens in unequal proportion, are committing a crime with our eyes wide open; we are sinning against the light; we are hugging to our breasts the enormity that we affect to despise and that we have not hesitated to denounce.

What is the parliamentary character of the question now presented? Opposition to this motion is not an attempt to defeat this bill, or even to defeat the Senate amendments. What is to be the effect of a vote against the resolution of the gentleman from West Virginia? It is not even to defeat the Senate bill; it is simply to send back our conferees to a conference; it is simply to give life to the conference that has been ordered by both Houses. If no agreement is reached we can still show our capacity for self-abasement.

It is still within our power to submit to the arrogant demands of these nameless enemies of popular government; but we are asked now to fly from a shadow, to run from a threat which has never even taken definite form; and, as I recollect the pride and circumstance and confidence with which but a few weeks ago the conferees of this House, backed by the Speaker, went out to the conflict, and behold the spectacle presented here to-day, I see an attempt to accomplish that which, if it be successful, will form the most discreditable page in the history of the American Government.

These conferees, aided by the Speaker, emulating the example of a famous king of France, who has been celebrated in song and story, "marched up the hill," and then, even without waiting for the enemy to appear in sight, apparently alarmed at the solitude and silence which surrounded them, they turned pale and fled back to this House, declaring that they must not be asked to make such a perilous journey again. [Laughter and applause.] Think of my friend from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] standing here and declaring that this is at least one step in the march against the citadel of American protection and that it constitutes a breach in its wall!

Why, Mr. Speaker, no hand has been raised here against that citadel of protection which the other House of this Congress has proved itself to be. Our representatives have fallen prostrate before the frowning wall of special privilege and craved leave to make their submission without striking a blow for industrial emancipation. If the current rumors be true we owe it to the Senate itself to stand out and make one fight more to liberate the thirty-eight members of that body who claim to be Democrats from the four or five custodians who have taken their consciences and their votes under their control.

We owe a duty to the American people greater and more important than the mere fixing of schedules—more vital than the mere adjustment of rates of taxation. It is to stand here now for the dignity of the House of Representatives, for the right of the American people at least to have their representatives polled upon any important question—for the right to have the yeas and nays called upon the question whether a great party shall sacrifice its principles and itself in a state of abject cowardice and panic-stricken fright and accept schedules which this House has denounced under the leadership of the gentleman who has now moved that we recede from the position of honor we have occupied for the last month.

It is said, Mr. Speaker, that something must be done; that trade is languishing in every quarter of the country; that the moment this tariff agitation is ended the wheels of industry will again spring into motion, and that we shall see prosperity throughout the length and breadth of this country. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that we are upon the verge of the dawn of such a happy day. Before you can have good times again this country must travel through industry, hard laborious industry, and self-denial, the path which it is necessary to pursue in order to restore the material of production to its former volume.

All trade is but the exchange of commodities. When commodities are plentiful this abundance leads to free exchange and makes prosperous trade. When the volume of commodities is reduced, there is less to be exchanged; and you have that depression of trade which is known as "hard times." The revival of prosperity in this country must come from the earth; it must come from an abundant crop; and then, with freer trade conditions, with emancipation from oppressive taxation, this country can enter upon a career of prosperity the like of which it has never seen in all the glories of its past history.

But now it is proposed to establish a new tariff—a new protective tariff—"protective in spots," freer of taxation in other spots. What must be the necessary consequence of that? Surely I can appeal to the distinguished Speaker of this House, who is largely responsible for its management, who will be largely charged with the result of whatever it may accomplish, who will enjoy the larger share of its credit if it win renown, who will have to submit to the larger share of its discredit if it become discredited throughout the country—surely I can appeal to him to justify me in saying that where one industry is highly protected and another is protected in lower proportion, the more highly protected industry will prosper at the expense of those less highly favored.

The first revival of activity and prosperity will be shown in the industry to which all other industries are made tributary. The American people, when the revival of industry comes, will see the protected industries more prosperous than all others. In every town this will serve as an "object lesson" to which those who are interested in maintaining high rates of duty will point. They will declare "Behold the effect of protection; protection means prosperity; lower tariff taxation means adversity!" The iron industry will march to greater activity under this bill than the woolen industry; and protectionists will claim that its prosperity is due to the high protection which this measure bestows on it. Thus you stab the cause of tariff reform in the house of its friends. You surrender the dignity and independence of the House to secure the passage of a bill which will so firmly intrench protection in popular favor that this generation may never see another successful effort to overthrow it.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it was Lord Macauley who declared that there never yet was a quarrel in which the equities were so exquisitely balanced that the right was all on one side and the wrong all on the other. But here we have a dispute between the Senate and the House; and the Senate does not even claim to be right. There is not within the length and breadth of this country a single disputant who declares that the attitude taken by the Senate is a sound position, consistent with any principle of legislation. Yet we are asked to surrender not to powerful or even plausible reasons, not to arguments which would justify our course, but we are asked to yield to some nameless public enemy that which both sides concede to be right and to debase ourselves before men who act not as part of the American Congress but who assume to constitute themselves a force that can absolutely control it.

Sir, the gentleman from Georgia has spoken recently of an article of diet to which he has been compelled to habituate himself. The article which he has named is too strong a dish for my digestion. Let those whose digestion is more robust than mine crowd around the table and dispute among themselves for the ranker portions. For my part, before I surrender my sword, I want to know who will take it. Rather than yield it to some foe who dares not show his face, I prefer to break it upon my knee and cast aside the pieces. I accepted this bill as it passed this House, although everyone here knows how bitterly I opposed the income-tax feature of it. I voted for it because I believed tariff reform essential to the progress of this country; and I was willing to submit to what I conceived to be an odious system of class taxation in order to secure for American labor emancipation from oppressive and restrictive laws.

I find now this bill returned from the Senate with tariff reform stricken out and nothing but the income tax left. True, you have the promise of a few pop-gun bills, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has described them, and I rejoice that in adopting such a method of procedure my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is given the leadership of the House, although in the truncheon of the marshal which has been handed to him there is a barbed point, which shows at once the broad foundation on which the leadership of this House is based and the lofty height to which it may be upbuilded.

Mr. Speaker, I will not vote for this proposition unless some reason be given me for it. I must at least be satisfied by the declaration of some competent person that the Senate will not consent to recede from any of its amendments. I will not fly from shadows. I will not fly from threats coming from unauthorized and unknown sources. If we are to swallow this obnoxious bill, if we are to take to this article of diet which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] has described, then in the name of fair play, in the name of propriety, in the name of decency, in the name of American liberty and American freedom, let the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] name the men at whose hands we must take the dose, tell us to whom we are surrendering, tell us who they are who constitute the new force in this Government to which we are compelled to pay tribute, tell us fully and without reserve the character of the action which he asks us to take, that we may judge the depth of the infamy into which we are invited to descend. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] is recognized.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I hope the gentlemen on the other side will consume the balance of their time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. REED. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TARSNEY].

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, the question to be decided at the conclusion of this debate is not whether any particular bill shall become a law or shall be defeated. The tariff bill has already passed both Houses of Congress. There is a disagreement as to details, which might remain in the conference committee, might be reported from the conference committee, and might be acted upon by both Houses of this Congress on every day until the 4th of March next before it was determined whether there should or should not be a tariff bill passed. That is the parliamentary situation.

But we are now asked under this rule to accept, to make final, a certain bill that is familiar to all the members of this House; that is known to all the country; that has been reviewed by the press and the people of the country, and its manner and method of enactment is thoroughly understood by the people. That bill, Mr. Speaker, has by the highest authority in my party, has by the leader of my party, by the President of the United States, been stigmatized as an abandonment of Democratic principles to that degree that it involves party perfidy and party dishonor. In that characterization I thoroughly concur, and for me to vote for it now would, in my judgment, involve personal perfidy and personal dishonor upon my part, and this no individuals or organization, no party, can extort from me.

Mr. REED. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

[Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

[Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

[Mr. STORER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. REED. I reserve the remainder of my time.

[Cries of "QUIGG!" QUIGG!"]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I hope the gentleman from Maine will consume the remainder of his time.

Mr. REED. We have used continuously thirty minutes of our time, and I hope the gentleman from West Virginia will take a part of his.

Mr. QUIGG. Your Wilson bill is smashed. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, when the last Republican President sent his annual message to Congress, after the defeat of his party in 1890, he stated to the two Houses and to the American people that that defeat was due to misinformation. When his party, including himself, had been beaten in the election of 1892, he had the candor to announce to Congress in his annual message of December, 1892, a better estimate of that result. He said:

It is not my purpose to renew here the arguments in favor of a protective system. The result of the recent election must be accepted as having introduced a new policy.

Again he says:

I recommend that the whole subject of tariff revision be left to the incoming Congress. It is a matter of regret that this great work must be delayed for at least three months, etc.

This Congress assembled in extra session on the 7th day of August last, and it has been engaged in the task imposed by the political revolution. Let it be remembered that if it had been simply a question of providing a bill which should give adequate revenues to the Government, it could have been formulated and passed within a fortnight.

The rest of this long year has been spent in an effort on the part of our friends to take care not of the Government, but of private interests claiming the power of taxation! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, it must be remembered, too, as some further excuse for this long delay, that the bill, in order to be enacted into law, has to pass the two Houses of Congress. Under the operation of that great impulse which the people had given to the popular branch, we were able after one month of debate to pass the bill through the House of Representatives. It then went to the Senate, and there, in the various stages which marked its history, it was undergoing some sort of discussion or consideration from the 1st of February until the 3d day of July last.

Let it also be remembered that during that long delay in the other branch of Congress our friends in that body, who represented the view that we entertain, and for the success of which their hearts beat as earnestly as ours, in the absence of rules limiting debate, had to sit in their seats in silence and endure the fusillade and fire of every pop-gun that could be raised against the measure in that body. I do not wish to disparage any honorable gentleman on either side of that illustrious body, but all gentlemen will remember the devices which were employed there to delay and obstruct the passage of the bill. One Senator is reported to have had a fifteen days' speech on the subject.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia (continuing). In this closing hour let it be borne in mind what our friends in that branch had to endure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Did not the gentleman——

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Will the gentleman forbear, if he pleases.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman stated the same thing to me a few months ago.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman is mistaken. I have been so occupied that I have not spoken to him for some time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman said then that it was not in order to attack the Senate. That is what you said.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I know that the gentleman does not mean to interrupt my remarks without my consent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask you if that is not what you said to me?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I decline to yield. I state to my honorable friend that no part of my ten minutes can be spared for his benefit.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is not for my benefit.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Let me finish what I have to say.

Mr. Speaker, it must be borne in mind that in that other branch of Congress we had not the Democratic majority which we had in this House. The country, I hope, understands now that the tariff reformers were in a minority in that body. But whatever may be the relative strength of parties in the Senate, they completely changed many of the features of the bill, and a conference was instituted to adjust these differences.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has just mentioned a remark made by some honorable gentleman in the Senate about "turning a calcium light on the conference." It is too contemptible to notice; but I beg to say to him that if he really suspects any wrong of any sort in the conference I will, in behalf of my colleagues in the conference, gladly emancipate every man I met on the other side or anywhere else from any injunction. I bid the calcium light welcome whenever it may come. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] The facts can be easily ascertained. Honorable gentlemen met us there from the Senate who sincerely desired tariff reform.

But let it be said to their credit that from the beginning to the end of that remarkable controversy they said to us that we were right; they had no doubt that our positions were sound and correct; but that under their obligations to their associates in the Senate, and on account of the condition that prevailed in that body, they did not believe that they could materially change the bill.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. My friend will remember that I only have ten minutes.

Mr. Speaker, when that light is turned on it will show another fact. There was my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] and my friend from Kentucky [Mr. MONTGOMERY] and my humble self, led by my gifted and devoted friend from West Virginia. [Applause.] It may be that we were too persistent; but when that calcium light is turned on it will be shown that the time that we spent there was spent in an honest effort to redeem the pledges of our party and to reinstate somewhat the bill which the House of Representatives had passed; and that struggle continued, through infinite complications, until the last hope of success perished on Saturday last.

My eloquent friend from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] has just said something about dietetics, and I understood him to refer to a remark which I had made earlier in this debate. I believe the reference was to eating something that was disagreeable.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that this article is not altogether agreeable to my taste; but my diet on this occasion is more agreeable to me than the diet of the McKinley bill taken from under the feet of the Republican party. De gustibus non disputandum. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let the gentleman take the latter if he will. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state two or three reasons why I shall vote for these Senate amendments. I shall vote for them, in the first place, because I know that they do not suit the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In the next place, one of the main reasons why I shall vote for this bill—and I say it for the benefit of my honorable friend from New York—is because it still contains the income tax. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. That is frank and candid.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TRACEY). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. I desire to reserve my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] is entitled to close the debate.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from West Virginia wants a vote he can have it. If he wants to talk he can do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from West Virginia is entitled to close the debate. Does the gentleman desire to use his time?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Does the gentleman from Maine decline to use his time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine declines to use his time.

Mr. REED. I reserve my time.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, there ought not to be any misunderstanding. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] did not decline to use his time. He reserved it.

A MEMBER on the Democratic side. Then let him use it. This side is entitled to conclude the debate.

Mr. REED. That side is entitled to a vote if it does not want to talk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not recognize the gentleman from Maine later.

Mr. REED. Well, if the Chair refuses to recognize the gentleman from Maine, he will only be carrying out what seems to be natural to the seat. [Derisive cries on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] is recognized.

Mr. CRISP. The rule is too well understood in this House to be misapprehended by anyone, that those holding the affirmative of a proposition have the right to conclude the debate, and if the gentleman from Maine loses the four minutes that remain to him he has himself alone to blame for it, because he now has full notice.

Mr. REED. Both from the floor and the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Maine desire to use his four minutes?

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Maine desires to use them when he chooses. [Jeers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I submit that the majority, having buncoed the Senate out of the bill and the House out of its judgment, are now trying to bunco the Republicans of the House out of their time. [Cries of "Sit down!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRISP. I only desire in the few moments allowed to me to publicly assume my full share of responsibility for the action this side of the House is now asked to take, and to aver in the face of my colleagues and the country that we are doing what, in the judgment of those who have been actively engaged in this struggle, those who have taken earnest part in this fight, is for the best interests of the cause of tariff reform. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is very easy for a distinguished gentleman like my friend from New York who, as we all know, with all his ability and amiability spends but little of his time in attending to the details of the business of the House [laughter and applause], it is very easy for him to come here and indulge in pyrotechnics about "principle" when we who are here as plain practical business men are seeking to obtain some relief for a suffering people.

But I want the gentleman to understand, and I want the country to understand, that the deserters from the cause of tariff reform are not these conferees and others who have been making this great struggle and who now advise that this bill be accepted, but the deserters are rather those gentlemen who, in the midst of the fight, because they do not approve all the provisions of this bill, hold back and say "We will have no lot or part in this struggle further." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Those gentlemen can receive the approbation and applause of Republicans who desire nothing better than the maintenance of the McKinley bill; but they can never meet the approbation and applause of the plain people of this country who have been oppressed and downtrodden by that law. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] taunts this side of the House by saying that we wanted free iron ore, we wanted free coal, we wanted free sugar, and we have given them all up. I say to my friend from Michigan that these gentlemen who have labored day and night, in season and out of season, to secure some changes in the Senate bill, say to us that we must take that bill or we get nothing.

What should we do? We are plain, practical men. We are not discussing a theory. We believe in homely phrase that when people are starving, "half a loaf is better than no bread." Therefore we say we will take the Senate bill; but before this House adjourns to-night, if our friends will stay with us——

Many members on the Democratic side. We will do it.

Mr. CRISP (continuing). We will send to the Senate, crystallized into the form of acts passed in this Hall, bills making sugar free [loud applause], making coal free [renewed applause], making iron ore free [continued applause], and making barbed wire free. [Renewed applause.] If my friend on that side is so much concerned about these articles, let him stay here and vote with us. [Laughter and applause.]

It is quite apparent that you gentlemen on the other side prefer the McKinley bill. There are gentlemen on this side who prefer the McKinley bill to the House bill with the Senate amendments. Those gentlemen are willing to incur all kinds of risks and hazards, because they feel that in the end they can not be losers, because they prefer the McKinley law to this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CRISP. Just one word further.

Mr. COCKRAN. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. REED. I yield two minutes of my four minutes remaining to the gentleman from Georgia [loud applause on both sides of the House], and the other two minutes I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to another minute yielded by the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I only want to say that so far as I am concerned, I was willing to continue the contest for a better bill so long as there was any hope of obtaining it. But when the conferees on the part of the House, in whom we have the utmost confidence, who are familiar with all the facts, tell us that in their judgment we must take this bill or be remitted to the penalties of the McKinley bill, I do not hesitate a moment. I take the Senate amendments.

If there is a sugar trust in this country which is dominating legislation, the Republican party created it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And although this bill does not destroy that trust, as we wish it did, it takes away more than one-half of the protection accorded to that trust. [Applause.] If there is a "coal combine," the legislation of the Republican party built it up; and although we do not make coal free in this bill, we reduce the duty from 75 cents to 40 cents.

If there is a steel and iron combine the same remark applies. Going through these schedules, whilst they are not all we wish, they are (and we want the country to understand it) the best we can now get. The moment we get this we intend to move forward; we do not intend there shall be any backward step in tariff reform. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] We believe that the adjournment of this Congress without the passage of some tariff bill would be a blow for tariff reform from which it would not recover for years to come. [Long continued applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that, operating under the order of the House, it would not be in order to recognize any member for any question of the kind suggested by the gentlemen from New York; but if the gentleman desires to use his minute yielded to him by the gentleman from Maine——

Mr. COCKRAN. Two minutes. I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that the remark of the gentleman from Georgia—— [Derisive cries on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. The gentleman from New York has been recognized for one minute.

Mr. COCKRAN. I desire to say that the gentleman from Georgia, in making a statement that my absence from this House formed any part or should form any part of this discussion, has made an exhibition which I am sorry to find made by any member. The gentleman from Georgia knows why I have been absent; nobody knows it better. He knows the painful circumstances which have compelled me to be absent; and that statement of his is but an evidence of the growth of Georgia chivalry since Alexander H. Stevens was replaced in the statesmanship of the country by the present Speaker of the House. [Applause, derisive cries, and great disorder.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, that statement was not made—— [Cries of "Regular order!" on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. Gentlemen will take their seats. Gentlemen on the left of the Chair will be seated. Gentlemen on the right of the Chair will be seated. Members will take their seats.

Mr. CRISP. I ought to be allowed to say——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker—— [Great confusion in the Hall.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen will be seated. The gentleman from Maine will be seated. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] is recognized.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I want to say, in justice to myself and to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], that the reference to his absence had no relation and was not intended to be any reflection on him as a Representative. It was intended to show his ignorance of the situation here because he had been away. That is all. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia tell us now why he is surrendering, and to whom? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York will be seated.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why do you not make the gentlemen on your right sit down as well as those on your left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen on the right will be seated.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] has three minutes in which to close the debate.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, in closing the debate I wish to correct or make more accurate a statement which I made in answer to the question of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HUDSON]. I stated to him that I was informed that the sugar trust had imported nearly $100,000,000 worth of raw sugar in anticipation of the going into effect of an ad valorem duty upon raw sugar. That statement was made to me by a member of Congress personally familiar with these matters and whose statement I supposed to be one that I could rely upon. It seems, however, that he was mistaken, and that my other statement was the correct one. About 448,000 tons is said to be the amount which the trust has imported in anticipation of the passage of this bill.

A MEMBER. How much is that in dollars and cents?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I can not tell you, but it is something like $25,000,000, perhaps.

Mr. M'MILLIN. Twenty-two million dollars.

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Certainly; I will answer a question.

Mr. PENCE. I do not seek to interrupt the gentleman, but I have read the rule which was reported here. I wish to ask him if we are to understand that after the passage of the motion that has been made by the gentleman from West Virginia it is the purpose of the majority of this House to sit here and at this session to-night pass a free sugar bill?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Yes. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall occupy even the few moments of time that I have left. I do not know that it is necessary for me to add any word to what I have already said. I indorse in the main the sentiments of my friend from Georgia [Mr. TURNER]. I do not believe that this is an occasion for Democratic enthusiasm. I believe that we are doing that which is possibly our duty, or our plain necessity to do. But if the Democratic party is to live in this country, and if the Democratic party deserves to live in this country, it can not lay down its weapons until it has made this a country where class taxation shall be unknown and no man shall bear burdens for the enrichment of any other man. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

I move that the order heretofore made, requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill 4864, be rescinded; that the conferees heretofore appointed on the part of the House be discharged from further duty in that behalf, and that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments to said bill and agree to the same.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

A division was demanded.

The yeas and nays were demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. JONES, and Mr. HOOKER of New York.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 182, nays 106, answered "present" 3, not voting 61; as follows:

Mr. RAYNER with Mr. WEVER, for the rest of this day.

Mr. TRACEY with Mr. FLETCHER, on this vote.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DRAPER]. If he were present he would vote "no" and I would vote "aye."

Mr. DALZELL. I am paired with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM]. If he were present he would vote "aye" and I would vote "no."

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask indefinite leave for my colleague, Mr. BUNDY, on account of sickness.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAY. I desire to withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] on this tariff bill. If he were present he would vote "aye;" I should vote "no."

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to announce the absence, on account of sickness, of my colleague Mr. CONN.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, leave of absence will be granted to the gentleman on account of sickness.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I am paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS]. If he were present I would vote "aye."

Mr. PENCE. Before the vote is announced, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in behalf of Mr. KEM and Mr. MCKEIGHAN of Nebraska and Mr. SIMPSON, all of whom are excused on account of sickness, that if present they would vote "aye."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

[Applause on Democratic side.]

On motion of Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FREE COAL.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Democratic caucus I send up this bill to the desk for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7963) to place upon the free list bituminous coal, shale, slack, and coke.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the following articles, when imported into the United States, shall be admitted free of import duties: Bituminous coal, shale, coal slack, or culm, and coke.

The SPEAKER. Thirty minutes, under the rule, are allowed for debate. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] for fifteen minutes, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] for the remainder of the time.

Mr. REED. I suppose the gentleman from West Virginia will explain what this bill is.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to this bill, to add after the word "coke," in the last line:

And machinery for the manufacture of cotton goods.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not open to amendment.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I have no desire to debate the bill.

Mr. REED. The gentleman has the opening.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I have nothing to say about it, because the House has debated the subject.

Mr. BURROWS. I would suggest that it would contribute to good order in the Hall if the Speaker would direct those machines to be stopped. It is late in the evening, and we do not need them.

The SPEAKER. The fans?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The fans will be stopped. Does the gentleman from Maine desire to debate the bill?

Mr. REED. Of course I desire debate. I will not be a party to this game without exposing it. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CRAIN. I move the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, during the debate this afternoon upon the tariff bill I sought opportunity to put a question to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER]. I sought the opportunity in a regular parliamentary way, as I have always done. I have never yet attempted upon this floor to inject any remarks into the speech of any gentleman without asking his permission under the rules. What I desired to do was to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia, in a respectful manner, to an interruption which he gave to me on a former occasion, and the reason why I desired to interrupt him was because the gentleman at the particular time had made utterance as follows. Speaking of this bill he said:

It then went to the Senate, a coördinate branch of Congress, and there in the various stages which marked its history it was undergoing some sort of discussion or treatment and consideration from the 1st of February until the 3d day of July last. Let it also be remembered that during that long delay in the other branch of Congress our honorable friends in that body who represented the views that we entertain, and for the success of which their hearts beat as cordially as ours, had to sit in their seats because they had no rules to do business, and endure the fusillade and fire of every popgun that could be raised in the Senate against the bill which we sent to that body. I do not wish to disparage any honorable gentleman on either side of that illustrious body, but all gentlemen will remember the tactics which were employed to delay and obstruct the passage of that bill; one Senator having a fifteen days' speech on his desk for the purpose of hurling it against this measure.

At that time I desired to call the attention of the distinguished gentleman to page 5460 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the current session of Congress, that he might see the following language:

Mr. MARSH. What is the date?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The 10th of May.

Take the lead trust, take the linseed oil trust, take all the trusts, as I have said, even the collar and cuff trust, they have gone one by one through their special representatives, have taken the body politic of Congress by the throat, and have established their domination in a way that no man can resist.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I wish to ask the gentleman whether in his opinion it is exactly proper, on the naval appropriation bill, to arraign gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol and on an entirely different subject?

Now, I was trying to say in the most respectful manner, or to call the distinguished gentleman's attention, without any interruption or without any purpose of injuring his feelings or to incommode him to the difference between a gentleman coolly listening to a speech and another gentleman in the full tide of abuse of a coördinate branch of the Government.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia such time as he desires.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say, in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio just made, that when he undertook to interpose during the brief remarks I was making a short time ago, I was going under some stress of excitement, and endeavoring to say a great many things in a very short time. I declined on account of my limited time to be interrupted by the gentleman from Ohio. I begged the gentleman not to persist, because I wished to finish my statement without losing my opportunity for discussing the pending subject. If I had understood correctly the gentleman's reference, I could not have resisted his request.

Let me say now, that the gentleman from Ohio has been uniformly courteous. I have never had any other experience at his hands; and when I found that he was somewhat ruffled at my refusal to yield the floor to him for an interruption, I sought the first occasion I had to find what the subject-matter was that he had in hand. I regret very much now that I said or did anything which in any manner offended the gentleman. I really think, from the remarks which he has just made, he can find nothing really at which to take umbrage, let me say to my honorable friend.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me say to my friend that I am not offended with him. I was only trying to satisfy the gentleman from Georgia and the House that I was not making an impertinent interference in his remarks.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. If I were to reply to the gentleman in the same spirit which he has just replied to me, I would say that I did not intend on that occasion to which he refers to give any offense at all. The gentleman says that he took no offense. I am very glad of it. I wish to say that on the occasion to which he refers, when I had asked his consent to interrupt him he consented, and I did interrupt.

There is a little difference there, which I am sure the gentleman will recognize, perhaps to my disadvantage. The gentleman had an hour and I had only ten minutes. I desire to make one other statement, and that is that the gentleman now arraigns me, properly, for having, in reply to some strictures that were made on the floor here on the proceedings in the Senate, used language in reference to the affairs of that body which were not entirely in order.

I wish now to set the gentleman from Ohio an example which he may follow on a similar occasion when he next arraigns the Senate. I call his attention to it and hope he will not do as he did in May last. I propose to strike out of my remarks everything that could offend anybody in the Senate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Should the gentleman from Georgia be found in the Senate at that time I shall great pains not to say anything offensive to that body. [Laughter.]

[Mr. PAYNE withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question being put, there were, on a division (called for by Mr. REED)—ayes 78, noes 47.

Mr. REED. No quorum, Mr. Speaker. You would not think of passing an important bill like this without a quorum.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois and Mr. BROOKSHIRE were appointed as tellers to act during the call of the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 162, nays 104, answered "present" 1, not voting 84; as follows:

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Rest of this day:

Mr. STEVENS with Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York.

On coal and iron schedule:

Mr. BAILEY with Mr. APSLEY.

Mr. SNODGRASS with Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee.

Mr. SCHERMERHORN with Mr. SHAW.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DRAPER]. If he were present, I would vote "aye;" he would vote "no."

Mr. BRODERICK. I was paired with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE], but the bill proper was excepted from the pair. These other tariff bills were not contemplated or considered, and so in order to keep faith with him I shall refrain from voting except on the question of sugar. I know how the gentleman would vote on this question if present.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FREE IRON ORE.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I am instructed by the Democratic caucus to present the following bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7969) to place upon the free list all ores of iron.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the following articles, when imported into the United States, shall be admitted free of import duties:

Iron ore, including manganiferous iron ore; also the dross or residiuum from burnt pyrites, and sulphur ore, as pyrites or sulphuret of iron in its natural state.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from West Virginia to control fifteen minutes of the time in support of, and the gentleman from Maine the other fifteen minutes in opposition to the bill.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman from West Virginia will give us some explanation of the bill.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I do not desire to speak.

Mr. REED. I thought some gentleman on that side would say something.

Mr. BLAIR. I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia a question, if he will take the floor for that purpose.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Very well.

Mr. BLAIR. During the debate this afternoon—the discussion on the main question—it was stated by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON], and I do not now see him in his seat, and to whom I would have addressed the inquiry if present, that the Republican Senators had agreed to withdraw their opposition to the Senate bill, as it was sent to the House and adopted to-day, provided that certain schedules were fixed to their satisfaction, or the satisfaction of the great interests concerned in them.

Now, I challenge that declaration. I challenge its accuracy, and I ask the proof. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, responsible more than any other one man for this legislation, whether that statement is true or otherwise?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. And, if so, to name the man.

Mr. BLAIR. Again I ask the gentleman if it is true?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what information the gentleman from Ohio has. I do not see him in his seat at this time. I have no definite information that would enable me to answer the question of the gentleman from New Hampshire. But my understanding is that several times—or my information is in a general way—that several times during the progress of the tariff bill through the Senate the silence, that is, the agreement to stop debate and come to a vote of the Republican Senators, or some of them, was obtained by conceding to them some interest in the tariff bill.

Mr. BLAIR. What interest was referred to?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Well, perhaps something in the line of the iron and steel and cotton schedules. I would not undertake to be accurate as to that. I have not followed the debate thoroughly, being absent at the time, and do not know exactly what its progress was in the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. Then it can be reduced to nothing more definite than the statement the gentleman now makes?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Not so far as I am concerned. The gentleman is aware of the fact that they have no previous question in the Senate, and any Senator can speak for or against a matter and occupy the floor as long as he pleases. In the case of the tariff bill they had to buy the silence of the Republican Senators, or some of them, by the granting of additional taxes on the American people.

Mr. BLAIR. You mean to be understood as saying that certain protected interests bought their protection in the bill, which has just become a law by sacrificing the other and perhaps four-fifths of the people who were receiving protection under the McKinley bill?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Well, that is a question that has many sides to those who make the sacrifice. I would like to sacrifice, I would state to the gentleman, a great many more of them.

Mr. BLAIR. I desired to ask the gentleman from Ohio the question, but did not see him in his seat.

Mr. REED. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, after a year's session of Congress we seem to be approaching an adjournment. We have just enacted the Gorman-Brice tariff bill, which the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], in answer to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] intimates, if he does not state, to be an improper bill, passed through another body by improper if not dishonorable methods.

Mr. BLAIR. And if the gentleman will allow me to suggest, a very proper subject-matter of investigation by this House.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And yet the gentleman from West Virginia and that side of the House by voting for it breathed the breath of life into the improper and dishonored product. The gentleman from West Virginia is estopped from making the accusation of dishonor, because he becomes an accomplice when he adopts it and blesses it by action. Votes are vital, not words. [Applause on the Republican side.] After all, you are to stand or fall by the merits of this legislation. With the notice that our Democratic friends give us, what is to come in the future? The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], following the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] and the honorable Speaker of the House, or they following him, give notice that this is but one stage of the journey to what they call tariff reform.

Think of it! From high prosperity to business despair, universal nonemployment, the borrowing of money, strikes, riot, arson, and murder, suppressed by the strong arm of the law, in less than eighteen months, from one condition to the other, with the gentleman from West Virginia heading the organized threat against the country's welfare. And now, when under protest he takes this dishonored legislation and adopts it, he gives notice to a distracted country that he is ready to hoist his flag and draw his sword and make another onslaught upon the people. Instead of giving quiet and rest, even if this legislation be improper, and enabling the country to say, "We will adjust ourselves to it," he still further unsettles it by saying, "We have not yet begun to fight." I thank God that his masters and mine will have a chance to say in November next whether he and his party shall remain in command in this House during the balance of this Administration.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. You do not want me defeated for Congress!

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Personally, I wish the gentleman no harm. As he embodies the vicious economic principles which have bankrupted the country, I can say nothing too severe concerning him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what have we? The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] in his first statement has, I suspect, stated substantially the truth. And what was it? That the dealers in sugar who control the product in the United States have now on hand—that they have imported, duty free, or substantially so—a hundred millions of dollars' worth of that product.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I corrected that; I said 448,000 tons.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, yes; the gentleman afterward said about one-fourth of the amount which he first stated. I think his first statement was right. Now, what does he do if his first statement is right? By doing that which he said he would not do, by taking, as he calls it, this dishonest product that comes from the Senate and breathing the breath of life into it, he legislates into the pockets of the men who control that great product of sugar, which rich and poor alike must have under all circumstances, $40,000,000 in the twinkling of an eye, if he is correct in his statement.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. If the Republican Senators will vote for the bill I have in my hand, they will not get one dollar of the forty millions.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, "if!" That is nonsense. In the single period of six hours, under the gentleman's flag and command, you give these men $40,000,000 profit, and then turn around and say, "Oh, we will put sugar on the free list as an independent proposition." The gentleman knows, as he sits before me this evening, that that legislation is not to go upon the statute books, and that when he voted to pass this law placing this duty upon sugar that he fastened that burden upon the people of this country and upon all the people.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will later on, because I have but little time. Now I want to talk about sugar a minute. What does this bill do? It not only gives this $43,000,000 of profit on the present product in the hands of these men, but the consumption of sugar in the United States per annum is 4,000,000,000 pounds in round numbers, worth $120,000,000. Forty per cent on that you can count, and then add, if you please, your one-eighth differential, and you have over $53,000,000 added by this legislation annually on sugar alone as a burden upon all the people of this country.

But that is not all. The bounty under the McKinley law to producers of sugar in the United States so as to establish that industry here is the bête noire of the Democratic party. They hold up their hands and they say, "What, pay a bounty on sugar; why not pay a bounty on the farmers' corn?" What, gentlemen, is it that you put in the Gorman-Brice law? In the McKinley law we put sugar on the free list, even all the sugar that came from all the world, the Sandwich Islands included, coming in free.

Mr. TYLER. Raw sugar.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, yes, raw sugar; and we do not import any other kind.

Mr. SWANSON. Of which the trust gets the benefit.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman will get into very good company if he could get into my remarks; but I have not time to yield to him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will you allow me to ask you a question?

Mr. REED. Ask him in the time of the gentleman from West Virginia. He has time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In a moment I will yield to the tornado from Missouri. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY in the chair). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REED. I give the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has a memorandum that the gentleman has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. REED. I do not care what memorandum the Chair has; I have got a measure in the RECORD which shows what the memorandum amounts to up there. I know just what time I had, and just what time I gave; and 10 from 15 leaves 5.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The gentleman from Maine is entitled to five minutes more, unless the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] occupied a part of his time.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from New Hampshire occupied part of the time of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, certainly. He asked the gentleman to take the floor long enough to answer some questions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois for five minutes as soon as order is restored.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I do not object.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is an open secret that Mr. Claus Spreckels and other members of the sugar trust control the sugar product in the Sandwich Islands, own most of the plantations, or have a contract with the whole product. That product already amounts to 300,000,000 pounds per annum, and can be indefinitely increased, and under the treaty with that country sugar from that country comes free into the United States. Your law puts 40 per cent tax on sugar that comes from all other countries. The result is that the moment the Sandwich Island sugar lands in the United States it has added to it 40 per cent of value, and that 40 per cent goes into the pockets of the sugar trust, and will amount to $5,000,000 annually, bounty paid practically from the Treasury to the sugar trust. Ah, you are not willing for the beet-sugar industry to be established in our country, by our own citizens; but you vote this bounty into the pockets of these men on the Sandwich Islands' product.

Mr. BOWERS of California. And abrogate a solemn treaty.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. There, gentlemen, is the whole story; and if you think you can muddy the water and not let the light on the 1½ cents a pound of increase in price of sugar that everybody will have to pay after Grover Cleveland signs this bill, you are mistaken. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON] gave you a fair warning, but after all his warning, after my warning, after the people have given you notice, with bankruptcy upon us, with disaster upon us, with strikes upon us, with almost civil war upon us in some sections, with our mills idle, with our farmers' products going for a song, you insist on this legislation that gives this great bounty to the sugar trust.

The English language does not afford words, or at least I have not ability enough to properly describe your political shortcomings, and I will remit you to your people in your respective districts, expecting, personally, that they will treat you well, but politically they will leave you at home as they ought to do, and send somebody here that believes in the country, that believes in her industries, that believes in her protection, that would rather our people should do well than to do ill, that our mills should be open and running and making profit enough that labor should have a fair price, rather than to be closed or running at a loss. Why, do you know, if I had time and was a preacher I would send a lot of missionaries to talk to your people about you.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. That last supposition is a very violent one.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I might not catch the chief of sinners, the Speaker, or the gentleman from West Virginia, but I would catch some of our New York friends, because up there you have suffering people; up there you have industries; up there they are crying for employment. I would open wide the church door, and I think I could secure some of these New York people, and possibly some New Jersey people. It might tax the grace of the Lord a great deal to convict and convert the average New Jersey Democratic politician, but I have faith to believe that thousands of farmers and working people in New Jersey who have followed the tariff reform "will-o'-the-wisp" are ready to acknowledge their error.

Go on, gentlemen; you have passed the Gorman-Brice bill with your eyes open; that is to be the law. The Senate and House concur, and now, having done the devilment, you hear the cry of a long-suffering and indignant people, and hope to escape their condemnation by passing these pop-gun bills through the House. One puts coal, one puts iron ore, one puts sugar on the free list.

You know the Senate will never pass them; you are exhibiting the ostrich act. You push your heads in the sand and think you are in hiding. It does not require a microscope to witness the exhibition.

Somebody asks will the President sign your Gorman-Brice act? I do not know. I expect he will. Somebody says, do not GORMAN and VEST & Co. gain a victory over him if he does? I do not know. I do not care. It did seem to me that the President had the best of the Senatorial junta. It seemed to me that he had the press and his party behind him, but they seem to have turned up on top some way, and now I suppose he will sign the bill. [Laughter.] Go on, gentlemen. It is a Kilkenny cat fight, and while you are at it honest men may get their due. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I can assure my friend from Illinois, whose oratory I always delight to hear, that if he will hire a church anywhere within a convenient distance I shall be a constant attendant on the services. [Laughter.] So far as the animadversions he has made on the sugar trust are concerned, or on any profit that it may get on the raw sugar already in its warehouses or on any profit it may get from the continuance of the Hawaiian treaty, I indorse—not his figures, for I do not know that they are accurate—but I indorse his position upon that question, and before this House adjourns to-night I shall offer and ask him to vote for a bill putting sugar upon the free list, so as to cut off from the trust its yearly revenues from sugar imported from the Hawaiian Islands and its prospective profit on the sugar now stored in its warehouses; and I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that if he can find two or three or four Republican Senators who will vote for that bill, it will be on the statute book before this present session ends.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I want to say to the gentleman from West Virginia that I will vote for his popgun free-sugar proposition, but I tell him further that, while I shall vote for it, I shall do so without any hope of its becoming a law, and I will remind him that within the last sixty minutes I have voted to keep sugar on the free list, while he has voted to put it on the taxable list. [Laughter. Applause on the Republican side.]

The question being being taken on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT and others called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the yeas and nays be considered as ordered on the passage of the bill, and not on the third reading.

Mr. BURROWS. That will be satisfactory.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—yeas 172, nays 103, answered "present" 1, not voting 75; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. LOCKWOOD and Mr. WHEELER of Illinois were announced as paired on all political questions for the rest of this day.

Mr. LYNCH and Mr. SHAW were announced as paired on the iron and barbed-wire schedules.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DRAPER]. If he were present I should vote "aye."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM]. If he were present he would vote "aye" and I would vote "no."

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen from Nebraska [Mr. KEM and Mr. MCKEIGHAN] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] are absent on account of sickness, either personal or in their families, and if present they would vote "aye."

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FREE BARBED-WIRE FENCING.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Democratic caucus, I offer the bill which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7970) to place on the free list barbed-wire fencing and wire rods for the manufacture of the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the following articles, when imported into the United States, shall be admitted free of import duties: Barbed wire, fencing wire; wire rods of iron or steel when imported for the manfacture of barbed-wire fencing, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). Thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes on each side.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr REED] is recognized.

Mr. REED. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from West Virginia what was the duty on barbed wire in the late "Wilson bill?" [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. It was either 30 or 35 per cent; I do not recall at this moment which.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman give us the reason for this change of heart?

Mr. PAYNE. And will the gentleman at the same time tell us why wire rods are not also made free?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Oh, well, we are always progressing on the tariff question. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I would like to know from the gentleman in charge of this bill——

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I do not hear what the gentleman is saying.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has been recognized.

Mr. REED. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois to ask the gentleman from West Virginia a question.

The SPEAKER. How long does the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED. Long enough for the gentleman to ask whatever questions he wants to ask, and more time, if he wants it, after he gets through with his questions.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I would like to know from the gentleman in charge of this bill whether there is anything personal in this measure, and whether it is intended as a reprimand to my friend from the Sangamon district of Illinois? [Cries of of "Vote!" "Vote!"] If the gentleman does not answer, I take it that my question is answered in the affirmative. [Renewed cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. REED. I am afraid that the House has not understood the remark of the gentleman from West Virginia, because it was applauded on the other side. He says his views are always progressive on the subject of the tariff. He means by this that he has jumped to-day from his old position in favor of taxed coal as a specialty to free coal (that, however, was a jump of several years), and that he is now ready to jump in a single session from taxed barbed wire at 30 or 35 cents to free barbed wire; and he declines to answer any questions as to why wire rods out of which barbed wire is made are made dutiable.

A MEMBER on the Democratic side. He will jump farther than that.

Mr. REED. Yes; he will jump farther than that; he will jump overboard. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] [Renewed cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. REED. Wait a moment. You gentlemen had better learn fully the lesson of what you are doing. I do not wonder you can not speak distinctly in view of the mouthful you have taken to-day; that is but natural. But I want you now to understand this matter. The gentleman from West Virginia, while he has been deposed practically from his position, and while the principles of the gentleman from Illinois have been adopted, still remains the "shadow of a name," which still reverberates somewhat in the country. And I want this House and the country fully to understand the significance of the utterance of the gentleman from West Virginia. His progressiveness on tariff matters in the past does not concern us very much; it is possible it may not in the future.

But so far as he represents his party, his views may be of some importance. And this enables me to reiterate—and neither he nor any gentleman on his side can contradict the proposition—that the actions of to-day are not in any sense a basis upon which this country can do business. Even the practical, plain, homely person that the Speaker to-day described himself to be with tremenduous accuracy [laughter on the Republican side]—even that plain and simple business person can not be able in any way to do business in this country as long as his feet rest upon the shifting sands, which are represented by the present chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [applause on the Republican side], who, in the presence of this House, publicly submits to the reflection put upon him by the House in refusing to allow the committee over which he presides to have a word to say with regard to tariff matters which are presented here.

Bowled out by the Senate and by the House, he still represents their willingness to go from one point to another without regard to his and their past position; and he announces to the country (I recall again the significance of it) that this raid which has been made upon the industries of the land is to be repeated to the fullest extent, so far as he can get followers.

He has said here again and again, and he is always right, that he had destroyed some industries by this bill and was willing to destroy some others. [Laughter and applause.]

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRAIN. Let us have a vote.

Mr. REED. I do not think that the gentlemen of the Democratic party are in their usually sweet temper this afternoon. Something they have eaten has perhaps disagreed with them. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Perhaps it is indigestion that makes them adopt such a course as we have witnessed here during the time that this discussion has progressed. [Laughter.]

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it necessary to reply to the sneering remarks of the gentleman from Maine, in which he tries to work himself up to the idea that when the caucus gave me authority as an individual and ordered me as an individual to introduce these separate bills it put any affront upon me as chairman of my committee.

Now, I say to the gentleman from Maine that so far as I am concerned, and I believe so far as the people with whom I am associated in this great work here are concerned, we do not intend to give up this fight. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

The right of the American people to be relieved of class distinction is higher than the right of any protected industry to repose in its industry. [Renewed applause.] In so far as I am individually concerned, and my humble views, I can say to the gentleman that there will be no let up in the fight as long as the yoke of monopoly is on the neck of any citizen of this country. [Applause and cheers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, that is good. [Laughter.] That was my object in making those remarks. I have got the gentleman to the surface, and the whole Democratic party. There is where you are, and you can not fool the people again with your talk.

Mr. BUNN. We have not tried to; we reserve that for your side.

Mr. REED. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague on the committee.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire that the members of this House should remember that when the Wilson bill was prepared under the guidance of the gentleman from West Virginia, who has just addressed the House, that barbed wire was placed on the dutiable list at 35 per cent ad valorem. This amount of duty was placed there, not in the excitement or heat of debate, as this bill is presented to-day, but under the deliberate judgment of the gentleman himself and of his colleagues that it was a proper revenue duty. In the consideration of this item in the Senate it was found that the best interests of the Government would be subserved by retaining a duty on barbed wire, and it was retained, but changed from an ad valorem to a specific duty.

The only person in either branch of Congress who favored putting barbed wire on the free list was the Populist Senator from Nebraska. This bill is an abandonment of Democratic principles. It is a surrender to the Populists of the House and Senate. It may be that it is the price the leader of the Democratic party of the House has paid for the support the Populists gave his party less than an hour ago, when the abject surrender of the House was made to the Senate in the adoption of the Gorman bill in place of the Wilson bill. After the humility and disgrace you have voluntarily taken upon yourselves this afternoon in receding from the Senate amendments to the House bill and adopting all of the six hundred and thirty-four amendments without even the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" you probably are prepared to pass this bill, although it is a complete abandonment of all Democratic principles.

The gentleman himself said when he presented the original Wilson bill to the House that the various schedules were so graduated and regulated that they were in the interest of true revenue reform. Now I know that under the duty that is imposed in the Gorman bill as cheap barbed wire will be offered to the country as any individual can well ask. Under the duties that have been imposed by the Republican party great barbed-wire industries have been established in Illinois and in other States of the Union, and under this duty barbed wire has decreased in value steadily from 18 cents a pound until to-day, under the McKinley bill, it is sold for less than 2 cents a pound.

A MEMBER. One and three-quarter cents.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. My colleague from Iowa says 1¾ cents, and yet these gentlemen, for the purpose of destroying this industry, are willing to put it on the free list. One of these large industries is now located in the district I have the honor to represent. This industry has made rapid progress there, and has given employment to four or five hundred men who have been retained in that employment during the whole time that the Republican party has been in control in this country.

The manager of that industry has told me that during the present year, owing to the conditions of trade and commerce that has been brought on the country by this threat to annihilate all manufactories that have been developed under Republican legislation, he has lost $20,000 in that industry alone in endeavoring to give employment to his hands. Now, in the face of such facts as these, I find that the members of the Democratic party are willing to put this industry on the free list. Why, what causes this change on the part of the Democratic party? Does your party, Mr. Speaker, expect to gain some political advantage by this sudden change of front on barbed wire?

I wish to say, sir, that during the entire debate that has been had on this tariff legislation, both in the Senate and in the House, I have heard no Democrat rise in his place and talk about what is for the best interest of the Government. I have listened with interest to know from them by any statement they might make whether the proposed legislation would be in the interest of the wage workers of America or of the consumers. I have listened, Mr. Speaker, in vain for the expression of any such sentiments.

The great concern, Mr. Speaker, has been: "What shall we do to protect and to perpetuate the power of the Democratic party?" And in this they are simply playing with the people, they are undertaking what has been stated here to-day, to lead the people to believe that by these free coal and free iron and free sugar bills some legislation is to be had on these subjects. They know, and they knew when they surrendered here to-day, that the legislation that is proposed in these separate bills here will sleep the sleep of death in the Finance Committee of the Senate.

They knew, Mr. Speaker, that they could afford to pass this legislation, because nothing but the bill that they first voted for, the Gorman bill, would be the legislation that would be given to the people of the country. Now, see the position they put themselves in. In one hour they vote for a duty upon coal, iron ore, and sugar, and barbed wire. In the next hour they pretend to vote for free iron ore, free coal, free sugar, and free barbed wire.

Gentlemen, the people of this country are not as ignorant as you assume them to be. You will find when you go to your several homes that they know and appreciate the situation quite as well as you do. You have proven false to them upon every question upon which they placed you in power in 1892. You told the wage workers that under Democracy their wages would be maintained at the standard under Republican rule and they would be given cheaper clothing and food.

By your tinkering with the tariff you have reduced their wages from 10 to 25 per cent, and in the barbed-wire industry you propose in this bill to make tramps of all who heretofore have found employment at good wages in these industries.

Your race, however, is nearly run. In November these same wage workers will have an opportunity to express their present opinion of you and your broken promises. It requires no prophetic qualities to now tell what their verdict of you will be. They will not make the mistake of being fooled twice by the same party.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS].

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Speaker, if there is any duty more indefensible than another, it is the duty upon barbed wire. For many years barbed wire, manufactured in the United States, has been exported to all parts of the world. The price to-day for export is $1.45 per hundred pounds, delivered free on board vessel in the port of New York.

If our manufacturers of barbed wire have been able to compete in foreign markets while paying a duty upon the raw material, how much more will their ability be increased when the iron rods from which they make their product are given them free of duty? The addition of the free material clause justifies the House committee in changing from 35 per cent to free list. Instead of closing the factories of our friend from Illinois, the second section of this bill will make them more able than ever to control the markets of the world.

And now I wish, Mr. Speaker, to make another statement that I consider as very important, for in it lies our only defense in receding from our disagreement with the Senate amendments.

It has been charged by gentlemen on the other side of the House that these independent tariff bills which we are passing to-night are popgun bills, not seriously intended to be passed or insisted upon in the Senate. This is a most serious charge, and strikes at the dignity and good faith of this House. It can not be too warmly resented. I for one would never have voted to recede except upon the most positive assurances that we should stay here and fight it out and insist upon the Senate's voting before we adjourn Congress. I expect the House to sustain its good faith and dignity and not permit Congress to adjourn until they become laws.

The action of to-day by which we recede from our differences with the Senate was simply, as I believe, to untie the deadlock existing between the House and the Senate and to fight out these other matters, sugar, coal, and iron, upon their own bases, not complicated with other articles—not a change of front, but a necessary change of tactics. This ought to have been the course from the beginning. We should not have united all the industries and trusts in one formidable opposition; it was bad strategy. If we had proceeded in this way, and I insisted upon it from the beginning, taking groups of industries and passing upon them with deliberation after careful consideration, tariff legislation would have been more effectual, more certain, and less hurtful to the industries of the country.

And now I want to say that this House can not afford to adjourn, can not afford to let the Senate adjourn, until every one of these measures is acted upon by that body. [Applause.] I received assurances from the leaders of the House, gentlemen in whom I have confidence, before I consented to vote for concurrence, that that should be the case, and any variation from that course would be undignified and indefensible. The Republican Congress stayed here until October to pass the McKinley bill. The Democracy, the people's representatives, can and should stay here until December, if necessary, to achieve its overthrow and redeem the pledges of the party. I for one will stay and make one vote to keep a quorum of the House here and enforce action by the Senate. [Immense applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has expressed some solicitude about a barbed-wire factory in his district. Of course we could not expect him to feel any interest in the farmers of his district, who buy of that factory.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I want to say to my friend that I represent the farmers in my district, and there is not a Democrat in the district but what will support me in my vote against this bill. [Cries of "Oh, no!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRYAN. We shall be able to tell better about that after the vote is polled than we are now, when the gentleman tells us what he thinks about it. I want to reassure the gentleman by reading from a letter written by a manufacturer of barbed wire, so that the gentleman will not feel any concern about his constituents who are engaged in that industry. Senator ALDRICH, as a part of a speech made on the 28th of July, 1892, gives a letter which was dated at Worcester, Mass., July 13, 1892, signed by the Washburne & Moen Manufacturing Company, Charles F. Washburne, vice-president. In the course of that letter Mr. Washburne says, on page 7538:

> There is only one other thing in addition which we wish to add, and that is that barbed wire is sold a good deal less in the United States than it is anywhere abroad.

Now, if a manufacturer of barbed wire states that it is sold in the United States "a good deal less" than it is abroad, he need not be afraid of the high-priced wire from abroad coming in here and ruining the industry.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You need not be afraid of protection then if it has enabled us to sell it cheaper than it is sold anywhere else.

Mr. BRYAN. But I am telling you the condition of the industry now. I am showing that there is no need of protection to keep the industry up.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You wanted it cheaper and you got it cheaper.

Mr. BRYAN. I want the Republicans of the West who have been voting to give free salt to the fish curers of the State represented by the gentleman who has been interrupting me [Mr. BOUTELLE] to let us know by their votes whether they are willing to give our farmers free barbed wire.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Why did not my friend do that in the bill which was framed by his committee?

Mr. BRYAN. I did all I could do then, and am doing all I can do now. We are going to give to you gentlemen who pretend to be interested in the Western farmers a chance to show your hand and to defend yourselves. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.[

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is the trouble with you; you have shown your hand too clearly.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRYAN. I will.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. We of us who are in favor of the farmers in the West are going to run again in our districts on the doctrine of protection to American labor and to American industry, a position which the gentleman does not dare to assume with his record in this House.

Mr. BRYAN. We will give the gentlemen from Nebraska a chance to tell their constituents whether they are for free sugar or not.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. You can have it.

Mr. BRYAN. We will give to the Senators who claim to be for free sugar a chance to go on record.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Did not the gentleman vote for a tariff on sugar to-day?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. Did you not vote for a tariff upon barbed wire to-day?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes, sir; I voted for everything in that bill to-day.

Mr. PICKLER. And that will become the law.

Mr. BRYAN. I voted for everything in that bill to-day, because that is the best we could do, and now I am going to do better by voting for these separate bills. [Cheers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRYAN. No; I only have five minutes time.

Mr. Speaker, just another word. I want to suggest to those gentlemen who find fault because we do not go far enough, that they stand in the attitude of the criminal who, when sent to the penitentiary, complained of the inefficiency of the prosecuting attorney and said, "He has not done his duty; he ought to have had me hung, but instead of that I got off with a term in the penitentiary."]Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has five minutes and the gentleman from West Virginia has three minutes remaining. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. REED. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

[Mr. GEAR withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, it would be a hard thing to discuss a question like this in three minutes, the time allotted to me. So far as barbed wire is concerned—and that is the question before the House, notwithstanding the animadversions of the gentleman from Iowa—no man stands here to oppose this bill except the gentleman who represents the district where the trust has its abiding place. There is no question, in my judgment, in the minds of the members of this House as to what should become of the barbed-wire trust or what should be done as to this bill. This House is for it; the country is for it; there should be free barbed wire, and if you can not make it in the gentleman's district in Illinois we will buy it elsewhere or make it for ourselves.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. You will buy it abroad. There will not be a pound of it made in this country.

Mr. PENCE. As to the gentleman who has just spoken, let me answer him in two minutes. Two minutes do not suffice for the discussion of that question, but when the gentleman from Illinois attempts in ten minutes to persuade this House, and through this House the country, that there should be a tax left in some form or other upon sugar, he attempts that which no man can accomplish, I care not what his ability may be.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Did not you vote to put a tax on sugar this afternoon?

Mr. PENCE. Yes, sir; I voted for the Senate bill this afternoon.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And did not that bill tax sugar?

Mr. PENCE. That bill taxed sugar. I did it, if the gentleman from Hawaii will permit me [laughter], because I knew that after that there would be a chance to give to the American people free sugar regardless of any tax that might be desired by the gentleman's clients.

Mr. BOUTELLE. How did you expect to secure free sugar?

Mr. PENCE. How did I expect to secure it? I do not know that I can answer questions in one minute, Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not think you can.

Mr. PENCE. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more. There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If the gentleman is to have five ninutes by unanimous consent to answer my question, I want an opportunity to put my question.

Mr. PENCE. Go on with the question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to know how the gentleman justifies his course in voting this afternoon to put a tax on sugar, and now undertaking to claim that he is going to relieve the people from that tax by voting for a bill which he knows will never go farther than this House?

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, of course I can not expect to keep gait with the gentleman from Maine as to what a fellow may know. He knows a great many things in his mind that I never dreamed of. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is true.

Mr. PENCE. Now we are agreed on that. The gentleman asks me how it happens that this afternoon I voted for the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia to pass the Senate bill——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Taxing sugar.

Mr. PENCE. Taxing sugar. And I answer him, because the resolution which he had read and I had read contained a provision that immediately after the passage of the Gorman bill from the Senate this question should be presented in this House——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Yes, and nowhere else. [Laughter.] If the gentleman knows anything, he knows just that.

Mr. PENCE. The gentleman had the resolution before him, so had I. The difference between him and me was simply this: He did not believe that the majority in this House would follow the adoption of the Senate tariff bill by the adoption of a free-sugar bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Certainly, I did believe it.

Mr. PENCE. I believed that they would do it. I believed, and I believe yet, that before yonder clock shall strike the hour of 10——

Mr. MERCER. That clock never does strike. [Great laughter.]

Mr. PENCE (continuing). This House will adopt the bill putting sugar on the free list.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in this question I feel much concern, because on the income tax and this matter center all the interests of the party to which I belong.

Now, let me remind the gentleman who has said in retort to me that the bill which is to follow—the free sugar bill—will pass this House, but not the other——

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is my judgment.

Mr. PENCE. That is your judgment. Upon your judgment I would not bet a markee on any matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. What is the judgment of the gentleman from Colorado about that matter?

Mr. PENCE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have lost track of the time by my watch——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I should like to see how much the gentleman knows about the Democratic programme, or what is his judgment about the fate of the sugar bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question being taken, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being upon the passage of the bill—

Mr. BRYAN and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee and Mr. HOOKER of New York were appointed as tellers to act during the roll call.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 191, nays 84, answered "present" 0, not voting 76; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FREE SUGAR.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Democratic caucus I send to the desk the following bill and ask its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7971) to exempt from duty sugar, molasses, etc.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act the following articles, when imported into the United States, shall be admitted free of all import duties:

All sugars, all tank bottoms, all sugar drainings and sugar sweepings, syrups of cane juice, melado, concentrated melado, and concrete and concentrated molasses, and molasses.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment which I send to the desk. I first ask consent that the amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to reading the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I object.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I hope the gentleman will allow it to be read.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I have no objection to its being read.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I ask the Clerk to read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill:

"That the bounties authorized to be paid to producers of sugar by section 231 of the act entitled 'An act to reduce revenue, equalize duties, and for other purposes,' approved October 1, 1890, shall be reduced one-eighth part of their respective amounts, as prescribed in said act, each year, beginning with July 1, 1895, and extending to July 1, 1901, inclusive, and shall thereafter cease and determine."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana to be permitted to offer this amendment to the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from West Virginia to control the time in support of the bill, and the gentleman from Maine in opposition.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

[Mr. SPRINGER withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague [Mr. DINGLEY] ten minutes out of my fifteen.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who has just addressed the House, has made the remarkable statement that the Gorman-Brice bill, which has passed the Senate and has been concurred in by the Democratic majority of the House to-day, gives less than half the protection to refined sugar which the tariff act of 1890 gives. The gentleman has come so far out of the way of the actual facts, that his statement can only be excused on the ground that he has not carefully read the sugar schedule.

I desire to call the attention of gentlemen to the provisions of that bill which have received the almost solid vote of the Democratic side to-day. The bill provides for one-eighth of 1 cent differential duty upon refined sugar, and gentlemen have been talking as though that was all the protection there was to refined sugar contained in it. But the bill further provides that 40 per cent duty shall be imposed upon imported raw sugar and also upon imported refined.

How much concealed protection is there in that, I ask the gentleman from Illinois? assuming that it requires, as sugar refiners claim, 105 pounds of centrifugal raw sugar, polarizing 96°, to make 100 pounds of refined sugar. Raw sugar polarizing 96° has averaged 3 cents per pound in Cuba during the past year. One hundred and five pounds of raw sugar, polarizing 96°, would be valued at $3.15. A duty of 40 per cent upon it would be $1.26. When that sugar is refined, what is the foreign value of it? It is 1 cent per pound more than raw sugar, that is 4 cents per pound.

Now, you have 100 pounds of refined sugar, valued at $4, and your duty of 40 per cent ad valorem on it immediately becomes $1.60 instead of $1.26. Now, how much concealed protection is there in the difference between $1.26 and $1.60? There is a difference of 34 cents, or thirty-four one-hundredths of a cent per pound. Add that to your one-eighth of a cent differential, or twelve and one-half hundredths, and you have forty-six and one-half hundredths per pound as the protection that is given the sugar trust by the bill that you have passed, instead of the eighth of a cent per pound. And that is on the assumption, claimed by the trust, that it requires 105 pounds of raw centrifugal sugar to make 100 pounds of granulated sugar.

But it must be borne in mind that there is a residuum of sugar below No. 16, and of sirup, which is of value, not to mention the certainty that under an ad valorem duty sugar will be undervalued, making the real protection of refined sugar that is given by the bill that you have passed at least one-half of 1 cent per pound, or substantially the same as that given by the tariff act of 1890, instead of one-half as claimed by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. GEAR. In addition to the other differential of one-tenth of a cent?

Mr. DINGLEY. The differential of one-tenth on sugar imported from bounty-paying countries is in the bill which has been passed to-day, and also is in the present law, hence that may be set aside in making a comparison.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question there?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is it not a fact that when you framed the McKinley bill you only gave for refined sugar about 35 cents per hundred?

Mr. DINGLEY. You mean as the bill passed the House?

Mr. MCMILLIN. As it passed the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. Four-tenths of a cent.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then, on the demand of the same combination of manufacturers, did you not give 5 cents, with the additional one-tenth of a cent on sugar coming from countries that gave a bounty?

Mr. DINGLEY. The facts relating to the framing of the sugar schedule of the tariff act of 1890 were these: After it was decided to place raw sugar upon the free list—because sugar is an article of food and nine-tenths of our consumption is imported, thus making the duty a tax—and to give a bounty to encourage its production here, the question arose as to what, if any, duty should be placed on refined sugar to maintain the business of refining in this country.

Inasmuch as we found that nearly half the refined sugar consumed in this country was refined by independent industries, the trust at that time not being able to prevent competition, we treated sugar refining as we did other competitive industries, and endeavored to ascertain the difference in cost of refining here and abroad. All the sugar refiners who came before us were independent refiners, struggling against the sugar trust, who appealed to us to strengthen their hands in the contest by preventing such foreign competition as would make the continuance of their business impossible. So far as I know, no member of the sugar trust came before the committee.

Acting on such information as we were able to obtain from independent refiners, it was decided in the House to fix the duty on imported refined sugar at four-tenths of 1 per cent per pound. When the bill reached the Senate the duty was increased, and when the bill reached conference, in view of the representations of the Senate conferees that four-tenths was an insufficient duty to protect the industry carried on by independent refiners, we finally compromised by making the duty five-tenths of 1 per cent per pound, not in response to the request of any trust, but in response to the appeal of independent refiners, and to aid so far as possible in maintaining home competition in the industry, and preventing the trust from breaking down independent refineries.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then, the McKinley bill created the trust.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. The trust originated under the act of 1883, whose sugar schedule has been described by the gentleman from West Virginia as providing for a revenue duty, which he favors, at a time when fierce competition was leading up to trusts all over the world; and even the sugar schedule of the Mills bill of 1888 gave a higher differential for refined sugar than did the McKinley act. The Mills bill fixed the duty, on refined sugar at 2.80 cents per pound, and the duty on raw sugar polarizing 96° at 1.83 cents, thus giving a protection of over nine-tenths of 1 cent protection on refined sugar, which was 80 per cent more than the protection given by the McKinley act.

Mr. ENLOE. Then you perfected the control of the trust.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman think that a reduction by the McKinley act of the differential duty on refined sugar to one-third that of the tariff of 1883, and but little more than half that proposed by the Mills bill of 1888, improved the opportunities of the sugar trust?

As I was saying, the five-tenths of a cent differential duty on imported refined sugar imposed by the McKinley act was imposed when nearly half our consumption was refined outside of the trust and was intended to strengthen independent refineries and enable them to make successful opposition to the trust. If the situation in 1890 had been as now, if the sugar trust had in 1890 strangled competition and held the industry by the throat as it does to-day, I am sure that the Republicans who framed the McKinley act would never have made the differential duty on refined sugar five-tenths or even one-fourth of a cent. At least I never should have consented to it. For, from my point of view, a protective duty on competing imports of a home industry capable of supplying our wants without natural disadvantage, rests on the sure defense of home competition, through which prices are kept at the lowest possible level consistent with the payment of high wages; and whenever any industry is able by the formation of a trust to strangle home competition—as has yet never been successfully done except in the cases of refined sugar and petroleum—then it forfeits all claim to protection until such time as such a trust is broken and the industry is opened to home competition. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

DEMOCRATIC FAVOR FOR TRUSTS.

The complaint that I now make against the Democratic majority which has approved the tariff bill that has passed the House to-day, is not that it approved the differential duty of 1½ cents on refined sugar in the tariff act of 1883, which the gentleman from West Virginia has styled a revenue duty and under which the sugar trust was inaugurated; not that it favored the sugar schedule of the Mills bill, which made the differential duty on refined sugar nine-tenths of 1 cent; not that the Democrats in Congress solidly voted in 1890 to retain the sugar schedule of 1883, which gave a differential duty on refined sugar nearly three times as large as that provided by the McKinley law, at a time when the sugar trust was not able to stifle competition and when nearly half of our sugar was refined by independent industries; but that now, in this year of our Lord 1894, when everybody knows that the sugar trust has broken down competition and controls the entire sugar refining industry of this country and makes prices according to its own sweet will, this Democratic majority has deliberately enacted a tariff bill whose sugar schedule is so constructed as to give substantially as much differential duty to protect the product of this monopoly as was given four years ago by the McKinley tariff before the monopoly had gained control of the industry, and when severe competition between independent refineries assured to the consumers the lowest prices possible with the payment of American wages.

Neither will it answer for our Democratic friends to excuse the vote they have just given in favor of the sugar trust by saying that they voted two hours ago to protect the sugar trust with the expectation of voting three hours later to place all sugar on the free list. This dodge is too transparent to deceive anybody. When they voted for the Gorman-Brice tariff and its sugar-trust schedule they knew that that vote would make the trust schedule a law unless vetoed by the President. Now, when they vote for these popgun bills, the pending one to place sugar on the free list, designed simply to deceive somebody, they know that neither of them will become a law. They know, indeed, that in the Senate on a yea-and-nay vote the Democrats voted nearly solidly against free sugar. They know, also, that President Cleveland in his tariff letter to Chairman Wilson, for fear that it would be inferred that he opposed the sugar schedule of the Gorman-Brice bill, declared not only in favor of taxed sugar, but also in favor of a differential duty on refined sugar. Moreover everybody knows that the duty on sugar is indispensable if the reductions of duty proposed by the new tariff in other schedules are to be made. No, gentlemen, you will not escape the responsibility of voting for taxed sugar and a differential duty to protect the sugar trust by the performances you are now going through.

More than this, Mr. Speaker, you will not avoid the responsibility of voting for a tariff bill whose sugar schedule not only gives the sugar trust, at a time when you know it absolutely controls the sugar-refining industry of this country, as it did not in 1890, the benefit of a differential duty substantially as large as that given the industry when it was competitive, a sum estimated by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] as exceeding $25,000,000 per annum, but which has also given the sugar trust an opportunity to import millions of tons of raw sugar free of duty to be refined and sold at the increased price required by the imposition of a duty of not far from 1½ cents per pound.

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] said to-day that the sugar trust had already imported raw sugar that would have a value of nearly one hundred millions in anticipation of the duty; whereupon I remarked to him that if this were so, then, as it would make nearly a year's supply, the sugar trust would practically pocket the $43,000,000 revenue expected from sugar during the present fiscal year and the Government would get almost nothing. Probably this estimate of the quantity of sugar already imported is too large, but there is no doubt that the sugar trust's harvest through the simple transfer of sugar from the free list to the dutiable list will exceed $5,000,000.

THE WHISKY TRUST SLICE.

And I may add that the 20 cents increase of the internal-revenue tax on whisky, from 90 cents to $1.10, as provided by the tariff bill which you have passed to-day will for the present fiscal year be nearly all pocketed by the whisky trust, which has already withdrawn from bond and paid the tax at the old rate on a large proportion of the whisky that will enter into consumption during this period. It is estimated that the whisky trust and other owners of whisky in bond will thus pocket nearly the whole $20,000,000 increase of tax on whisky estimated for the present fiscal year.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is little as compared with the profits which the whisky trust and owners of whisky will realize from the five years' extension of the bonded period for whisky provided by this tariff bill.

Under the law as it existed previously, the bonded period, i. e., the time during which the owner of whisky could retain it in a bonded warehouse without payment of tax, was three years. For years the whisky interest has been seeking for an extension of this bonded period; but always heretofore when the request has come squarely before Congress it has been refused. Now, it seemed to the whisky trust that trusts were in the swim, and hence while the sugar trust was securing its points the whisky trust appeared and secured in the Senate an amendment to the tariff bill extending the bonded period for whisky from the present period of three years to the astounding period of eight years. And now the Democratic majority of the House have concurred with the Senate in giving the whisky trust this astounding gift.

I say "gift," for it can be considered nothing else Consider that the object in putting whisky into bond, especially in holding it in bond for years, is not simply to hold it temporarily for a market, as ordinary imported merchandise is held, but to hold it to age and become more valuable. It is known that whisky worth only 25 cents per gallon when put into bond becomes worth more than $3 per gallon when held for six or eight years. It is proposed by the new tariff bill not only to allow the owners of whisky to hold their whisky in a Government bonded warehouse for eight years without payment of the $1.10 per gallon tax until the expiration of the eight years, but also to make an allowance of 9 gallons in every 40 for evaporation, etc., in the estimate of the amount on which the tax is to be paid.

In other words, this bonded extension legislation grants to the whisky trust and owners of whisky an extension of eight years, without interest, in which to pay their tax on whisky while it is being kept in bond for the purpose of aging and increasing in value from 25 cents to $3 per gallon, and then actually makes the Government pay for the loss by evaporation while this process is going on.

It is estimated that after deducting loss of interest by this deferred payment of tax and diminution of taxable gallons by evaporation the Government will not realize over 50 cents per gallon tax on any whisky kept eight years in bond to improve in value, while the cheap whisky which refiners of but small capital must sell as fast as made will pay $1.10 tax. How much this bonded extension period to the whisky trust may be worth to the whisky interest I do not know, but it is easy to see that it must be many millions per annum. And the Government practically loses what the whisky trust gains.

No wonder the New York World, the leading Democratic paper in the country, should have been moved to say of such legislation as this, enacted by a nearly solid Democratic vote in the Senate and in the House, that it is "a surrender to the sugar trust, the whisky trust, the lead trust, and the oil trust."

THE TWO TARIFFS COMPARED.

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen on the other side have excused themselves for voting for the Gorman-Brice tariff bill by saying that, in spite of some objectionable features, it is better than the McKinley tariff.

Better in what particulars? In its extension of the bonded period for whisky? Is that the feature which makes our Democratic friends favor it?

Or perhaps you regard it better because it imposes a duty of 40 per cent on sugar, an article of food as important as flour, nearly all of which is imported, and on which in the absence of a controlling product here the duty becomes a tax. Yet you confess by this bill to place sugar on the free list that you regard the McKinley tariff as better than the bill which you have just passed.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] has just given at some length his reasons for regarding the Gorman-Brice tariff as much better than the McKinley tariff—enough better in his opinion, I presume, to justify the disastrous results on the business and industries of the country during the last fifteen months of the tariff revolution threatened by the elections of 1892. These reasons are summed up by him in his declaration that the new tariff has greatly reduced the tax burdens of the people.

Inasmuch as the new tariff proposes to raise from duties on imports, on the basis of the imports of 1893, only nineteen millions less than that raised under the McKinley tariff, resorting to an income tax only on persons possessed of an estate of $80,000 or more, as that is the average estate yielding an income of $4,000 or more—so small a reduction of taxation is rather an insignificant result to offset against the mischievous consequences of the Democratic tariff revolution.

The gentleman from Tennessee has read with much unction a table of average reductions of average ad valorem duties, and has informed us that the average duty on dutiable goods has been reduced from 49½ per cent under the McKinley tariff to 38½ per cent under the Gorman-Brice tariff, entirely overlooking the fact that while the average duty on all imports was 23 per cent under the Mckinley act, the average under the Gorman-Brice bill is 20½ per cent—a reduction of only 2½ per cent.

The difficulty about comparisons of average duties of dutiable imports is that they are so greatly affected by changes from the dutiable to the free list, and vice versa, as well as by reductions or increases of luxuries, as to be worthless as any indication of comparative burdens. The Gorman-Brice tariff transfers an importation of one hundred and nine millions of sugar from the free to the dutiable list, and reduces the duties on liquors, cigars, silks, and other luxuries; thus on the one hand swelling the dutiable imports by adding sugar at a duty lower than the average, and on the other hand reducing the average by diminishing the duties on luxuries, while in fact the real burdens are not diminished.

REDUCTION OF DUTIES ON LUXURIES.

This is made clear by the fact that the new tariff would have imposed a duty of $43,478,957 on the raw sugar imported and consumed in this country in 1893, equivalent to nearly 1½ cents per pound, where the McKinley tariff admitted it free of duty. And this increase of burdens laid on the people by the new tariff has been made in part to make it practicable to reduce duties on the following luxuries:

On leaf tobacco and Havana cigars	$1,434,012

This reduction is one which the gentleman from Tennessee seems to regard as a great relief to the suffering taxpayers.

On liquors	$1,232,950

To accomplish this relief, among other things the duty on brandy is reduced from $2.50 under the McKinley tariff to $1.80 under the new tariff. Is this one of the reductions which make the new Democratic tariff so great an improvement over the McKinley tariff?

On laces and embroideries	$1,537,890

What joy must come to the poor man's household over the announcement that after a year's struggle the Democratic majority has reduced the duties on laces and embroideries a million and a half, even at the price of the imposition of a duty of forty-three and a half millions on sugar.

On silk dress goods, plushes, velvets, etc	$2,720,605
On ostrich feathers and flowers	265,330
On kid gloves	873,000
On chinaware	2,233,087
On paintings and statuary	432,657
On pearl buttons	224,000
On plate and cut glass	215,667
On opium for smoking	400,073
On jewelry	76,000

I might go on enumerating luxuries like these on which the new Democratic tariff bill makes reductions of duties amounting to about $15,000,000 on the basis of the imports of 1893. There was not the slightest necessity for these reductions, because these articles are luxuries or articles of voluntary consumption, consumed mainly by the rich or well to do, who are entirely willing to pay the large duties imposed upon them by the McKinley tariff because they are luxuries; and especially no excuse for these reductions when they necessitated the imposition of a duty on an article of food like sugar, consumed nearly as largely by the poor as by the well to do.

Such reductions go far to make it appear that the average duty of the new Democratic tariff is reduced 11 per cent, when as a matter of fact the reductions are largely on articles where relief was not needed. It will be no relief to the workingman to be told that there has been a large reduction by the new Democratic tariff of the duties on laces, silks, Havana cigars, kid gloves, pearl buttons, opium, jewelry, ostrich feathers, velvets, and liquors, when he finds that he must pay 2 cents per pound more for the 200 pounds of sugar which his family use every year.

WOOLEN GOODS AND FREE RAW MATERIALS.

The gentleman from Tennessee has called special attention to the reduction of the duty on woolen goods, as a great relief to the people, yet every dollar of that reduction must come out of the farmers who keep sheep and who compose a large proportion of our population. Wool has been put on the free list, and the duties on woolen goods have been reduced to the extent of the compensatory duties to cover the duty on wool. The farmers of the country have been chosen by the Democratic leaders for the sole sacrifice on the altar of free raw materials. The farmers' wool, the farmers' lumber, and certain of the Northern farmers' products that have to meet Canadian competition have been put on the free list; but the free raw material theory of the Democratic party has ended there. Even the crudest of all so-called raw materials—coal and iron ore—are retained on the protected list.

Even the official head of the Democratic party, President Cleveland, in his letter to Chairman WILSON, felt obliged to say:

> It may well excite our wonder that Democrats are willing to depart from this most Democratic of all tariff principles (free raw materials), and that the inconsistent absurdity of such a proposed departure should be emphasized by the suggestion that the wool of the farmer should be put on the free list and the protection of high tariff taxation be placed around the iron ore and coal of corporations and capitalists.

Yet, even the reduction of the duties on woolen goods, coming as they do almost entirely out of the farmers who keep sheep, affects mainly fine imported goods worn by the well-to-do—for very few woolen goods worn by the masses are imported. The reduction of duties on woolens, on the basis of the imports of 1893, is $18,428,889, and an examination of the list of articles imported will show that more than $12,000,000 of the duties thus remitted came not from anything used by the masses of the people, but from wool plushes, embroideries, Axminster carpets, fine cloths and dress goods, and fashionable garments used by persons of ample means—those who have a fancy for something imported, "English, you know"—and who could have continued to pay these duties to the Government without feeling the burden, if the burden of such duties falls on the consumer.

And of the $2,404,319 of duties remitted on cotton goods, at least $2,000,000 was on imported goods used only by the well-to-do.

Indeed, in many cases the reduction of duties will not affect the price here. The foreign manufacturers will simply pocket the duty by raising their prices, just as they practically paid the increases of duty made by the McKinley tariff by reducing their prices. The remission of $6,000,000 duties on tin plate will not reduce the price here, just as the increase of duty in 1890 did not materially increase the price.

DESTRUCTION OF BENEFITS OF RECIPROCITY.

One of the serious evils resulting from the enactment of this new Democratic tariff bill, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that it destroys all of our reciprocal treaties with South American countries, Cuba, and Puerto Rico, by placing on the dutiable list the sugar imported from these countries, and used as a basis for the reciprocal agreements. Thus at one blow the increased markets for our agricultural products and manufactures opened in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and Brazil by these treaties, are destroyed.

Indeed, so unreasoning is the hostility of the Democratic majority to the great advantages gained by reciprocal treaties, that they have deliberately surrendered our great markets for lumber and in part to fish and agricultural products without compensation when Canada was ready to grant us in return for such favors important reciprocal advantages in the admission of our manufactures at lower rates of duty than she admitted similar goods from other countries. A private business man who should be guilty of such thriftlessness in the management of his property as the Democratic party has shown in this great national concern would have his sanity questioned. But the Democratic leaders seem to regard this stupidity—for that it really is—as one of the crowning advantages of the new Democratic tariff.

THE DISCRIMINATIONS OF THE NEW TARIFF.

Mr. Speaker, while the tariff which has been finally passed by the Democratic party, after more than a year's incubation is not as bad as the party pledged itself to enact; while it is not as bad as the Wilson bill which passed the House, in that it has retained much of protection—a result due partly to the wholesome fear inspired by the disasters which had resulted from the Democratic threats of tariff revolution, and partly to the narrow Democratic majority in the Senate; yet it has in so many features disturbed the basis on which many industries have so long stood that it will take a long time for them to readjust themselves to the new conditions, and will necessitate a permanent reduction of wages, which in itself is a public misfortune that will seriously affect the prosperity of the people. Business will of course slowly revive, because our people will not lie down, but it will revive on a new wage basis. And in the meantime the reduced duties on imports, which we ought to make for ourselves, will increase such foreign importations and correspondingly reduce our own production and the opportunities for labor.

The new Democratic tariff has amply protected many industries—as amply as any bill constructed on a protective basis could, notwithstanding the platform of that party declared protection to be "robbery"—but it has opened up so many other industries to increased foreign competition that the blight on these latter industries will be felt by all.

It is such discriminations between industries by the new Democratic tariff—discriminations sectional, political, and personal—which will always make this tariff known as one of bargain and sale.

On what basis of justice, for example, is the Southern planters' rice given a protection of 83 per cent, and the Northern farmers' oats, dairy products, vegetables, horses, cattle, hay, etc., subject to a sharp competition from Canada, have their protection practically obliterated by a reduction to 20 per cent?

Why should planed and tongued and grooved lumber, laths, pickets, shingles, clapboards, staves, and other manufactured lumber, constituting one of the most important manufacturing industries of many States, be placed on the free list, while the coarse cotton goods of the South are given from 30 to 40 per cent of protection?

Why should hoop iron when made into cotton ties be free, and when made into hoops for hay bales bear a duty of 30 per cent?

Why should collars and cuffs be protected by a duty of 58½ per cent—the highest duty on manufactured goods—while the most highly finished manufacture of granite is admitted to compete with our granite-cutters at the destructive rate of 30 per cent?

How does it happen that so crude raw materials as mica, coal and iron ore are accounted finished products worthy of a protective duty, while manufactured articles like planed lumber, barbed wire, and cotton bagging are placed on the free list?

No wonder President Cleveland, in his letter to Chairman WILSON, was compelled to exclaim:

How can we (the Democracy) face the people after indulging in such outrageous discriminations of principle?

While the McKinley tariff was constructed throughout on the protective principle, i. e., on the basis of imposing on all imports which come into competition with the products of our industries duties equivalent to the difference in the cost of production growing out of our higher wages, the new Democratic tariff is not framed on any principle. It has high protection, free trade, free raw materials, protected raw materials, free manufactured products, protected manufactured products, duties for revenue only, duties for protection only—everything thrown together promiscuously, very much like one of the bargain counters of a class of stores found in our great cities. It is evident, too, that no such diverse and inconsistent measure could have been framed except on the bargain and sale principle.

The Democratic party in 1892 declared that protective duties are "unconstitutional and robbery." It has now passed a tariff bill having in part high protective duties.

The Democratic party in 1892 declared for free raw materials. It has enacted a tariff law which places the crudest of all so-called raw materials, to wit, mica, coal, and iron ore on the protected lists, and at the same time commits wool, the farmer's finished product, and planed lumber and other manufactured lumber to the free list.

The Democratic party in 1892 bawled itself hoarse in denunciation of alleged Republican favors to trusts which did not exist, and now passes a tariff bill which has gone so far to aid trusts which everybody knows exist and strangle competition, that by common consent the new tariff act will always be known as the "sugar trust" and "whisky trust" tariff.

FURTHER DEMOCRATIC TARIFF SMASHING THREATENED.

Yet, incongruous as it is, the tariff bill passed, outside of its trust features, is far better than the controlling elements of the Democratic party intended or would have consented to under other circumstances. Indeed, the very men who finally made it a law announce that from this time forward they intend to renew their agitation for further tariff changes in the direction of free trade. Not abashed by the destruction to our industries which they have caused in the past fifteen months, they feel aggrieved that any industries have been saved out of the disasters, and declare that the war must go on.

It is evident already that even the passage of this tariff bill, after a year's upheaval of the business of the country, is not regarded by the Democratic leaders as a finality. It remains for the people of this country in the election of Representatives to Congress in the coming autumn, and in the Presidential election two years hence, not only to pronounce their verdict against the uncalled-for Democratic war upon our industries which has resulted in such disasters during the past year, but also to put out of power at once and for the future a party which has proved itself so incapable and so mischievous.

REPUBLICAN PROSPERITY—THE "CHANGE" TO DEMOCRATIC CONTROL.

Mr. Speaker, for thirty-two years, from 1861 to 1893, under the uninterrupted policy of the Republican party, prosperity and progress marked the history of this country. From an inconsequential manufacturing country we became the largest manufacturing nation on the face of the earth. Agriculture developed until the products of our soil far surpassed the products of the soil of any other country. We grew in wealth as no other country ever did. The development of our railroads and internal trade was so marvelous as to be regarded with astonishment by the civilized world. Wages increased in purchasing power 80 per cent, and everyone who wanted employment found it with good pay.

In 1892, when the people of this country went to the polls, and under the appeals of the Democratic leaders voted for a "change," no nation in the world approached us in all the elements that go to make a prosperous nation and a happy people.

A year and a half has elapsed since it was known that a "change" had been decreed, and the full control of the country committed to the Democratic party. For over a year that party, with a majority of 90 in this House, as well as a majority in the Senate, and in possession of Executive power, has kept Congress in almost continuous session for the purpose of formulating the policy which they had promised in the convention of 1892, to give the country the increased prosperity they had promised a deluded people.

What have the Democratic party done? They have repealed the Federal law designed to secure honest national elections. They have after a year's struggle at last passed a tariff, which President Cleveland, the official head of the Democratic party, declares embodies "party perfidy and party dishonor." This is all of their legislation of national importance, unless the unsuccessful attempt of the Democratic Administration to reinstate a savage queen as the ruler of Hawaii is to be added to this roll of dishonor. They found the country with ample revenue to meet the national expenditures, notwithstanding the remission to the people of $60,000,000 in duties on sugar by the act of 1890—a revenue which, in 1891, had paid all expenditures and left a surplus of thirty-seven millions; which, in 1892 and 1893, had paid the large increase in pensions, as well as all other expenditures and had left a small surplus each year. Yet in the first fiscal year of the Democratic Administration, notwithstanding the pensions of Union soldiers have been cut down $18,000,000, while no reduction of expenditures has taken place elsewhere, a deficiency of $70,000,000 has occurred, which has been supplied by issuing bonds in time of peace and borrowing $58,000,000 and drawing the balance out of the gold redemption fund set apart for the payment of the greenbacks.

The Democratic Administration found the country with a gold redemption fund of $105,000,000. To-day this redemption fund has gone down to $52,000,000, and another issue of bonds is inevitable.

The prosperity which the country had for thirty-two years has vanished. Business and industries which prospered so continuously for thirty years have been for fifteen months wrecked as never before in the history of the country. Millions of men are seeking work in vain; wages have been reduced; industries are unremunerative, and capital has suffered losses which are appalling.

The distrust caused by the Democratic threats of a tariff revolution has produced its bitter fruits, and the end is not yet. The people have had bitter experience of the "change" for which they unwittingly voted in 1892, and they have got enough of it. Unless the signs of the times are misleading, in the approaching elections the country will hear the voice of the people proclaiming to the Democratic party in thunder tones, "Weighed and found wanting."

APPENDIX.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND TO CHAIRMAN WILSON.

[Letter from President Cleveland read in House of Representatives July 19, 1894.]

[Personal.]

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, July 2, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: The certainty that a conference will be ordered between the two Houses of Congress for the purpose of adjusting differences on the subject of tariff legislation makes it also certain that you will be again called on to do hard service in the cause of tariff reform.

My public life has been so closely related to the subject, I have so longed for its accomplishment, and I have so often promised its realization to my fellow-countrymen as a result of their trust and confidence in the Democratic party, that I hope no excuse is necessary for my earnest appeal to you that in this crisis you strenuously insist upon party honesty and good faith and a sturdy adherence to Democratic principles.

I believe these are absolutely necessary conditions to the continuation of Democratic existence.

I can not rid myself of the feeling that this conference will present the best if not the only hope of true Democracy. Indications point to its action as the reliance of those who desire the genuine fruition of Democratic effort, the fulfillment of Democratic pledges, and the redemption of Democratic promises to the people. To reconcile differences in the details comprised within the fixed and well-defined lines of principle will not be the sole task of the conference; but as it seems to me its members will also have in charge the question whether Democratic principles themselves are to be saved or abandoned.

There is no excuse for mistaking or misapprehending the feeling and temper of the rank and file of the Democracy. They are downcast under the assertion that their party fails in ability to manage the Government, and they are apprehensive that efforts to bring about tariff reform may fail; but they are much more downcast and apprehensive in their fear that Democratic principles may be surrendered.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

In these circumstances they can not do otherwise than to look with confidence to you and those who with you have patriotically and sincerely championed the cause of tariff reform within Democratic lines and guided by Democratic principles. This confidence is vastly augmented by the action under your leadership of the House of Representatives upon the bill now pending.

Every true Democrat and every sincere tariff reformer knows that this bill in its present form and as it will be submitted to the conference, falls far short of the consummation for which we have long labored, for which we have suffered defeat without discouragement; which in its anticipation gave us a rallying cry in our day of triumph, and which, in its promise of accomplishment, is so interwoven with Democratic pledges and Democratic success that our abandonment of the cause or the principles upon which it rests means party perfidy and party dishonor.

One topic will be submitted to the conference which embodies Democratic principle so directly that it can not be compromised. We have in our platforms and in every way possible declared in favor of the free importation of raw materials. We have again and again promised that this should be accorded to our people and our manufacturers as soon as the Democratic party was invested with the power to determine the tariff policy of the country.

The party now has that power. We are as certain to-day as we have ever been of the great benefit that would accrue to the country from the inauguration of this policy, and nothing has occurred to release us from our obligation to secure this advantage to our people. It must be admitted that no tariff measure can accord with Democratic principles and promises, or bear a genuine Democratic badge, that does not provide for free raw materials. In these circumstances it may well excite our wonder that Democrats are willing to depart from this the most Democratic of all tariff principles, and that the inconsistent absurdity of such a proposed departure should be emphasized by the suggestion that the wool of the farmer be put on the free list and the protection of tariff taxation be placed around the iron ore and coal of corporations and capitalists.

[Applause.]

How can we face the people after indulging in such outrageous discriminations and violations of principle?

It is quite apparent that this question of free raw materials does not admit of adjustment on any middle ground, since their subjection to any rate of tariff taxation, great or small, is alike violative of Democratic principle and Democratic good faith.

I hope you will not consider it intrusive if I say something in relation to another subject which can hardly fail to be troublesome to the conference. I refer to the adjustment of tariff taxation on sugar.

[Laughter and applause.]

Under our party platform and in accordance with our declared party purposes, sugar is a legitimate and logical article of revenue taxation. Unfortunately, however, incidents have accompanied certain stages of the legislation which will be submitted to the conference that have aroused in connection with this subject a natural Democratic animosity to the methods and manipulations of trusts and combinations.

I confess to sharing in this feeling; and yet it seems to me we ought, if possible, to sufficiently free ourselves from prejudice to enable us coolly to weigh the considerations which, in formulating tariff legislation, ought to guide our treatment of sugar as a taxable article. While no tenderness should be entertained for trusts, and while I am decidedly opposed to granting them, under the guise of tariff taxation, any opportunity to further their peculiar methods, I suggest that we ought not to be driven away from the Democratic principle and policy which lead to the taxation of sugar by the fear, quite likely exaggerated, that in carrying out this principle and policy we may indirectly and inordinately encourage a combination of sugar refining interests. I know that in present conditions this is a delicate subject—and I appreciate the depth and strength of the feeling which its treatment has aroused.

I do not believe we should do evil that good may come, but it seems to me that we should not forget that our aim is the completion of a tariff bill, and that in taxing sugar for proper purposes and within reasonable bounds, whatever else may be said of our action, we are in no danger of running counter to Democratic principles. With all there is at stake there must be in the treatment of this article some ground upon which we are all willing to stand, where toleration and conciliation may be allowed to solve the problem without demanding the entire surrender of fixed and conscientious convictions.

I ought not to prolong this letter. If what I have written is unwelcome I beg you to believe in my good intentions.

In the conclusions of the conference touching the numerous items which will be considered, the people are not afraid that their interests will be neglected. They know that the general result, so far as these are concerned, will be to place home necessaries and comforts easier within their reach, and to insure better and surer compensation to those who toil.

We all know that a tariff covering all the varied interests and conditions of a country as vast as ours must of necessity be largely the result of honorable adjustment and compromise. I expect very few of us can say when our measure is perfected that all the features are entirely as we would prefer. You know how much I deprecated the incorporation in the proposed bill of the income-tax feature. In matters of this kind, however, which do not violate a fixed and recognized Democratic doctrine, we are willing to defer to the judgment of a majority of our Democratic brethren. I think there is a general agreement that this is party duty.

This is more palpably apparent when we realize that the business of our country timidly stands and watches for the result of our efforts to perfect tariff legislation, that a quick and certain return of prosperity waits upon a wise adjustment, and that a confiding people still trust in our hands their prosperity and well-being.

The Democracy of the land plead most earnestly for the speedy completion of the tariff legislation which their representatives have undertaken, but they demand not less earnestly that no stress of necessity shall tempt those they trust to the abandonment of Democratic principle.

Yours, very truly,

GROVER CLEVELAND.

Hon. WILLIAM L. WILSON.

[Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, while I realize that nothing I can say at this time will probably affect the result, it is, nevertheless, my duty to the people whom I represent upon this floor to enter one last appeal and one last protest against the wrong that is to be done them now. In fact, all of our State is interested, and over half of its population is dependent upon the sugar industry. I represent 218,000 people who are agriculturists, a class of people who are entitled to the consideration and the sympathy of this Congress. I represent a class of people who are especially entitled to the sympathy of the Democrats upon this floor.

Coming as I do from a State of which every governmental branch is Democratic, and represented upon this floor by Democrats only, I did feel, my Democratic friends, that we were entitled to some consideration and fair treatment at your hands. Now, what is the situation? A great cry has arisen that there must be free sugar, and that the trust must be stricken down; and in an effort to strike at the trust you are striking us a deadly blow that will bring poverty and distress and ruin to what is now a fair and prosperous country.

I speak not in anger; I make no threats, but I do appeal to my personal friends and Democratic colleagues upon this floor, and ask if it is not possible for them even at this late hour to do something to save our people from utter ruin. Some may say it is necessary to pass this bill. The honored Speaker of this House, if I mistake not, said that he regretted in doing this act that a blow had to be stricken at some that he and others did not want to strike.

I am very thankful for the sympathy he expressed then, and I hope that something can yet be done. It is entirely possible, if you are to have free sugar, to give us the bounty, after our people have planted their crops, incurred their expenses, made their contracts, and gone eight months into this year, and something should be done to prevent them from being made bankrupts.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRICE. I have only five minutes; but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. I will ask the gentleman from Louisiana if it is true that the two Senators from Louisiana entered into a written contract to defeat the whole bill?

Mr. PRICE. That I do not know.

Mr. MEYER. It is not true.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, and if they did, is it right for the gentleman from Indiana or other member upon this floor to visit upon my Congressional district and the State of Louisiana punishment for anything that others might have done that was not approved by him? I appeal to you, my friends, to have some consideration, to have some pity, if I may use that word, for our people. Let us see what the facts are.

When this Congress assembled and the Committee on Ways and Means brought in a bill they proposed to gradually abolish the sugar bounty. That encouraged our people to believe that they would at least have some Governmental aid for several years. That was voted down; and the bill went to the Senate, and the Senate immediately reported a bill giving a duty on sugar and providing that the law should not go into effect until the 1st of January, 1895. The newspapers told our people that they would not have any change in the existing law during this year.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman permit me to say that it was stated in the press and it was understood to be an agreement in the Finance Committee of the Senate that the duty in the bill should take effect on the 1st day of January?

Mr. PRICE. It was said that the bill should take effect on the 1st day of January, 1895, and our people were all led to believe that there would be no change in the McKinley sugar schedule until that date.

The bill came into the House to-day and it is passed with a duty on sugar; and lo, in a few hours afterwards, here comes a proposition to take from our people absolutely everything, not only the bounty, but the duty given in the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOMBS. I hope the gentleman will be allowed further time.

Mr. PRICE. I realize that I can not make an argument in this short time.

Mr. COOMBS. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Louisiana may be extended ten minutes.

Mr. REED. I think it is nothing more than fair that he should be allowed time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I realize, as I have said, that perhaps nothing that I can say can do any good; but is there not some parliamentary method by which our people shall be saved from destruction? Can it not be by saying that we shall get a bounty for this year? Is it not good faith that these people should be allowed to go through the current year under the existing law? Would you, gentlemen, in your desire to strike at the sugar trust, that you talk so much about, wreck these farmers and these men who have believed that your course would be fair and just, regardless of what your views might be on economic questions?

Did we not proclaim all over this land that the Democratic party was not a party of destruction? Has not it been the doctrine of the Democratic party that a duty on sugar was a proper revenue duty? Had not our people a right to believe that under a revenue duty they would get at least incidental protection? My friends, I say to every one of you, before you cast your vote on this question, that unless some remedy follows this bill, you are casting a vote which will absolutely destroy half of a sovereign State, a State that has done, I believe, as much for the Democratic party as any State in the Union.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Do you contend that the sugar planter ought to receive any more protection or aid than the cotton planter?

Mr. PRICE. My dear sir, I have no time now to enter upon a discussion of theories of protection and free trade. I am talking about the condition that confronts our people; but I will say that if the cotton planter had been led to believe that he would get during this year a certain amount of Government aid, God knows I would never be the one to say that he should not have it, after he had been promised it and had made his contracts for the year with reference to it.

Another thing. You are doing worse than decreeing free sugar. You have allowed our people to expect that a duty would be put upon sugar or that a bounty would be retained. You have raised that expectation all over this land. Another thing, Mr. Speaker, the storehouses are filled with recently imported raw sugar, and what will be the consequence? When our people go to the refiners this fall and undertake to sell their sugar—because half the sugar sold in Louisiana is sold to the refiners—they will be told that the refiners do not need it, that they have already a great stock of sugar on hand, and the refiners will give the planter just what they choose and not what the sugar is worth.

Why, gentlemen, even if a man is the most ardent free trader in the world; if he believes in tearing down every custom-house in the land, he certainly ought to feel that in this instance it is only just and fair and equitable and right to allow these people to go through the current year under the existing law. Have you not given in this bill six months in which to put the woolen schedule into effect, and why should you be more considerate of those manufacturers than you are of the sugar-planter in our State?

My Democratic friends, do you remember that in 1884 the State of Louisiana held the balance of power, and that if her vote had not been recorded for the Democratic party and its leaders we never would have had our Democratic victory in that year? And now, are you going to strike down your friends without regard to the promises you have made or the equities that exist? I ask you earnestly to consider this question, and I do again most solemnly protest against the great injustice which you are about to do our people. [Applause.] I yield the remainder of the time to my colleague [Mr. BOATNER].

Mr. BOATNER. Is there any time left?

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent for the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PRICE] to transfer his time. Is there objection to the gentleman [Mr. PRICE] yielding to his colleague the five minutes of the ten minutes accorded to him?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I merely desire to call the attention of the House to the legal aspects of this question. If the bill which passed the House to-day is to become a law, supplemented by the bill which is now before the House under consideration, it will amount to a repudiation by the United States of a legal obligation in favor of the sugar producers of this country for the bounty for this year. Under the terms of the McKinley act a bounty was to be paid for the production of sugar each year to those who availed themselves of the provisions of the act.

The sugar producers of this country have availed themselves of the provisions of that act for the present year. A great many of them have taken out licenses. More than six months of the year have passed, and the crop is now practically made. And for the Government to refuse to pay this bounty which has been earned under the provisions of its laws is merely to take advantage of its sovereignty and to avail itself of the privilege that it is subject to the jurisdiction of no court and can not be compelled to perform its obligations.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Did the gentleman vote for the tariff bill to-day?

Mr. BOATNER. Yes; I did.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If that bill becomes a law, is not that a repudiation of the sugar bounty?

Mr. BOATNER. It will be repudiation to some extent, unless the bounty for this year is otherwise provided for. I have just stated that. I have said that if that bill becomes a law in connection with the bill now under consideration, it will be a total repudiation of the obligation of the United States to pay the bounty which has been earned under the McKinley law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The other bill has practically become a law.

Mr. BOATNER. It has not become a law; I hope it will; I hope the President will sign it.

The gentleman knows very well that I voted for that bill because it contained more of good than it did of bad. I could not have that bill altogether to suit me. If it had been within my power, I would have written it differently. There is no use to enter into a discussion of how gentlemen came to vote for that bill. The gentleman knows that as well as I can tell him. I am not now speaking of a matter of politics for the benefit of the gentleman from Ohio. I am appealing to this House for legislation which will require the officers of the Treasury Department to pay to the sugar growers of the United States the bounty for this year which has been earned under the provisions of the existing law. This should be done as a matter of common justice. The United States ought to pay to the sugar producers of this country, whether they live in Louisiana or Nebraska, the money which has been earned for the present year under the bounty law which is the law of the land.

As my colleague has said, it was given out authoritatively that the Committee on Finance of the Senate agreed that the bounty for this year should be paid by agreeing that the sugar schedule should not take effect until the 1st day of next January. That meant that the bounty should be paid under the provisions of the existing law. It was stated by authority that that agreement had been made. Subsequently, in violation of that agreement, several Democratic Senators voted in favor of an amendment which made the sugar schedule take effect with the other provisions of the bill.

But, in the mean time, contracts had been entered into; expenses had been incurred; people had made all their arrangements and obtained their credits upon the faith of a statute of the United States and its continuance until the 1st day of next January. Now, I repeat that after the year has more than half passed, after obligations have been incurred, after the bounty has been earned under the very terms of the law, to repeal it without making adequate provisions for the performance of the obligations created by the law, is nothing short of absolute repudiation.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, this is the last of the air-cushions which the statesmen of this little kingdom of Liliput, in which we are now living, have arranged for themselves to tumble on this evening. Of course, it is a cushion that is filled with air like the rest—not wind, because wind is air in motion; this is air that has gone to rest. [Laughter.]

I am inclined to feel a deep sympathy for the gentleman from Louisiana; and the cogent fact that I and my compatriots had that feeling towards him when it was of some use is proven by the fact that in order to do justice to an established industry in his State, we of the Republican party entered upon a new system of encouragement of home industries; and we did it because of a sense of justice which I should blame him for not indicating in his vote for the bill which passed to-day if I did not know that he is a Democrat; but knowing, as I do, that tariff and charity and good feeling are "purely local" with him from the nature of his party relations, I am not at all surprised that he should appeal to me and to the rest of us on behalf of his fellow-citizens, and be utterly forgetful of the fact that his vote to-day has helped to destroy ten or a dozen manufacturing institutions in my State.

But I bid him to be of good cheer, for this is only a part of the farce of which we have gone through some four acts preceding. There is really nothing in it—nothing but one of those little resolutions that used to be introduced here years ago when the Greenbackers were flourishing and the money question was made a trap to catch respectable gentlemen.

Now, the sugar tax is composed of two different things; but the great bulk of it is the 40 per cent taxation upon sugar of all kinds introduced into this country from abroad. That tax comes from the poor people of this country in a larger proportion than in my judgment is just and fair. I do not propose in this thimble-rigging arrangement to have myself put upon record as being opposed to the repeal of that particular tax. We Republicans repealed the tax and gave the people of this country free sugar.

You Democrats have reimposed the tax on sugar, and have also imposed a tax on its manufacture, in such a fashion that it is absolutely a stench in the nostrils of the people, so that there can be no sort of honest discussion of the question here so thoroughly has your conduct clouded it with prejudice. I do not wonder you are anxious to get from under it, by even so cheap and transparent a pretense as this. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why can not the Democratic party, once in a while at least, be middling honest? [Laughter.] Why not come once in a while into the open, like men? But they never do and they never will; it is useless to expect it.

Now, we have a repetition of the same farce that has been perpetrated so often before. These things do not mean anything whatever; and when a man gives his vote, or allows this bill to pass by his vote in favor of it, there is nothing meant by it except a meeting with a political trap and crushing it. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is nothing in the vote I shall give upon this question which will prevent me, by bounties or other judicious methods, whatever I may consider wise and right, whenever the time shall come, from dealing with the question in a proper way, nor shall anything in this vote preclude me from retaining the manufacture and the production of sugar in this country. It is too great and important an industry, of too great necessity in the lives of all of our people, to be a shuttlecock between the battledores of the two discordant wings of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia has five minutes remaining.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, if there be any hardship to come to the people of Louisiana by this legislation, the responsibility for that hardship rests immediately at the door of the sugar trust; and the responsibility for the existence of the sugar trust lies at the door of the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Under a revenue duty upon sugar, no such great and threatening monopoly could have appeared on the political horizon of this country as has now made its appearance.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And has now been made the special partner of the Democratic party.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to be interrupted.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The gigantic power of that great organization, which has been felt from the beginning almost to the end of this great tariff controversy in Congress, is the result of the legislation of the Fifty-first Congress, which gave them the power to tax the American people 50 cents on every hundred pounds of sugar, and possibly 60 cents, and then paid people a bounty to raise the material for them to manufacture.

You found, in the Fifty-first Congress when you came here, a large and fruitful duty flowing into the public Treasury from the revenue tax on sugar as the law then existed. For every dollar of tax paid by the people in that respect, at least 80 cents of it went into the Treasury of the Government to be applied to the support of the Government. In your haste to divert from the public Treasury as large a part of the tax paid by the people as possible, and to pour those taxes into the pockets of your favored beneficiaries, you struck down the revenue tax on sugar that you might resort to protective taxation for the benefit of the monopolies, and then went through the sham and pretense of putting a bounty, paid directly out of the Treasury, to the growers and agricultural producers of sugar in this country, knowing full well that whenever protection came out of its hidden lair, and materialized itself in the open as a bounty, that the American people would give it the coup de grace. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Sir, I sympathize with what has been said by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON]. I know something about the constituents he represents so faithfully and so ably upon this floor. I do not hesitate to say to-day, as I have said from the beginning in this debate in all of its stages, that I have always been a believer in a revenue tax upon sugar, and what little incidental protection came from the revenue tax on sugar the agricultural people of this country were welcome to, so far as I am concerned. I am ready to-day to coöperate with the Democrats of the House in the restoration of a just revenue tax upon sugar. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. REED. The time, I think, has not elapsed, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman from West Virginia has more time.

The SPEAKER. The time has been consumed.

Mr. REED. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired, and the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Several MEMBERS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. HOOKER of New York and Mr. TRACEY, as tellers.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 276, nays 11, not voting 65; as follows:

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana objects. The reading of the Journal will be proceeded with.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no suggestions of amendment or correction, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. PEFFER presented a petition of Local Assembly No. 1562, Knights of Labor, of Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation embodying a provision taxing immigrants $50 apiece; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5439) for the relief of Richard Hawley & Sons, asked that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7571) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Osage River in the State of Missouri, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate bill of the same title, being the bill (S. 2137) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Osage River, in the State of Missouri, which has been reported from the Committee on Commerce, and is now upon the Calendar, be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7572) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, at De Witt, Carroll County, Mo., and to establish it as a post-road, reported it without amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. From the Committee on Pensions I report back adversely the bill (S. 2124) granting a service pension to soldier, sailors, and marines, and their widows and orphans, and for other purposes. By request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who introduced the bill, I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. VILAS, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4017) for the reinstatement of clerks dismissed from the Railway Mail Service between the 15th day of March and the 1st day of May, 1889, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6529) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the St. Croix River between Wisconsin and Minnesota, reported it without amendment.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. I am unanimously directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6060) to amend section 4833, Revised Statutes, and for other purposes, to report it favorably without amendment. It is a matter of some urgency and to meet an emergency which has arisen in the management of the Soldiers' Home, and I ask that the bill be considered at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4833 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4833. The Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers are authorized to aid persons who are entitled to its benefits by outdoor relief, in such manner and to such extent as they may deem proper, but such relief shall not exceed the average cost of maintaining an inmate of the home: Provided, That in the event that buildings at any branch of the home shall be destroyed by fire or rendered unfit for habitation because of pestilence or by the elements, then and in that event the Board of Managers shall have authority to remove the members of said branch so afflicted or destroyed to any other branch not so affected, and to do this they may use any funds appropriated for the home, notwithstanding they may have been specifically appropriated for other purposes, to the extent that such funds shall be necessary to effect such a transfer and the maintenance and support thereafter of said members so transferred, and shall report their doings therein to the Congress and their expenditures as in other cases of expenditures: Provided further, That the appropriations for any fiscal year shall not be exceeded."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Is the bill reported from a committee?

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. It is reported unanimously from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to hear the title of the bill again read.

The SECRETARY. A bill to amend section 4833, Revised Statutes, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLATT. It relates to the National Soldiers' Home, I understand.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUIS C. SARTORI.

Mr. GIBSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1713) to promote Commodore Louis C. Sartori, now on the retired list of the Navy, to be a rear-admiral on said list, in accordance with his original position in the Navy Register, to report it favorably with an amendment, and to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was to strike out section 2 in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the said Louis C. Sartori, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the difference of pay between the sum which he has received as an officer of the Navy and the amount to which he would have been entitled had he not been passed over, but promoted regularly according to seniority.

And to insert:

SEC. 2. That upon promotion, as authorized by this act, he shall be allowed the pay of a rear-admiral retired on account of age, in conformity with the act of Congress approved March 3, 1873; but no additional back pay shall be allowed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYÉS IN DISTRICT HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HARRIS. By direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia I report a joint resolution. I will make a brief statement in regard to it. On the 2d of October a special act was approved authorizing the health department of the District of Columbia to employ two additional clerks at $100 per month. That act provided for their payment up to the beginning of the fiscal year, the 1st of July, upon the presumption that the District appropriation bill would be passed by that time. These clerks are provided for permanently in that appropriation bill, but the Auditor decides that they can not be paid for the time between the 1st day of July and the time at which the appropriation bill takes effect. I therefore report the joint resolution from the committee.

The joint resolution (S. R. 101) providing for clerical assistance in the health department of the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provision of the act entitled "An act to provide for clerical assistance in the health department of the District of Columbia" approved October 2, 1893, are hereby continued and declared to be in full force and effect from July 1, 1894, and until the date of the approval of the act making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1895.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the joint resolution be considered at this time. It simply provides for the payment of those two clerks during the period of time I have indicated.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDEX TO PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Printing, submitted a report, accompanied by the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Ordered, That the usual number of the index to private claims, from the Forty-seventh to the Fifty-first Congresses, inclusive, prepared by the Secretary of the Senate, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of September 30, 1890, be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (S. 2309) to supplement and carry out and enforce the provisions of a treaty made pursuant to a convention concluded at Washington, D. C., March 17, 1894, between the United States of America and His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of China, and to more completely prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers into the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VILAS introduced a bill (S. 2310) to limit the benefit of pensions under the general law, founded upon the service of soldiers and sailors in the late war, to such persons as claim or shall hereafter claim the same through marriages contracted prior hereto; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SQUIRE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2311) to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a college for the education of daughters of American soldiers and sailors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. MANDERSON it was Ordered, That John W. Walker be permitted to withdraw from the files of the Senate, under the rules thereof, the papers relating to the bill (S. 468) in the Fifty-third Congress to remove the charge of desertion standing against him, leaving copies thereof.

AMERICAN PRISONERS IN CUBA.

Mr. CALL. I introduced a resolution in the Senate on the 23d of July requesting the President of the United States to institute negotiations for the release or trial of certain citizens of the United States claimed to be held in unlawful imprisonment in the Island of Cuba. I send to the desk a letter received from one of them, and ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

CÁRCEL REAL, SANTA CLARA, CUBA, August 9, 1894.

DEAR SIR: I am a resident of Key West, Fla., a citizen of the United States of America, having lived and voted in Key West and New York City, and I am registered as a citizen of the United States of America in the United States of America's consulate at Cienfugos by our consul, after having exhibited to him satisfactory evidence of citizenship.

Now, my object in writing to you is to ask your aid in my behalf, for I have now been a prisoner in the Cárcel Real here in Santa Clara for some ten months, without trial, or much hopes or prospects of being tried and released, for if I could get a trial before any fair and impartial court I would be speedily set at liberty.

I am held here as a political prisoner without any just cause. The only cause of my arrest and long imprisonment is that I was unfortunately working in the town of Cruces last October when there was some kind of trouble in the country near that town, and being a citizen of the United States of America, was arrested on suspicion of sympathizing with the Cubans.

Is it not possible for you to ask our Secretary of State, Mr. Walter Q. Gresham, to instruct our consul-general at Havana to act promptly in my behalf, to the end that I obtain what rights and privileges are afforded to American citizens in such cases, under our treaties and regulations between Spain and the United States of America?

Your prompt and favorable action in this matter is urgently requested by one of your fellow-citizens in trouble.

Yours, very truly,

JOSE MENDEZ NIMEZ.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
U. S. A. Senate, Washington, D. C., U. S. A.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the United States are a great power. They command inexhaustible resources of force and for peaceful and respectful negotiation. I have no reason to think that this and other cases of like character have any other cause than the "law's interminable delay;" but whether this be true or not, the Government of the United States owes protection to its citizens in foreign countries, and has a right and is bound to demand their release after a reasonable detention without trial.

This duty is especially imperative in relation to the Cuban citizens of the United States, whose relations to the Government of Spain render them liable to unreasonable suspicion and to arbitrary arrest. I hope that prompt action will be taken by by the Government in this and all other like cases for the release of citizens of the United States subjected to arbitrary and unreasonable arrest and confinement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the absence of objection.

PRINTING OF THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, there will be a great demand in the country for copies of the tariff bill which has recently been passed, and I offer the order which I send to the desk providing for its printing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That 5,000 copies of bill H. R. 4864, as passed, and to be known as the sugar-trust tariff bill, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that lie over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. VEST. What was the motion in regard to the resolution of the Senator from Maine? I could not hear it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the resolution was offered by the Senator from Maine, to which resolution there is objection, and it goes over under the rule.

Mr. HALE. Let it be again read, so that the Senator from Missouri may understand it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. VEST. Is that the title of the bill, or does the Senator give the title himself?

Mr. HALE. I refer to what will be the popular acceptation of the bill as the sugar-trust bill. I do not insist that it be put into the title of the bill, of course, but public sentiment upon the matter will settle all that.

Mr. VEST. I respectfully question the right of the Senator from Maine to say what is the popular acceptation. He has no right to give any such appellation to any bill here, and it is an outrage upon the Senate for him to do so.

Mr. MILLS. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ALDRICH. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. MILLS. Let us have the yeas and nays on my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the present consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Maine having been objected to, it has gone over under the rule, and is not before the Senate for consideration at this time.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 11th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1640) granting a pension to Otis Smith;

An act (S. 470) for the relief of George H. Jewett, of Arlington, Washington County, Nebr.; and

An act (S. 2217) to provide for the closing of a part of an alley in square 185 in the city of Washington, D. C.

FREE COAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives; which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 7968) to place upon the free list bituminous coal, shale, slack, and coke.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the bill on its first reading may be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill the first time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act, the following articles, when imported into the United States, shall be admitted free of import duties:

Bituminous coal and shale, and coal slack or culm, and coke.

Mr. MANDERSON. I object to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. VEST. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I am not very familiar with the rules of the Senate; but as I understand the rule a single objection carries this bill over until to-morrow. Is it in order to move, notwithstanding that objection, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this measure?

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. VEST. I submit the inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that such a motion would not be in order, and that a single objection carries the bill over.

Mr. MANDERSON. I call attention to Rule XIV, which is very explicit on the subject.

Mr. VEST. I was under the impression that that was the rule——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has no doubt that it is the correct ruling.

Mr. VEST. But I desired to make the motion if possible.

FREE IRON ORE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 7969) to place upon the free list all ores of iron.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask for the reading of the bill in full.

The Secretary read the bill the first time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the following articles, when imported into the United States, shall be admitted free of import duties:

Iron ore, including manganiferous iron ore, also the dross or residuum from burnt pyrites, and sulphur ore, as pyrites or sulphuret of iron in its natural state.

Mr. MANDERSON. I object to the second reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

FREE BARBED FENCING WIRE, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 7970) to place upon the free list barbed fencing wire, and wire rods for the manufacture of the same.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the bill may be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill the first time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act, the following articles, when imported into the United States, shall be admitted free of import duties:

BARBED FENCING WIRE.

Wire rods of iron or steel when imported for the manufacture of barbed-wire fencing under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. MANDERSON. I object to the second reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

FREE SUGAR, MOLASSES, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 7971) to exempt from duty sugar, molasses, etc.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the bill may be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill the first time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the following articles, when imported into the United States, shall be admitted free of all import duties: All sugars; all tank bottoms; all sugar drainings and sugar sweepings, sirups of cane juice, melada, concentrated melada, and concrete and concentrated molasses, and molasses.

Mr. MANDERSON. I object to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. HILL. If it is in order, I desire to give notice of some amendments to those bills, which I now ask to have printed, and I ask to have one of them read. By reading one, it will be discovered what the other amendments are.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. HILL to the bill (H. R. 7969) to place upon the free list all ores of iron, which was to add at the end of the bill:

All provisions of law in existence at the time of the passage of this act providing for the taxation of incomes are hereby repealed.

RECENT ELECTION IN ALABAMA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CHANDLER on the 11th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be directed to inquire into the facts of the election held in the State of Alabama on the 6th of the present month of August, and to ascertain and report whether such election was full, fair, free, and honest, and resulted in the choice of a Legislature entitled to elect a United States Senator, and that said committee as a whole or by a subcommittee shall have power to send for persons and papers and sit during the approaching recess of Congress.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I received a telegram from my colleague [Mr. MORGAN] on last Saturday, informing me that he would be in the Senate on yesterday. I have heard nothing from him since that time, and I ask that that resolution go over, believing that he will certainly reach the city to-day, or that I shall be informed of his inability to get here.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to the resolution going over until to-morrow, retaining its place as a part of the morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the resolution of the Senator from New Hampshire will go over, retaining its place.

DOMINION COAL COMPANY, OF NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 622, being a resolution that the special committee appointed to investigate the charges of bribery against certain Senators be instructed to inquire into the facts connected with the organization and history of the Dominion Coal Company, Limited, of Nova Scotia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAY and Mr. BERRY. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF JOHN WIGHTMAN, DECEASED.

Mr. QUAY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 886) for the relief of the legal representatives of John Wightman, deceased.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute has been previously read.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill seems to be voluminous, and I should like to have a statement as to its purport before I consent to its further consideration. What does the claim amount to, and what is it based upon?

Mr. QUAY. The bill proposes to make an appropriation of $6,888 to the heirs of a former mail contractor. The matter is in charge of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON], who will explain the details of the measure.

Mr. HARRIS. Has the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads favorably reported the bill?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. Unanimously?

Mr. HUNTON. I will explain the matter.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not care for a lengthy explanation.

Mr. VILAS. Will the Senator from Virginia permit me to say a word right there.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir; I will make a statement, and then the Senator from Wisconsin can follow.

In response to the inquiry made by the Senator from Tennessee, I beg to state that the bill was reported unanimously from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], who is now the chairman of that committee. At that time the committee was presided over by our late distinguished friend from Georgia, Mr. Colquitt. When the bill came up in the Senate the Senator from Wisconsin, who had then become chairman of the committee, moved its reference back to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill was considered by the committee a second time and was reported back to the Senate favorably, I believe, with only one dissenting vote. The question now comes before the Senate as to whether it will pass the bill thus twice reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads. While I am on the floor I may as well explain to some extent the provisions of the bill.

It appears that Mr. Wightman was a post-office contractor for carrying the mails from Pittsburg to Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania. He carried the mails six times a week for the sum of $9,000 per annum. An appropriation for a daily mail was not made in the appropriation act of 1859, and the service was reduced from six times a week to three times a week.

There was great distress along the line of the route; it was a thickly settled country and very much in need of mail facilities, and a petition as long as the moral law was sent to the Postmaster-General asking him to restore the daily mail service. Thereupon the Postmaster-General and Mr. Wightman had an interview, and the Postmaster-General said: "Mr. Wightman, if you will carry the mails over this route six times a week I will recognize you as the contractor for carrying the mail six times a week and will recommend that the Congress of the United States shall pay you in the next appropriation bill the old sum of $9,000." This arrangement was entered into between the Postmaster-General and Wightman, and the latter did carry the mail between those two points six times a week for one year. He received therefor in money $4,500, leaving still due him the sum of $4,500.

At the next meeting of Congress, when the appropriation had to be made or refused, the Postmaster-General made an urgent request that Mr. Wightman should be paid his $4,500. Mr. Buchanan, who was then President of the United States, in the conclusion of his message in regard to this contract and others of a similar character, says:

> For these reasons I recommend the passing of a bill, at as early a day as may be practicable, to provide for the payment of the amount with interest.

That was not done, sir. Mr. Wightman first, and then his representatives afterwards, appeared before every succeeding Congress and asked the payment of this sum. Finally, in a recent Congress, a bill was passed referring the case to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims reported back as a matter of fact and as its judgment on the law of the case that Mr. Wightman was entitled to the principal sum, leaving out the interest, because the court was not allowed by the law under which it was acting to pay interest on claims.

From the time of the payment of the principal, Mr. Wightman's representatives have had a claim before both Houses of Congress to pay the interest on that sum of money from the time the money became due until the principal was paid under the judgment of the Court of Claims. That is the provision of the pending bill. It is to pay the interest on the principal, $4,500, that principal having been paid. The interest amounts to the sum mentioned in the bill, $6,888.75.

Mr. COCKRELL. What was the amount of the principal?

Mr. HUNTON. The principal was $9,000 originally, and the principal sum paid under the judgment of the Court of Claims was $4,500 or thereabouts.

When this matter was up before there was something said about the Government not paying interest on what it owes. I, for one, do not sympathize with any such view. I know, Mr. President, that if you owe a debt the law makes you pay interest on it from the time it falls due, and if the law did not compel you to do it your own sense of propriety would. I can not draw a distinction between the morality and binding force of the law as applied to an individual and their application to a government. It was said heretofore by my friends, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], I believe, that the Government never paid interest on such claims.

With great respect to those two Senators, I beg leave to take issue with them. I have before me a document published under the authority of Congress, and I call the attention of the Senate to a large list of claims where the Government has paid interest. I read from House Report No. 40, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, with respect to the claim of the Choctaw Nation. In this document are cited fifty-three acts of Congress in which interest has been allowed upon claims when paid. There is one very notable case to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate. There will be found on page 51 of this document an act approved July 29, 1854, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay John C. Fremont $183,825, with interest thereon from the 1st day of June, 1851, at the rate of 10 per cent per annum in full of his account for beef delivered to Commissioner Barbour for the use of the Indians in California.

I might go through the whole list of fifty-three claims cited in the document, where acts have been passed paying interest on claims, but the time of the Senate is too precious to do so. But here is the claim of John C. Fremont for beef delivered to Indians, and I ask the Senate whether a claim for furnishing beef is any more sacred than a claim for labor actually performed in carrying the mails along the route from Pittsburg to Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania?

More than that, the Senate will find upon examination of this document and of the claims, fifty-three in number where interest has been allowed, that there is no claim among them which could appeal to both Houses of Congress for interest to the same extent that the claim of Wightman does. It was recommended by Mr. Holt, the Postmaster-General who made the contract; it was recommended by Mr. Buchanan, who was then President of the United States, and it has been recommended repeatedly since by Postmasters-General and Presidents.

I beg leave to state one more fact. Mr. Wightman in carrying out the understanding between him and the Postmaster-General paid out $1,500 in cash in order to execute the contract. So he lost the interest on the $1,500, and it is but fair that the Government should pay him interest upon what the Government owed him at the time the contract was completed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a written report in the case? I understand the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. VILAS) has made a minority report.

Mr. VILAS. I think perhaps the views of the minority will state just what is the nature of the bill as well as anything can.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The views of the minority will be read.

The Secretary read the views of the minority accompanying the report, as follows:

> The undersigned, a minority of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 886) for the relief of the legal representatives of John Wightman, deceased, is unable to agree to a favorable report on the bill, and submits, as briefly as possible, his reasons for dissent.
> This is a claim for interest, pure and simple, upon a sum of money which was claimed by the deceased as due him under a contract for carrying the mail during the year ending June 30, 1860, and which was finally paid in pursuance of an act of Congress approved August 4, 1886. The amount found due and paid under that act was $4,125. The amount of interest now claimed, computed from the time when the service was performed until the payment of that judgment, is $6,888.75. Nothing else is now claimed, the debt—if it ever was a debt—having been fully discharged.
> Interest is never claimable except by virtue of express contract or express law. It is unnecessary to say that no law exists for the payment of interest to creditors of the United States, except in the case of its bonded debt, upon which interest was expressly provided to be paid.
> In this case there was no contract for the payment of interest. More than that, there was no contract for the payment of the principal. That was paid entirely by virtue of the special act above referred to, under the authority of which alone the Court of Claims had the right to render a judgment against the United States.
> The case presented, then, is simply an appeal to Congress to bestow interest as a favor or gratuity, upon the theory of some special equity.
> The case was, briefly stated, that the deceased had a contract to carry the mails six times a week, which the Postmaster-General, in pursuance of the contract itself, and because of a failure of appropriation, reduced to three times a week; and the contractor carried the mail six times a week upon the expectation that Congress would authorize his payment; which was effected twenty-six years afterwards. It is impossible to distinguish any just reason why such a claim should have interest awarded to the claimant when none is allowed to a creditor with a legal debt, payment of which has been deferred for years.
> The deceased voluntarily put himself in the attitude of a claimant instead of a creditor; and, although his claim was eventually allowed, his equity is not so great as that of a creditor would have been.
> It can require no discussion to show that if this claim for interest is to be allowed it ought to take the form of a general bill to allow interest to all creditors who have hitherto suffered delay in the payment of their demands against the United States.
> WM. F. VILAS.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I have no possible interest in opposing this claim. I merely desire to call the attention of the Senate plainly to its nature. It is simply a bill to pay over $6,000 interest upon a claim amounting to about $4,000, which Congress passed an act to grant several years ago. The theory of the claim is that the deceased, Mr. Wightman, was a mail contractor in 1859 and 1860, just before the war broke out, and the Department, because of the lack of appropriations, and exercising the authority which the contract preserves in every case to the Postmaster-General, and which the law requires him to exercise, reduced the number of trips from six times a week to three times a week.

The contractor, however, at the solicitation of people interested, continued to carry the mail the full number, six times a week, and thus he had a claim against the United States for compensation for carrying the mail the additional three times a week. He had received, of course, one month's pay upon notice of discontinuance of the extra service, for the law requires and authorizes the Postmaster-General to pay one month's service in such case.

Some years afterwards, in 1886, Congress finally passed an act appropriating the amount of the balance due for the service of the additional three times a week; and this is a bill simply to pay interest upon the amount so appropriated from the time when the mail service was rendered to the date when the act was passed.

Of course, as I state in the views of the minority, Mr. Wightman voluntarily put himself in the position of a claimant. He was not a creditor of the United States; Congress made him a creditor. This bill would prefer him to every other creditor, except those who hold the bonds of the United States, and it would necessarily make every creditor entitled to interest on every deferred debt unless there is reason for a discrimination between one and another of the Government's creditors.

I have felt it my duty to make a plain statement of what the bill is, the entire committee disagreeing with me, I am bound to say. If the Senate thinks we will, in response to repeated solicitation, establish the precedent of passing a bill to pay interest upon a claim some years after we have allowed the claim, I make this statement plainly in order that the Senate may be possessed of the facts, and without a particle of care otherwise as to what is done with the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin one question in explanation. What was the language of the act of Congress authorizing the payment of the $4,000?

Mr. VILAS. I think it referred the case to the Court of Claims. I am not quite sure for the moment.

Mr. HUNTON. That is exactly right.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Virginia says I am right. It referred the case to the Court of Claims, and authorized the Court of Claims to allow the amount if the court found the facts to be as stated.

Mr. HUNTON. I think the Senator is wrong there. There was a reference of the case to the Court of Claims without saying anything about what the Court of Claims should allow. The Court of Claims considered the case and allowed the principal, but was not authorized under the law which gave jurisdiction in such cases to give anything but the principal. That is the fact.

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from Virginia will allow me, he will see that I was correct in my remembrance of the act. The act says:

That the claim of the legal representatives of John Wightman, deceased, for and on account of the mail service rendered by said John Wightman, deceased * * * be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, and the said court is authorized and required to take jurisdiction of the same; and if, upon the evidence in the case, it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said court that the said service was performed—and the same, or any part thereof, has not been paid for, then and in that case the said court shall render judgment in favor of claimants for the said service so rendered and not paid for at the rate of compensation provided for in said contract.

Mr. HUNTON. The Senator from Wisconsin reads from the record——

Mr. VILAS. I read from the act itself.

Mr. HUNTON. The Senator reads from the act itself to show that I am wrong and the act which he reads very clearly shows to my mind that he is wrong and I am right. As I stated before, according to the language of the act referring this case to the Court of Claims, it was a reference to that court to determine what should be done in the way of compensation to Wightman if he had rendered the service, and the Court of Claims was limited to the principal amount due; it could not give the interest.

There was one point omitted by the Senator from Wisconsin in his statement of the facts of the case to which I desire to call his attention and that of the Senate. He states the facts with entire accuracy except that he omits one, and it is the important fact in the case, because I believe that the question of the right of this party to the interest on the sum that was due him hinges upon the fact that I am about to relate.

When this mail service was reduced from six times a week to three times a week there was complaint all along the line of the route from Erie to Pittsburg. The parties went before the Postmaster-General, and the Postmaster-General said: "I am powerless to give you a daily mail, but if the contractor will agree to carry out his former contract, I will legalize it as far as I can by directing the postmasters along the line of the route to open the post-office and receive the mail and deliver it out to those to whom the mail is addressed." Under that arrangement between Wightman and the Postmaster-General, Wightman undertook to carry and did carry the mail six times a week, performing the service thus legalized by the Postmaster-General, under a promise from the Postmaster-General that "as far as in me lies, I will see that you are paid for it when Congress meets."

If it was not an express contract between Mr. Wightman and the Postmaster-General it was such a strong implied contract as between individuals always carries interest to the party recovering upon an implied contract.

If I am right in this statement of the fact in the case, there can not be any doubt about the equity of Wightman's representatives to interest upon the sum that was due him from the time the original sum became due until the principal was paid a few years ago. Upon this point I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a joint resolution that was passed in the very beginning of the Government. I believe it is maintained that it is not in force now, but I will show what the Government thought was right. It was passed on the 3d of June, 1784, and reads as follows:

That an interest of 6 per cent per annum shall be allowed to all creditors of the United States for supplies furnished or services done from the time that the payment became due.

I hold that that joint resolution of Congress of 1784 expresses nothing more than the law of the case, which ought to bind the Government if the Government was subject to be bound by law. We know that if this condition of affairs existed between two individuals, and it was recognized as the Government has recognized in this case, that the principal sum was fairly due to Wightman, then as a necessary appendage to that fact would follow the payment of interest on the claim. I think that Mr. Wightman is as much entitled to the interest on this money as he was to the principal.

I beg to say, in the language of the Senator from Wisconsin, that I have no particle of interest in the case, any more than he has. I never heard of John Wightman or his legal representatives until the case was put into my hands as a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I considered the case with a great deal of care, and I could not escape the conclusion that when the Government admitted, as it did by paying the sum, that it owed John Wightman $4,125 from 1860 down to the time when the principal was paid, that admission carries along with it an admission that he is entitled to interest upon that sum also, and especially when carrying the mail six times a week was the cause of an expenditure of $1,500 to a subcontractor to help him carry out this contract or stipulation with the Postmaster-General.

How much more it cost Wightman we can not tell. The mail could not be run every day on a route of that magnitude without a large outlay of money, and he expended money under the implied contract between Holt and himself with the expectation that when the money became due it would be paid to him, and as the money was not paid to him when it became due I hold—I could not hold any other doctrine as an honest man; however, honorable Senators may differ from me—that when the Government failed to pay that money which was justly due him, and which it has admitted to be due him, it owes the interest also.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President, this claim has received more than usual consideration at the hands of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The bill, it will be remembered, was reported heretofore from that committee unanimously and considered for a time by the Senate, and it was recommitted at the instance of the friends of the measure to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads for further consideration. It was carefully reconsidered, and the result is that the committee, with the single exception of one member, united in reporting back the bill favorably, as stated by the Senator from Virginia, who was instructed by the committee to report the bill. It is true the chairman of the committee dissents; and he has given his reasons for the position he takes.

This is an exceptional case, and even if it were not exceptional, it will not do to say that the passage of the bill is to establish a precedent that the Government of the United States will pay interest on a claim. Such ground can not be taken from the fact that I hold in my hand a list of fifty-three acts of Congress heretofore passed by which interest was allowed. The first act was passed the 14th of January, 1793, and the last not a great while ago. Such an act was passed May 31, 1794, and July 23, 1795, and January 23, 1798; another in 1802, one in 1804, two in 1807, two in 1810, two in 1812, three in 1813, two in 1814, one in 1815, two in 1816, one in 1818, two in 1820, one in 1822, two in 1823, two in 1824, two in 1826, one in 1827, one in 1828, one in 1830, five in 1832, two in 1834, four in 1836, one in 1838, one in 1842, one in 1846, one in 1859, one in 1847, one in 1852, another in 1854, and two in 1870.

Every one of these fifty-three cases was an act where interest was paid on claims against the Government of the United States. So it will not do to say that we are inaugurating a new principle here, or that we propose to establish a rule for which there is no precedent.

It has not been the custom, I admit, to pay interest generally on claims, although to tell the truth, so far as I am concerned I could never see any very good reason why if the Government owes an honest debt to one of its citizens and fails to pay it when it is due, it should not pay interest, just the same as an individual is expected to pay interest in law and in morals.

But this is an exceptional case as stated fully by the Senator from Virginia, and I shall not detain the Senate by going into its history further. It is enough to know that this committee, Democrats and Republicans, after a second investigation of the case, have come to the conclusion that this is an honest claim and one that the United States ought to pay. I may refer to one fact. Under Mr. Buchanan's Administration, when Mr. Holt, recently deceased, was Postmaster-General, this claim by name was referred to in the Postmaster-General's report and in the message of the President of the United States, and it was there stated that it was a claim, principal and interest, that would not be withheld on the part of the Government without dishonor to the Government.

Mr. HIGGINS. If the Senator from Oregon will allow me, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly.

Mr. HIGGINS. Are there precedents for the payment of interest?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There are fifty-three, to which I have just called attention, giving the date of the acts.

Mr. HIGGINS. It is an old policy of the Government?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The general policy of the Government is the other way, I presume, although as I have said there are fifty-three acts of Congress on the statute book to-day, placed there since the formation of the Government, where interest pure and simple has been paid. There have been exceptional cases.

Mr. HIGGINS. On what ground has this exception been placed?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. On that which has been stated fully by the Senator from Virginia who made the report, and who is more able to give the details than I am.

Mr. HIGGINS. Then the Senator himself can not state it. I am sorry.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I can state it. The appropriation failed on an important mail route in the State of Pennsylvania, where it seemed to be absolutely necessary to continue the mails. The President of the United States and the Postmaster-General said to this man, "There is no appropriation; we can not pay you, but if you will go on and go to the expense of putting on stock and supplying the people on the route with the mails, taking your chances, we will see that you are paid at the end of the time." The contractor did so. He went to great expense, as the report shows, in putting on stock, and he carried the mails and performed his contract. Then the Government failed to pay him. It failed to pay him the old contract price until some twenty or thirty years afterwards.

Now, we say he is entitled to interest on the amount of that claim from the time he ought to have been paid until the time when he was paid, whether it amounts to $1 or whether it amounts to $500,000. It is a matter of honor on the part of the Government; it is a matter of justice to the claimant; it is a matter of right between the individual parties; and it is a matter of right between the Government and one of its citizens, the contractor. That is the view we of the committee with one exception take of this case. I do not wish to detain the Senate any longer. I submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, there is some mystification in regard to this case, and I beg to say that with this report before me I can not agree to the statement of facts made by the Senator from Oregon. Here are the facts as found by the Court of Claims and that finding divests this case of a great deal of the sentimentality of obligation on the part of the Postmaster-General which has been woven into it by the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Oregon. What are the facts?

5. On the 23th of June, 1859, the Postmaster-General—

This is the finding of facts by the Court of Claims—

the Postmaster-General, by reason of failure by Congress to make necessary appropriations, reduced the service to three times per week and correspondingly reduced the compensation, to wit, to the sum of $4,500 per annum.

That was perfectly legal. It was in accordance with the expressed will of Congress in refusing to appropriate the money to carry the mails six times a week. Now, let us go further.

6. Shortly after the order of curtailment to three times a week, owing to appeals made to the Postmaster-General by citizens along the route interested in the mails for revocation of the order of reduction, the Postmaster-General—

Did what?

the Postmaster-General indicated to the agents sent by these citizens to the Postmaster-General—

Not to the contractor. The contractor was not present. There was no promise, direct or indirect, on the part of the Postmaster-General, but—the Postmaster-General indicated to the agents sent by these citizens to the Postmaster-General that if the contractor, John Wightman, would carry the mails six times per week, and trust to the justice of Congress for future appropriations to pay for the restored service, he would—he would cause the postmasters along the route to deliver the mails to him six times a week.

There is the only kind of contract that was in any manner made. It was an indication by the Postmaster-General to citizens who wanted service six times a week instead of three times a week that if the contractor went on and performed the service and trusted to Congress for payment he would cause the postmasters to deliver the mails to him six times instead of only three times as he was required to do under the law.

7. On the faith of such assurances from the Postmaster-General, Wightman did carry the mails six times a week each way from on or about the 1st day of July, 1859, to and including the 30th day of June, 1860, the mails during that time having, under the orders of the Post-Office Department, been delivered to him six times a week each way.

8. The said contractor, John Wightman, was paid for carrying the mail three times a week each way during all said year ending June 30, 1860, and was also paid, on or about the 9th day of May, 1860, the sum of $375, one month's extra pay, and no more.

9. The amount at the contract rate, for the service of carrying the mails three times a week from and including the 1st day of July, 1859, to and including June 30, 1860, is $4,125, after deducting the credit of $375 for one month's service.

CONCLUSION OF LAW.

On the foregoing finding of facts the court decides as a conclusion of law: The claimant is entitled to recover $4,125 for the additional service of carrying the mails set forth in the findings.

That amount was paid and the question is whether interest shall be paid upon it? I know there are precedents for paying interest, isolated examples, the facts of which we have not before us. We know that constantly in the Departments where an appropriation has failed or has not been made up to the amount, employés of the Government are told, "You can go on and do the work; we will accept of it, if you will trust to Congress for the appropriation." It may be that the appropriation is made at the next session or it may not be made for years. That is the case all through the service.

Mr. President, there are a hundred such cases as this, and probably a thousand. If we establish it as a matter of law that we are to pay interest upon mail contracts, where will it end? I sympathize with the claimant in this case. It was probably an extraordinarily great hardship to him; but where is it to end? Are we to say that the Government is liable for the payment of interest upon all contracts? Here are claims for supplies taken by a competent authority during the war. We paid for the supplies in 1880 and in 1890. Those supplies were furnished; they were worth a certain amount of money; the Government got them on that day; and are we to say that we shall go back and pay interest from the time the Government received the benefit of the supplies up to the time when the principal was paid?

Mr. President, this would be a dangerous precedent; and while this is an extraordinarily hard case, and I sympathize with those who claim the money, I can not in justice to the taxpayers of this country favor such a precedent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I know nothing about this case except what has been stated to-day before the Senate. It is perfectly clear to me that the payment of a claim like this would not only be a very bad precedent, but it would involve perhaps the payment of millions of money. In 1859 and 1860 we were passing through a period of great financial stringency, and throughout the country the postal routes were limited and the cost of the service in every respect was reduced to the lowest possible sum. This gentleman who had the contract in Pennsylvania suffered only the same inconvenience that probably thousands of other contractors did. A general reduction of the amount of service on all the postal routes of the United States occurred in those two years, and every one of those claimants, whether living or represented by heirs, would have a stronger right to claim money from the Government of the United States than this claimant.

This claimant had no contract with anybody authorized to make a contract to pay for any more service than three times a week. The Postmaster-General performed his bounden duty to keep within the limits of the expenditure appropriated by law. He had no right to make a contract for any more service than was authorized by Congress. The service was limited by the appropriation. The same rule of reduction of service was applied all over the United States. I happen to know that at that time it was applied in Ohio, and I have known of contractors who, for the convenience of the people, went on and carried passengers and mails six times a week when they were only paid for three times; but there was no pretense of any claim ever made by them.

Mr. HUNTON. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me go on a little further. As to the pretended declaration made by the Postmaster-General, it had no more operation in law or in equity than the declaration of any man walking along the road. He had no right to make such a stipulation, nor did he make it, because he never agreed that the money should be paid or that an additional appropriation would be made in the future. He did not promise anything of that kind. He promised nothing except that the mail would be received by the postmasters and delivered to the contractor every day if he presented himself at the post-offices along the route. Now I will hear the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTON. I beg to ask the Senator from Ohio, if a party had done service for the Senator by his consent without a contract, and the dealing between him and that individual raised an implied contract on the Senator's part to pay him $5,000, would he as an honest man say, "I will pay you the $5,000 ten years afterwards, but I will not pay the interest"?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a very fallacious argument. It is an absurdity on the part of my honorable friend, it seems to me. This work was not done for the benefit of the United States of America. The United States of America, through its officers, said they could only afford to pay for service three times in the week, and the work was done for the convenience of the people along the route. If this case is to be tried in a court of honor as being under a contract those people ought to be called upon to pay the money. Clearly the people who were benefited along the route ought to have paid it.

But there is another point, Mr. President, about the payment of interest. It is true there have been fifty or sixty cases during the history of our Government, going back a hundred years, in which we have paid interest, but what were the circumstances as to the particular claim? In more than a million cases we have refused to pay interest. It is the standing rule not to pay interest. No one expects interest in collecting a claim from the Government. The Government of the United States is always presumed to pay when due, and therefore there is no interest to pay; but if we do not pay when bound to pay we only exercise the same power that all governments sometimes exercise in delaying payments on account of public exigency.

It is not wise to depart from the established rule, except in some clear and strong case of a contract made for a stipulated amount and for a stipulated time, which would create an obligation to pay interest. Fifty or a hundred or a thousand such cases might occur where the interest ought to be paid, but if this bill should be passed this claimant would receive a sum of money which we never promised to give him. He has already received a sum of money to the full amount of the principal, obtained, it is true, by badgering Congress year after year, and now he comes in and wants interest. If interest at 6 per cent is allowed, instead of $5,000 interest, we ought to pay him $10,000 interest, because the claim has been in existence for thirty or forty years, and he will come back after awhile and say we have not paid him enough interest.

Private claims against the Government ought to be subjected to the severest test and scrutiny, and the Committee on Claims, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and all branches of the service ought to be careful not to set precedents like this and open the door to unreasonable demands.

For the benefit, therefore, of the people of the United States I make these remarks. I should like to vote in compliment to my friend from Pennsylvania for his bill, but under the circumstances I believe it will be setting a bad precedent, and I think the bill ought to be defeated.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I have not been in the Senate all the while this matter has been under discussion, but I understand this is a claim for interest where the principal claimed to be due has been paid by the Government. That being so, I desire to say a word or two about the importance of adopting a precedent by the payment of interest in this case.

It is only a short time since a bill passed the Senate in quite a similar case, for money claimed to be due a constituent of mine, residing in the State of Connecticut, upon a contract for carrying the mail away back in 1860. The principal only was paid, and I never thought in behalf of my constituent nor did my constituent think of asking for interest in that case. There were some four or five thousand dollars of principal due, which were paid. The case to which I refer is the case of Nancy E. Day, administratrix, and the claim dated back to the 24th of May, 1861, being one month's pay of her husband for carrying the mail upon a contract from New Orleans to Mobile. That has been what Congress has done with regard to all these claims. Congress has not paid interest upon claims just as much entitled to interest as this, I have no doubt, and more. The case of Nancy E. Day, I think, was more entitled to the payment of interest than the one now under consideration, because that was upon a contract, the amount being due for the carrying of the mail one month prior to the time, or at the time when the South set up the so-called Confederate government.

The question of the payment of interest is a very large question, Mr. President. It may be that the Government ought to pay interest in all cases where it withholds money, but the fact is that it has not done so, and that, whether the rule be founded in equity and good morals or not, the rule is the other way. It is only when some person comes and by persistence in pressing a particular claim induces Congress to pay interest that any exception has been made to the rule. So, as the Senator from Ohio says, there are a few cases in which Congress has allowed interest; but in the innumerable cases where claims have not been paid and the parties have had to come to Congress for payment, no interest has been allowed.

Take the case of claims which are set up by the Indians against the Government, which come to my knowledge by reason of my service on the Committee of Indian Affairs. I believe I am not mistaken in saying that if the rule of paying interest upon such claims as this is to be adopted and settled as the rule of Congress, there are from five to ten million dollars due to the Indians for interest upon their transactions with the Government which should be paid. I merely speak of this to show how large a question this is. I have in my mind as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, not yet reported upon—and, of course, I do not know what report will be made—a bill proposing to pay $590,000 of interest, the principal having been paid, which was only $240,000.

In sending a case to the Court of Claims last year the Committee on Indian Affairs provided that the Court of Claims should not consider the question of interest. That was a case in which the principal sum claimed was about $700,000, dating back to 1838, and the interest would have been about a million and a quarter dollars. At this very session claim after claim has been urged upon the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations by parties representing Indians, asking for the payment of interest in very much larger sums than the principal sum.

If we are to reverse the rule and provide that the Government shall pay interest on all claims where the payment of money is deferred for any reason and under any circumstances, then let us do it by general act. A general act of that kind would not get five votes in the Senate, in my judgment; it would get scarcely any votes, because the amount which would have to be paid under such a general law would be simply enormous. The rule of the Government having been the other way, I think we should either maintain the rule, or else, if we change the rule, we should change it to make it applicable to all persons.

What reason is there that the party in this case should have the interest paid to him, the principal having been paid, which does not exist in the Day case, which I hold in my hand, where the Government paid $3,000 for one month's service under a contract for carrying the mail? So of innumerable other cases. We must have some rule on the subject which will be just and equal to all claimants. It will not do to say that it is just and equitable that this claimant should have this amount of interest and then not provide for the great number of other claimants. If we are going to change the rule, let us change it as to all and not change it as to one.

Mr. HUNTON. One word, Mr. President, and then I shall submit this case to the Senate, so far as I am concerned.

I admit the general practice of Congress has been to deny interest to claimants, but from the foundation of the Government to this time there have been exceptional cases. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] and I laid before the Senate fifty-three of those exceptional cases. How many more there are we do not know, and nobody in the Senate Chamber does. All I mean to maintain is that this is an exceptional case, as much so as any one of those alluded to in the list produced by me to the Senate, and we ask the Senate to pay interest because it is an exceptional case.

I beg to state to the Senator from Connecticut and to the Senate th at two different committees of the House of Representatives have reported that this was an exceptional case and that interest ought to be paid; two committees of the Senate have reported to the Senate that this is an exceptional case and that it ought to carry interest; the Postmaster-General has said it is an exceptional case and ought to carry interest; and the President of the United States has said it is an exceptional case and ought to carry interest. Therefore I hope the Senate will concur in their view that this is an exceptional case, which ought to carry interest, and will pass the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. COCKRELL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORDON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question if he were present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SQUIRE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], and I withhold my vote, unless it be necessary to make a quorum.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PATTON. I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. MILLS. I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. If he were present I should vote "yea," and he would vote "nay."

Mr. BATE. I am paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BERRY. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. SQUIRE. In order to make a quorum, I vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], but as this is a private bill, I think I am at liberty to vote, notwithstanding the pair, and I vote "nay."

Mr. BATE. In order to make a quorum I shall vote. I desire to say that if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] were here, I believe he would vote "yea." I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH. I am paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], but in order to make a quorum I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—10.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the joint resolution will go over.

BAYOU DES GLAISES AND ATCHAFALAYA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7668) to authorize the St. Louis, Avoyelles and Southwestern Railway Company to bridge Bayou Des Glaises and Atchafalaya River in the State of Louisiana.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 1, line 7, after the word "Avoyelles," to insert "State of Louisiana;" and in line 9, after the words "Red River," to insert "in said State;" so as to read:

That the St. Louis, Avoyelles and Southwestern Railway Company, its successors or assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a railway bridge and approaches thereto over and across Bayou Des Glaises, in the parish of Avoyelles, State of Louisiana, and also a railway bridge and approaches thereto over and across the Atchafalaya River, between Melville and the mouth of Red River, in said State, at such point as may be selected by said railway company for crossing said bayou and river with its railroad line, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS—REMOVAL OF BAR OF DISLOYALTY.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3130) to repeal in part and to limit section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. PLATT. I suggest that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him?

Mr. PLATT. I object.

Mr. GEORGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. PLATT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the request?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The bill is intended to correct an error in an act passed in the last Congress, and I hope I may be allowed to have it considered at the present time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. MANDERSON. We were unable to hear the request on this side. We have no idea what it is. I ask that it be read at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the request of the Senator from Maryland.

The Secretary read as follows:

That Senator JARVIS be appointed on the Committee on Claims, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the Select Committee on National Banks, and Select Committee to Establish the University of the United States.

That Senator DANIEL be appointed upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

That Senator MARTIN be appointed upon the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland whether he is ready to report an appointment to fill the vacancy upon the Committee on Finance?

Mr. GORMAN. I have not made such a request. The request is confined to the committees named.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING STATUARY.

Mr. TURPIE. I offer, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES], who is a member of the Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, a resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. GORMAN. Under the rule the resolution should go to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution under the rules will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CHANDLER. The senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has not yet reached the city. I therefore ask that the resolution may go over, as it did yesterday, for another day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRINTING OF THE REVENUE BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the order yesterday submitted by Mr. HALE, as follows:

Ordered, That 5,000 copies of bill H. R. 4864 as passed, and to be known as the sugar-trust tariff bill, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Let the resolution go to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

FREE COAL, ETC.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the revenue bills which came from the House of Representatives on yesterday and had their first reading have their second reading at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the bills.

The bills were respectively read the second time by their titles, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7968) to place upon the free list bituminous coal, shale, slack, and coke;

A bill (H. R. 7969) to place upon the free list all ores of iron;

A bill (H. R. 7970) to place upon the free list barbed fencing wire, and wire rods for the manufacture of the same; and

A bill (H. R. 7971) to exempt from duty sugar, molasses, etc.

Mr. HARRIS. I deem it my duty to submit to the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, received this morning. I send it to the Secretary's desk, in order that it may be read to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., August 15, 1894.

DEAR SIR: Your letter advising me that the House of Representatives had passed and sent to the Senate bills putting sugar, coal, iron ore, and barbed wire on the free list, and requesting "an official statement from you (me) as to the effect that the passage of these bills, or either of them, would have upon the revenues of the Government," is received, and in response I have the honor to say that, according to the most careful estimates that can be made, if no change is made in the proposed revenue legislation which has recently passed through Congress, the total receipts into the Treasury during the current fiscal year will be as follows:

Estimated revenues for fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

From duties on imports:
Senate bill, including $43,000,000 on sugar		$179,000,000
From internal taxes:
Whisky	$95,000,000
Tobacco	33,000,000
Fermented liquors	33,000,000
Income	15,000,000
Oleomargarine	1,800,000
Playing cards	1,000,000
Miscellaneous	200,000
		179,000,000
From sales of lands and other miscellaneous sources		20,000,000
Total estimated revenue		378,000,000

The estimated receipts for the present year from the proposed tax on incomes and playing cards, and the proposed additional tax of 20 cents per gallon on distilled spirits, are, it will be observed, much less than is stated in the various tabulated statements which have heretofore been used in the discussion of these subjects, but I am satisfied the amounts here given are approximately correct.

The proposed income tax will not become payable, by the terms of the bill recently passed, until "on or before" July 1, 1895, which is the close of the fiscal year; and it is estimated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that by reason of the large stock on hand the receipts from the tax on playing cards will not amount to more than $1,000,000 during this year.

The estimated increase of receipts on account of the additional tax on distilled spirits during the present year has already been prevented to a great extent by the withdrawal of large quantities of goods from the bonded warehouses and the payment of the tax thereon at 90 cents per gallon, and this process is still going on.

The total expenditures during the current fiscal year will be as follows:

Civil and miscellaneous, including deficiency in postal revenues	$90,000,000
War, including rivers and harbors	56,000,000
Navy, including new vessels and armament	33,000,000
Indians	10,000,000
Pensions	143,500,000
Interest	30,500,000
Total estimated expenditures		$363,000,000
Estimated surplus for year		15,000,000

The duty on sugar proposed in the recent bill will, according to importations of that article during the fiscal year 1893, yield an annual revenue of $43,478,956, and the duties on the other articles mentioned in your communication would yield, under that bill, about $1,000,000; that is to say, iron ore, $270,920; coal, $436,149; and barbed wire, fencing wire, and wire rods, of iron or steel, when imported for the manufacture of barbed-wire fencing, about $200,000.

It will be seen, therefore, that if sugar alone is placed upon the free list, the expenditures during the present fiscal year will exceed the receipts to the amount of $28,478,956, and if the duties are removed from all the articles specified in your letter the deficit will be $29,478,058, not including any expenditure on account of the sinking fund, or the payment of $2,363,000 of Pacific Railroad bonds which will mature during this fiscal year.

In view of the existing and prospective requirements of the public service, I am of the opinion that it would not be safe to place all the articles enumerated in your letter, or even sugar alone, upon the free list, without imposing taxation upon other articles or subjects sufficient to raise an annual revenue of about $30,000,000.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

Hon. ISHAM G. HARRIS,
Acting Chairman Senate Finance Committee.

NOTE.—The bonds of the Pacific Railroad guaranteed by the Government, to the amount of $2,362,000, mature during the present fiscal year; and this amount is not included in the above estimate of expenditures.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I desire to make a motion, if it is in order, to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7971) to exempt from duty sugar, molasses, etc. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill, and I hope it will be disposed of one way or another at this time.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I feel it my duty to say a word, and move to refer these bills to the Committee on Finance, if the Senator from Missouri will allow me. I shall be very brief.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course I yield to the Senator from Tennessee. I presume his motion will permit debate.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; the motion which I shall make is debatable.

Mr. VEST. Then I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, while I am heartily in favor of free sugar, raw and refined, and certainly have no objection to putting the other articles dealt with by the other bills which are now on the table upon the free list, in view of the communication just received from the Secretary of the Treasury, and the strong probability, if not the absolute certainty, that if these bills shall become laws we shall during the current fiscal year have a deficiency in the Treasury of twenty-nine or thirty million dollars, I feel it my duty to move the reference of each of those bills to the Committee on Finance, in order that that committee may, in dealing with those bills, so deal with them that we may provide against that probable or inevitable deficiency which must occur during the current fiscal year according to the statement submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not think that Congress can afford to adjourn without such provision as will effectually guard against such deficiency. For that reason, and that reason only, I move that the bills be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HUNTON. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to know from the Senator whether an abolition of the differential duty on refined sugar would create any deficiency in the Treasury for the next fiscal year? I, for one, am in favor of a duty on sugar, and I am opposed to the differential duty of one-eighth of 1 cent. If it is in the power of the Senator from Tennessee to say that an abrogation of that duty of one-eighth of 1 cent will not create a deficiency, then I desire to separate the two points in that bill, and concur in the House provision as to the differential duty of one-eighth of 1 cent and nonconcur in the bill so far as raw sugar is concerned.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I do not hesitate to express the opinion that a duty of 40 per cent straight on raw and refined sugars, which would eliminate the one-eighth of 1 cent to which the Senator from Virginia refers, would produce more than $30,000,000, which deficiency the Secretary of the Treasury thinks the Treasury is threatened with by these bills. I am quite as much opposed to the differential duty as is the Senator from Virginia, but my opinion is that the Finance Committee ought to deal with the bills, and so deal with them that we may effectually guard against that dreaded deficiency. More than that, Mr. President, I do not care to say.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. This matter has been so thoroughly discussed during several months past and is so thoroughly understood by every Senator on this floor as to what his own views are, that I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee why we can not proceed now, without sending the bills to the committee? Let us consider the Secretary's letter, and everything connected with the subject, and determine whether we will agree with the bill as it passed the other House, or whether we will let the tax remain on raw sugar and knock off the tax on refined sugar.

Let the Senate determine the matter and not bury it in a committee. The free-sugar bill was passed by the House of Representatives with only 13 dissenting votes. An overwhelming majority of the people of the entire United States are in favor of free sugar, and I believe it is the duty of the Senate to take up the bill now and vote on it and let each Senator record himself, so that the country will know how the Senate of the United States stands on this question.

We have been handicapped here for months; the Senate has been charged with being in favor of the sugar trust; we have been charged with being opposed to free sugar, and my object in moving to consider the bill now is to let the country know how each Senator stands on the bill. Let him record his vote for free sugar or against it. I for one believe that the Senate ought to pass the bill precisely as it came from the other House without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t"——

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BERRY. And that a provision for free sugar ought to become the law of the land.

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator from Arkansas submit to a question? I am led to ask it because the Senator's statement as to his views shows very conclusively to some of us that the matter has not been debated sufficiently, and the Senator certainly needs more light.

Mr. BERRY. I decline to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MANDERSON. The question I desire to ask is whether—

Mr. BERRY. I have stated that I decline to yield to the Senator.

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator from Arkansas state how he voted on the differential of one-eighth when the tariff bill was before the Senate?

Mr. BERRY. I decline to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MANDERSON. All right, if the Senator from Arkansas does not desire to answer any question I propound to him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas is entitled to the floor, and declines to yield.

Mr. BERRY. What I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee is whether, in case the bill is referred to the Committee on Finance, there will be a report made in time to enable the Senate during the present session to vote upon these questions? I do not want to have the bill buried in the committee. I take it for granted that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber will desire to vote for free sugar, as many of them have done already. I certainly wish to vote for the bill as it came from the other House. It seems to me it is the duty of the Senate to dispose of this question now and not bury it in the Finance Committee, which I understand is equally divided between the two political parties, as it stands at present, or leave it there until we have no quorum or until the next session of Congress. All I desire is that the question shall be determined now in one way or the other, so that each Senator can say whether he is in favor of free sugar or is opposed to it.

Mr. HARRIS. In answer to the question of the Senator from Arkansas I can say, for myself only, that if this bill or these bills are referred to the Finance Committee I shall ask the committee to meet for the purpose of considering them immediately; and, so far as I am personally concerned, I shall insist upon the earliest report consistent with a fair consideration of the bill. If it could be done in three hours, I should gladly have them report the bill back within that time, but I think in dealing with a probable deficiency probably involved in these four bills, the measures ought to be considered by the appropriate committee and the deficiency provided against before the Senate takes definite action on any one of them, and certainly before the Senate takes definite action upon all of them.

As to the committee being equally divided, if, as the committee is to-day constituted, the majority party is not permitted to exercise its will in respect to the time and manner of report, I will promise the Senator from Arkansas that one hour shall not pass until I ask the Chair to fill the vacancy on the Finance Committee, when we will have the power to control the action of the committee.

Mr. VILAS, Mr. BLANCHARD, and Mr. COCKRELL addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had recognized the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who yielded to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. That is true.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the amendment of the Senate numbered 277 to the bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. 253) granting a pension to Maria Hall, widow of Joseph E. Doak, deceased;

A bill (S. 1772) extending the time for the completion of a railroad bridge over the Columbia River at or near Vancouver, in the State of Washington;

A bill (S. 1885) to extend the privileges of the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement to the city of Ocala, in the State of Florida;

A bill (S. 2269) providing for reconveyance by District Commissioners of certain lands to Andrew J. Curtis and Mary E. Curtis;

A bill (S. 2303) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Contentnea Creek, at Grifton, Lenoir County, N. C., and to establish it as a post-road;

A joint resolution (S. R. 96) to extend the charter of the Maryland and Washington Railway Company.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2107) granting to the Northern Mississippi Railway Company right of way through certain Indian reservations in Minnesota; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

And the Senate agree to the same.

F. M. COCKRELL,
CALVIN S. BRICE,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. The only point in dispute is the proposed appropriation of $1,809,539.70 to pay a judgment in favor of the Southern Pacific Company. The House has refused to agree to that amendment of the Senate. I move that the report be concurred in, and that the Senate further insist upon its amendments numbered 127 and 128.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to know what has become of the amendment increasing the appropriation for the payment of Indian depredation claims?

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendments that were made by the Senate were substantially agreed to, and the amount as the Senate proposed was reduced somewhat. The appropriation is left substantially as it was.

Mr. DOLPH. Is the appropriation left substantially as the House put it, or as the Senate put it?

Mr. COCKRELL. As the Senate put it, except that there is some reduction. The House conferees would not agree to the full amount that the Senate put in.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senate increased the appropriation from $100,000 to $250,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not remember the exact amount of the reduction which has been made, but there is some reduction.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for a separate vote on the amendment providing for the payment of the judgment in favor of the Southern Pacific Company. I desire to vote against the amendment. Let the vote be taken upon the general agreement which has been made, and a separate vote on the two amendments which have not been agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the report.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, the question is in respect to the amendment to pay the judgment in favor of the Southern Pacific Company.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 127. I have not had time during the present session to consider the very important question involved in the finding of the Court of Claims. I wish time to examine it. It not only involves the one or two million dollars proposed to be appropriated here, but it will involve also, arising out of this judgment, many other millions. I therefore hope that the Senate will recede from the amendment with a view to its consideration next session.

Mr. COCKRELL. Before the Senator from Ohio makes that motion, will he allow me to state that this is a judgment already rendered by the court. Subsequent liabilities have been paid, and every month the Government is paying this very company because of such claims. This is a back amount which was suspended.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. Payment was refused; the matter was taken into court; the court rendered a judgment, and there the judgment stands, drawing 5 per cent interest now, I believe, under the law.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is what I wished to inquire about. It is 4 per cent, is it not?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is 4 per cent. The judgment draws that rate of interest under the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. As we are borrowing money now, and as our receipts do not equal our expenditures, I think the Senate had better recede from the amendment. We are paying interest, anyway. I think a little more careful consideration should be given to this subject, which involves so much money. It will be only a short time until the next session of Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Ohio must also remember that this is a nonbond-aided railroad.

Mr. SHERMAN. The fact that the House of Representatives has declined to agree to the amendment is a sufficient justification in itself why we should not press it, at least until a fuller examination is made. If the objection of the House of Representatives is final, if they insist upon it, we might as well recede now as at a later date.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 127 and 128.

Mr. DOLPH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays. ["No," "No."]

Mr. GEORGE. Let the amendments be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays are demanded. Is there a second?

Mr. DOLPH. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask that the amendments be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be read.

The SECRETARY read as follows:

To Southern Pacific Company, $1,809,539.70; in all, $3,083,785.85.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 127 and 128.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I must ask for the yeas and nays. The amendments must be receded from if the other House insists upon its disagreement.

Mr. COCKRELL. The matter will be considered in conference fully in connection with what the Senator from Ohio has said. The vote of the Senate is equivalent to insisting upon the amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I have no objection to letting the matter go back to conference with the statement I have made.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate request a further conference with the House of Representatives on the amendments numbered 127 and 128.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. COCKRELL, Mr. BRICE, and Mr. HALE were appointed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. The commission may employ a clerk who is a stenographer, and who shall do the stenographic work of the commission as clerk; and that the commission shall have power to send for persons and papers, and the chairman of the commission or of any subcommittee may administer oaths. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and House of Representatives on vouchers approved by the chairman, and the commission may report by bill or otherwise;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 145, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Add at the end of said amendment the following: "to be paid out of the appropriation for surveys of public lands made by this act;" and on page 87, in line 14 of the bill, strike out the words "two thousand five hundred dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "four thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 238, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$45,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 261, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$5,000;" and add at the end of said amendment the following: "The Bureau of American Republics shall be placed under the control and direction of the Secretary of State, who shall report to Congress at its next regular session the propriety of continuing said Bureau, or if any obligation exists upon the part of the United States requiring the continuance thereof;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment to the amendment of the Senate numbered 277, from which amendment numbered 277 the Senate had receded.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 278, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"COTTON STATES AND INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT ATLANTA, GA.

"SEC. 3. For an exhibit by the Government of the United States of such articles and materials as illustrate the function and administrative faculty of the Government, to be made at the Cotton States and International Exposition to be held at Atlanta, Ga., in the year 1895, and for the employment of proper persons as officers and assistants by the board of management hereinafter created, and for the maintenance of the building hereinafter provided for, and for other contingent expenses incidental to the Government exhibit, to be approved by the chairman of the board of management and by the Secretary of the Treasury upon itemized accounts and vouchers, $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be disbursed by the board of management, of which not exceeding $10,000 shall be expended for clerical services. And to secure a complete and harmonious arrangement of said Government exhibit a board of management shall be created, to be charged with the selection, purchase, preparation, transportation, arrangement, safe-keeping, exhibition, and return of such articles and materials as the heads of the Executive Departments, the Smithsonian Institution and National Museum, and the United States Fish Commission may, respectively, decide shall be embraced in said Government exhibit. The President may also designate additional articles for exhibition. "But the United States shall not in any manner nor under any circumstances be liable for any of the acts, doings, proceedings, or representations of the said Cotton States and International Exposition, organized under the laws of the State of Georgia, its officers, agents, servants, or employés, or any of them, or for the service, salaries, labor, or wages of said officers, agents, servants, or employés, or any of them, or for any subscriptions to the capital stock, or for any certificates of stock, bonds, mortgages, or obligations of any kind issued by said corporation, or for any debts, liabilities, or expenses incidental to the exposition: Provided, however, That all articles which shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at said exposition, upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty, shall be admitted free of payment of duty, customs fees, or charges, under such regulation as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exhibition to sell for delivery at the close of the exposition any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition in the exposition building or on its grounds, subject to such regulation for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; and all such articles when sold or withdrawn for consumption in the United States shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such article by the revenue laws in force at the date of importation, and all penalties prescribed by law shall be applied and enforced against such articles and against the persons who may be guilty of any illegal sale or withdrawal: And provided further, That medals with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions commemorative of said Cotton States and International Exposition, and of the awards to be made to exhibitors thereat, be prepared at some mint of the United States for the board of directors thereof, subject to the provisions of the fifty-second section of the coinage act of 1873, upon the payment of a sum not less than the cost thereof; and all the provisions, whether penal or otherwise, of said coinage act against the counterfeiting or imitating of coins of the United States shall apply to the medals struck and issued under this section.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 280, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 15 of said House amendment strike out the word "and" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "occupied, and not less than 20 acres of each 160-acre tract;" and the Senate agree to the same.

A. P. GORMAN,
W. B. ALLISON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
JOS. H. O'NEIL,
WM. COGSWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. MANDERSON. Is this a final report?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a final report.

Mr. MANDERSON. It completes the agreement between the two Houses?

Mr. COCKRELL. It does.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should like to have read again that feature of the report that has reference to the names of those who were killed in the Ford's Theater disaster.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is amendment numbered 110, on page 59.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The part of the report indicated by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 110, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "That a joint commission, consisting of the select committee of five Senators appointed by the President of the Senate to investigate the Ford Theater disaster, and five members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, shall investigate the Ford Theater disaster and report to the Senate and House whether in equity and justice the Government should compensate the sufferers of that disaster for the injuries sustained by them, and, if it shall be decided that they should be compensated, then the commission will investigate each individual case and report the amount of compensation that should be allowed in each case. The commission may employ a clerk who is a stenographer, and who shall do the stenographic work of the commission as clerk, and that the commission shall have power to send for persons and papers, and the chairman of the commission or of any subcommittee may administer oaths. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and House of Representatives on vouchers approved by the chairman, and the commission may report by bill or otherwise;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I think that this is a most unfortunate if not a very cruel result. The Ford's Theater disaster occurred, as I recall the date, early in June, 1893. The whole country was shocked by that result, attributable clearly to negligence somewhere, for which the Government of the United States was responsible. Twenty men were killed and over one hundred men were injured; and all of them were employés of the Government, working in the capacity of clerks in the ramshackle building that tumbled about their ears. When the Senate met at the extra session it appointed a special committee, men some of whom were certainly well qualified by experience for the investigation of this matter. That committee had as its efficient chairman the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], who, with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN], and the senior Senator from Nebraska were charged with the duty of the investigation.

The committee was composed of four lawyers, men of large practice in their profession, and a business man who has achieved, as is well known, great success in that capacity. They set themselves to this work. They held numerous meetings. There was prepared with great care a blank application or petition that should form the basis of each claim. No step has been taken by that committee which has not been akin in thoroughness of exploration to that which would have been had had those men gone into court for the purpose of a settlement of their claims. There was no question in the mind of any member of that committee, and there can be no question in the mind of any member of either House of Congress, but that the Government is liable in damages to the people who were thus injured and to the heirs of those who were killed. There is no question of the moral or equitable liability. There can be none in the mind of any man. In the mind of no lawyer can there be any question of the legal liability if a private individual and not the Government of the United States were substituted for the party to blame.

The blanks having been thus prepared they were carefully filled by those who applied. There devolved upon me as one member of the committee the exploration of the claims of those who were instantly killed or those who died immediately after the occurrence. I made very thorough exploration in every line not only as to the character of the injury, the result where death did not immediately follow, and the examination of physicians and those who had examined the body after death, but we also investigated the facts concerning the survivors. I wish it were possible for me to go through that list of names and that list of survivors to show the deplorable condition of the families of the people thus killed—widows in some cases with six or eight children, with no income, dependent upon the charity of the public or such aid as they can get from individual relatives, perhaps of relatives unable to give them the sustenance that they demand.

Even during this long session of Congress, with its daily sittings from 10 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock in the evening, the committee was unable to give that thorough examination that was needed as to the claims of those who were not killed, but great progress has been made in that direction. My impression is that the Senator from California and the Senator from Michigan have, as to all of the claims submitted to them, some twenty-two to each, made the exploration, and they have been ready to report. The Senator from Tennessee has not been able to make that exploration on account of the duties devolving upon him as a member of the Committee on Finance, but in the partial report made from the special committee it was shown that there had been such investigation that during the coming recess undoubtedly we would be able to report as to all the cases, that the aid they absolutely need may be given to them.

Partial report was made that $5,000 should be appropriated to the families of those who were killed, making a total appropriation of $105,000. This has apparently been abandoned by the Senate conferees. I regret it exceedingly, for I see that these people are to have that sickness of heart which comes from hope deferred. This new proposition is that there shall be raised a joint committee of ten, five from each House, and that they shall again explore and investigate, and so time will creep along with petty pace, day will succeed day, week will succeed week, and month will succeed month, and there will be no relief to these people who are in such great suffering and distress.

When can the proposed committee of ten of the two Houses of Congress meet for the purpose of this exploration. With this long continued session running close up to the fall elections it is not presumed that that committee will get to work during the recess. Then will come the short session of Congress with its numerous demands, requiring of every man the expenditure of all the forces in him, taking up great time. Certainly it will not be until after the close of the present Congress that any committee will have the opportunity to make that exploration; and then what will come? There then will be no organization of the House of Representatives that will permit a joint committee to be established; and I can foresee that for years to come these poor people will be clamoring at the door of Congress for that relief which common decency, common honesty should require that we should give at once.

Mr. President, for this reason alone I shall vote against this conference report. I appeal to the Senator from Missouri, in view of the circumstances which have been stated and that were stated a day or two since when unfortunately I was not in the Chamber, that an effort be made again to pay these people the money that is fairly due them.

Another item has been abandoned in the report. It is perhaps too late to make comment upon it, but here we are to be left with another adjournment of Congress without any steps being taken towards the erection of a new Government Printing Office. That item is, I understand, entirely stricken out of the bill by some sort of parliamentary juggling that for one I certainly can not understand. But I appeal to the Senator from Missouri and I appeal to my colleagues upon the special committee to see if we can not obtain for these people, by some process, that which is fairly and decently their due.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to offer a suggestion in connection with the amendment relating to the Ford's Theater disaster. The Senator from Nebraska as well as the Senator from Tennessee have gone over the matter thoroughly before the Senate and I fully agree with them as to everything they have said. We have done, of course, a great deal of work individually upon that committee. We have examined a number of cases, and with great care. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if it would not be possible to insist upon this provision to pay the relatives of those who are dead, at the same time stating that we shall certainly be willing and glad to meet a joint committee on the part of the other House with reference to the cases concerning which there has been no formal conclusion reached.

I have no doubt the Senator from Nebraska will agree with me that it would be practicable to have a joint committee in the future with reference to the claims not yet reported to the Senate. If the House were willing to take that view of it, the payment could be made in those cases where there can be really no question. There is no doubt of the death. No one claims that there is any pretense here that a person applying for relief does not represent the family of the decedent, nor is there any doubt to anyone who has taken a most casual look at the transaction that if the property were owned and controlled by an individual that individual would be liable for gross neglect in placing his employés in a building which was inherently unsafe and the unsafeness of which was patent. Under these conditions a private individual would undoubtedly be liable.

Of course if we can not agree, we can not agree, but it seems to me that it is worth an additional effort to see whether or not these people can not be to the limited extent proposed in the bill compensated at the present session. The chairman of the committee, of course, understands the situation better than I can understand it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have no desire to embarrass the committee of conference in charge of this bill. Believing as I did that the Government ought to make a measure of compensation to the heirs of the deceased and to the seriously injured parties in the employment of the Government who suffered by reason of the disaster, I introduced the resolution that raised the committee, of which I have the honor to be the chairman, to investigate and report whether compensation should be made at all, and, if at all, to what extent. That committee was unanimously of opinion that compensation ought to be made, as I am. I regret that the other House did not raise a similar committee at the same time. I would have been glad to have had a joint committee; but in the light of such investigation as we have been able to make, there is no member of that committee who has a doubt as to the fact that compensation ought to be made.

I stated the other day when the conference report was before the Senate that we had merely asked for appropriations in this bill to compensate the widows and orphans of those who were killed outright in the disaster, the injured parties requiring more scrutiny of investigation as to the extent, the character, and probable duration of their injuries, and as to the measure of compensation they ought to receive.

In view of the fact that the widows and orphans of those persons who were killed outright by that disaster are in the main penniless and suffering, I had hoped—and if there be a ground on which to base a hope, I still shall indulge it—that the conferees on the part of the Senate may induce the House of Representatives to appropriate by this bill the money necessary to relieve the sufferings of those widows and orphans.

So far from objecting, I am exceedingly glad to have the House of Representatives appoint a similar committee, or a joint commission, if it may be so called, and let both Houses investigate to their entire satisfaction all the circumstances leading to that disaster and its fatal results, and determine the question as to compensation; but being perfectly satisfied myself that compensation is demanded by every consideration of justice, of equity, and propriety, I have indulged the hope, and indulge it still, if possible, that the widows and orphans of those deceased persons may be provided for by the passage of this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I must say frankly and candidly to the Senate that the House conferees will not agree to the amendment proposed by the Senate. They say that they have had no opportunity of investigating the matter, and know nothing about it; that it does not belong to an appropriation bill, and ought not to have been sent to them in that form, when they had no opportunity of investigating it and determining it, and that it involves questions of law as well as questions of fact. When they made the suggestion to us that they did not understand the case, we then as a last resort agreed to the substitute directing the select committee already appointed by the Senate in connection with a similar committee to be appointed by the House of Representatives, to investigate and report upon the subject. In my judgment, I say frankly it is either this provision, or none at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the House joint resolution continuing the appropriations for the executive branches of the Government provided for in the sundry civil appropriation bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. Res. 217) to continue the provisions of existing laws providing temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. COCKRELL. The sundry civil appropriation bill has now passed the Senate and will doutless pass the House of Representatives, where the conference report will be agreed to to-day, but it can not possibly be enrolled and signed by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses and prepared for the signature of the President of the United States before to-morrow evening, probably, if then. The clerks have already worked so hard that they are not able to work any longer until they have a few hours' rest. Therefore the passage of this joint resolution for some time is absolutely necessary. Let the joint resolution be read, and we can modify the time.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the provisions of joint resolutions approved June 29 and July 31, 1894, providing temporarily for the expenditures of the Government, be, and the same are hereby, extended and continued in full force and effect to and including the 24th day of August, 1894.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend the joint resolution by changing the time it is to take effect by striking out "twenty-fourth" and inserting "twentieth;" so as to read "20th day of August."

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to the joint resolution in the form now suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

FREE SUGARS, ETC.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has the floor on the motion to refer the bill (H. R. 7971) to exempt from duty sugars, molasses, etc., to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is with very great reluctance I find myself compelled to differ with the acting chairman of the Committee on Finance, of which committee I am a member. I have not the slightest doubt if this motion to refer the bills which have come to us from the House of Representatives prevails it will be the end of the consideration of those measures.

The fact has already been alluded to that the Committee on Finance as now composed consists of five Republican members and five Democrats. Even if the Senator from Tennessee should fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of our late lamented colleague, Senator Vance, of North Carolina, it is well known to every intelligent man that at this stage of the session, with the probability of the absence of a quorum in one or both Houses within a very few days, it will be impossible to bring those bills back here and secure their consideration.

Mr. President, in addition to the reasons which have been so forcibly urged why there is no necessity for a reference of these bills to the Committee on Finance, I desire most earnestly and explicitly to urge another. It is due to the Senate as a body, it is due to individual Senators, and particularly to those of us who have been called upon to discharge the difficult task imposed on members of the Finance Committee in the majority and members of the conference committee. I repeat what I said the other day, that the calcium light should be turned into this Chamber and every Senator should assume the responsibility before the American people of taking his position upon the questions which have been fruitful of gross and miserable scandals against the personal character of many of us.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] asked the present occupant of the chair [Mr. BERRY] if he could now support free sugar after having voted for the one-eighth differential on refined sugar in the pending bill? Let me answer that question. I voted for that one-eighth differential. I am willing to stand by that vote and by the bill as it is to-day, rather than have the party to which I belong convicted before the American people of incompetency and incapacity and of utter obliquity as to the pledges which it made to the people in the canvass of 1892.

I was called upon as a member of the Finance Committee and as a member of the conference committee to make a choice between evils. I was called upon to stand before the people of this country and say we could pass no bill at all, that our party was utterly incompetent, or to take a bill infinitely better than the McKinley act, and go before the Democrats of the United States and say to them, "I have brought you the best that circumstances permitted, and I have done my duty honestly and faithfully as I saw it."

There is no inconsistency in the position of those who voted for the pending bill and who now favor free sugar or a duty upon sugar which will produce the revenue which the Secretary of the Treasury says is necessary to carry on the Government.

Mr. President, I am most unfortunate in that I am compelled again to say something in the nature of criticism as against the present Administration. It has not been many days since the President of the United States, the head of our party, under whose flag to-day and now I am ready to fight to the death for tariff reform and Democratic policy, declared in a letter to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives that the Senate bill, now accepted, constituted perfidy to the Democratic party and dishonor to Democratic principles.

The Wilson bill came to us with no duty at all upon sugar, raw or refined. Every word in the letter the Secretary of the Treasury sent to us to-day, and which was read from that desk, is an arraignment of that bill, because it shows that if passed there would have been a deficiency of more than $30,000,000, and it would have been necessary to again issue interest-bearing bonds in order to carry on the operations of the Government. It must be remembered that we have increased duties by the amendments adopted by the Senate to the House bill, and it must be remembered that we have produced more revenue——

Mr. COCKRELL. We had to do it.

Mr. VEST. And were compelled to do it; but if what the Secretary of the Treasury now says be true—and I do not gainsay it—what would have been the condition of this country with the Wilson bill enacted? A deficiency of from forty to fifty million dollars staring us immediately in the face.

Sir, the letter of the Secretary of th Treasury is a vindication of the bill as passed by the Senate. Much has been said against that bill. I propose before I close to show that the self-constituted critics of the newspaper press and the miserable demagogues who want to pull down men in high places in order that they may climb there themselves, have perverted the truth and have assailed the bill as passed by the Senate in such fashion as convicts them before the American people of gross slander or willful ignorance.

Mr. President, the Hebrew superstition which turned a goat into the wilderness in order that it might carry away the sins of the people still exists. In times of great popular depression and calamity a scapegoat must still be found even amongst civilized nations, and the Senate of the United States is now filling that position with the American people. Much of this we have brought upon ourselves. We have brought it upon us because we have no rules for the transaction of business. For some years after becoming a member of this body, attracted by the idea of its great dignity and conservative character, I favored the absence from our rules of the previous question, as it is termed.

Sir, after my experience in the last five months, I have not an enemy in this world whom I would place in the position that I have occupied as a member of the Finance Committee under the rules of the Senate. I would put no man where I have been, to be blackmailed and driven in order to pass a bill that I believe is necessary to the welfare of the country, by Senators who desired to force amendments upon me against my better judgment and compel me to decide the question whether I would take no bill at all or a bill which had been distorted by their views and objects. Sir, the Senate "lags superfluous on the stage" to-day with the American people, because in an age of progress, advance, and aggressive reform we sit here week after week while copies of the census reports, almanacs, and even novels are read to us, and under our rules there is no help for the majority except to listen or leave the Chamber.

Is it to be wondered at that in an age like this the people should at last turn upon a body which seems to be made for obstruction and not progress? I do not wonder that the Senate has become a byword and reproach with the loose tongues and pens, bought and acting for every sort of mercenary interest throughout the land.

Sir, let us look for a minute at the history of the sugar schedule, which has been the rock in all this debate around whose base the cross currents and eddies of discussion have boiled and seethed. In one end of the Union, in that beautiful State of Louisiana, were the cane-growers, on 74 per cent of whose product as refined sugar, is all the protection that is given to the product of the trust, and who demanded protection because they represented an American interest. For myself, let me say, that allied to them geographically and by the ties of blood and commerce, I had rather give to them protection than to any other class within our broad domain. At the other end of the Union was a giant monopoly, stretching its Briarean arms into every family and to every breakfast table throughout the land, with watered stock amounting to $75,000,000, upon one-half of which they were paying 7 per cent, and upon the other 12 per cent quarterly, with a surplus of $18,000,000 ready for distribution amongst their stockholders—aggressive, defiant, almost dominant in the legislation of the country. Between these two was the minor interest of the beet-sugar producers, so small, however, as hardly to enter into the discussion as to the duties to be imposed.

Mr. President, under the McKinley act the duty upon refined sugar, the product of the trust, amounts to 60 cents on the hundred pounds—50 cents upon the face of the act and one-tenth differential as to all countries that impose an export duty; and as Germany is the only country that imposes this discriminating duty, and the only country that sends to us the refined sugar that competes with our product, the duty upon refined sugar under the McKinley act amounts practically and really to 60 cents on the hundred pounds. Under the Wilson bill, about which we have heard so much, and which is so often placed antithetically against the bill as it passed the Senate in regard to tariff reform, and especially in regard to the duty upon sugar—under the bill as originally reported by Mr. WILSON from the Committee on Ways and Means to the House of Representatives, and which was endorsed in the President's message of December last, the duty upon refined sugar, the product of the trust, was 25 cents on the 100 pounds, with the raw material free, as it was in the McKinley act, and a bounty for eight years upon the raw sugar of the South. The House of Representatives struck out the duty and sent to us a bill with free sugar, raw and refined. That bill was sent to the Finance Committee and taken charge of by a subcommittee composed of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who had taken the place of our late lamented colleague, Mr. Vance, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], and myself.

Sir, it has been said that we are the creatures of the sugar trust. The liars and slanderers and libelers, the miserable creatures who live upon the garbage and filth of public life, and whose bread has been breathed upon by infected lungs, dare to make this statement about men who have gone through these five months of labor and anxiety and humiliation in order to do their duty.

Here is the bill we proposed [exhibiting], printed and brought to the full Committee on Finance. Here is the sugar schedule as we made and agreed upon it. It imposed eighty hundredths of a cent on sugar not above 80 degrees under the polariscopic test, and one-hundredth of a cent for each additional degree up to 100 degrees, without any differential at all in favor of the sugar trust. It imposed a revenue duty upon the sugars of Louisiana, but gave nothing to this trust, which is said now to dominate the Senate.

This bill, upon the morning that we proposed it to the Finance Committee, was taken out of our hands and put before a caucus of Democratic Senators, without our knowledge or consent, and for three days we wrangled and disputed in regard to the terms of the tariff measure to be proposed to Congress.

The end of that discussion was—and if any Senator here denies it let him rise in his seat and say so—that this bill as we had made it was rejected, although a better bill than the Wilson bill in the way of tariff reform, lowering duties upon woolen goods and in the metal and other schedules.

Mr. MILLS. Reducing duties $15,000,000.

Mr. VEST. Reducing duties $15,000,000, as my friend from Texas says.

Mr. GRAY. And with more ad valorems and fewer specifics.

Mr. VEST. And with more ad valorems and fewer specifics. It came nearer to my idea of what a tariff-reform bill should be than any that had been enacted since the Walker tariff of 1846. At the end of these three days of miserable wrangling and recrimination we were turned out of that caucus with the intelligent and definite instruction to make a bill that would secure 43 Democratic votes, and which could be passed by the Senate! To that task we addressed ourselves. The result is seen in the bill which has been passed.

Mr. President, I shall speak of that bill in a few moments; but I desire to say now in passing that much of it, a very large portion of it, was agreed to by me simply in order to escape the humiliation of going back to the Democrats of the United States with no bill at all It is as well known as that we are assembled in the Senate of the United States that in this Chamber are some six or seven Democrats as honest as I, whose motives I do not impugn, with whom I differ radically and essentially in regard to the tariff.

It has been said that we have made a fight here for the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] against the President. Mr. President, in 1892 I wrote the first letter that came from a member of this body in favor of Mr. Cleveland's nomination for the Presidency. It was written to the Greystone Club, of Denver, Colo., and in it I said that, whilst my personal relations with the Senator from Maryland were as pleasant as they could possibly be, I would not support him for the nomination because he did not represent my views in regard to tariff reform; that, whilst I differed with Mr. Cleveland in regard to the silver question, I was prepared to support him for the nomination, and, of course, for election, because he stood the foremost representative of what I believed right in regard to the tariff question.

Sir, I have fought for no man, and never shall. I belong to no faction. I am neither of the house of Montague nor Capulet, of York nor Lancaster. I shall fight under any flag which leads to the principles I believe to be right, no matter in whose hands the staff of that banner may be placed. I am ready now to follow the President. I shall not follow him when I know that he is committing an injustice upon members of his party and doing violence to the results that ought to be achieved by the Democratic party in the coming canvass.

Mr. President, pursuing what I was saying in regard to the sugar duty, the result of our labors in regard to it is seen in the provisions of the tariff bill which has been accepted by the House of Representatives. The bill passed the Senate, but under circumstances which convinced many of us that the margin was so slight and the danger so great that it would be almost rashness to bring it back to the Senate with any great difference in its composition.

It has been said repeatedly—and I shall come to that more explicitly directly—that there never has been a time, and this has formed the staple of the editorials of the metropolitan press—that a bill like the Wilson bill in its provisions substantially and generally could not be passed in this Senate.

It has been asserted that nothing but pure cowardice or sinister motives kept us from reporting a bill similar to the Wilson bill which would have been passed, and which would have forced certain Senators "into the open," as the expression was, and who then would not have dared to vote against it. If there is a Senator here to-day upon either side of this Chamber who believes that the Wilson bill, or anything equivalent to it, could have been passed in the Senate at any time I ask him as a personal favor to rise in his seat and say so. [A pause.] I have been in this contest from the beginning, giving time and labor at the risk of life and health to the work before me, and I assert there never was a time when anything like the Wilson bill could have been enacted into law.

Senators from the great manufacturing States of the Northeast looked upon that bill as murderous to the interests of their constituents and would have fought it to the death. The complications growing out of the sugar interest assisted them in their opposition, and with no rules in the Senate and a majority of one, possibly of two, we were at the mercy of the minority, and it was as impossible to have passed that bill as for me to-day to carry this mass of marble upon one hand.

I come now to another phase of this measure, and I shall nothing extenuate,

Nor set down aught in malice.

When we came into conference with our brethren in the other House after the first disagreement—and it is unnecessary to go behind that—I stated myself (and I make that remark in order to assume the full responsibility), when the conference first assembled, that it was useless to go any further with the bill or with the disagreement between the two Houses until we had disposed of this Medusa head of the sugar tariff continually confronting us. It was agreed unanimously that we should take up the sugar schedule to the exclusion of every other subject, and come to a determination upon it.

We did take it up, and finally agreed, without a dissenting vote in the conference, upon a sugar schedule. That schedule was 40 per cent upon the saccharine matter in the sugar imported, together with a differential of one-fifth of 1 cent in favor of the refiners, constituting 20 cents upon the 100 pounds. The one tenth differential as to countries which impose a discriminating duty was left out and the bounty upon sugar until the first of January was left out. The schedule as I have stated it was unanimously agreed upon in the conference, and was set aside.

The argument in favor of this schedule was that it removed the nebulous and scandalous accusation that in the 40 per cent upon raw and refined sugar in the bill there was some hidden profit to the trust, to which they clung closely, and which was not known to the public. As the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the other House suggested, when the 40 per cent was placed upon the saccharine matter alone, it stripped the bill of this objection and let the whole world know that the trust received 20 cents upon the 100 pounds instead of 25 cents under the Wilson bill as originally framed, and 60 cents under the McKinley act.

Mr. President, for five long months the waves and winds had roared around Congress in regard to sugar. Cartoons, editorials, lying correspondents, demagogues on the hustings had accused the Senate of having been sold out to the sugar trust. Everywhere and anywhere, by night and day, the question was in regard to the sale of the Senate to the sugar trust. When we had agreed with our associates of the other House, and the sugar schedule had been disposed of, we fondly supposed that the great obstacle to agreement had been removed, and that we should then and there meet and embrace like brethern and stand as one before the American people. Imagine our surprise when we found that the insuperable obstacle was not in the sugar duty, but that it came from the duty upon coal and iron ore.

From the 20th day of March, when the tariff bill was published to the world, to the 2d day of July, when the President wrote his letter to Mr. Wilson, no intimation had been made to the members of the Finance Committee that a bill with a duty upon coal or iron ore, or both, constituted perfidy to Democratic principles and dishonor to the Democratic party.

Sir, recurring again to an unpleasant subject, I hope for the last time, I have no quarrel with the President of the United States. I made no attack upon the President of the United States. The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] did me injustice when he put me in the classic rôle of the envious Casca, who stabbed Cæsar at the foot of Pompey's statue. I simply defended the motives of myself and my colleagues upon the Finance Committee against the imputation in the President's letter.

If it were necessary, in order to remain in public life, that I should retract one word of what I said in the Senate, I would not utter it. No man, no matter how high his position, has a right to perpetrate an injustice upon another. After the President of the United States had told my colleagues—for I had not been to the White House—that although he preferred free coal and free iron, still the bill as we were preparing it would receive his support; and after we had given our labor, our energy, almost our lives, to the preparation of the bill, for the President to come before the American people and denounce a measure which he had failed to denounce before, although he knew its provisions, was an act of gross injustice to those of us who had suffered far more than he.

The result has been and will be under existing circumstances that the best campaign document furnished the Republican party, of which we will not hear the last until the approaching canvass is ended, will be the letter of the President denouncing the Senate without exception for having framed a bill, the provisions of which are now necessary, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, to prevent the issue of interest-bearing bonds to carry on the Government.

After two days or more of attempt at amicable adjustment—and I beg to say here and now that for each of the conferees on the part of the other House I entertain the most sincere personal regard and have no complaint to make of their action in any way whatever—we offered to the conferees on the part of the House to allow the sugar schedule to stand as we had made it, and to which we all agreed, and that they should take either free coal or free iron ore, as they pleased.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Missouri means as the conferees had made the sugar schedule.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course as we, the conferees, had made and agreed upon it. We offered them the privilege of taking either free coal or free iron ore, stating to them that it seemed to us fair to adjust the differences between the two bodies by their taking one-half and leaving the other half as the Senate had voted it.

Let it be understood that all this time the Senate conferees personally agreed with the House of Representatives, but we were there as conferees, representing the Senate, standing by the votes of the Senate, instructed to maintain the position of the Senate. While I did not consider myself bound to the extremity of standing by all the amendments of the Senate without exception and without further amendment, but was prepared to give up many of those amendments in order to save the bill, yet, at the same time, as a conferee on the part of the Senate, I considered myself honorably bound to defend and advocate, as far as possible, the instruction which had been given to me.

When this proposition was made to the House conferees that they should take either free coal or iron ore, they expressed great gratification, and said the spirit which we had manifested would be met by them in the same conciliatory and friendly manner. They went out for consultation, and after some two hours came back and suggested that it would probably be best to take free iron ore instead of free coal. We told them that was a matter to be determined by them, and that we were willing to make the change.

We then adjourned, with a sort of parliamentary love feast for the second time, concluding that the matter had been fully adjusted and that we could make a report. We stated to them at the same time, I should have said, that with our knowledge of the Senate and the close vote that must occur here upon any disputed question, it was not safe to go through all of the schedules and cut down duties, and that it would be dangerous to come back to the Senate with reductions in the metal schedule, the woolen schedule, the cotton schedule, the glass schedule, and the other great schedules in the bill. The next morning we met again in conference, and our friends from the House then informed us that they had concluded it was best to have free coal instead of free iron ore. We said "Gentlemen, take your choice. We can be

Were t'other dear charmer away."

[Laughter.]

After we had concluded upon free coal and had settled the sugar question, the chairman of the conferees on the part of the House stated that he considered it his duty and that of his coconferees to demand that we take up the whole bill and go through all of the schedules and agree to such adjustment as would not endanger the fate of the bill in the Senate.

Speaking for myself, I can state that while I personally was willing to agree to any report that they might see proper to make in order to get the bill through the Senate—I stated frankly that to commence such a general reduction, or even any material reduction, of the duties in the bill would endanger its passage through the Senate, and that this was the great peril to be avoided above all others.

We also offered them free sugar instead of free coal, or 40 cents a ton for five years on coal and iron ore, with a reciprocal provision imposing the same duties on coal and iron ore from other countries as might be placed by such countries on coal and iron ore from the United States.

The House conferees insisted upon those reductions, and from the beginning to the end of the whole conference the trouble was, and I say it most respectfully and kindly, that our friends in the other House could never be made to understand that we knew more about the condition of affairs in the Senate than they did. Their idea seemed to be that for some sinister or occult purpose we were avoiding an open vote. They continually demanded of us, "Take the bill back to the Senate with such amendments as you yourselves concede with us ought to be made, and let the Senate, in the broad, open light of day, vote upon it."

We, upon the other hand, with one view under heaven, so far as I am concerned, that of avoiding the absolute destruction of all tariff legislation during this Congress, assured them, and every day confirmed us in our opinion, that if the bill came back here with material amendments it would be defeated and the country would be told that the Democratic party was incompetent to make any bill at all.

While the House conferees were insisting upon taking up all of the schedules and we were warning them against the inevitable result, the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] introduced his resolution which brought about the tie vote, in which the Chair gave the deciding vote, so well known to the Senate and to the public. After that there was no conference, because that vote demonstrated beyond all sort of question that what we had said to them in regard to the conditions in the Senate was absolutely and inevitably correct.

Mr. President, what are the salient points in the Senate bill, which has been so much derided and abused? What has the Democratic party of the country given to the American people in the shape of tariff reform as compared with the McKinley act? A false issue has been made before the people, and it has been made deliberately and intentionally for sinister purposes. It has been telegraphed, written, and spoken everywhere that the question was between the Senate bill and the Wilson bill.

That never was the question. It is as false as the assertion so often made that this is a Democratic Senate. This is not a Democratic Senate on the question of tariff reform. It never was, and it never will be, as at present constituted. But it has been said everywhere that the question was between the Wilson bill and the Senate bill. The question all the time has been between the Senate bill and the McKinley law. That was the choice to be made, and every man who understood the situation knew it.

Now, what have we done; and I shall dispose of that question in a very few words? The bill which the House has accepted, and which in a few hours will go to the President of the United States, puts wool, lumber, salt, copper, burlaps, bags and cotton bagging, flax and hemp, all agricultural implements, cotton ties, and binding twine absolutely on the free list, in antagonism to the provisions of the McKinley law. On coal and iron ore the duty has been decreased from 75 cents to 40 cents a ton. On lead ore the duty has been decreased one-half. On zinc sheets it has been decreased one-half. On woolen goods, the citadel of protection, the great fortress of monopoly and outrage in the McKinley law, the duties have been reduced 50 per cent. They have been reduced 38 per cent in the metal schedule, 22 per cent on cotton goods, 31 per cent in the glass schedule, 22 per cent on chemicals, where the House bill reduced the duties only 20 per cent.

If Senators and the opponents of the Democratic party, before they criticise the bill further, will take the trouble to examine the "Comparison of the Tariff and Administrative Acts of 1890 and the Bill H. R. 4864," being report No. 550, Fifty-third Congress, and turn to the comparative statement from the Treasury Department, they will find a summary, the substance of which I will state. Under the present law the average ad valorem is 49.58 per cent; under the House bill it is 35.51, and under the Senate bill it is 38.68 per cent. In other words, between the McKinley act and the House bill there is a decrease of 14 per cent; between the McKinley act and the Senate bill there is a decrease of over 11 per cent, being a differential between the House and Senate bills of 3 per cent. We have sugar included in our bill, while the House bill came to us with no duty on raw and refined sugar.

Mr. HARRIS. Under the McKinley act, of course, sugar was free.

Mr. VEST. It was free with a bounty of 2 cents a pound. If Senators will turn to page 394 they will find another summary. The average ad valorem rate based on the value of importations of the fiscal year 1887, in the act of 1883, was 47.10 per cent; average ad valorem rate of the Mills bill, based on the value of importations of the fiscal year 1887, 42.38 per cent, or a difference of 5 per cent; average ad valorem rate in the McKinley act, based on the value of the importations of the fiscal year 1893, 49.58 per cent; average ad valorem rate, based on the value of the importations of the fiscal year 1893, in the House bill, 35.51 per cent; average ad valorem rate, based on the value of the importations of the fiscal year 1893 in the Senate bill, 38.68 per cent.

So it appears, Mr. President, that all this scandal, vituperation, and criticism arise upon a difference of 3 per cent between the two bills. When we have made the immense step in advance on the path of tariff reform of putting wool upon the free list, and have reduced the duty upon woolen goods 50 per cent, when we have put lumber and salt upon the free list, and have reduced the duties upon lead and zinc, we are still told that in framing the Senate bill we have been guilty of perfidy to Democratic principles and dishonor to the Democratic party.

Nor should it be forgotten that the Senate bill retains the Income Tax, shorn of many objectionable provisions, which establishes, I trust, for all time the democratic principle that taxation should be in proportion to Governmental protection, and that the citizen should pay upon his income above a fixed sum, and not upon consumption.

Mr. President, I am glad now to be able to speak as an American Senator and not as a conferee. My friend from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] suggests to me that I should say something in regard to the deficiency. The Secretary of the Treasury has informed us that if the duty is taken from sugar there will be a deficiency of $30,000,000. I make no issue with the Secretary of the Treasury. I regret that this fact was not made known to us before, but since it has come to us now I shall not avoid the issue. If it be true that a deficiency of $30,000,000 will be created and that bonds are to be issued, why should we send the bill to the Finance Committee, never to be heard of again?

Why should we not grapple with the proposition now? What are committees for except to give information to the Senate as to details? Who does not know all about the sugar duty? Who is not prepared to act upon it? If to make sugar free will create a deficiency of $30,000,000, then why not put 40 per cent on sugar, raw and refined, and leave it there and take the responsibility each one for himself before the American people, with no protective duty to the refiners at all? Take Mr. Theodore Havemeyer, president of the trust, at his own proposition, when, in 1888, he said that the refiners of the United States could hold their own with those of any other country in the world.

Why should we continue this scandal? Why should we now send the bill into a tomb and put the seal of the everlasting upon it, and then have the American people say, "Oh, yes; they did their work for the trust, and then they were afraid to face what the representatives of the people had sent them in the shape of a free sugar bill?" Why can not we settle it now? Why shall we put it off? Where stands the majority of the Senate upon the sugar question? Why force a few of us to be the scapegoats of popular indignation, scandal, and defamation everywhere? Why not let every man stand out and answer to his name and say what he thinks should be done, and go back to his people with the result?

Sir, I am tired of evasion, suspicion, and lies. I want the truth to be known, and let each man assume the responsibility for himself. Another word and I shall have concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. Before the Senator from Missouri, my colleague on the Committee on Finance, concludes, I should be glad to have him state, as he opposes the reference of the bill to the committee, what remedy he suggests for the threatened evil of a deficiency of $30,000,000 in the Treasury.

Mr. VEST. I have just stated it.

Mr. HARRIS. I have not understood the Senator. I was unfortunate in that respect.

Mr. VEST. I endeavored to make it as clear as possible. I would impose a revenue duty upon raw and refined sugar. I understand my friend from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] has prepared such an amendment. He showed it to me this morning. It meets all doubt about a deficiency, answers the Secretary of the Treasury completely, and relieves us of all this nebulosity of defamation which has been so rank in the country for the last five months. I have, for myself, always advocated free sugar, but I am willing, in order to meet the demands of the Treasury Department, to vote for the amendment which the Senator from Arkansas has prepared and will offer. I will make another remark, and then I am done with the subject, I hope forever.

Mr. President, it is not pleasant ever to indulge in personality, but my attention has been called recently to an infamous statement, coming from a generally reputable source, made in the public press, to the effect that my action in reference to the letter of the President to Mr. WILSON, and in regard to the bill had been dictated by a feeling of revenge against his Excellency because he had ignored me as to the patronage of my State. The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] was kind enough in his concluding remarks, when he played the role of Marc Antony, and when some people suspected that he would like to have played Marc Antony in earnest, and "come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him," to say as to those who formed the classic group that had attacked our modern Cæsar:

What private griefs they have, alas, I know not.

Mr. President, I have no private griefs; but I wish to acknowledge in the most public manner my gratitude to the President for having relieved me from all responsibility in regard to appointments in Missouri. Sir, if there is anything in my public life which has afforded me any pleasure, real and substantial, it has been the fact that the President in the exercise of his constitutional right, of which I do not complain, informed me that he no longer desired my advice or assistance in regard to Missouri patronage.

Not again during this Administration will I stand in a crowded anteroom looking into the anxious and haggard faces of expectant officeholders. Not again when admitted to his august presence, will I watch the shadows, possibly produced by indigestion, that float across the Executive brow and feel hope sink "to rise no more." Not again will I be damned at country post-offices and upon street corners as an ingrate who has given no offices to his friends. Sir, were it not for this tariff I could now indulge in the ecstacy of that well-known hymn:

There shall I bathe my wearied soul
In seas of endless rest,
And not a wave of trouble roll
Across my peaceful breast.

[Laughter.]

I have no complaint against the President as to patronage. I am ready to follow him now as the old Scotch followed the banner of the Bruce, when he fought for country and honor. I fight for no man; I fight for my principles, my party, and my country. Men pass away like clouds from the evening sky, but principles live forever. Sir, when any man accuses me of personal motives in what I have done in connection with the bill, my connection with which is now ended, I simply answer him as Marmion to Douglas:

Lord Angus, thou hast lied.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, in view of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury which has been read to the Senate, I offer an amendment to the pending bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated at the desk.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not understand that the bill is open to amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the amendment be read for information.

Mr. MANDERSON. That can be done. Let it be read for information and ordered printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Arkansas that the amendment can be read for information. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask that the amendment may be considered as pending, and that it be printed with the bill and go over.

Mr. ALDRICH. It can not be considered as pending, but the Senator may offer it and have it printed.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment be read and printed, and if the bill is referred, let it be referred with the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That from and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all sugars and on all tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice, or of beet juice, melada or concentrated melada, concrete or concentrated molasses, a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem.

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on molasses testing above 40° and not above 56° polariscope, a duty of 2 cents per gallon; if testing above 56° polariscope, a duty of 4 cents per gallon.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I have not risen either to attack or defend the bill which has recently passed Congress and is now awaiting the signature of the President. I think perhaps the least that we can say about that measure the better it will be. It is the most remarkable measure that has ever found itself upon the pages of the statute books of any country. It is a phenomenon in political science; and especially is it so when we consider that this is a popular Government and that legislation in a popular government is the crystallization of the public will. I make bold to say here to-day that that bill does not reflect the sentiment of one thousand people of the United States.

I do not think I will be far from the truth when I say there is not a Republican in the United States who favors it. I do not think I will be far amiss when I say there is not a Populist in the United States who favors it, judging by the votes of their representatives in this Chamber. I do not believe I will be far from the truth when I say that the great masses of the Democratic people of the United States condemn it. It is the product, as we all know, of five or six, or at best seven, members on this floor.

As my friend from Missouri said, and well said, a while ago, there is no Democratic majority on this floor on tariff reform, and there has not been at any time since I have been a member of this body. There are four distinct parties upon this floor. There is a Republican party, a Democratic party, a Populist party, and a Conservative party. The Conservatives hold the balance of power, and we all know what the balance of power means. It is one of the most potent instruments wielded either in legislation or in the executive departments of government. It is the balance of power that has adjusted the territorial boundaries of the dominions of Europe for more than a century. It is the balance of power that has kept crowns upon heads in Europe, and the balance of power here, five or six members expressing by their votes their will and not the will of the people of the United States, or any considerable number of them, have made the bill what it is, and it will be a law in a short time. In a government of freemen the ballot box is the source of all power and the expression of all power. It is the crystallized public will, so to speak, of the people of the United States. Yet, as I said, I do not believe if the entire body of the people of the United States were polled 1,000 voters would say that it is a bill that meets their approval.

We all voted for it over here. We passed it. As the Senator from Missouri well said, the issue was between that bill and the McKinley law; and as I said, perhaps not in such fine language as my friend would use, and perhaps not exactly in parliamentary language, especially when used in the Senate of the United States, we all found ourselves "between the devil and the deep sea," and we went to the sea rather than see the country go to the devil. [Laughter.]

We have no apologies to make for it. The bill is better than the McKinley law. It was the best we could do under the circumstances.

I regret, Mr. President, that my friend and other distinguished gentlemen will continue to attack the President of our party because we differ. The President may have been wrong or he may have been right. I believe that he is an honest man. I believe that he sincerely wants the redemption of the pledges made to the six million Democrats at the ballot box when they voted to change the control of the Government. The issue is not between the President and this body on the sugar question. The President's letter showed that he is in favor of a tax on sugar. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is no condemnation of the President's letter to Mr. WILSON.

The nervous language that he used in the letter to Mr. WILSON that to abandon the cause and the principles of the Democratic party and its professions would be party perfidy and party dishonor was not made about sugar. It was made because we were departing from the pledges that we had made for free materials of manufacture and the reduction of the cost of the production of American manufactures, giving employment to our people, manufacturing more, and sending our manufactures out to the world and selling them in competition, driving all rivals and competitors before us and taking the world's market. The President of the United States wanted to give employment to the idle people of the United States. We had promised them not only free coal and free ore, but our platform pledge was that tariff reform should take the direction of free materials for manufacture. The bill we had passed was not doing it.

Now, my friend from Missouri was not hit by those words. He need not lose any sleep. They were not aimed at men who have his principles and his record in public life. I know what his political convictions and his principles and his record have been. His record has been the same as that of the great majority of our party. It has been for tariff reform, for reduction of taxes, for exempting from taxation the materials of manufacture. It was not at him that those words were aimed. I myself lose no sleep on account of those words. "Let the galled jade wince; my withers are unwrung."

I will state some of the things at which the President was aiming. If you will look on pages 324 and 325 of this document, here are nearly two pages of materials that were taken from the free list in the Wilson bill and transferred to the dutiable list in the Senate bill. I will not take time to read them. We were going backward when we had promised to go forward and exempt materials of manufacturers from taxation. It was at these and at this line of policy that the criticism of the Executive was leveled, and not at such a man as my friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST], or my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], or my friend from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

I have no criticism to make on the committee of conference. They have done all that they could do. We were within a power we could not resist, and we either had to take the terms dictated to us or to take the McKinley law. That is all there is about it.

My friend quoted in defence of the bill the per cents in the tables. Nothing is more deceptive than per cents. Suppose we had $400,000,000 worth of dutiable goods coming into the United States, and that is in round numbers the amount in 1893. Suppose the duties paid on those goods amounted to $400,000,000 this year, that would be 100 per cent, would it not? Suppose, in revising the tariff, we put $200,000,000 worth of these same imports on the free list and receive $200,000,000 of duty on the other $200,000,000 of imports, the duty would still be 100 per cent and show that we had not reduced taxation.

Suppose we put $300,000,000 worth on the free list and $100,000,000 worth on the dutiable list, and tax them $100,000,000, it would still show that we have done nothing, for it is still 100 per cent. Suppose you put everything on the free list but a pound of candy worth a dollar and charge a dollar and a half duty upon it, you are arrayed before the country for increasing taxation 50 per cent, notwithstanding you have exempted $400,000,000 worth of imports from taxation, and removed that great burden from the shoulders of the people.

In looking at a question of this sort, you must take into consideration the goods that you exempt entirely from taxation and add to the free list. That was the peculiar value of the bill of 1887. In that bill we put about $20,000,000 worth of imports on the free list. This bill only puts about $11,000,000 worth on the free list. We are going backward instead of forward. I say for myself (and I know I speak for my friend from Missouri, and my friend from Tennessee, and my friend from Arkansas, and all the rest of them), we do not at all accept this as a final settlement of the question of tariff reform. We have carried the outposts that defended the citadel of the enemy, and we intend to push the contest until we carry the gates of the city and sweep the streets of the enemy and take everything from him.

We intend to restore to the people of this country the God-given right to work for life and to sell the products of their work in whatever markets they can sell them. The right to work is worthless if you can not sell the products of your work, for we are all working for other people. If we entirely forbade commerce and trade and exchange, civilization would perish in one generation from off the face of the earth. The greatest possible calamity that could befall the human family would be to carry the doctrine of protection to its logical analysis and forbid everybody from trading. The greatest possible benefit that could occur to the human family would be to remove all barriers and permit them to enjoy free trade all over the world.

Mr. President, I shall say nothing more about the bill. It is a step in the right direction. It is a substantial step in the right direction, with the exception of the policy of taking from the free list any articles that enter into free manufacture. It will be a substantial benefit to the country. It will reduce the cost of woolen goods to the people of the United States from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000, to say nothing of other schedules.

But, Mr. President, I rose to say something about the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury. I rose to say that there is no cause whatever to apprehend a deficit. I say that you may take all the tax off sugar and you will have more money than you can spend legitimately. All the estimates that have been made by the Finance Committee, which have been adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury, are based upon the imports of 1893 under the McKinley law.

What has been the fact with reference to every tariff act in the history of the Government that reduced duties when they were above the protected point? Importations increased, and with increased importations came increased revenue. It was so in the Walker tariff of 1846. We had no surplus revenue under the protective tariff of 1842. In 1846, though the duties were decreased down to a revenue standard, the revenue increased $8,000,000 the very next year. I want to read good standard authority on this question. I read from the report of the Finance Committee of this body made by my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] in 1888. At that time, as we all know, we had about $100,000,000 in the Treasury that we had no use for, and one of the main arguments for the bill of the House of Representatives was that it would empty the Treasury and reduce the revenue.

What do our friends say? I read from the report of the majority of the Committee on Finance on the Mills bill in 1888. Listen to it. Here is the truth enunciated and a principle to which all of us agree, both Republicans and Democrats, that when you have protective duties above the revenue point and reduce them you increase importations and increase the revenue. We contend that that is right. Our friends on the other side contend that it is wrong; but the fact we both admit.

Mr. GRAY. Both admit it as true.

Mr. MILLS. The fact we both admit, that when the duties are above the revenue point and a reduction of duties is made, the logical and inexorable consequences are increased importations and increased revenue. I read from the report made by my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] in 1888:

> Your committee, after a thorough examination of the provisions of the bill (H. R. 9051) referred to them by the Senate, have become convinced of its inadequacy as a remedial measure in view of the condition which confronts us.
> 1. Its adoption would probably result in an increase, instead of a reduction, of the revenue from customs.
> It is claimed by the friends of the bill that the reduction of revenue from this source would amount to $49,486,240.75, but we are confident that the large reduction in rates proposed would result in greatly increased importations. When American producers supply a considerable portion of our market with articles in general use and the rates on these are reduced below the protective point, both importations and revenue must increase.
> By the acts of July 14, 1870, May 1 and June 6, 1872, important reductions in tariff rates were made and the free list greatly enlarged. It was officially estimated at the time of the passage of the various acts that these changes would result in a reduction of the revenue from customs of $57,227,510. The revenue from this source in 1869 was $176,114,904, and in 1873 it was $184,929,542, or an increase of $8,814,138, instead of a reduction of $57,227,510. This increase took place notwithstanding the fact that free importations increased in value $157,707,264 between 1869 and 1873. Similar results may be reasonably expected should the House bill become a law.

Now, listen to this:

> If foreign manufacturers should, through the changes made in the cotton and woolen schedules, secure a quarter of the market now held by our cotton and woolen manufacturers—and this is certainly a very conservative estimate—the additional amount of duty collected from increased importations would amount to at least $60,000,000 annually. The expansion of imports which would surely follow the reduction of rates on china, porcelain, common window glass, manufactures of iron and steel, flax, jute, hemp, and a large number of minor manufactures, would greatly augment the revenue.

The importations in 1888 were about what they were in 1893. The reduction proposed is in the same neighborhood, only this approaches more closely to the revenue point and therefore will bring greater importation and greater revenue.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator for information—which bill approaches nearer the revenue point?

Mr. MILLS. The Senate bill.

Mr. GRAY. Nearer than the so-called Mills bill?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir; the duties are lower. Now, with these facts before us, and they are mathematical and can not be contradicted, there is to be a very large increase of importations under the bill. My friend from Rhode Island nods his head in assent to it. A large increase of importations means a large increase of revenue. It was estimated at $60,000,000 in 1888 on cotton and woolen goods alone, to say nothing of the other articles in the schedules.

There is no necessity for putting a dollar of taxation on sugar, and yet I consented to it with my friend from Missouri and my friend from Arkansas when we were arranging these schedules. I will be frank enough to say that I proposed it, and that my friend from Missouri and my friend from Arkansas opposed it for a time. I proposed it and urged it, for two reasons. One was that we could not pass the bill without it, which is just the same reason that I gave for voting for the bill. The other was that a number of our friends, as some of them appear to-day on the floor, felt that it would not be safe; that the bill upon its face looked like it would bring a deficit. They had not looked at the question of the increased importations that would follow. I consented that a tax on raw sugar might be placed in the bill. That would bring $35,000,000 or $40,000,000.

That tax was placed in the bill, as my friend has read. It was changed, however, but the amount of revenue produced under the changed specifications in the bill will be about the same. The only fact that reconciles me to the duty on sugar is that if we receive forty, fifty, sixty, or seventy-five million dollars more money than we want, we are in debt and can purchase our interest-bearing bonds and extinguished them.

But I prefer to put sugar on the free list, and to do it now. There is no necessity for sending this bill to the Finance Committee. We are in possession of all the facts. A number of us have been dragooned from day to day and week to week and month to month as voting the way we did not believe we ought to vote in accordance with our own private convictions, and because we deferred to others in voting to get a bill that was better than the McKinley law. Now, I ask for a vote on this question in order that we may all show what our convictions were as to this item.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I ask the Senator from Texas a question?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Does the Senator take issue with the Secretary of the Treasury in the statement made by him this morning, and does the Senator hold that there is no necessity for the revenue to be derived from sugar?

Mr. MILLS. I do, most unequivocally.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I understand the Senator to say that he would vote to put sugar on the free list?

Mr. MILLS. I will.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will he do so in the face of the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. MILLS. I tell you the Secretary of the Treasury copies the estimates made by the Finance Committee and they are made on the imports of 1893 and on the duties of the McKinley law. As I have shown, in every instance where we have reformed the tariff and brought the rates of duty down the imports have increased and the revenues have increased.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If I correctly understood the Senator's contention since he began his remarks, it was simply that while we had placed many things on the free list, notably wool, salt, lumber, and other articles, still the bill had been maintained nearly up to the McKinley rates. If that be the case, how is it possible for him to claim a large importation of goods over and above the imports of 1893?

Mr. MILLS. The Senator has got things mixed up. If he will notice the estimates he will find that, taking the importation of 1893 with the rate of taxation existing in 1893, $400,000,000 worth of goods were imported. Now, take the goods which are made dutiable under the bill according to the amount imported in 1893 and we get $179,000,000, when under the McKinley law the amount was $198,000,000. Of course, some of the dutiable articles in the McKinley law are put on the free list, but take these same goods and you will find that the imports will be increased perhaps $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 in value, and then at our rate, say 38 per cent, they will bring over $30,000,000 more than the amount indicated by the Secretary of the Treasury. If you go to the Secretary of the Treasury and ask him he will tell you that he made his estimate on the importations of 1893.

Mr. MCPHERSON. He could make it upon nothing else.

Mr. MILLS. He could make it upon nothing else. He had nothing else to make it on.

Mr. HARRIS. He so states.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I have made these remarks to present the facts to the Senate that we may act intelligently on the question. There is no earthly necessity for any consideration of the bill by a committee. We now have all the facts. These questions were discussed over and over again in this body during the long continued debate on the tariff bill, and I hope my friend from Tennessee will withdraw his motion to refer and let us vote upon this measure.

Mr. HARRIS. With great respect, as I have, for the opinions of the Senator from Texas upon this question, the actual conditions of the Treasury of the United States, the demands upon it and the revenue necessities, I trust, as I know he will pardon me for saying, I shall be governed by the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury as to these necessities and as to the probable revenues derivable from the bill just passed rather than upon his opinions.

Now, I move the reference of these four bills. My motion, to be strictly in order, should refer to each of them separately, and inasmuch as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] has made a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for free sugar, as it may be called, I apply my motion to that bill. I can not withdraw it; believing, as I do, that the proper committee of this body should carefully consider and report the proper method, whatever that may be, of guarding against this apprehended and, as I believe, absolutely certain deficiency if that bill shall pass in the form it comes to us from the other House.

I am in full sympathy with the Senator from Texas. If I felt at liberty to exercise my own judgment and inclinations, independent of revenue necessities, I should go with him; but, as a member of the Finance Committee and as a member of the American Senate, I shall never consent for this Congress to adjourn until we have made such provision as will avoid the bankruptcy of the Treasury and a deficiency of twenty-nine or thirty million dollars. It is the highest of our duties to provide against such deficiency. If the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] will cover that contingency, as I believe it will, and the Senate chooses not to refer to the committee, upon the idea that the Senate knows quite as much as it can be informed by any committee, I shall have no regrets.

I would myself prefer absolutely free sugar, raw and refined, but in view of the present revenue necessities, and in view of the fact that the duties upon coal, the duties upon iron ore, the duties upon barbed wire, and rods to make it, are infinitesimal and cut no figure which is appreciable in respect to this deficiency, we have to deal with sugar in respect of this deficiency. Whether the Senate may choose to deal with it without a reference to the Committee on Finance or not I am not so particular, but in respect to questions such as these I have always deemed it safest for the appropriate committee to consider, and carefully consider, and report to this body the exact method best calculated to accomplish a given and a necessary result.

Let the Senate decide the question as it may as to whether the bill shall be referred or not, but if it is not referred, free-sugar man as I am, in reference to this inevitable deficiency I shall vote to put such a duty on sugar, raw and refined—and I want it to be a straight duty upon both, equal and alike—as will give absolute assurance of furnishing the revenues necessary to meet the demands of the Government. No more than this do I desire to say.

Mr. MILLS. Before taking my seat I wish to state, as I have stated repeatedly here before, in the other House, and in the country, that I am in favor of a tax on sugar, on coffee, on tea, on tropical fruits, and on every article that does not come in competition with anything that is produced in this country, except the materials of manufacture. That I understand to be a tariff for revenue. I have taken that position everywhere.

The only reason why I would favor the repeal of the sugar tax now is that it would be going backward, and, as I said awhile ago, I do not want to go backward. It has been placed on the free list, and I do not want to go back and vote it on the dutiable list, nor do I advocate putting coffee and tea and those other things upon the dutiable list now; but if there was a majority of this body and of the other body in perfect harmony with my views, then I would construct a tariff, and in constructing that tariff I would put a tax on coffee and on tea, and I would put everything that is to be remanufactured on the free list, in order that we might produce our products at the lowest possible cost and drive all rivals before us in all the markets of the world.

Mr. President, for the same reason I would put a tax on sugar, because nine dollars out of every ten would go into the Treasury and only one dollar out of every ten would go into the private pocket of a protected producer; but when you put sugar on the free list, which was done in carrying out the Republican policy, that revenue shall be the incident and protection the principle, and they put a heavy tax on woolen goods in order that nine dollars might go into the pocket of the private producer where one dollar goes into the Treasury.

For these reasons I would put a duty on sugar. But we are not now constructing a Democratic tariff, a tariff for revenue, and such a tariff as the industrial interests of these people require. The time will come when we shall be engaged in that work here in this body, for, if I am not mistaken in the public judgment and public common sense of this country, they are growing stronger in the faith that the best possible condition of the human family is that in which the God of nature placed them, every man to be free, and every man following his own pursuits of happiness in his own way, choosing his own occupation, and government existing alone for the purpose of securing him in the full enjoyment of those rights.

Mr. GRAY. And of keeping the peace.

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, before this matter is disposed of, I wish to make one suggestion in respect to the course which may be, and I think ought to be, taken with this bill. But before doing so I will call a moment's attention to the observations of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], with a view to correct one or two points to which he adduced facts, and of supplementing what he said with some further facts in relation to the passage of the revenue bill. Whenever we hear the charming eloquence of the Senator from Missouri we are captivated and enthralled for the time, and it is almost with difficulty that one is able to direct his attention to facts which are not presented, or reasons which have influenced the actions of others.

The distinguished Senator from Missouri truly said that a caucus of Democratic Senators was called, and that as the end of it the Finance Committee was required to report a bill which should command the assent of 43 Democratic Senators; and at least at that time it was hoped it would command the assent of 44.

Mr. President, let me call attention to the fact that the caucus which charged the Finance Committee with that duty assembled long before the report of the Finance Committee was made to the Senate. The Finance Committee undertook to execute that behest. They did execute it so far as it was in their power to do so. If we can understand the action they took, the fact that they reported a bill implied attempt to discharge the duty imposed upon them.

The bill had come to the Senate on the 2d of February. It was not until the 20th of March, after weeks of labor, that the Finance Committee reported their bill. That bill was then entitled to have had the support of a Democratic majority in the Senate. That bill was, as the Senator from Missouri said, a justifiable bill in its general features, while criticism might be passed upon some points in respect to it. We have been speaking of caucus action, and it is only fair to Democrats, of whose caucus so much has been told, to add that they voted in that caucus for free iron ore, and the bill reported to the Senate did not execute that vote. But upon the general behest to prepare a bill which should command a majority of the Senate, the committee reported the bill with a duty upon iron ore as well as upon coal.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon, but he is entirely mistaken about the facts. There never was but one bill, except the bill which the House has accepted, prepared by the majority of the Finance Committee. That was a bill which I had a moment ago upon my table here, which proposed a duty upon coal, but not a duty upon iron ore. It provided a duty of 50 cents upon coal and made iron ore free. I helped to make that bill and I know every word in it. That bill was carried to the Democratic caucus on the morning we prepared it. The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], had called the Finance Committee together, and notice was served upon us of a caucus.

That was the only bill that ever was presented to a caucus of Democratic Senators. I said nothing in my remarks about the last one. The amendments had all been made and were submitted. I spoke of the caucus at which we presented that bill with a duty of 50 cents on coal and with iron ore free. The bill is in print and the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] has it.

Mr. VILAS. Let me understand the Senator from Missouri. Does he say that he spoke of a caucus after the Finance Committee had reported the bill to the Senate?

Mr. VEST. Oh, no; before the bill was reported to the Senate. There were two caucuses. The bill which I had upon my desk, and which was printed and put in the hands of each member of that caucus, had 50 cents duty on coal, and iron ore free, together with a specific duty on sugar, to which I referred this morning, commencing at 80° by the polariscopic test and going up one-fourth of a cent on the hundred. That was the only bill we presented until the bill which was accepted by the House of Representatives was reported from the committee. The Senator has his dates and facts all wrong.

The second caucus called was in regard to the Jones amendments to the bill as to which we took a vote in the caucus—I will say since the matter has been mentioned—upon iron ore, and the vote stood 18 to 18, if I remember.

Mr. VILAS. I remember it as 19 to 17.

Mr. VEST. I know the vote was very close. Then we were dismissed with the advice to make a bill which could be passed.

Mr. VILAS. Has the Senator from Missouri the bill which was reported by the Finance Committee?

Mr. VEST. I had it a few moments ago, and will procure it for the Senator.

Mr. VILAS. I may be in error in respect to the report of the Finance Committee. It may be easily corrected if I am. Upon that point there ought to be no difference of statement although there is liable to be always a difference of remembrance in respect to a particular fact, which it will be easy enough to correct if I am wrong.

Mr. VEST. I now have the bill and will hand it to the Senator.

Mr. VILAS (examining). This is not the bill as it was reported by the Finance Committee.

Mr. VEST. It is the bill reported by the subcommittee of the Committee on Finance; it is the caucus bill.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri and I are not at difference. He is speaking of a bill which was printed as a mere tentative report of the subcommittee of the Committee on Finance before the time when the caucus was held. I was speaking of the bill which the Finance Committee reported a long time—I shall not say how many days, for I do not remember the date of the caucus—but a long time after the caucus, and the bill of the Finance Committee as reported first to the Senate, the only report the Finance Committee ever made, I am very sure contained a duty of 40 cents a ton on iron ore and a like duty on coal, although the caucus had previously voted for free iron ore, and Senators about me confirm my remembrance.

Mr. VEST. That is a very different statement.

Mr. VILAS. That is the identical statement which I made, and it was with reference to that bill that I was about to remark that if the Finance Committee discharged the duty imposed upon them—and I think they did at that time faithfully and laboriously, and after great labor to do so—the duty then fell upon the Senate to support them; it fell upon the Democrats here to accept the best solution which the Finance Committee had been able to make, at least, and pass the bill in the Senate.

But, sir, all that faded away. Nothing came of it. Why? Because the action of the Finance Committee in the execution of the direction of the Democratic caucus was not accepted by all professing Democrats. From the 20th of March to the 7th of May, a period of forty-eight days, the bill was unfinished business in the Senate, talked about, filibustered against, debated after a fashion which our rules permit under the name of debate, but not a step of advance was made. Why? Because the Finance Committee had not made a Democratic bill? No; it was for the reason given this morning both by the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Texas, that there is no Democratic majority here so far as tariff reform is concerned, which would accept and follow the principles of the party as expressed by its constituted authorities in caucus and in the Finance Committee.

Then came the second caucus, as a result of which a long list of amendments were proposed. I do not wish to review what I said the other day upon that subject nor to repeat; but I desire to ask this of the distinguished Senator from Missouri, as an independent fact which is necessary to my justification and to the justification of the Democratic members on this side of the Senate. I ask him if it was his understanding that the result of that caucus in a request to support those amendments in the Senate was obligatory, or regarded as obligatory, upon members on this side of the Chamber after the time when that bill should pass the Senate and go into conference?

Mr. VEST. Do you want an answer now?

Mr. VILAS. I will thank the Senator to answer.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, my understanding is—I speak for myself alone—that as members of the Democratic party and the caucus we were to support those amendments. I never understood that after we went into conference, and I was a member of that conference committee, that I could agree to nothing except those amendments. In other words, I considered it my duty to carry out the wishes of the Senate as expressed by their votes so far as possible consistent with securing a tariff bill, but no farther. If I had found that any of those amendments by being modified could have secured the passage of any sort of a tariff reform bill, I should have been willing to modify them, and so expressed myself in conference.

Mr. VILAS. I call attention to the fact that the Senator from Missouri did not quite answer the question which I have put to him, but I have no doubt he will. I was not speaking of what might be his opinion of his duty as a member of the conference committee, but whether or not he understood that any obligation upon those who attended that caucus extended beyond the passage of the bill in the Senate?

Mr. VEST. I thought I answered that question. If I did not, I shall do so. I did not think so.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator answers precisely as I thought he would.

I wish to observe another fact and ask the Senator another question, for I know, or I believe I know, he agrees with me upon that subject. After the amendments, known as the Jones amendments, were reported and the bill was thereupon further debated in Committee of the Whole, there was a great number of amendments proposed, and more than 60 distinct and important increases of duty were placed upon that bill in Committee of the Whole; eleven different subjects that had been left upon the free list after all previous action were placed upon the dutiable list in Committee of the Whole. Now, I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri if it was not a common expression which he and other Senators of the Finance Committee made use of, which passed continually among Democratic Senators on this side of the Chamber, that this bill was to be made in conference and that none of those amendments were to be regarded as obligatory or binding upon us, but would be corrected in conference?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I will state frankly that my idea in regard to those amendments was that they were to be changed in conference if it were possible. There were a great many amendments put upon the bill, which I supposed we could afterwards get rid of in conference, and some of them were put on with the distinct understanding that they could be changed in conference. I never understood that when we adopted those amendments they were to remain there without regard to the consequences upon the measure. The result in conference, as a matter of course, was governed by circumstances, about which I knew nothing and could have known nothing at that time.

I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin, if I understand him, that there were amendments which were put on that we hoped to get rid of. I could name a great many of them that we hoped to get rid of in conference, but it so eventuated that we could not do it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think the Senator from Missouri ought to add in connection with his statement that about that class of amendments there would have been no difficulty in correcting them in conference if other things could have been agreed to.

Mr. VEST. That is true.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, one other thing ought to be understood here if we are having a plain talk about the facts, and that is that most of those amendments, if not all of them—no, perhaps not all, but nearly all—were made at the instance of Senators upon the other side of the Chamber, and were made with the expectation that they were not to be defended and fought for in conference, at least to some extent. I do not know as to what number of them that would be true, but it was true as to a considerable number.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the Senator passes from that statement, I want to say that I had no such understanding as he now states.

Mr. VILAS. I do not remember whether the Senator from Iowa had any amendments made or not.

Mr. ALLISON. I had one made, but I had no understanding that it was to be surrendered at any time or under any circumstances.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I have had no understandings of the sort, but I am only speaking of reports and conversations current on this side of the Chamber.

Now, I wish to draw attention to the facts, or to the inference which is properly to be drawn from these facts. And, first, let me observe that it is the explanation of the votes that were given on this side of the Chamber by Senators who were ready to trust the Finance Committee in their leadership of this bill, but who, except for their confidence in a justification by the final result, would have been unwilling to have gone on assenting to those amendments, I think all of them, or nearly all of any great significance.

Take the amendments that were put on in reference to wool. I wish I had at hand the documents by which I could show the effect of those amendments. The Senate would never have accepted them.

I do not care to attack the bill which has passed; I do not care to carry forward for a moment any controversy among ourselves; "Let the dead Past bury its dead;" but, sir, I can not permit the statements which have been made to go without calling attention to these very important and significant facts upon which turns the justification of Democratic Senators on this side, men who have been sincere and honest in their belief that this system of taxation, which has failed so far of redress, is an iniquity and an injustice upon the people of the United States.

I wish right here to make another remark, for the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], I am sorry to say, felt it permissible to cast some animadversions upon the President. Just these facts here disclosed, and the others stated by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] some days ago, completely exonerate the President from any obligation to the Senate bill, and that ought to be told as it has been now plainly told. He constantly expressed his wish and hope that the bill when made in conference, as it was to be made, as it was expected to be made, by Democratic conferees in fidelity to Democratic principles, would carry to the extent claimed the principle of free raw materials.

The Senator from Missouri began by saying the President accused the Senate of party perfidy. The letter does not bear that interpretation.

The President spoke only to a conferee on the part of the House, in a private letter, a conferee who had been foremost in championship of the cause of free raw materials, when he said that in that particular conjuncture of affairs to abandon that cause would be party perfidy and party dishonor. He did not put it to him in personal terms, but simply said that the abandonment of the cause would be such perfidy and dishonor. There was no accusation of the Senator from Missouri, and I am astonished and regret that he should assume to believe that he could be accused of party perfidy or party dishonor by reason of any effort which he made here to pass the bill through the Senate, or that any other man, who has been so honestly and zealously laboring to bring about that result, could be so accused.

Mr. HARRIS. In view of the most kindly relations which exist between the Senator from Wisconsin and myself, I regret to interrupt him; but he stated a few minutes since that the Democratic Senators had trusted the Finance Committee, and I beg to know whether he meant to be understood as saying that the committee had in any sense, to any extent, or in any way, betrayed the trust which the Democratic Senators reposed in them?

Mr. VILAS. I will presently speak to the point to which the Senator from Tennessee calls attention.

Mr. HARRIS. I will wait patiently until it suits the convenience of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. VILAS. I was not speaking with the view of accusing members of the Finance Committee——

Mr. HARRIS. I did not quite understand the Senator's reference to the trust which the Democratic Senators had reposed in the committee, and then I thought he somewhat complained of their action.

Mr. VILAS. No; I did not. What I was saying was that the members of the party on this side of the Chamber did place their trust in the Finance Committee and its leadership, and therefore they voted, as they did in special and particular cases, against the principles they would have supported or what the principles they supported would have required of them.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I will state that the Democratic members of the Finance Committee did the same thing under the absolute necessities which confronted them.

Mr. VILAS. Yes, sir; precisely. I made that statement with a view of explaining the basis of our action.

I am going to make a remark in respect to the way in which the bill was passed. The Senator from Missouri asked if anyone in the Senate believed that the Wilson bill would have passed the Senate. I am perfectly sincere in saying that I do not. I have not believed it. If I had believed it I should not have consented to a single amendment increasing a duty above that reported by the Wilson bill, and I should have been glad to have had many duties lower than the Wilson bill provided.

To the point to which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] called my attention I will make this observation. Those Senators assigned to conference failed to agree with the House conferees. I do not know, except as I have heard shadowy reports outside, and some statements by conferees, what took place or why they failed to agree. I do not know upon what basis our expections for a better bill were disappointed, except that the Senator from Missouri has said that it was because the conferees believed they could pass nothing else through the Senate.

I have but one criticism upon that, and that criticism I desire to make openly and plainly, since the Senator from Tennessee has called my attention to the matter. I by no means impute to him or to any of these honorable gentlemen any motive different from that which ought to govern a man of honor, but I do not believe they ought to have subjected all of us to the consequences of that fear without giving it a trial in the Senate. There is the point which I make.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me for a moment? My answer to the suggestion of the Senator is this. When I was informed by individuals who had the power to defeat the passage of the bill as originally reported by the Senate committee or as it came from the other House, and I was informed that it could pass and could only pass by certain concessions, and in good faith we agreed to make those concessions in order to harmonize and unify the elements necessary to its passage and thereby acquired power to pass the bill, which is a vast improvement upon the existing law, though not what the Democratic members of the Finance Committee would have desired, and not what the majority of the Democrats on this side of the Chamber would have desired, does the Senator from Wisconsin assume that having entered upon such an agreement and it having been carried out in good faith by the other side, we were at liberty to throw it off, ignore and abandon it because it was not exactly consistent with our views? If he does, he and I entertain very different opinions as to the obligations of an honorable agreement.

Mr. VILAS. I do not believe——

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to make a statement?

Mr. VILAS. I should like to make one observation.

Mr. VEST. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I should like to make a statement.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to make an answer to the Senator from Tennessee first, and then I will give way.

I desire very particularly to state, and I may refer here to the friendly and pleasant personal relations between the Senator from Tennessee and myself, which I am sure will not be broken by any difference between us in respect to what our duty requires of us in the Senate——

Mr. HARRIS. I certainly hope not.

Mr. VILAS. That from my intimate knowledge of his character I could conceive of no such thing as his abandoning or breaking an agreement; and I do not believe that the Senator from Tennessee imagines that I would either do it myself or would suspect it of him.

Mr. VEST. Now, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I thought I had stated clearly this morning, but perhaps it was obscurely stated, that the difficulty all the time between the House conferees and the Senate conferees consisted in the fact that the House conferees seemed to think, like the Senator from Wisconsin, that we exaggerated the obstacles in the way of passing in the Senate any bill that might be reported from the conference. Finally, all the Senate conferees agreed in the offer to the House conferees that we would come back and submit to our respective Houses the disagreement between us and allow the respective bodies to vote upon those disagreements.

We repeatedly stated to the House conferees, "If you doubt our judgment in regard to this matter, all of us being anxious to pass a tariff bill, let us go back to the Senate and report the action we have taken, and the fact that we are unable to agree, and let the Senate instruct us;" and they refused to allow us to do it. Finally, speaking for myself alone, I said to the House conferees, "Write out your report; I will not even read it. I will sign it and go back to the Senate and take the result, and you gentlemen can then be satisfied whether we are fighting a shadow or whether we understand the real condition of affairs among our colleagues."

There never was a more unjust statement than that made by the Senator from Wisconsin. We exhausted every proposition in order to get the bill back into the Senate, to report a disagreement, to report a general disagreement, to report what we had done, and then report specifically what we had disagreed about. They said, "No; we have the power to prevent any such report, and it can not be made."

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from Missouri will add that the conferees on the part of the Senate offered to the House conferees to make any report which they thought they would be willing to intrust to the chances of passing and that the conferees on the part of the Senate would agree to such a report being made, certainly there can be no criticism in respect to it. But I do not understand from the statement which the Senator has made that that was offered on the part of the Senate conferees, but that it was only an expression of personal willingness on his part.

Mr. VEST. I stated distinctly that the Senate conferees offered to report a disagreement, a general disagreement or a report of the progress we had made in agreeing, and then the points on which we disagreed, and let the Senate vote upon it. We of course did not say to the conferees as a body "Make out your report and we will accept it and go to the Senate." That would have been absurd, although for myself I was willing to come here with any report at all, in order to show the world that the House did not understand the situation and that we did.

Mr. VILAS. I have no desire to enter into any criticism upon the action of the Senate conferees. I desire only to state the justification for our action during the progress of the bill on this side of the Chamber. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] invited me, impliedly, to state what I thought about it, and I felt bound to do it. I can only say this, in further justification of the remark, that I myself am not happy under the idea that there is or was some specter, undefinable, intangible, unnamable, that should have frightened the Senate and the House of Representatives into the acceptance of a bill with all those sixty amendments put on here as in Committee of the Whole, in superaddition to those which were reported by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], and which we undertook to pass into conference with hope of improvement there.

Mr. President, I do not propose to prolong any discussion of the methods by which the bill was passed. I know, and do not question, the personal honor of the men who were especially engaged in trying to pass the bill. Criticism can be made, explanation of the position which the rest of us were placed in can be made, without any imputation of that kind upon any of them. We are not talking here of personal action. We are talking of party duty and the maintenance of party principles; and I am sure the Senator from Missouri will not claim, whatever may be the gain of the bill that has passed over the McKinley law, that it comes near to being the fulfillment of the pledges of the Democratic party to the people, which we hope yet to meet in time.

I am unwilling to let it go, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] stated in his speech, that we are settling the tariff measure for twenty years by the passage of this bill. I am not willing to let it go that this meets my sense of obligation as a Democrat, my sense of obligation as the servant of Democrats, who has often appealed to the people to support these measures of tariff reform. It is true something has been gained. I do most profoundly hope that it is more than I have supposed it to be from the examination I have made.

I wish it had been vastly more than it is; and while I agree that the Wilson bill could not have been passed, I can not yet discharge myself from the belief that something better could have been done than what we have done. Yet in that I am perhaps unsupported by the opinions of others; it may be merely an erroneous individual belief. At all events the Senate in its majority and the House of Representatives have acknowledged the justification of fear, and the bill has been therefore passed.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. Is the Senator from Wisconsin of the opinion that the Wilson bill, so called, as it passed the House, was a bill which presented to the country a measure of full tariff reform as he and I understand tariff reform?

Mr. VILAS. No, sir; I wish it had. I myself would have been far better pleased to have seen the bill come from the House of Representatives constructed on the principle on which the Walker tariff of 1846 stood. I would have been far better pleased to have seen a bill brought here which was everything that a Democrat could wish for. I believe it would have had a better chance of passage. Oh, no, Mr. President, let us have no misunderstanding on that matter. The Democratic party has lost such an opportunity, it seems to me, as in the providence of God is offered to man or parties but seldom in the history of the world.

While I lament it, while I feel, and do not attempt to conceal my regret, that we have not done more, I by no means undertake thereby to say that we have not done much. The Democratic party in the nation understand by this time, I believe, the situation in which we stood. I hope they understand the paralysis which the rules of the Senate give it in the power of any minority to inflict upon its action. I hope they understand by this time with what constancy of effort, with what humiliation, almost, we have bowed our necks in faithful desire to pass a bill that will give them as much relief as it was possible for us to obtain from those who were preventing so far as they could the passage of any bill. Upon that belief, upon that hope, I stand alone for justification before my countrymen for having contributed to a union of effort by support of some duties that I never could have justified except because thus, and thus only, could we gain anything from the enemy intrenched in power and possession.

I have been led into extending the observations that I desired to make, preliminarily to what I wish specially to urge, much beyond what I originally intended. It seems to me that now is the opportunity for us. The Senate, if we can judge by the expression elicited when the first conference report was under discussion, is not, on either side of it, ready to defend a special and particular duty in favor of the sugar trust. We are now given the opportunity to deal with it, and no longer does the safety of the tariff bill, with all its various features of beneficence, stand involved in the attempt to correct the iniquitous advantages given to that great trust. Let us, therefore, take up the pending bill, and if we can not remove the duty upon sugar, let us amend the measure and place the duty upon sugar where it ought to be.

Mr. GRAY. A revenue duty.

Mr. VILAS. A revenue duty upon sugar, without one single particle of gift to a great monopoly, and above all things without winning the hand of corporate greed with any of the great powers of government to levy taxes upon every home and every family in this land.

It is easy to deal with this subject. We need no reference of the bill to the Finance Committee. The Senator from Missouri, himself a member of the Finance Committee, has well expressed that. We need no further incubation out of the Senate.

Right here, under the light of day and the witness of all who may assemble to observe our action, let us take the bill, and leaving the duty on sugar as a revenue duty or fixing it where you will, let us eliminate from it, by suitable amendment, all these advantages given to the sugar-trust monopoly, and send it back to the House of Representatives. And I aver my belief that when that action shall be taken there will be a cry of rejoicing from the people of this country from one end to the other, not Democrats alone, but Republicans as well, that at last their great Government, their Congress with its two Houses, is not the servile dependent of a sugar trust or any other monopoly in the land.

Mr. President, was a motion made for the present consideration of this bill, or was it withdrawn?

Mr. BERRY. I made the motion, and I did not withdraw it. I made the motion that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. VILAS. Then that motion was made before the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will answer the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin, if he desires.

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from Arkansas has not answered it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not hear the remark of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I stated to the Senator from Wisconsin that I made a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill now on the table, calling it by number. Thereupon the Senator from Tennessee moved to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that under the rules the motion of the Senator from Tennessee takes precedence. The rule can be read if there is any question about it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President——

Mr. VILAS. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether, in the event the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance should fail, he favors the passage of the bill as it came from the other House, or whether he proposes to put some kind of a duty upon sugar?

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I have no concealment of my opinions on this subject. Sugar is a fair subject for a revenue duty, and when that duty shall be laid in fair and moderate measure so that none but the Treasury of the United States shall derive the gain which comes from it except so far as it is impossible to withhold incidental protection to the fields of agriculture, I have no doubt the people of the United States will willingly and cheerfully pay it. They will gladly pay it rather than be bestridden by this Man of the Sea.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me, I will say, with all deference, that is hardly an answer to my question. I am in favor of the passage of the bill as it came from the other House. I am not in favor of the passage of a bill putting any kind of a duty on sugar, and my vote on the motion to refer might be influenced somewhat if I were fully advised as to the intention of parties on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. VILAS. I do not know what may be the opinion of others on the subject. For my own part I think a revenue duty on sugar is proper. I would, however, rather than have the trust profit to the extent of millions, abandon sugar as a subject of revenue duty. But I do not think it is necessary to take that course in order to relieve ourselves. We may obliterate from the law the differential duties in favor of this gigantic monopoly and leave a revenue duty that shall give no protection but that which will go to a class of people who, as a whole, pay the tariff duties and do not enjoy them—the agricultural class of the country.

Therefore I was about to make a remark, but the President of the Senate anticipated me. I thought that a motion to take up a bill for consideration was not debatable, and therefore when it was made, except debate proceeded by unanimous consent, it was necessary that a vote should be immediately taken upon it.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I will state that a motion could not be made to take up the bill until it has reached the Calendar, but before it reached the Calendar the Senator from Tennessee intervened with a motion to refer, which takes precedence in that way, and the motion to refer is debatable.

Mr. VILAS. Can a debatable motion be made upon the top of a nondebatable motion, and thus debate be opened?

Mr. FAULKNER. The order of precedence of motions is laid down in the rule.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that the motion to refer takes precedence of the other motion, and is the first motion in order.

Mr. VILAS. I do not conceive that it makes any difference in what order we vote, so that there is an intelligent understanding of what we mean to do. If we vote to refer the bill (and I mean no imputation at all upon the Finance Committee when I say it) I think we vote to do what the distinguished member of that committee who sits near me [Mr. VEST] said we thereby should to bury it or hide it, or put it beyond possibility of immediate action at the present session of Congress. Therefore, those who are willing to make this effort to take off the tentacles of this gigantic sugar trust from the Senate and the people of the country will vote against a reference and in favor of the consideration of the bill.

Mr. FAULKNER. Before the Senator from Wisconsin sits down, as my mind is leaning in the direction of voting in favor of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, and yet I stand very much on the line he has been discussing, I should like him to state to the Senate in a way to satisfy me that a vote to refer means the killing of this bill. By what authority, after the declaration of the Senator from Tennessee, does the Senator make that statement to the country? I understood the Senator from Tennessee to say that he would call the committee together at once, and if there was any question about the matter, the political division being equal in the committee, if it divided on party lines, within one hour after that division he would see that the Democrats had a majority of the committee. Now, after that statement, upon what authority does the Senator from Wisconsin state that there will be no action by the committee?

Mr. VILAS. I do not make that statement upon authority, though if I sought to obtain it the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is sufficient authority to justify the opinion. But upon a very few circumstances or reasons, which can be readily presented, I base that idea. If it is necessary for the bill to go to the Finance Committee at all, after the months of instruction which we have had here by our mutual debate, it is necessary that it should go there for some time; it is necessary that it should go there for reflection and study, perhaps again to struggle with the idea whether the bill can be passed or not, or what amendment is necessary to pass it. That will take time. The moment we fail to act on this measure, that moment we shall see our quorum disappear and our power to dispose of it at all at the present session will go with it. Now, while we have the Senate present, a Senate instructed in this business, able to cope with it to-day as well as to-morrow, without as well as after a Finance Committee's report, let us proceed to deal with this subject and discharge our obligation to the country.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, if no other gentleman on the other side of the aisle desires to unfold the secrets of that great charnel house know as the Democratic party, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DOLPH. I hope the Senator will allow an executive session and withdraw his motion.

Mr. MANDERSON. Very well.

Mr. CALL. I hope neither motion will be insisted upon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the second report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 217) to continue the provisions of existing laws providing temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 2303 to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Contentnea Creek, at Grifton, Lenoir County, N. C., and establish it as a post-road;

A joint resolution (S. R. 96) to extend the charter of the Maryland and Washington Railway Company; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 217) to continue the provisions of existing laws providing temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of July 24, 1894, information as to the percentage of the enlisted men, noncommissioned and commissioned officers of the regular Army of the United States who are aliens, and what percentage are citizens of the United States by birth or naturalization; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DOLPH. With the consent of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Oregon to withdraw that motion while I ask the consideration by the Senate of a resolution which was reported adversely by the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. DOLPH. Very well.

Mr. BERRY. I shall have to object to the consideration of the resolution the Senator from Florida desires to call up. I want to have the question determined whether we are going to settle this free-sugar proposition before any other thing is interjected into it. I am compelled, therefore, to object to the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the resolution called up by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. MANDERSON. I renew my motion.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Nebraska yielded to me a moment ago that I might move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no objection to that. I yield for an executive session.

Mr. GRAY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, upon which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay," and I suppose he would vote "yea."

Mr. GORDON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. McLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and vote "nay."

Mr. McPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PLATT. My colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], I believe.

Mr. FAULKNER (after having voted in the negative). I did not know that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] had left the Chamber. He said he would leave some time to-day.

Mr. PLATT. He has gone.

Mr. FAULKNER. Under those circumstances, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN]. Having ascertained that if he were present he would vote "yea," I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the negative). I voted "nay," but I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who I see is not present and has not voted. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. PASCO. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER].

Mr. HARRIS. Then I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], who is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], that we transfer our respective pairs.

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. I vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY. I vote "yea."

Mr. CALL. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], but with the privilege of voting on this question. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN].

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 34; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I simply desire to say that the motion I made has no reference whatever to the pending measure. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] was about to move an adjournment. There was some executive business that I thought should be transacted, and obtaining his consent, I moved an executive session. If it is the desire of the Senate to discuss the pending measure I shall certainly be very glad to have it done, and if I get a chance to vote upon the House bill relating to sugar, I shall vote for the bill as it came from the other House.

Mr. PALMER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 5645, which is a bridge bill.

Mr. BERRY. I object to any bill called up by anyone until the sugar matter is disposed of. Let us have a vote on the pending motion.

FREE SUGARS, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to refer to the Committee on Finance the bill (H. R. 7971) to exempt from duty sugars, molasses, etc.

Mr. PALMER. As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] declines to allow the consideration of the bill I wished to call up, I will for a few moments turn my attention to the consideration of what might be fairly called the pending measure.

The tariff bill now in the hands of the President received the vote of every Democratic Senator except the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. It is a Democratic measure. I voted for that bill and for most of the amendments, and I accept the distinct responsibility of having done so. I have no apologies to make here for any vote I gave. Whatever apologies or explanations I may hereafter undertake to make, I will make to those to whom I am responsible. I voted as in Committee of the Whole for nearly all the amendments. I voted for the bill on its final passage in this body. I am, I repeat, responsible for my votes, and I am surprised that Senators decline that proper responsibility.

Mr. President, I am not a party leader, and I am glad that I am not. I have been a soldier in a very small way, and I have read something of military history. Napier, in the marvelous account he gives of the Peninsula campaign, says that the cry of save yourself was never heard in the English army, but he says that in the French army the French expression equivalent to it was often heard. I have never on any occasion used the cry, "save yourself," or "save myself." I voted for the measure with my Democratic friends, and whatever responsibilities may result from it I accept without the slightest hesitation.

I do not regard the bill as perfect. It is obnoxious to some of the objections which have been urged by Democratic Senators; but I shall expect to hear those objections sufficiently urged within a short time by those who are opposed to the bill. I am not disposed to furnish them any material myself, if I could do so. Even though my humble share might be beneficial to them, I am not disposed to vouch it now. All that can be said for the bill is that it is a very great improvement over the law which it is to supersede, and that is glory enough.

We talk about the pledges of the Democratic party during the last campaign. What were those pledges? So far as I am concerned, the pledge I made to the people was to exert myself to secure the best possible tariff bill, based upon the principle of a tariff for revenue only. That the bill which has been passed falls short of the perfect realization of that purpose may be admitted, but we have done what we could in that direction.

Neither do I agree with gentlemen who say that there is not a Democratic majority in the Senate. There is. I know of no authority to impose any cast-iron rule upon Democratic Senators or Democrats in either public or private life.

Gentlemen here have presented their opinions, they have urged them, and they have stood by them. The majority members of the Committee on Finance exerted themselves with a fidelity to principle, with a devotion to the opinions of the majority of the Senate to an extent that is worthy of all praise. They accomplished the very best possible results, and what more can be expected? They have simply expressed the views of the Democrats in this body. It is true our private opinions were expressed to them. It was their task to have a bill passed which would be the best possible approximation to a perfect bill in the conception of those who claim to be masters of the science. They had done that.

It is true my eloquent friend from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] says an offering has been made to the sugar trust. Mr. President, this is not the first time it has been done. Let the act that will be superseded by the bill just passed be examined and it will be found that there are large concessions in it to special interests. In the canvasses that have occurred since 1890 we have charged it, and we have demonstrated it. That the bill recently passed should have a particular blemish is not surprising. Special interests have great power.

I return again to the original proposition. We have done the very best that could be done. Think of the condition in which we were placed. I repeat that it is a Democratic measure. The Democratic party is entitled to all the credit that can possibly be derived from it. The Democratic party must accept all the blame.

Mr. President, I have made it the rule of my life never to complain, publicly at least. Whatever little private swearing I may have done on my own account, I have never complained of that which I intended to submit to. I must confess that my party leaders with their needless confessions, I think, with their gratuitous confessions of imperfections in the bill are going far beyond the wisdom that should characterize party leaders.

Mr. President, I think this is about what I wish to say in this connection. I have no disposition, I may remark by the way, to go into the history of party controversies over this question. I doubt the wisdom of these disclosures; I doubt the propriety of these discussions of what took place before the conference committee. I am sure so far they have done no good, and I am sure that neither of the gentlemen who represented the Democratic side of the Senate have any reason to suppose a defense of their conduct is in any possible sense necessary. They need no defense; and whatever they have said in defending themselves or any explanation they have made I think is the result of extreme sensibility, because I think that we know and the country knows how faithfully and earnestly they have exerted themselves to secure the best possible result. The conference committee knew very well what the difficulties were; the conference committee recognized them, and it dealt fairly with us and dealt fairly with the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives. The result has been realized so far as our votes go.

I say all these measures are to be tested not by any absolute rule. I wish I could get some cast-iron mode, some cast-iron form of a tariff bill. I should like to see the production even in mere delineation. These measures are good or bad as they are compared with what precedes or what may follow. The Senator from Missouri to-day enumerated the great results which have been accomplished when we have struck at the foundation of the whole doctrine of protection.

Mr. President, the abolition of the tariff on wool is of itself a triumph. I hope my friends will allow me to say that it used to be said in Illinois before the war and during the war that if a man had an interest in a negro, however small, it necessarily made him sympathize with the Southern Confederacy; and wool has been the very type, the shibboleth of protection. We have step after step stricken it down; we have destroyed that method by which the protectionists have captured the farmers of the West.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would it interrupt the Senator if I were to call his attention to a little matter in that connection?

Mr. PALMER. Not in the slightest. Nothing ever disturbs me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Here is a dispatch from Ottawa, Ontario, dated August 14, which says:

> At last we Canada wool men will have an opportunity of selling our goods in the United States. For the past eighteen months we have had to grin and bear it; now we have a chance of getting even.

Does the Senator think that removing the tariff on wool and permitting the woolgrowers of Ontario to take possession of our markets will help the farmers of the United States?

Mr. PALMER. I have an answer to the Senator from New Hampshire that does not cost me an effort. If the Canadians will bring their woolens into Illinois and sell them cheaper than the manufacturers of New England, in God's name let them come.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is in reference to raw wool.

Mr. PALMER. Let them bring in the raw wool.

Mr. GALLINGER. And blot out the sheep industry of Illinois?

Mr. PALMER. Never. That is one of the humbugs of this whole controversy. It has been argued again and again that sheep can not be raised without some protection, some help. The sheep industry would be benefited by cheap wool.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will allow me—I do not wish to trespass upon his time—if wool is raised in Canada and brought into Illinois, and if woolen goods are manufactured in Canada and brought into Illinois and displace both wool and the woolen manufactures in Illinois, how are the people of Illinois to be benefited by that? Will they not be damaged?

Mr. PALMER. The Senator says "if." If the Senator will affirm that those things will certainly follow, then I shall contradict him as emphatically as politeness will allow.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what this telegram from Ontario says. Will the Senator also permit me to read a statement from one of our consuls in Scotland covering substantially the same matter?

Mr. PALMER. I shall consider it as having been read, as I understand it covers the same matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well; I shall read it in my own time when I get the opportunity.

Mr. PALMER. It will afford me the greatest satisfaction to hear it.

Mr. President, the age of humbug is rapidly passing away, and the day has passed in this country when people can be deceived by this humbug protection. It is claimed that wool can not be raised without protection, and the same claim has been made for every other product. One of the successes of the tariff bill recently passed is in the destruction of that miserable delusion which has kept the sheep-growers of the West attached to the protectionist party.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Illinois kindly allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PALMER. With the greatest satisfaction in the world.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is the Senator now approving, defending, or opposing the bill which has surreptitiously passed recently in regard to the tariff?

Mr. PALMER. Am I approving it?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; or is the Senator opposing it? I do not understand exactly what the Senator's position is?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Or apologizing for it?

Mr. ALDRICH. Or is the Senator apologizing for it?

Mr. PALMER. I shall answer that question so fully that the Senator, even though he is from Rhode Island, in my opinion can not err. I approve the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Which one?

Mr. PALMER. I mean the bill in the hands of the President.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not know whether the Senator meant the bill which is now pending or the one which has been passed.

Mr. PALMER. I think the Senator is not quite so ignorant as he professes to be.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is a bill on the table for putting barbed wire on the free list.

Mr. PALMER. I approve that, because it also provides for the free admission of the material of which barbed wire is made.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from Illinois, then, approves both bills. One puts barbed wire on the free list and the other puts a duty upon it; and yet the Senator approves both.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I do approve both as stated. [Laughter.] I approve them upon the principle that I had rather take a cup of coffee than a dose of salts.

Mr. ALDRICH. Which is the cup of coffee and which is the dose of salts?

Mr. PALMER. The McKinley law is the dose of salts. The Senator ought to know that without being told.

I have said already that the value of such measures is to be determined by comparison. I have said that I approve the bill now before the President. I regard it as one not perfect, but one which admits of improvement. I should regard the bill proposing to abrogate the duty upon sugar as a great improvement.

Mr. BUTLER. Did the Senator ever know of a tariff bill which could not be improved? I have never seen one which could not.

Mr. PALMER. I have just asked for a cast-iron form of a tariff bill, or the picture of it. I should regard the barbed-wire bill as an improvement; I should regard the bill proposing to remove the duty upon iron as an improvement; I should regard the bill removing the duty upon coal as an improvement, but, with all that, I regard the bill as it is as an infinite improvement over the law which it proposes to repeal. By its provisions we get rid of the infamy of a bounty on sugar.

There is nothing in the history of legislation so indicative of corruption, and never was an attempt made by any party in the world to corrupt a whole section such as was the imposition of the sugar bounty of 1890. Look at it; think of the effect of it. I speak not now of the Louisana Senators; I speak of the Populists. The Populists, as I understand them, are free traders, are in sympathy with us, and yet the bounty upon sugar has embarrassed those gentleman to an extent which is pitiable. Although there were improvements, changes in the tariff much to their advantage, yet they were—I shall not say bribed, I shall not say corrupted, but yet they cling to this miserable bounty, and their known opposition to this bill has been one of the embarrassments which stood in the way of its final passage.

Mr. KYLE. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me just one word?

Mr. PALMER. With great pleasure.

Mr. KYLE. I wish to say for the Populist Senators in this Chamber that they are in favor of fulfilling every moral contract made by the United States Government with the humblest of its citizens. That is their position.

Mr. PALMER. Does my friend from South Dakota put that upon the ground of contract alone?

Mr. KYLE. Upon the ground of contract alone. Ab initio I am not in favor of the bounty system.

Mr. PALMER. The question of ethics involved in this is one which I shall not now discuss; but I think my friends the Populists are a good deal like other people; they insist upon the absolute and perfect fulfillment of every bargain where they have the long end of it. [Laughter.] But I doubt, with great respect to my friend, whether they would have been so conscientious about a bargain which operated in favor of other people.

It can be said with equal confidence that manufacturing establishments have been constructed in New England, in New York, in New Jersey, in Pennsylvania, in Illinois, in which large investments have been made upon the faith of the McKinley law; and if the judgment of those persons were to control Congress it would be but a little while until all the powers of Congress over revenue questions would be held to be irrevocably abandoned on the score of some moral contract.

Mr. KYLE. I presume the Senator from Illinois, then, is in about the same category as the Populists.

Mr. PALMER. I should be willing to be like them in many respects.

Mr. KYLE. I understand the Senator is a free trader upon general principles, but when it comes to barbed wire he is not a free trader, but wishes to protect the barbed-wire interests in Illinois.

Mr. PALMER. I confess I am somewhat like a citizen of Maine who said he was in favor of the Maine liquor law, but against its enforcement. [Laughter.] I have explained myself fully on that point, I trust. When I have expressed my satisfaction with the bill which has passed the House that ought to acquit me, at least so far as I need an acquittal, but I need to be acquitted of nothing. About half my lifetime was spent in proving my consistency, and I regard that portion of my life as having been substantially thrown away. [Laughter.] From this time forth no Senator, no friend of mine, can stop my mouth by any testimony that I have given by my past acts. I am trying to do the best I can now. If I erred in the past, I have repented thoroughly.

But that has been the effect of the bounty, and although my friends the Populists had in the bill which has passed provisions which were largely in the interest of their people, although the whole country will feel the benefit of them at no distant day, still the bounty was not there, and because the bounty was not there our friends would not even accept the very great advantages which were offered them by the bill.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to have one word just there.

Mr. PALMER. With pleasure.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to ask whether the Senator from Illinois does not recognize the justice of paying the bounty to the sugar growers for the present year?

Mr. PALMER. I do.

Mr. KYLE. That is all the Populists contend for.

Mr. PALMER. But, Mr. President, I do not put it upon the ground of a debt. I felt, and I feel yet, that the retention of that bounty was too much to pay, or rather we could not sacrifice all which that bill contained for the sake of the bounty.

Mr. KYLE. But we could sacrifice the honor of the American people to the sugar trust.

Mr. PALMER. I do not quite understand what my friend, the Senator from South Dakota, means by the sugar trust and sacrificing the honor of the American people to the sugar trust. May I ask the Senator what he means by that?

Mr. KYLE. I mean the granting of the differential of one-eighth of 1 cent per pound on sugar.

Mr. GEORGE. They have a half cent now.

Mr. PALMER. I understand that under the present law they get more.

Mr. HARRIS. It gives them 60 cents on the hundred pounds.

Mr. PALMER. So I am told; and the difference is altogether in favor of the consumer, as I understand. I was told by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana that even the sugar producer derived a very considerable benefit from that same one-eighth differential.

But, Mr. President, I said sometime ago, and I repeat it, that I expected to pay a large price to get rid of the bounty. It did not make much difference to me into whose pocket the money went. We had to buy the exemption from the bounty on sugar, and had to pay for it. The bounty, as I said before, had demoralized South Dakota, it had demoralized Nebraska, and we had to buy out the representatives from those States where they raised cane and beets. Somebody has said they had us by the throat. They said, "Give us bounty," not "your life or your bounty," but "You can have no bill that will reform the tariff unless you pay for it by a bounty."

Mr. KYLE. Then, according to that statement, the Senator finally concluded that it was cheaper to buy the sugar trust than to buy the Populist Senators?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, I did do that, too. The price is much less, I confess. [Laughter.] I have said in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] in another connection, when my people have to buy, I want them to buy where the thing is to be bought the cheapest. But the great point was to buy out of this bounty, and we had to pay that price for it, unless we can get rid of it by the passage of the bill now before us.

Mr. President, I have been betrayed into criticisms upon the bill that I did not intend to indulge in. There is nothing in this matter for recrimination among Democrats. We have differed in opinion about the provisions of the tariff bill. Gentlemen whose Democracy will never be questioned have entertained one view of the question—I need not name them—and another gentleman, who need not be named, and whose boast it is "I am a Democrat," has voted against this bill. [Laughter.] We have found him not opposing it on all grounds, but at all points. So it is not fair to say that gentlemen who differ about these things are not Democrats.

I propose to go home and tell the people of Illinois—for they are very sensible people—"The House passed a bill which was confessedly imperfect"—perhaps I ought not to say "confessedly"—"and the Senate received that bill. There were a number, whom I need not name, who favored a different bill from that which has passed; some Democrats felt that they could not in conscience vote for the bill under any aspect of the case; that was the situation; and we have presented you a bill"—that is, if the President shall think proper to sign it [laughter], and that is a matter about which I do not, of course, know anything—"at all events the House and the Senate have passed a bill, and I take for myself the full and absolute responsibility for every provision of that bill. You may think that I erred; no doubt I did; but I will give you the reasons why I did it."

Mr. President, I want to say, in conclusion, that aside from the people of the State of Illinois, whose confidence I had once, and I hope to retain it, although I expect it will cost me some explanations [laughter], I am responsible to no earthly being. I am simply doing the very best I can, and I am willing to take the consequences. If any Senator here thinks that he needs explanation, in God's name let him make it. I need none. I have done the best I could; I have done my duty; I will take the responsibility, and I have no complaints to make of any Senator on either side.

The gentlemen on the other side have fought us steadily. They must be answerable for that. We have been somewhat divided, but do not let us aggravate the trouble by any controversies here. If we are going to have any fight, let us retire to a private room. Indeed, I understand we had a caucus, but I think the divisions there have been so far exposed that it might as well have been had out of doors.

Mr. CAREY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PALMER. With great pleasure.

Mr. CAREY. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois whether he is favor of the repeal of the bill as passed by the Senate in whole or in part before the President signs it.

Mr. PALMER. Neither. I want to answer that so distinctly that the Senator can not misunderstand it. I am in favor of neither. I am in favor of improving the bill, whether the President signs it or not.

Mr. CAREY. Then, the agreement on the part of forty-three Senators on the other side did not go any further than simply getting the bill through; that is, you propose to fool some people on your side of the Chamber.

Mr. GRAY. Oh, no.

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator means by that question to ask me whether I mean to fool anybody or not, I hope he will pardon me for not answering. If the Senator means to use an appellation, I hope he will still pardon me for declining to answer.

Mr. CAREY. Reference has been made to forty-three Senators who agreed to pass the Senate bill. Does the agreement last up to the time the President approves the act, or is that off now?

Mr. PALMER. I am not prepared to answer the question. I would advise the Senator, if he desires information on that point, to consult gentlemen who know better than I do. That is the best source of information from which he can get it. I think I have stated my own views and opinions, and the Senator will pardon me for not answering his question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to present certain statements obtained from authentic sources with reference to the operations of the tariff bill as passed by the Senate when it becomes a law.

I regret exceedingly that Democrats should decry and denounce a measure for which the Democratic party is in honor bound to accept the entire responsibility. This bill is at best a compromise measure, for the passage of which no Democrat is called upon to apologize.

We all know the situation which surrounded us in the Senate;

we all know the formidable opposition which confronted this measure on the other side of the Chamber; and we must admit that this bill is in a measure a compromise to the strength of the formidable opposition arrayed against it on the other side of the Chamber, because under the rules of the Senate, or rather in the absence of a rule, it is impossible to bring any question to a vote until the utmost limit of debate has been exhausted.

So, instead of Democrats, after the passage of the bill, indulging in crimination and recrimination about it, we should make up our minds to assume the full responsibility and go before the country and say that we have done the best we could under the circumstances. I do not consider that this is the end of this great question. It will continue to be a live question before the American people until the issue of tariff reform is finally and ultimately accomplished.

Mr. President, I did not rise to make any extended remarks, but merely to submit for publication in the RECORD certain authentic statements which will show how beneficial the bill as it passed the Senate will be to the taxpayers of the country in removing onerous tariff rates and in opening up the way for freer trade among the nations. I shall not trouble the Senate or consume its time by reading these tables, etc., but shall ask permission to have them published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). If there be no objection, the statements referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should be glad to have the statements made by the Senator from Georgia read, and I should also be glad if the would state the authority upon hich they are based.

Mr. WALSH. I have here an official statement showing the schedules of importations under the McKinley law, the estimated duties under the bill as it came from the House, and the duties under the bill as it passed the Senate. I have a statement here by Mr. Durfee, the secretary of the Finance Committee, and I have certain other statements of importance prepared by Mr. Schoenhof, one of the tariff experts connected with the Finance Committee. I give them now upon my own responsibility, of course.

Mr. ALDRICH. If they are to be published in the RECORD as coming from any authority, I desire to have them read.

Mr. WALSH. I will have them read. It will take some time to read them, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island object to the publication in the RECORD of the statements mentioned?

Mr. HARRIS. I imagine the Senator from Rhode Island does not desire to have these tabulations and statements read.

Mr. WALSH. It would be very interesting to him.

Mr. ALDRICH. As the statements are to be published in the RECORD with more or less authority, I should be glad, as I may not have time to read them, to hear them read.

Mr. HARRIS. Would it not answer the Senator's purpose to read them in the RECORD in the morning?

Mr. ALDRICH. My time is taken up with the sessions of the Senate, and I have very little time to read the RECORD. I should be glad to have the statements read.

Mr. HARRIS. It is now 5 o'clock, and I was about to ask the Senate to devote its attention to some other business or quit.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from Tennessee desires to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, or adjourn, I am willing to quit.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Georgia must be permitted to print the papers in the RECORD.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be done, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the statements will be published in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The statements referred to are as follows:

COMPARISON OF THE M'KINLEY SUGAR BOUNTY AND THE SENATE DUTY.

The following in reference to the sugar schedules of 1883, 1890, and the Senate bill was prepared by Mr. Benjamin Durfee, statistician of the Finance Committee of the Senate:

Imports of sugar (dutiable only).

1883.

Amount of imports	pounds..	1,694,207,751
Value of imports		$84,355,545
Duty collected		$46,711,795
Average ad valorem of duty	per cent..	55.37
Average value of imports, per pound	cents..	4.47
Average duty per pound	do....	2.47

1890.

Amount of imports	pounds..	2,709,554,549
Value of imports		$92,743,777
Duty collected		$53,985,873
Average ad valorem of duty	per cent..	65.24
Average value of imports per pound	cents..	3.05
Average duty per pound	do....	1.99

Imports of free sugar, 1893.

Amount of imports	pounds..	3,728,783,783
Value of imports		$114,796,397
Under tariff act of 1894, at 40 per cent duty, would be		$45,917,558
Average value of imports per pound	cents..	3.78
Average duty per pound under tariff act of 1894	do....	1.51

Under the operations of such a law as the Senate bill there would have been payments of $45,917,558 into the United States Treasury as duties on the imports of sugar in the fiscal year 1892–'93, instead of payments of $9,375,130 out of the Treasury as bounty to American producers of sugar.

The payments of bounty to sugar producers are increasing at the rate of 29 per cent per annum. For the past three fiscal years the amounts paid have been as follows:

Year ending June 30—	Amount of bounty.
1892	$7,342,077
1893	9,375,130
1894	12,099,399

At the same rate of increase the payments for the next ten years would be as follows:

Year ending June 30—	Amount of bounty.
1895	$15,608,224
1896	20,134,608
1897	25,973,644
1898	33,506,000
1899	43,232,740
1900	55,780,234
1901	71,956,501
1902	92,823,886
1903	119,742,812
1904	154,568,227
Total for ten years	633,326,876

Such a rate of increase in the domestic production of sugar would be necessary to enable the industry to supply the entire amount consumed in this country by the time fixed for the expiration of the bounty provisions of the tariff act of 1890, namely, July 1, 1905. In the fiscal year ended June 30, 1894, the consumption of raw sugars in the United States was approximately 2,933,017,920 pounds, this amount representing the sum of the imports and domestic production for that period. On a similar basis, the consumption for the year ended June 30, 1894, was 4,931,711,251 pounds, an increase of 68 per cent in the ten years. A continuance of this ratio of increase in the consumption of sugar for the next ten years would reach 8,275,274,901 pounds in 1904, in which year the domestic production would have reached a slightly smaller figure at the present rate of increase, or about 7,728,411,350 pounds.

The import value of sugars has decreased from an average of 4.47 cents in 1883, to 3.78 cents in 1893. Assuming a similar decrease in the next ten years, the price would be about 3.20 cents per pound in 1904, making the value of the amount necessary to supply this country in that year $264,808,796. If all the demands of the country at that time were to be supplied by domestic producers, under a continuance of the present bounty, it would necessitate the payment of $165,505,498 out of the National Treasury. If the wants of the people were to be met by imports of sugar, there would be paid into the Treasury the sum of $105,923,518 in duties under the rates fixed by the Senate bill and upon a price for sugar assumed to be as much below the present value in 1904 as the present price is below that of ten years ago. There would be a difference of $47,422,016 between the operations of the McKinley bounty and the Senate bill duties on sugar ten years hence.

The average yearly bounty under the McKinley bill if continued to termination would be $63,332,687, while the duty under the Senate bill based on imports for 1893 would be only $45,917,558

The advantages of the sugar schedule of the Senate bill, as compared with the bounty provision of the McKinley law, are still further emphasized by contrasting the operation of the two measures in the matter of refined sugars. The McKinley law gives the refiners a protection of five-tenths of a cent per pound, and an additional tenth of a cent upon refined sugars imported from countries that pay an export bounty, making a total of six-tenths of a cent per pound, or 60 cents per 100 pounds.

The Senate bill gives refiners a protection of one-eighth of a cent per pound over and above the duty on the raw sugar. An additional tenth of a cent is provided for sugars imported from countries that pay an export bounty, but importers can be relieved from this additional duty upon proof that any particular invoice of sugar has not received any such export bounty, either direct or indirect. Based upon the differential the protection to refiners under the Senate bill is, therefore, virtually one-eighth of a cent per pound, or 12½ cents per 100 pounds. The benefit to consumers of refined sugar by reason of the Senate bill can be stated thus:

Duty per 100 pounds of refined sugar.

McKinley law	$0.600
Senate bill	.125
Saving by Senate bill	.475

The approximate consumption of raw sugars in the United States during the fiscal year 1892–'93 amounted to 4,210,908,864 (imports 3,728,783,783 pounds, domestic production 482,125,081 pounds). Upon the usual allowance of 112 pounds of raw sugar for 100 pounds of refined this would equal a consumption of 3,759,740,067 pounds of refined sugar. The saving to consumers on this quantity by the difference between the McKinley act and the Senate bill, at the rate of 47.5 cents per 100 pounds, would amount to $17,858,765. The cost of the McKinley bounty to producers of raw sugar and protection to refiners may be stated as follows:

Cost of McKinley sugar bounty and duty to consumers, 1892–'93.

Protection to refiners	$17,858,765
Bounty paid to producers	9,375,130

Not a penny of this amount went into the United States Treasury; the people paid direct to the refiners the amount of the protection given to this industry, while the amount of the bounty was paid out of the Treasury receipts from customs and other taxes. As the total duties paid during the fiscal year 1892–'93 on sugars above No. 16 Dutch standard amounted to only $160,500, the tariff on refined sugars was not paid by importers, in accordance with the protectionist theory. A tariff rate of 40 per cent, like that provided in the Senate bill, applied to the imports of 1892–'93, would have yielded $45,917,558 in revenues, instead of costing the consumers and the United States Treasury $27,233,895 on the above basis. The duty imposed by the Senate bill saves the payment of over $9,000,000 per year out of the Treasury to sugar producers, and also saves the payment of nearly $18,000,000 by the people, as consumers, into the coffers of the sugar trust.

AVERAGE AD VALOREM RATES OF MILLS BILL, M'KINLEY LAW, AND SENATE BILL, WITH PER CENT OF REDUCTION BY SENATE BILL.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Wednesday, August 1, 1894.]

TARIFF STATEMENT SUBMITTED BY HON. PATRICK WALSH.

Mr. WALSH. I present a petition of the Commercial Club of Savannah, Ga., praying for the early settlement of the tariff question. I ask that the petition lie on the table, and be printed in the RECORD.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"SAVANNAH, GA., July 20, 1894.

"The Commercial Club of Savannah, at a meeting duly held and regularly called for that purpose, distinctly and emphatically records its earnest protest against the dilatory action which now marks the progress of the tariff bill pending before the Congress of the United States. This club embraces within its membership men who represent the leading commercial and industrial pursuits of this community. Its interests are not circumscribed within the limits of this city, nor within the great State of Georgia, but the objective purpose of its formation was to advance alike the material prosperity of the entire nation. It believes that it voices the sentiment of the people of the United States when it says that the uncertainty attendant upon the adjustment of that measure has caused untold financial embarrassment, restricted the use of capital, limited investment, and has had a general and most depressing effect upon all lines of material activity.

"The delicate and complicated machinery of business at this time is not unlike the condition of a sick patient who has long been deprived of the sustaining forces of life; and the great financial convulsion which has recently swept over this country has left its business interests in such a condition that the immediate application of restorative remedies is imperatively required.

"Any concession which would tend to effectuate the immediate passage of this bill would be infinitely preferable to delay at this crisis. It is therefore

"Resolved by the Commercial Club of Savannah, That immediate action upon the tariff bill is necessary to end the existing financial depression and embarrassment and to stimulate trade to its normal condition. It is

"Further resolved, That the Representatives and Senators of the State of Georgia in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use every effort to bring about some speedy and definite action upon this bill. It is

"Further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of the Representatives and Senators from the State of Georgia."

TARIFF STATEMENT.

Mr. WALSH. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have printed in the RECORD a statement of the average ad valorem rates of duty of the Mills bill, the McKinley law, and the Senate bill, with per cent of reduction by Senate bill on the articles contained herein. It is a matter of information in which I think the country generally is interested.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution proposing an investigation by the Committee on Patents, reported adversely by the Committee on Contingent Expenses, may be considered by the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. When was it reported?

Mr. HARRIS. This morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object. I do not think the Senate is in condition to take up a resolution that comes from a standing committee of the Senate adversely reported, and undertake to pass it over the adverse report.

Mr. CALL. All right. I shall not press the request at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a resolution providing for a peripatetic traveling committee to go over the country. I am opposed to such propositions on general principle.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent to address an inquiry to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. The whole day has been wasted with useless debate, and I wish to know whether the Senator is not prepared to fix an hour to-morrow when we may vote upon the pending question. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRIS. It is always with profound attention, and generally with admiration, that I hear a suggestion from the Senator from New Hampshire, and I always regret, as I regret now, when I am unable to give him a perfectly frank, full, and satisfactory answer.

Mr. CHANDLER. A suffering country, I say to the Senator from Tennessee, waits upon his answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRIS. I admit that there is a suffering country, and it has suffered for many months because of the conduct of the Senator from New Hampshire. [Laughter.] But not to prolong this exceedingly interesting and important discussion between the Senator from New Hampshire and myself, unless he hankers to make a reply to my remarks——

Mr. CHANDLER. I simply wish to ask the Senator to fix a time when the country may be relieved from suffering because of either of us by an adjournment.

Mr. HARRIS. Whenever the Senator from New Hampshire will consent to be absolutely silent, that result will be brought about. [Laughter.] I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 16, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 15, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Rev. W. E. PARSON, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday was read and approved.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I desire to correct the daily RECORD. On page 9956, on the vote on the bill for free sugar, I am recorded as paired with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I was not paired with anybody. Mr. CULBERSON, I see, voted "yea," and if present I should have voted the same way. I would have voted to continue the bounty provided for the producers of sugar in this country under the act of 1890, believing that the Government in good faith was pledged to that.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I desire to correct the daily RECORD. On page 9950 I am recorded as voting in the affirmative on the question of free iron ore. I did not vote on that question at all; but was paired with my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR]. I want the RECORD so corrected.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Speaker (after making a correction as to how he would have voted on the motion to discharge the House conferees on the tariff bill had he not been paired, said: "I desire to be recognized for the purpose of presenting a resolution."

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I desire to be recognized for the purpose of presenting a resolution.

The SPEAKER. We have not reached that period yet.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am requested to ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. ADAMS, on account of sickness in his family.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am requested by my colleague, Mr. COCKRAN of New York, to ask indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness in his family.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That Mr. HOAR be excused as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 6284) to prevent interference in the collection of State, county, and municipal taxes assessed against corporations and corporate property, and for other purposes, and Mr. PLATT be appointed in his place.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 277, and had receded from the amendment of the Senate numbered 277 to the bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes.

RESIGNATION OF HON. CLIFTON R. BRECKINRIDGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, D. C., August 14, 1894.

DEAR SIR: I have to-day resigned my commission as member of Congress for the Second district of Arkansas.

Very truly, yours,

CLIFTON R. BRECKINRIDGE.

Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP,
Speaker House of Representatives.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its amendment to the Senate amendment numbered 277.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment indicated by the gentleman from Texas, so that the House can see what it is.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to the House, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment of the House is simply the amendment for the purchase of ground upon which to erect a public building near the present Printing Office.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. SAYERS. To insist upon the House amendment to the Senate amendment 277.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House further insist upon its amendment to the Senate amendment indicated.

The motion was agreed to.

SAUGATUCK HARBOR, MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of Congress, information as to the probable cost of completing the improvement of Saugatuck Harbor, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

JOSHUA BECK, DECEASED, VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a copy of the finding of the Court of Claims in the case of Joshua Beck, deceased, against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLESTON HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, showing the necessity for additional aids to navigation in Charleston Harbor, South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A. D. BABCOCK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 744) for the relief of Avery D. Babcock and wife, of Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

MARIA HALL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House an act (S. 253) granting a pension to Maria Hall, widow of Joseph D. Doak, deceased.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Maria Hall, widow of Joseph E. Doak, deceased, late a private in Capt. Renshaw's company of Tennessee militia from December 6, 1812, to April 20, 1813, and from September 26, 1813, to December 10, 1813.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. KILGORE. I think we have passed that bill two or three times already in this House.

Mr. DE ARMOND. No, sir. It has never been presented before.

Mr. KILGORE. Let the report be read, Mr. Speaker.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 253) granting a pension to Maria Hall, widow of Joseph Doak, deceased, have examined the same and report:

The following facts are established in this case:

Soldier performed military service as recited in the bill.

Soldier's widow remarried, and for this reason pension was denied her in the Pension Bureau.

Claimant is now a widow, aged 90 years, and entirely supported by charity.

The bill is a meritorious one, and your committee recommend its prompt passage.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DE ARMOND, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MARYLAND AND WASHINGTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a joint resolution (S. R. 96) to extend the charter of the Maryland and Washington Railway Company.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, in the temporary absence of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RUSK], I ask unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution be taken up and passed, as the House committee has reported a like measure unanimously.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc, That the time for building and completing the railroad provided for in an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maryland and Washington Railway Company," approved August 1, 1892, be, and the same is hereby, extended six months from and after the 1st day of August, 1894.

Mr. HEARD. I only want to say, Mr. Speaker, that this is a road chartered in the State of Maryland to run to the District line, and by Congress to come from that point to the boundary of this city, and this joint resolution extends for six months the time for its construction. I think there can be no objection to it on the part of anybody.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has the work been commenced?

Mr. HEARD. I understand that they have commenced work on the road in Maryland, and they ask only six months to complete it to the boundary of this city.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEARD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LUCAS, for two weeks, on account of sickness.

To Mr. MCCALL, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. ROBBINS, indefinitely.

To Mr. GORMAN, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. COCKRAN, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. CONN, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WELLS, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. HOPKINS of Pennsylvania, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. ENLOE, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, for one week, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HULICK, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers (a petition for a pension) in the case of Joseph Shayler, Seventh Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

TURNER MERRITT.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3268) for the relief of the estate of Turner Merritt, late of the parish of East Baton Rouge, La.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims be, and it hereby is, authorized and directed to investigate and find whether or not Turner Merritt, late of the parish of East Baton Rouge, La., was loyal to the United States throughout the late war; and if said finding should be that he was so loyal, then and in that event, said court is further authorized and directed to investigate, find, and report to Congress how much cotton, if any, was taken from him and used by the Federal Army in the defenses of Port Hudson, and what its value then was, and whether any payment has been made therefor; also how much of said cotton was thereafter sold by the Government and for how much. And if it should appear from the testimony to be given in said court that any witnesses have died whose affidavits are now on file in the case, such affidavits shall be received as evidence and shall be allowed such weight as said court may deem proper.

An amendment recommended by the Committee on War Claims was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the claim of Turner Merritt, late of the parish of East Baton Rouge, La., for cotton alleged to have been taken from claimant during the war of the rebellion by the United States forces, and used by them in the defenses of Port Hudson, be referred to the Court of Claims under the provisions of what is commonly known as the Bowman act and section 14 of the Tucker act, and said court is authorized to take jurisdiction in the premises and report to the House of Representatives as authorized and required by said statutory provisions, reserving to said House of Representatives the right to finally pass upon said claim upon the receipt of said report."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. I object.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. The gentleman, I am sure, will withdraw his objection when he understands that this merely refers the case to the Court of Claims, without binding Congress in any way, shape, or manner to make an appropriation in case the court should pass favorably upon the claim.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is this for cotton seized?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. No, sir; it is for cotton used for breastworks in the defense of Port Hudson.

Mr. BARTLETT. By whom?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. By Gen. Grant.

Mr. BARTLETT. I object.

STEAMER MARGARITA.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6986) to provide for the American registry of the steamer Margarita.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamer Margarita, of Philadelphia, purchased and owned by an American citizen and repaired by him in the United States, to be registered as a vessel of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to authorize and direct the inspection of said steam vessel, steam boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances of said boilers, and cause to be granted the proper and usual certificate issued to steam vessels of the merchant marine, without reference to the fact that the said steam boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances were not constructed pursuant to the laws of the United States and were not constructed of iron stamped pursuant to said law; and the test to be applied to the inspection of said boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances will be the same in all respects as to strength and safety as are required in the inspection of boilers constructed in the United States for marine purposes, save the fact that said boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances not being constructed pursuant to the requirements of the laws of the United States and are of unstamped iron, shall not be an obstacle to the granting of the usual certificate if said boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances are found to be of sufficient strength and safety.

Mr. FITHIAN. Is there a report in this case?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. PIGOTT (to Mr. FITHIAN). The bill is all right.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. PIGOTT) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6986) to provide for the American registry of the steamer Margarita, having considered the same, respectfully report as follows:

This steamer was purchased in England by A. J. Drexel, an American citizen, of the city of Philadelphia, Pa., for the sum of $90,000. The owner has expended in repairs upon the said steamer in an American shipyard the sum of $15,000 and has made and approved plans for further expenditure of $30,000, including the following alterations: Replumbing, refurnishing, electric light, painting, calking decks, new boats, and entirely overhauling the machinery.

During the Fiftieth, Fifty-first, and Fifty-second Congresses a large number of vessels were authorized by similar acts to be registered as vessels of the United States, in volume 25 of the United States Statutes at Large, pages 134, 475, and 668; volume 26, pages 105, 312, 414, 491, 495, 561, and 830.

Your committee, having carefully considered all the facts in the case, respectfully recommend that the bill be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection to the gentleman making an explanation of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not interpose any objection in the way of the patriotism of an American gentleman who wishes to sail under his country's flag, and who has made every effort to do so. Mr. Drexel last summer had an American yacht, which he owned and sailed in. Owing to the ill health of his wife, he was ordered to take a trip abroad.

He endeavored to have built in an American shipyard a yacht large enough for this purpose, but was informed that a year and a half would be the shortest time in which it could be completed, and he was unable in any shipyard in the country to succeed in getting a promise of its construction in less time than that. There was no yacht of sufficient tonnage of American build that could be found for sale; and so under all of the circumstances, being unable to purchase here or have the yacht built, he purchased one abroad, paying for it $90,000.

But true to his American instincts, which he had inherited from his father, he brought the ship into our ports, and expended $45,000 additional in an American shipyard to put it in proper condition for the purpose contemplated. He discharged the English captain and the English crew, and in these hard times keeps in constant employment a crew of forty men and a Yankee skipper; and with that natural pride which belongs to an American citizen he comes here now asking Congress, having used every honorable and patriotic effort to get this ship of American build, to be allowed to sail the ship under our own flag and with an American register.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, when these circumstances are known that this courtesy will be extended to him. I trust, in view of the patriotic instincts exhibited by one of our citizens, under such circumstances, who desires to sail under his own flag, as a loyal American citizen, and obey in every way the laws of his country, that this privilege will be granted to him that the bill contemplates. I trust when these facts are known that there will be no member of this House who will make an objection to the request for unanimous consent to consider the bill. Does any member of this House suppose that I, being the representative in part of one of the great cities of this country, in which are the largest shipping interests in the United States; that I, coming from the city of Philadelphia, full of shipyards, and now building the great American Navy, would dare to rise in my place and introduce a bill or ask consent to have one considered that would hurt in any way American shipbuilding interests?

I hope, therefore, in view of the peculiar circumstances of the case, and the large amount expended in an American shipyard on the remodeling of this yacht, that the strict letter of the law will not be allowed to stand in the way of doing a simple act of justice to an American citizen who desires the privilege of sailing with an American register and under the American flag.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I object.

OCALA, FLA., PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1885) to extend the privileges of the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement to the city of Ocala, in the State of Florida.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement be, and the same are hereby, extended to the city of Ocala, in the State of Florida. And the said city of Ocala is hereby constituted a port of delivery.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. Before consent is given to the consideration of this bill, I think there should be some explanation of it. Is this recommended by the Department?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. It is recommended by the Treasury Department.

Mr. DOCKERY. As I caught the reading of the bill it creates some additional officers.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. No. Let me say to the gentleman that this is recommended by the Treasury Department for the reason that Ocala has become a very large cigar-manufacturing point, and they are proposing now to transfer several large cigar factories from Havanna to Ocala, if it can be made a port of entry. For that reason, in view of the largely increasing business of the place in this direction, the Department recommends the passage of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. What number of additional officers does it create?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. It does not create any that I know of.

Mr. WISE. None whatever.

Mr. DOCKERY. No additional charge on the Treasury?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, and being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Florida, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1772) extending the time for the completion of a railroad bridge over the Columbia River at or near Vancouver, in the State of Washington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the completion of the bridge across the Columbia River at or near Vancouver, in the State of Washington, under the act of Congress approved August 29, 1890, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River by the Oregon Railway Extension Company," be, and the same is hereby, extended until the 15th day of April, 1898.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

Mr. COOMBS. I would like some explanation first, Mr. Speaker. Has this bill passed the Committee on Interstate Commerce?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. It has. It is the unanimous report of that committee. The report is very short, if the gentleman desires to have it read. I will state, however, that this is simply the ordinary extension of a franchise which was granted about four years ago.

Mr. COOMBS. It extends the franchise to 1897; quite a long time.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Under the circumstances it is not a long time. The river is very broad, and the company got into some financial difficulties, and is now in the hands of a receiver. Prior to that time the work was partly done. The piers are already built; but it will take some time to complete the superstructure. It is a gigantic enterprise.

Mr. COOMBS. Have there been any protests against it?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. None whatever.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, and being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. ELLIS of Oregon, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS CONTENTNEA CREEK, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BUNN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2303) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Contentnea Creek, Grifton, Lenoir County, N. C., and to establish it as a post-road.

The bill was read.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BUNN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

W. D. MACK.

Mr. HULL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 68) for the relief of W. D. Mack, a clerk in the Record and Pension Division of the War Department.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That William D. Mack, a clerk in the Record and Pension Office, and a veteran of the late war, who lost both feet in a railroad accident while returning from the anniversary ceremonies of the battle of Gettysburg, on July 4 last, is hereby exempted from the operation of so much of the act approved March 3, 1893, making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, as limits the amount of sick leave with pay that be granted by heads of Departments, and that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to said William D. Mack such portion of his salary as has been withheld from September 11 to October 14 (thirty-four days) on account of injuries received in the said railroad accident.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS NEWARK BAY.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7839) to bridge Newark Bay.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the boards of chosen freeholders of the counties of Hudson and Union, in the State of New Jersey, or the legally constituted authorities of the city of Bayonne and the city of Elizabeth, as may be determined by the authorities of the State of New Jersey, now or hereafter to be granted, shall be, and they or either of them are hereby, authorized to locate, build, maintain, equip, and operate a bridge across Newark Bay, in the State of New Jersey, between the city of Elizabeth, in the county of

Union, and the city of Bayonne, in the county of Hudson, at a point not less than 500 feet above the present bridge structure known as the Central Railroad bridge: Provided, That the bridge herein authorized shall be built as a drawbridge, with a draw giving a clear width of opening of not less than 100 feet, and said bridge shall be located and built in such manner and under such regulations for the security of navigation as the Secretary of War may prescribe; and to secure that object the parties proposing to build said bridge shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of the bridge and a map of the location, and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be commenced or built; and should any change be made in the plans of said bridge during the progress of its construction, such changes shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War: Provided also, That the draw of said bridge shall be promptly opened, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of vessels and boats; and the owners of said bridge shall maintain theron, from sunset to sunrise, such lights and other signals as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the approval of this act.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been favorably reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and personally I have no objection to its passage. But it is proper to state that one of the Representatives from New Jersey [Mr. ENGLISH] now absent is bitterly opposed to it; and therefore I do not think it ought to go through by unanimous consent.

Mr. DUNN. My colleague [Mr. ENGLISH] has withdrawn his objection to the bill. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] will sustain me in this statement. Since the objection of my colleague was made, the bill has been amended so that there is no objection to it now whatever.

Mr. BARTLETT. On the occasion of my last conversation with Dr. ENGLISH, he was still opposed to the bill; so that I can not state that he has withdrawn his opposition.

Mr. DUNN. He withdrew his opposition in committee.

Mr. WISE. I would cheerfully give consent to the passage of the bill; but I know that in the last interview I had with Dr. ENGLISH he expressed himself as bitterly opposed to the bill, and as wanting an opportunity to be heard in opposition to it on the floor of the House. I see him entering the Hall now. He can speak for himself. Personally I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. DUNN. I will ask my colleague [Mr. ENGLISH], whom I now see in his place, whether he has any objection to this bill as amended by the committee.

Mr. ENGLISH of New Jersey. Not at all. It is the substitute that I favored.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague states that he has no objection to the measure.

Mr. WISE. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. This is not a railroad bridge?

Mr. DUNN. No, sir; it is a bridge for public travel between the cities of Elizabeth and Bayonne.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DUNN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "Secretary of War," in line 27, page 2, insert the folowing: "And the said bridge shall be held to be a public highway forever."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS SOUTH CANADIAN RIVER.

Mr. AVERY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7811) authorizing the El Reno Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the South Canadian River, between Blaine County, Okla., and the Wichita Indian Reservation.

The bill was read.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of section 2 the following:

"And equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph companies, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and approaches for postal telegraph purposes: Provided, That before the construction of any bridge herein authorized is commenced the said company shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of such bridge and a map of the location, giving sufficient information to enable the Secretary of War to fully and satisfactorily understand the subject, and unless the plan and location of such bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the structure shall not be built: Provided, also, That any bridge constructed under authority of this act shall at all times be so kept and managed as to offer reasonable and proper means for the passage of vessels and other water craft through or under said structure, and for the safety of vessels passing at night there shall be displayed on such bridge, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals as may be prescribed by the Light-House Board."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. AVERY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE CURRENCY.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks consent for the consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the balance in available gold in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st day of August, 1894, had been reduced, despite the sale of $50,000,000 in gold bonds, to the sum of $54,975,607; and

Whereas the demand for gold in the Treasury made for shipments to foreign ports continues and increases; and

Whereas the reports from the Treasury show that during the month of July not a dollar in gold was added to the Treasury stock from the port of New York, the largest customs port in the United States; and

Whereas it is a matter of common knowledge that gold coin and gold certificates have virtually ceased to be used in discharging obligations to the Government, but that the obligations to the Government are discharged in silver certificates, United States notes and United States Treasury notes, which are so used as to deplete the Treasury of gold faster than it accumulates from all sources, including customs, internal revenue, and sales of bonds; and

Whereas there is in the Treasury unused and available an amount of silver equal to $513,880,682 of American standard coin value; and

Whereas the income of the United States does not now equal its expenditures: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, That the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures is directed to at once report to the House for its consideration a bill providing for the proper use and avail of the said silver.

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules is directed, upon the report of said bill from the said committee, to report a rule for the consideration of the House under which suitable, full, and reasonable debate may take place, and amendments be offered and votes taken within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I object.

Mr. TRACEY. Let it go to the committee.

POTOMAC STEAMBOAT COMPANY.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 425) for the relief of the Potomac Steamboat Company.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SAYERS. I object, Mr. Speaker.

JOEL A. KING.

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2231) for the relief of Joel A. King.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Joel A. King, of Caldwell County, Ky., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,800, being for stores and supplies furnished the Army of the United States during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have an explanation of that bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman can make a brief explanation.

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the report is very short. It sets forth the facts.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the report can be read.

The report (by Mr. STONE of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2231) for the relief of Joel A King, submit the following report:

This is a claim for quartermaster's stores furnished to the Army of the United States by Dr. Joel A. King, of Caldwell County, Ky., during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, under orders from Lieut. Col. S. F. Johnson, Forty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Mounted Infantry. Claim stated at $1,800.

The committee find that Joel A. King was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout the late war; and that in 1863 and 1864 he furnished stores and supplies for the military use of the United States at or near Princeton, Ky., then reasonably worth $1,800.

Your committee report back the bill and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. I object.

TITLE TO LAND IN YUMA, COLO.

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7955) to perfect the title to a quarter section of land in the town of Yuma, Colo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the preëmption cash entry numbered 4990, of George F. Weed, made at the district land office at Denver, Colo., on the 19th of September, 1885, for the southeast quarter of section 22, township 2 north, of range 48 west, which tract embraces the town of Yuma, Colo., the county seat of Yuma County, Colo., be, and the same is hereby, confirmed; and that patent of the United States issue therefor to said Weed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PENCE]?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The report is quite long. By consent, the gentleman can make a brief explanation.

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, the bill is simply to perfect the title to the land on which the town of Yuma, in Eastern Colorado, now stands. This bill is reported favorably by the Committee on Public Lands, unanimously.

In 1885 Mr. Weed made his proof upon the land. Thereafter, within the next twelve months, when the railroad came through, a town sprang up and was organized under our State laws, and proceeded to build its public improvements. In October, 1888, some three years afterwards, an affidavit was filed of record that raised some question as to the title to these town lots. It has caused some considerable trouble to the owners of the lots, and the petitioners who have presented this bill have presented such facts to the Committee on Public Lands that they feel that these people ought to be relieved by this act. There is nobody who is interested in it now except the lot claimants, and they wish to perfect their title.

Mr. COOMBS. Are there many of them?

Mr. PENCE. There were a good many last spring. I have forgotten how many voted last spring. This is the county seat of the county. There are probably less people there now since the drought.

Mr. COOMBS. Do I understand this bill is reported unanimously and favorably?

Mr. PENCE. Yes.

Mr. COOMBS. Is it understood out there, so that the people who would have the right to object to it could have done so?

Mr. PENCE. I should not present it otherwise.

Mr. COOMBS. I make no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PENCE]?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PENCE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RECONVEYANCE BY DISTRICT COMMISSIONERS OF CERTAIN LAND.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I ask for unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill S. 2269.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to consider a bill which the Clerk will report, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2269) providing for reconveyance by District Commissioners of certain lands to Andrew J. Curtis and Mary E. Curtis.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to reconvey by a suitable deed of conveyance or quitclaim to Andrew J. Curtis and Mary E. Curtis, their heirs and assigns, all the right, title, and interest of the District of Columbia in and to all that lot or parcel of land fully described and acquired in a deed from Andrew J. Curtis and Mary E. Curtis to the said District of Columbia on the 10th day of September, A. D. 1891, and recorded in liber 1628, folio 294 of the land records of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. COOMBS. I would like to hear the report.

Mr. POST. The simple facts are these, if the gentleman will allow me. A street in Bennings was deeded to the District.

Mr. COOMBS. Where?

Mr. POST. In Bennings. The Commissioners say that the topography of the ground makes it unsuitable for a street; and the only effect of this conveyance is to relieve the owners from taxation; and they desire to have it reconveyed.

Mr. COOMBS. Have you a letter from the Commissioners?

Mr. POST. I have a letter from the Commissioners to that effect.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. POST, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House bill relating to the same subject lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JOEL A. KING.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection to the bill of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York withdraws the objection he entered to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky. The Chair will have the title of the bill read again, and ask if there is any other objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2231) for the relief of Joel A. King.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objected to the consideration of this bill. Is there further objection?

Mr. LOUD. I will ask if this bill was not considered some few weeks ago?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be again read.

The bill was read again.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask if that bill was not considered here one Friday afternoon?

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. No, sir.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think this bill ought to pass without some discussion.

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. It never has been before the House, but it has been reported from the committee a number of times.

Mr. LOUD. I think it ought to come up in committee on Friday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California objects.

FINANCES.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk be read, after which I will ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, etc., the tariff bill has been passed by the House reducing the duty and cheapening the necessaries of life; and

Whereas by separate acts coal, iron, barbed wire, sugar, and molasses have been put upon the free list; and

Whereas without further legislation the masses of the people will be very little better off than before: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the people's money should be restored to its original status by the remonetization of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1, followed by some financial legislation increasing the circulating medium of the country, so that the people may be able to purchase the necessaries of life lately reduced in the tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to consider this resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. TRACEY. Let it go to a committee.

Mr. PAYNE. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is equivalent to an objection.

PAYMENT OF CONTRACTS IN LEGAL-TENDER MONEY.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 5217) to regulate and discharge the payment of contracts in any money made a legal tender by law for the payment of debts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all contracts for the payment of any money, whether in gold, silver, or coin, may be discharged by any money which is by law a legal tender for the payment of debts when the contract matures.

An amendment recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, inserting in line 3, after the word "contracts," the words "hereafter executed," was read.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE].

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, the importance of this bill can not be overstated. The purpose of the measure is to secure stability in our financial system. Under our present financial method we have various kinds of money, and the law, as it is now interpreted by the courts, allows parties to discredit various forms of our money by contract.

Mr. COOMBS. Does not the gentleman think that is proper?

Mr. LANE. It is not proper, and I will show that it is not. Our law requires that all the proceedings of our courts shall be expressed in dollars, dimes, cents, and mills. It was always the practice in this country up to 1878. The records of this country everywhere were always kept in that way, and the Supreme Court in 1878 for the first time changed that mode of procedure.

I have examined with great care the decisions of the courts of the various States on this question, and I find a uniform concurrence of opinion up to the time the question came before the Supreme Court of the United States. The courts of the various States had formerly held that when an obligation was given for the payment of money, it meant that that obligation could be discharged in whatever was declared to be the legal money of the country. I know that some gentlemen may claim that this bill is an attempt on my part to bring up the silver question, but I beg to state that such an idea never entered my mind in connection with this bill.

What brought this question to my attention was the fact that some of my constituents, desiring to borrow money, were offered some, but were required, in executing their notes, to give an obligation that the money should be repaid in gold. They sent the papers to me and asked my view about it. I advised them that that was not necessary, and with a view to meet that contingency I introduced this bill.

Mr. COOMBS. Has this bill been reported unanimously by the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. LANE. There is no dissenting report, as I understand.

Mr. POWERS. One was filed this morning.

Mr. LANE. I did not know that. The Democratic members of the committee, as I understand, all agree in recommending this bill, and some of the members on the other side, but not all. I wish to call attention now to the law as it was before this question came before the Supreme Court.

Mr. DANIELS. When this question came before the courts of New York they decided that all contracts could be discharged by the tender and payment of greenbacks, and that inasmuch as all debts were payable only in gold and silver before the law was passed, it made no difference whether that provision was in the contract or not, the greenback law covered the whole question.

Mr. LANE. I have those decisions here. I wish to call attention now to the decision of the courts of Massachusetts. In 1863 this question came before the supreme judicial court of the State of Massachusetts, and I have here a brief summary of the decision of the court. The note in that case was for $500 payable in specie, and of course the plaintiff insisted that he was entitled to gold or its equivalent on that contract. The court in that case said:

All the court can do is to treat as money that which the statutes of the United States legally enacted declare to be money. If it were in our power to render a specific judgment designating a species of currency in which it should be paid, we might avoid some of the existing difficulties, but we have no such power.

That is the opinion of the court of Massachusetts in 1863.

Mr. COOMBS. That was before the war.

Mr. LANE. It was during the war and after Congress had passed an act declaring greenbacks to be a legal tender for the payment of all debts.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that in this controversy I do not raise at all the question about the power of Congress to declare what shall be a legal tender. That question is not involved in this discussion.

Congress saw proper to declare that greenbacks should be a legal tender for the payment of debts; and my contention is that no private party has a right to annul an enactment of Congress.

Mr. COOMBS. Does not the form of the bill prevent contracts being made for the payment of a debt in specie even if the parties desire to so frame the contract?

Mr. LANE. The effect of the bill if it should become a law will be that a money contract may be discharged with any money that Congress has declared shall be legal tender.

Mr. COOMBS. No matter what the contract may be.

Mr. LANE. That is, a money contract. But it does not prevent a contract to be executed for a commodity, and gold may be a commodity.

Mr. COOMBS. I think it does.

Mr. LANE. It applies only to money contracts.

Mr. TRACEY. But it prevents the enforcement of a gold contract.

Mr. LANE. If it is a money transaction, you can discharge the debt in legal-tender money. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is what ought to be done.

Mr. LANE. If you desire to purchase gold as a commodity you may provide that the contract may be discharged in so many grains of gold. But that is a different transaction. If the intention of the contract is the payment of money, then the legal-tender money will discharge the obligation. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. And a very proper purpose.

Mr. COOMBS. I call the attention of the gentleman to this provision of the bill:

All contracts hereafter executed for the payment of any sum of money, whether in gold or silver or coin, may be discharged by any money which is by law a legal tender for the payment of debts when the contract matures.

Mr. LANE. Yes; that is the provision of the bill.

Mr. COOMBS. And that prevents a man from making a contract for payment in specie.

Mr. LANE. That is exactly what we intend shall be the law. But it applies only to money contracts. When a man makes a money contract that contract ought to be dischargeable in money of the United States declared by law to be a legal tender. No man has a right to discredit that which the Government has declared to be money. No contract can be made except in conformity with the law. The law is the essence of every contract. A contract which does not conform to the law is void. This bill prevents anybody from making a contract that a money debt shall be discharged specifically in gold and nothing else.

Mr. COOMBS. So I understand.

Mr. LANE. In other words, if you loan greenbacks you can not exact from your debtor an obligation that he shall repay the debt in gold.

Mr. RYAN. But suppose gold is the money loaned?

Mr. LANE. You can loan gold if you want to loan it, just as you can loan paper.

Mr. RYAN. The bill prevents a contract being made (though both parties may be willing) for the payment of a debt in gold dollars.

Mr. LANE. It prevents any man from discriminating against the currency of the country. If there has been a loan of gold, and if, when the contract matures, paper money is legal tender, you are allowed to discharge that obligation with paper money.

Mr. COOMBS. Then it restricts contracts?

Mr. LANE. It does not.

Mr. RYAN. But if both parties are willing to make the contract payable in gold this bill forbids it, though gold be loaned.

Mr. LANE. It does, because such a thing is against public policy. We propose not to allow any man to discredit the money of his country. At one time it was regarded as treason for any man to undertake to discredit the money of his country. Why should we allow a privileged class in this country to make gold contracts and cast upon the debtor the burden of preserving the currency of the country from depreciation? We have in this country now thousands, I may say millions, of dollars of money out on contracts of this very kind, contracts which are payable in gold; and the holders of such contracts can force gold to a premium in two hours, thus filching from the hands of the debtor class millions of dollars. I say the principle is wrong.

Mr. COOMBS. But suppose the parties have made contracts payable in gold?

Mr. LANE. This bill does not affect contracts already made; only those hereafter made.

Mr. COOMBS. But you said it was wrong that such contracts should be recognized by the law.

Mr. LANE. I do say it is wrong, morally wrong.

Mr. COOMBS. I see that it was an afterthought to amend the bill so as not to affect contracts already made.

Mr. LANE. That makes no difference. You have a right to make contracts in conformity to the existing law. Contracts must always be made in obedience to law. When there is no law there can be no binding contract. If there was no government, contracts would have no legal force; they would simply be moral obligations, dischargeable at the pleasure of the maker.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. A bill was presented here not long ago proposing to permit the Territory of Arizona to issue gold bonds, because it was stated that as gold bonds they could be floated at a lower rate of interest than if they were payable in currency. Now, this bill will prevent any State or municipality from issuing gold bonds, although the inability to do so may involve the payment of a higher rate of interest for years on the bonds issued.

Mr. LANE. I beg to differ with the gentleman from Florida. This has nothing whatever to do with contracts of the States or the nation.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Why?

Mr. LANE. Simply because it has not. That question was settled in Lane County vs. Oregon (7 Wall., 71); or, rather, a kindred question.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I think it has.

Mr. LANE. It relates only to private contracts.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. There is nothing in it that confines it to private contracts.

Mr. LANE. Oh, yes. The States and the nation can take care of themselves. They can only be sued by their consent.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I would risk my judgment as a lawyer that it covers all contracts—State, municipal, or any other—coming within the purview of the law.

Mr. BARTLETT. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. LANE. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. How does the gentleman from Illinois reconcile his position with that taken by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Brownson vs. Rodes, where the Supreme Court say, in speaking of a contract to pay a certain number of dollars in gold and silver, that—

It is not distinguishable, as we think, in principle from a contract to deliver an equal weight of bullion of equal fineness.

Mr. LANE. Well, I will come to that in a little while, and I think I can satisfy the gentleman on that point.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the gentleman from Illinois proceeds I wish to ask him if, in his judgment, this prohibits a municipality from issuing bonds payable in gold?

Mr. LANE. It would.

Mr. DINGLEY. Even if they could borrow money at 3 per cent to pay a debt which carried 5 per cent or more?

Mr. LANE. It would. The bond could be made payable in gold, but it could be discharged in legal tender.

I want to read now from what Judge Cooley says on this subject. He has some followers on this floor, and there are many gentlemen here who regard him as eminent in his profession as a lawyer. In a citation in 13 Michigan Reports, 420, in the case of Buchegger vs. Schultz, where the question before the court was in reference to a contract to pay a certain number of dollars stipulated to be paid in gold, not being a contract for merchandise, but for money, and to be discharged in money, Judge Cooley, delivering the opinion of the court, among other things, said:

If legal-tender laws were designed chiefly to confer upon debtors a privilege, there would be force in an argument that the class to be benefited might waive the privilege by stipulation in their contracts. But these laws are also based in great measure upon reasons of state policy, which sometimes to a considerable degree override and disregard individual interests. The act in question was based exclusively upon reasons of a public character, which, in the opinion of the lawmaking power, imperatively demands that Treasury notes shall be made equal in legal value to coin, and parties have no more right to stipulate that their contracts shall not be governed by it than those of a particular locality have to agree among themselves that a law shall not be in force in that locality.

That was in 1865, before the question came before the Supreme Court of the United States, which declared that a contract payable in gold could be discharged by legal tender, it being held that under the law of Congress legal-tender notes were equal in value with gold.

Now, in the State of Illinois, my own State, the question came up there on a similar presentation of fact, and that State held the same view of the law.

It was declared in 1866, in the case of Appel vs. Woltman, Thirty-eighth Missouri reports, that the same principle would apply, the court using this language:

But by law Congress has made Treasury notes of legal value with gold, and declared they should be legal tenders in satisfaction of private debts. As a legal medium, then, there can not be a dittinction taken between them and gold.

The same principle, precisely, was laid down in the Illinois case. Of course when the Supreme Court decided the question they had to reverse that decision, as the Supreme Court of the United States had primarily full power in the premises.

The court in the Missouri case continue as follows:

It is a notorious fact which has passed into the history of the country that for the purpose of trade and in commercial transactions there is a difference made between Treasury notes and specie coin; but whatever fluctuations there may be arising from extraneous causes, the debtor's right to pay in whatever medium he chooses can not be affected. In administering the law gold and Treasury notes must be considered as equal, and no difference or discrimination can be allowed.

That was followed by the decision in the Indiana case, in 1886, in the case of Brown vs. Welch, where the court used this language:

When Treasury notes were made a legal tender in the payment of debts they were made the equivalent of coin as a means of payment in all but the cases excepted by law. If, then, the law makes them equivalent for the purpose of payment, a failure to pay a given sum in gold, as required by contract, can not possibly beget an obligation to pay a greater sum in legal-tender notes, whatever premium men may voluntarily choose to give for gold when forced to obtain it for a specific purpose or when impelled by a spirit of speculation or by a weak distrust of the Government.

Without giving a citation from all of the other cases I can say, in brief, that this same principle was followed uniformly by a perfect concensus of opinion in all of the States—in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, Kentucky, New York, Texas, California, Georgia, Louisiana, Vermont, Alabama, Nebraska, and Iowa.

Mr. POWERS of Vermont. To what case does the gentleman refer from Vermont?

Mr. LANE. I will refer to that case particularly.

It was the case of Townsend vs. Jennison, quoted in the Forty-fourth Vermont Reports, where the court held that when a debt is payable in specie it is an error for the court to allow the plaintiff premium on silver coin, there being more than one kind of money called "specie," and the kinds being capable of different values.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Then you wish to provide that A can not contract with B a debt which shall be paid in gold?

Mr. LANE. I do; simply that and nothing more.

Mr. COOMBS. And it was an afterthought that they put in the word "hereafter."

Mr. LANE. It is in the bill now.

Mr. COOMBS. But it shows the wisdom of the bill!

Mr. LANE. In the Alabama case, the court say:

The verdict is for $5,000 in gold, and the judgment follows the verdict. The present law of the United States governing the currency and defining what shall be legal tender for the payment of debts forbids such a payment

The verdict ought, therefore, to have been for dollars simply. A judgment for dollars in gold is erroneous.

That is the decision of the court in that case. If you will take the pains to read through all these cases you will find they all hold that when a private contract is made to be paid in gold, silver, or specie, that the debt is discharged by any money that is legal tender at the time the debt matures. I find that the court of Georgia delivered this utterance on the question:

As the debt was contracted long after the passage of the legal-tender acts of Congress regulating the payment of such contracts, the judgment should have been for so many dollars only, leaving it to be discharged in any legal-tender currency or money of the United States.

I say that uniformly the State courts of this country have held that this kind of a contract could be discharged in any money that was a legal tender. The courts of France, construing not a special act, but their general law, held that it was against public policy to allow a man to contract against the currency of his country, and it was treason in England to discredit the money of the realm, and subjected the offender to the penalty of death. Now, these gentlemen, every time they make a contract of this kind, discredit the money of this country, discredit the paper money or any other money, excepting the special money contracted to be paid.

As I said before, all contracts must be made according to law, not contrary to law, and if the law was as indicated by this bill, then we should have a uniform currency, uniform contracts, and uniform decisions everywhere. This question came before the Supreme Court of the United States in 1868 for the first time, in the case of Bronson vs. Rodes, reported in 7 Wallace, 229. I call your attention to the anomalous position in which the question was placed under that decision. The contract was for $1,507, to be paid in gold and silver coin. The court went on and decided in that case, and adopted a new rule, for the first time, I think, in this or any other country. They held that on a note payable in gold and silver coin the judgment should be for coined dollars and part of dollars.

The judgment in that case was for coined dollars. We all know that an execution is the end of the law or was up to that time. When you go into court and get a judgment, and take out an execution, that is the end of the law; but under this decision it is not the end of the law. How will you collect a judgment for coined dollars? How are you going to enforce it? When you get an ordinary judgment for dollars and cents, the execution runs to the sheriff or marshal, to collect from the debtor so much money in dollars and cents. Under the decision of the case here in Bronson vs. Rodes, 7 Wallace, it is to collect coin dollars.

Under that kind of an execution, what must the sheriff do? He takes the execution, goes out and makes a demand for the coin dollars. He can not get them. They are not in the country at all. Coin does not circulate. What does he do? He levies his execution on a farm or some other property of the debtor, and sells it. What does he sell it for? Why, for greenbacks.

The marshal is compelled to accept the legal tender from the party purchasing the property. The law compels him to do so. What is he to do then?

Go to New York or some other market and purchase coined dollars. How is he going to know what premium to pay for gold? Who made him a judicial officer? What market is to control the price?

Mr. COOMBS. I would ask the gentleman if the original error does not lie in the party making that contract to pay in coin?

Mr. LANE. No. The error lies in the court legislating in the interest of the gold bugs.

Mr. BARTLETT. How is there any more difficulty in enforcing such a judgment than in enforcing any judgment for specific performance?

Mr. LANE. I will tell you. When you get a judgment of a court for specific performance, the court tells you what you are to do.

Mr. BARTLETT. They can do the same in this case.

Mr. LANE. Here you get a judgment for coin dollars. Now, the sheriff or the marshal goes with the execution, and how is he going to buy gold? In what market shall he buy? Shall he take the premium on gold in Illinois or New York or Louisiana, or in England? What right has anyone to make of him a judicial officer? He is a ministerial officer, to execute a process. How is he going to do it?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Half dollars are legal tender, are they not?

Mr. LANE. For a certain amount.

Mr. NORTHWAY. They are legal-tender money?

Mr. LANE. For certain amounts.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Under this contract you could redeem a contract for a million dollars in half dollars.

Mr. LANE. You could under certain conditions.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But there is no condition. They are legal tender.

Mr. LANE. They are only legal tender for $5.

Mr. MARSH. A limited legal tender.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But nevertheless what is known as legal tender.

Mr. LANE. But if you make a contract for $10, you can not pay it off in half dollars.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Read the bill and see.

Mr. LANE. I know what it is; and I say you can discharge it in any money that is legal tender to that amount. Now, the State courts follow the case of Bronson vs. Rodes. There are only two cases in the Supreme Court, Bronson vs. Rodes, and the case of Trebilcock vs. Wilson, 12 Wall., 687. In that case there was a note given for $900, a plain promissory note. In the court below the debtor tendered the amount due on the note in legal tender, and the trial court below held that that was a good tender.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did this note call for gold?

Mr. LANE. I will give you the exact words [reading]: "Payable in specie."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Payable in specie.

Mr. LANE. Now, specie is gold and silver, and it is also copper. There are three kinds of specie. So you will see the absurdity of the position. The definition of specie in the law books and in ordinary dictionaries is given as coined money, in gold, in silver, or in copper; and according to the literal meaning of this note the debtor could have discharged it in copper coin. It is payable in specie. Now, the court below held that as he had tendered in greenbacks or Treasury notes the amount of the contract it was a sufficient tender.

The case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and they held that he was entitled to a coin judgment for the amount due. You find the same condition as in the other case. The marshal is to take out an execution and go to the party and make his collection, or sell the property, and then go and buy gold.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me just a moment to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. LANE. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it not true that the effect of these two decisions is entirely destroyed, so far at least as silver is concerned, by the declaration of the statute of the policy of this Government to preserve gold and silver at a parity? Is not that obligatory upon the courts, as well as on the other branches of the Government? Would the court be permitted to discredit a portion of the coin of the United States by holding that it would not discharge an obligation, in the face of the declaration of the Government that silver is equivalent to gold?

Mr. LANE. I am glad the gentleman made that point, and I will show him how it operates. When this contract was made, there was no question between gold and silver. That was before some people in this country had discriminated against silver; now they claim that a silver dollar is only worth 50 cents, and they insist that the contract shall be in gold, not in specie.

Mr. BARTLETT. Make it gold.

Mr. LANE. A silver dollar is just as much a dollar as a gold dollar, and it has the same purchasing power.

Mr. BARTLETT. But make the contract in gold.

Mr. LANE. This contract is not made for gold. The rate is payable in specie and it can be discharged in specie. But it is a contract for the payment of money and it should have been held by the court that it could be discharged in any money that was by law made a legal tender. This is and should be the legal effect of such a contract. The law must control. The law declares that a certain per cent per annum shall be the legal rate of interest for the use of money, and any amount over that would be usury.

Parties, by private contract, can not annul such a law. The law controls the contract and the lawmaking power has the right to say that all contracts for the payment of money, whether in gold or silver, shall be discharged and satisfied by the payment of any money made by law a legal tender. You have no more right to make a contract in gold than you have to make a usurious contract.

Mr. BARTLETT. What right have you to restrain the liberty of making a contract if the contract is not against good morals?

Mr. LANE. It is contrary to public policy, and it is therefore against good morals. No contract can be lawful unless it is in conformity to law, and the law has the right to control the contract. The law is greater than the contract or the parties to the contract.

Now, let me show you what the court did here in this case. In the case of Vaughn vs. Telegraph Company, 14 Wallace, the action was for the loss of a cargo of goods, valued at $2,436 in gold. Now, in this case there was no contract at all. It was simply an action of tort. The court below held that the value of the goods destroyed was $2,436, and they turned round and entered up a judgment for $6,515.51.

Putting it mildly, this might be called legal robbery. This property was worth in gold only a little over $2,000, and the court rendered a judgment for over $6,000. That is the Supreme Court of the United States that rendered this judgment. If you will take and read this case, you will see what the court did in the premises.

A MEMBER. That is the case reported in your report?

Mr. LANE. It is in my brief. I will read you from 12 Wallace, page 548.

But the obligation of a contract to pay money is to pay that which the law shall recognize as money when the payment is to be made. If there is anything settled by decision it is this, and we do not understand it to be controverted.

That is what the Supreme Court itself decided in this class of cases.

Mr. COOMBS. That was not a gold contract.

Mr. LANE. It was in regard to a contract for the payment of money.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Yes; but that gold contract was before the statute establishing the equality of gold and silver and imposing the duty of maintaining that parity.

Mr. LANE. What the gentleman states is true, but the question then before the court was not a question between gold and silver, but the difference between specie or coined money and a legal tender in paper money. At that time there was no question as to a difference between gold and silver. The attempt then was to discredit paper money, and having succeeded in doing that, since that time the war has been made on silver and the attempt made to recognize no money as lawful money but gold.

The act of July 14, 1890, in regard to the purchase of silver bullion, known as the Sherman act, expressly provides that it is "the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals (that is, gold and silver) on a parity with each other upon the present ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law." This was the solemn declaration of Congress, but clearly that was not the intention of Congress in passing this act, for the act destroys the parity of the two metals by prohibiting the free coinage of silver. Parity means equality, and a law that grants a certain right to one metal and denies it to another does not put the two metals on a parity.

The statute does not declare that the parity shall relate to their legal-tender quality or their purchasing power, but simply to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present ratio or such ratio as may be provided by law. But I beg leave to remind gentlemen that the Supreme Court of the United States, so far as I know, has never discriminated against the silver dollar. When the decisions in the cases of Bronson vs. Rodes and Trebilcock vs. Wilson were rendered there was no complaint that a silver dollar was not as good as a gold dollar.

In the first case the promise was to pay in "gold and silver coin," and in the second case in "specie," and the judgments in both cases were for so many "coined dollars." As a matter of course a coined silver dollar would discharge the judgments as well as a coined gold dollar. If, however, a case should be carried to the United States Supreme Court now where the promise would be to pay so many dollars in gold, I do not know whether the court would or not render a judgment for coined dollars. The purpose of this bill is, however, simply to change the law as laid down in these cases where the court discriminated against Treasury notes or greenbacks and denied their validity as a legal tender.

The Congress of the United States declared that Treasury notes should be equal in value to coin, and private parties have no right nor power to annul that law. It is no violation of the right of contract to provide that a certain thing shall not be done, and every act is now regarded as unlawful which the law forbids to be done, and the courts generally hold that contracts made in violation of law are void.

Lobbying contracts are held void on the ground of public policy. Services in procuring contracts from heads of Departments of the Government and to secure appointments to offices or places of trust or an agreement to influence the action of an officer are void. Contracts made on Sunday, wager or gaming contracts are void. Option, future, and margin contracts and contracts in restraint of trade are void. Contracts given for Confederate money are void, as being against public policy. And so should contracts be void that discriminate against Treasury notes, which are a legal tender by law. Contracts for human flesh were permitted by the laws of Venice:

> But, in the cutting it, if thou dost shed
> One drop of Christian blood, thy land and goods
> Are, by the laws of Venice, confiscate
> Unto the state of Venice.

This condition was the restraint on Shylock, but our modern Shylocks oppose all restraint. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COOMBS] asked me some time ago if this bill prevents contracts being made for the payment of a debt in specie, even if the parties desire to so frame the contract.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman states a false assumption in his question. No person ever desires to sign such a contract. No sane man would voluntarily sign such a contract. Such a contract might be signed to-day for a hundred dollars in Treasury notes with the gold or specie clause in it, and within six months gold might go to a premium and the debtor would be compelled to pay $200 in Treasury notes in discharge of his contract for $100. Such things have happened and may happen again, and the law that permits it is manifestly unjust.

There is no equality between the creditor and debtor when the one is about to borrow of the other; the parties are not on equal terms. The debtor is pressed for means and he must yield to the tyrannical exactions of the creditor, whatever his terms are.

If all men were just we would need no laws, but human experience teaches that they are not, and therefore the law must protect the weak against the strong. The question finally resolves itself into one of justice. The reason a gold contract is exacted by the creditor is to protect himself against any fluctuation in our currency.

Why should the debtor alone be held responsible for the stability of the money of the country. Should not this burden be borne as well by the creditor as the debtor. Equality is justice and every man should have an equal chance in the race of life. When an ordinary money contract is given, if the volume of money in the country increases it is to the interest of the debtor, if it decreases it is to the interest of the creditor. These are chances that all business men must take in the affairs of life.

But under the gold contract the rule is changed and the responsibility is all cast on the debtor.

Justice demands that this measure should be enacted into law.

Mr. Speaker, my time has about expired, and I therefore ask permission to extend my remarks and to print in connection with them the report which I made to the House on this bill.

There being no objection permission, is therefore granted.

APPENDIX.

[House Report No. 1270, Fifty-third Congress, second session.]

TO REGULATE AND DISCHARGE THE PAYMENT OF CONTRACTS IN ANY MONEY MADE A LEGAL TENDER BY LAW FOR THE PAYMENT OF DEBTS.

July 17, 1894.—Referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 5217):

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House bill 5217, introduced by Mr. LANE, which reads as follows:

"A bill to regulate and discharge the payment of contracts in any money made a legal tender by law for the payment of debts.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all contracts hereafter executed for the payment of any sum of money, whether in gold, silver, or coin, may be discharged by any money which is by law a legal tender for the payment of debts when the contract matures."

Beg leave to report that they have considered said bill, and find that the purpose of this bill is to regulate the practice in the Federal courts in regard to entering judgments, in requiring such judgments to be expressed in dollars and parts of dollars, and to preserve the stability and uniformity of our currency.

The act of Congress of 1792, establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States, provides that the money of accounts of the United States shall be expressed in dollars, dimes, cents, and mills, and that all proceedings in the courts of the United States shall be kept in conformity with this regulation.

The law now is that gold and silver coin and Treasury notes are a legal tender for the payment of all debts, public and private. There are some exceptions in regard to the payment of customs, etc., in Treasury notes, but this has no application to judgments between private parties. The law makes coined money and Treasury notes a legal tender in the payment of private debts, that is, makes both kinds of money equal for this purpose, and neither the courts nor private individuals have the right to annul the law.

The law is greater than the court or the individual, and neither have the right to set it aside. The courts have no power to legislate or to annul the laws of Congress, or to permit private parties to set aside a public statute. This the Federal courts have done in holding that a judgment can be entered in "coined dollars," which is done for the very purpose of annulling the act of Congress making Treasury notes a legal tender for the payment of debts. In England it was a felony to discredit the money of the realm. The courts of France have held that parties can not, by special contracts, discriminate between the bank notes of the Bank of France, which are made a legal tender, and coin money, which is also a legal tender.

The decision will be found in Bulletin of Appeals of France, volume 75, No. 46, of date February 11, 1873. In the case of Delatre vs. Scouteters the court said: "In a monetary crisis laws directing the legal tender of bank notes have the character of police and surety laws, and are for the public benefit; consequently these laws can not be avoided by written contracts, made either after the promulgation of such laws or even before. Therefore creditors can not, in view of such contracts, refuse payment if it is tendered him in notes of the Bank of France, taking them at their legal value, which is by law equivalent to that of coin." Many other nations of the earth even went further and made it a crime punishable by death to discredit the money of the country.

The State courts of many of the States of the Union have passed on this question, and they hold the law substantially as it was held by the court in France.

These decisions were rendered in the State courts after the passage of the legal-tender act by Congress and before the decision of the United States Supreme Court was fully known. A few of the cases will be examined and the date of trial given.

Attention is first called to the following case:

In 1863, in the case of Wood vs. Bullens, 6 Allen (Mass.), 516, the note was for $500, with this statement in the note: "The above payable in specie." The court held that the note could be discharged in currency, and in deciding the case used this language:

"All the court can do is to treat as money that which the statutes of the United States, legally enacted, declare to be money. If it were in our power to render a specific judgment designating the species of currency in which it should be paid we might avoid some of the existing difficulties, but we have no such authority."

In 1862, in Shoenburger vs. Watts, 10 Am. Law Reg., 553 (Pa.), a bond for $28,000 was executed payable in specie, "current gold and silver of the United States," and the court held that the bond could be discharged in currency. The court says in that case:

"This being the object and design for which the coining and money-making power was given to the Government of the United States in common with all other governments, we may well doubt whether, while that Government has exercised its high prerogative by deciding that certain modes or forms of value shall all be money, and all money be equal, that the same named quantities of each shall be worth as much as any of the others, it can be competent for the citizen to distinguish to make a bargain excluding those with whom he contracts from a means of payment which the law has decided shall be open to and available for all and encumber them with a debt of a new and special nature not capable of being discharged in the way in which the ordinary debts are by law payable."

In 1864, in Schallenberger vs. Brinton, 12 Am. Law Reg., 591 (Pa.), the lease was for ground rent payable in "lawful silver money of the United States," the court held that the rent could be paid in legal-tender notes.

In 1865, in the case of Buchegger vs. Schultz (13 Mich., 420), it is held by the court that a contract for a certain number of "dollars," though stipulated to be paid "in gold," is not a contract for merchandise, but for money, and therefore can be discharged in any lawful money. Judge Cooley delivered the opinion in this case, and in doing so, among other things, he said:

"If legal-tender laws were designed chiefly to confer upon debtors a privilege, there would be force in an argument that the class to be benefited might waive the privilege by stipulation in their contracts. But these laws are also based in great measure upon reasons of State policy, which sometimes to a considerable degree override and disregard individual interests.

"The act in question was based exclusively upon reasons of a public character, which, in the opinion of the lawmaking power, imperatively demands that Treasury notes shall be made equal in legal value to coin, and parties have no more right to stipulate that their contracts shall not be governed by it than those of a particular locality have to agree among themselves that a law shall not be in force in that locality."

In 1865, in Whetstone vs. Colley (30 Ill., 228), suit was on a note for $150, payable in "gold." The court held that the note could be discharged in United States Treasury notes, and in an action thereon evidence as to the value of gold compared with legal-tender Treasury notes is inadmissible.

In 1866, in Appel vs. Woltman (38 Mo., 194), the action was for a recovery of $2,000, which, by the terms of the contract, "should be paid in the current gold coin of the United States, in full tale, or without regard to any legal tender that may be established or declared by any law of Congress." It was held by the court that this contract could be discharged in legal-tender Treasury notes. The court say in this case:

"But by law Congress has made Treasury notes of legal value with gold, and declared they should be legal tenders in satisfaction of private debts. As a legal medium, then, there can not be a distinction taken between them and gold."

Again the court in the same case say:

"It is a notorious fact which has passed into the history of the country that for the purpose of trade and in commercial transactions there is a difference made between Treasury notes and specie coin; but whatever fluctuations there may be arising from extraneous causes the debtor's right to pay in whatever medium he chooses can not be affected. In administering the law gold and Treasury notes must be considered as equal and no difference or discrimination can be allowed."

In 1866, in Brown vs. Welch (26 Ind., 116), the contract was for the "payment of a specified sum in gold or if paid in paper the amount thereof necessary to purchase the gold at the place of payment." It was held by the court that the contract could be discharged in Treasury notes at the sum named in the contract. The court uses this language in the opinion:

"When Treasury notes were made a legal tender in the payment of debts they were made the equivalent of coin as a means of payment in all but the cases excepted by law. If, then, the law makes them equivalent for the purpose of payment, a failure to pay a given sum in gold, as required by contract, can not possibly beget an obligation to pay a greater sum in legal-tender notes, whatever premium men may voluntarily choose to give for gold when forced to obtain it for a specific purpose, or when impelled by a spirit of speculation, or by a weak distrust of the Government."

In 1866, in Rily vs. Sharp (1 Ky., 348), it is held that a note payable in "gold" can be discharged in legal tender in the amount named in the contract.

In 1871, in Kellogg vs. Sweeney (49 N. Y.), $493.51 in gold coin was stolen from the plaintiff, and in a civil suit for its recovery it was held that the amount could be discharged by Treasury notes, although the value of gold coin in currency was $1.59 at the time, and if the matter was in contract the law would be the same. (Chysler vs. Renois, 4 Hand, 209.)

In 1870, in Killough vs. Alford (32 Texas, 457), the court holds that $750, payable "in gold coin, or the equivalent thereof in the United States legal-tender notes" can be paid in legal-tender notes of the United States, and gold coin are the same dollar for dollar; that things which are equal to the same thing are equal to each other.

In 1867, in Beatty vs. Rhodes (3 Nebr., 240), it is held that in the payment of a debt legal-tender notes are in contemplation of law equal to coin, and making the salary of a State officer payable in legal-tender notes after it had previously made it payable in coin is not unconstitutional.

In 1865, in Reise vs. Stearns (29 Cal., 275), a suit was on a contract to pay in gold coin of the United States, "or the equivalent of such gold coin, if paid in legal currency," and it was held that such contract can be paid in any kind of lawful money of the United States. The court say in this case:

"In contemplation of law a dollar in legal-tender notes is equal to and therefore the equivalent of a dollar in coin. In comparing the two kinds of money the law knows no difference in value between them. Where none is adopted the standard of equivalents must be that which the law establishes. Tried by this standard, any given number of dollars in legal-tender notes is equivalent to the same number of dollars in coin."

In 1873, in Glover vs. Robbins (49 Ga., 219), the note was of date October 10, 1864, and in five years after date promised to pay $6,500 in specie with 4 per cent interest. The trial court in this case rendered the following judgment:

"It is there ore considered and ordered by the court that the plaintiff have and recover of the defendant the said sum of $7,540.15 in gold or silver coin or its equivalent in United States currency, for which execution may issue to be levied and collected in gold or silver coin or its equivalent in United States currency, and also that the said plaintiff have and recover of said defendant the costs of this suit, for which execution may issue to be levied in United States currency."

On appeal the supreme court of Georgia reversed this judgment, and in the opinion, among other things, said:

"Yet, as the debt was contracted long after the passage of the legal-tender acts of Congress regulating the payment of such contracts, the judgment should have been for so many dollars only, leaving it to be discharged in any legal-tender currency or money of the United States."

In 1866, in Jump vs. Pettier (18 La. Am. 196), it is held that a note payable in gold can be satisfied by the tender of United States Treasury notes.

In 1872, in Townsend vs. Jennison (44 Vt., 315), the court held that when a debt is payable in specie it is error for the court to allow plaintiff premium on silver coin, there being more than one kind of money called specie, and the kinds being capable of different values.

In 1876, in Hunter vs. Rogers (50 Ala., 283), the court used this language:

"The verdict is for $5,000 in gold, and the judgment follows the verdict. The present law of the United States governs the currency, and defining what shall be legal tender for the payment of debts forbids such a payment. The verdict ought, therefore, to have been for dollars simply. A judgment for dollars in gold is erroneous."

The decisions of the supreme courts of fifteen of the States are now given, and they all hold with singular unanimity that private parties can not discriminate against the different kinds of legal tender in this country. We have here the opinion of fifty judges, many of them men of eminent learning, celebrated as jurists, and of national reputation, among them such men as Judge Cooley, of Michigan, and Judge Breese, of Illinois, all substantially agreeing that the debtor could not be held as an insurer against the fluctuation of our currency and that the debtor could discharge his debt in the payment of Treasury notes made a legal tender. Up to that time such a thing as a judgment in "coin dollars" was unknown to the law. Attention is now called to the decision of the United States Supreme Court on this point.

It is not intended to question the power of Congress to issue Treasury notes or make them a legal tender for the payment of debts. The simple inquiry is, did not the court misinterpret the act of Congress in regard to making Treasury notes a legal tender? If they did, here and now is the time to make the correction. It will further be noticed that these decisions in the United States Supreme Court were by a divided court, sometimes but one judge in the majority, and the dissenting opinion being joined in by sometimes three or even four of the nine judges composing that august tribunal, and the dissenting opinion being in harmony with the decisions of the State courts, as will be seen by a fair comparison. Attention is now called to some of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

In 1868, in Bank vs. Supervisors (7 Wall., 26), the United States Supreme Court held that Treasury notes were not subject to taxation in the same manner and to the same extent as coin issued under like authority, and reversed the decision of the New York court. The decision of the Supreme Court was predicated on the act of February, 1862, which declares that—

"All United States bonds and other securities of the United States held by individuals, associations, or corporations within the United States shall be exempt from taxation by or under State authority."

It was held that Congress had the power to make this difference between coin and Treasury notes; so it will be seen that this case has no application to the question presented by this bill.

In 1868, in Lane County vs. Oregon (7 Wall., 71), the Legislature of Oregon passed a statute enacting that the sheriff of that State shall pay over to the county treasurer the full amount of the State and school taxes in gold and and silver coin. The county of Lane brought suit against the sheriff to recover $5,460.96 in gold and silver coin. The sheriff answered that he had tendered the amount in United States notes, but the circuit court held this was not a good tender and rendered judgment against the sheriff for the sum claimed, in gold and silver coin with costs. This judgment was affirmed by the supreme court of the State and also by the United States Supreme Court. The reason for this decision was placed on the distinct ground that the law making United States notes a legal tender for debts has no reference to taxes imposed by State authority. So it can be safely claimed that this case has little or no bearing on the question at issue, as this bill only applies to private debts.

In 1868, in Bronson vs. Rodes (7 Wall., 229), a bond or note was given for $1,400, payable in gold and silver coin, with 7 per cent interest, payable also in coin. A tender of $1,507 in United States notes, the nominal amount of the note, was made and refused.

At this time $1 in coin was worth $2.25 in United States notes. So the question is here fairly presented, whether the United States notes have an equal debt-paying power as coin and whether the practice should be that judgments may be entered for "coined dollars and parts of dollars" on coin contracts, and in dollars generally in other cases. In this case the supreme court of New York held that the plea of tender was not a good plea, but on appeal to the supreme court in general term the plea was held good and this judgment was affirmed by the court of appeals of New York and the case was brought to the United States Supreme Court, when the judgment was reversed, Justice Miller dissenting.

The United States Supreme Court held in this case that a bond or note, payable in gold and silver coin, must be paid in coined dollars and can only be satisfied by the payment of coined dollars, and that such judgments may be entered for coined dollars and parts of dollars.

A judgment for coined dollars is a judicial curiosity. When Congress made Treasury notes a legal tender it was clearly the intention to give those notes the same purchasing and debt-paying power as coin, and public policy demanded that the statutes should be so construed. A "coin judgment" is also an undesirable innovation in our judicial practice.

In Butler vs. Harwitz (7 Wall., 258), the decision in Brownson vs. Rodes is followed.

In 1869, in Willard vs. Taylor (8 Wall., 557), the court in a suit in equity for the specific performance of contract, decreed that the complainant should pay in gold, although the contract which was made in 1854 did not in express terms contract for gold payment.

This case had no general application and does not demand further notice.

In 1869, in Hepburn vs. Griswold (8 Wall., 604), a suit was brought on a note of date June 20, 1860, for $11,250, but there was no express promise to pay the note in gold. In March, 1864, the maker of the note tendered $12,720 in Treasury notes in full payment. The trial court held the tender good, and the case was taken to the court of errors of Kentucky, which reversed the judgment, and the case was then taken to the United States Supreme Court, where the judgment of the court of errors of Kentucky was affirmed.

The United States Supreme Court placed the decision in this case on the ground that the act making Treasury notes a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, had no application to debts contracted before the passage of the act, Justices Miller, Swayne, and Davis dissenting. This case has since been overruled by the court, and therefore has no application now.

In Knox vs. Lee and Parker vs. Davis (12 Wall., 457), the decision in Hepburn vs. Griswald (8 Wall., 603), is overruled, and the court holds that the acts of Congress known as the legal-tender acts are constitutional when applied to contracts made before their passage, the Chief Justice and Justices Clifford, Field, and Nelson dissenting. It will be noticed, however, that there was no express contract to pay in coin in this case.

In 1871, in Trebilock vs. Wilson (12 Wall., 687), a note was given for $900, due in one year, with 10 per cent interest, "payable in specie." The amount due on the note was, after its maturity, tendered in United States notes, being a legal tender for all debts, public and private. The district court of Iowa held that the tender was good. The case was then appealed to the supreme court of Iowa and the decree was affirmed; the case was then brought to the United States Supreme Court and the decree reversed, Justice Bradley and Miller dissenting. The United States Supreme Court held that the note could not be discharged in its nominal value in Treasury notes, but that the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment to be entered for the payment of "coined dollars."

In 1871, in Vaughan vs. Telegrap (14 Wall., 258), the action was for the loss of a cargo of goods, valued at $2,436 in gold, and the decree was for $4,896.30 and interest, making in all $6,515.51. At this time gold was 101 per cent above legal-tender notes. On appeal from the United States circuit court at New York to the United States Supreme Court this decree was affirmed, the Chief Justice and Justices Clifford and Field dissenting. The principle announced in this case seems to be indefensible.

In the first place, the court heard evidence and found that the value of the goods destroyed was $2,436 in gold, and then heard further testimony and found that $2,436 in gold was worth $4,896.30, more than double the value of the goods, and rendered judgment for this sum and the interest, making $6,515.51. If this was not simple robbery, it was very near of kin to it. Why should the debtor be held alone responsible for the fluctuation of the currency when Congress declared that currency and coin money should be a legal tender, dollar for dollar, one as good as the other? What right had the court to annul the law in order to favor the creditor? It can not be explained.

It is no part of the design of this bill to consider the authority of Congress to issue Treasury notes and declare them a legal tender. These were burning questions at one time in this country, but they may be regarded as settled now. Before the adoption of the Constitution the power of coining gold and silver and emitting bills of credit or making money and declaring it a legal tender existed in the several States, but now by the Constitution it is prohibited in all the States except the right to make gold and silver a legal tender.

The power to issue money does not exist in the States, and it must therefore exist, if at all, in Congress. The fact is not forgotten that a great many constitutional lawyers believe that when the Constitution was drafted the intention of its framers was not to grant to the General Government the right to emit bills of credit, and if the General Government did have a right to issue bills of credit in certain emergencies, still they had no right to make them a legal tender. The United States Supreme Court, however, has finally held that Congress has the power in times of peace or war to issue Treasury notes, and also to make them a legal tender.

These questions are now settled in the affirmative, it is true, by a divided court, but they are settled, and it is to be hoped that they will remain so. But the trouble now is that, after the court decided that Congress can make Treasury notes a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, the court annuls its own decision by holding that these coin contracts can be satisfied by entering a "coin judgment." The uniform judgment of common-law courts is for a specific sum of money in pounds and parts of pounds, or in dollars and parts of dollars, leaving such judgment to be discharged in whatever has been rightfully made a legal tender for the payment of debts.

Judgments are not rendered and can not be rendered without an act of the Legislature or Congress in anything but dollars. Congress can say what a dollar shall be, and in such dollars judgments of courts shall be paid. It is the stamp of the Government that bestows upon a piece of gold or silver the value of a dollar. So Congress can make Treasury notes money, transmitting, if you please, the paper into coin and cause it to pass in all private transactions at their declared value, and all judgments rendered by the courts between individuals being entered up for dollars can, and of a right should be, discharged in dollars, paper money as well as coin.

When Congress declared that Treasury notes should be lawful money and a legal tender for the payment of all debts, public and private, the design was to render paper dollars legally equivalent to specie and an adequate performance of a contract expressly stipulating for payment in coin.

If the law does not mean this it means nothing. When the parties intended by their contract that money should be paid, then it can be paid in any lawful money. This is made plain by the court itself. In Knox vs. Lee (12 Wall., 566) Justice Bradley, in concurring in the opinion of the majority of the court, among other things said:

"So long as the money of the country, in whatever terms described, is in contemplation of the parties it is the object of the legal-tender laws to make the credit of the Government a lawful substitute. Therefore, if the contract is for the delivery of a chattel or a specific commodity or substance the law does not apply. If it is bona fide for so many carats of diamonds, or so many ounces of gold as bullion, the specific contract must be performed. But if terms which naturally import such a contract are used by way of evasion, and money only is intended, the law reaches the case. Not but that Congress might limit the operation of the law in any way it pleased. It might make an exception of cases when the contract expressly promises gold and silver money. But if it has not done so, if the enactment is general in its terms, specific promises to pay the money in specie are just as much subject to the operation of the law as a mere promise to pay so many dollars, for in contemplation of law is a promise to pay in specie."

No language could be plainer than this. Can any person doubt that in the cases cited and decided by the court it was not the intention that money was to be paid and not a commodity delivered?

There are but two of the foregoing cases that have a direct bearing on this question, and those are the cases of Brownson vs. Rodes and Trebilock vs. Wilson. In the first case the court tells us that a contract was given for $1,400, payable in gold and silver coin. Then there can be no doubt but it was a contract for the payment of money, coupled with an attempt to hold the maker as a guarantor against any fluctuation in the currency.

Now, a promissory note is an agreement in writing to pay a certain person a certain sum of money by a time certain. These three elements are indispensable to a promissory note. An agreement to deliver to a certain person a certain number of ounces of gold or silver by a day certain is not a promissory note, nor is it a negotiable instrument. If, therefore, the note for $1,400 was not for a sum of money, but the amount had to be fixed by testimony as to the difference between coin and Treasury notes, then the sum would not be certain, and the court was in error in calling it a promissory note. It was payable in gold or silver coin, so it is uncertain in which coin.

Suppose a suit was brought on this note at the present time; it might become a question in which coin it should be paid. Some members of Congress state on the floor of the House that a silver dollar is only worth 50 or 70 cents, and it is supposed they would swear to it if called on in court, and in that event in which coin would the court hold that the note could be discharged?

No one can tell. If parties have a right to discriminate between Treasury notes and coin, then they have the right to discriminate between the coins themselves, and the whole matter is at sea. Nor did it help the matter for the court to legislate that the judgment should be for "coined dollars," for the same trouble still remained.

The means of satisfying a judgment is by execution. The execution must follow the judgment and be founded on it. What would a sheriff or a marshal do with an execution for "coined dollars?" The usual language of an execution is a command to the officer to cause to be made so many dollars out of the defendant by levying the same on his goods and chattels, lands and tenements, etc. When the execution would be for coined dollars then the sheriff would be compelled to sell the property of the defendant, and if he could not get coined dollars, and then he would be compelled to accept Treasury notes and with that buy gold or silver coin, how would he determine what price he would pay? What market would control the price of coin as compared with Treasury notes? Such a system leads to endless confusion.

Again, suppose the promise was to pay $1,400 in wheat. The promiser would have the right to discharge his note by tendering $1,400 worth of wheat, but if he defaulted and suit should be brought on the paper the court would not inquire into the value of wheat but simply render a judgment for $1,400. The instrument itself fixed the measure of damages. Now suppose in the place of wheat the word "gold" should be used—gold is simply a commodity and the rule would not be changed, and in default of payment in gold the judgment would be for $1,400. The parties themselves in their contract fixed the amount to be paid at $1,400, no more nor no less. And the contract further provided that this sum should be paid in gold and silver coin; so according to the very terms of the contract the maker had a right to pay $1,400 in gold and silver coin, and if gold and silver were at a premium then why should not the maker of the contract be allowed to satisfy the claim with less than $1,400 in gold coin? But the truth is the promise was for $1,400, and the judgment should be for that sum.

All that has been said with reference to the case of Brownson vs. Rodes applies with even greater force to the case of Trebilock vs. Wilson (12 Wall., 687). In this case a promissory note was given for a debt of $900, payable in "specie." Now, what is specie? It is coin; gold, silver, and copper as currency. How could the court determine what kind of specie would discharge this note? Suppose a promise is made to pay $900 in wheat, oats, or corn. The maker could discharge the obligation by a tender of $900 worth of either of these commodities. These three articles were of different values, and if default was made in the payment of the note the court would not go into an investigation of the value of the wheat, oats, and corn, but would render a judgment for $900. The court was correct in the Vermont case just cited when they said that it was "error for the court to allow plaintiff premium on silver coin, there being more than one kind of money called specie and the kinds being capable of different values."

Again, the maker of this promise to pay $900 in coin could lawfully discharge it in silver half dollars and quarter dollars. When, then, did the court find authority to render judgment for "coined dollars"? It was clearly a money contract, and Judge Cooley was right when he said in Buchegger vs. Schultz:

"The act in question (meaning the legal-tender act) was based exclusively upon reasons of a public character, which, in the opinion of the lawmaking power, imperatively demanded that Treasury notes should be made equal in legal value to coin, and parties have no right to stipulate that their contracts shall not be governed by it."

Parties can not make contracts in violation of public policy. The statute of usury can not be annulled by contract; gambling contracts, and contracts for the sale of margins and for speculation in the rise and fall of commodities, and contracts for the sale of "puts" and "calls," and contracts in restraint of trade, are all void.

A contract to defeat a public statute is void. No lawyer will deny this proposition, for it can be sustained by unlimited authority from the courts of this and other countries.

Congress passed a public statute making Treasury notes equal in legal value to coin in the payment of debts; yet in the two cases mentioned the Supreme Court held that the parties could by private contract annul and defeat this statute. The rule is a menace to trade and commerce. A party desires to borrow money to go into business, and when he applies for it he is told that there must be the usual gold clause in the note. The risk is too much, and he refuses to borrow. It is to the interest of society that money should be used in business. The borrowers of money are the men who build our railroads, span our rivers, tunnel the mountains, build cities and towns, churches and schoolhouses, and engage in our vast industrial pursuits, all at great risk to them financially, and it is unjust in addition to the risk of their business to hold them responsible for the fluctuation of the currency. This rule also offers a premium for rascality. When the money of the country is loaned in the gold contracts, then the money power can greatly increase their wealth by forcing gold to a premium and compel the debtor to pay double the amount of money borrowed.

There can be no stable currency in this country if private parties are permitted to contract against a certain kind of currency and in favor of another kind, both of which the law declares shall be equal. Legal tender is a function of money, and no private contract should be permitted to annul it. Contracts must be made in pursuance of law and not contrary to it. There is no class of persons in this country who should be more interested in sustaining the commercial law of the land and the financial policy of the Government than the credit class.

When default is made in their contracts for the payment of money they apply to the courts to enforce the law for its collection, and, therefore, they should not themselves violate the law when they make their contracts and demonetize the money of the country. The creditor and debtor rarely ever occupy the same vantage ground. The necessities of the debtor often deprive him of the freedom of contract.

The object of law is to defend the weak against the strong, "to restrain men from injuring one another." "Equal and exact justice to all and special privileges to none," is the basis of all free governments; and it is not just to the debtor that he should be held liable for any and all fluctuations that may take place in the currency between the date of contract and the time of performance. The creditor should be willing to submit to the law and accept on his money contract the money declared by Congress to be legal tender for the payment of all debts.

This is what the United States Supreme Court declared in its second legal-tender decision, when it used this language:

"The obligation of a contract to pay money is to pay that which the law recognizes as money when the payment is to be made."

The flag of the country is pledged to sustain our financial system, and to make every dollar of our money equal to every other dollar in purchasing and debt-paying power, and no person should have the right to repudiate the money or the flag of the Republic. Patriotism, justice, and State policy demand that this bill should become a law, amended, however, by adding after the word "contract" in line 3 of said bill, the following words, to-wit: "Hereafter executed;" and as amended the bill is reported back to the House with a recommendation that the same do pass.

Mr LANE. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Committee on Appropriations desire to submit a conference report, and as they could take us off the floor anyway, I am willing to yield now. I suppose, however, that when the conference report is disposed of I may be permitted to occupy the remainder of the hour.

The SPEAKER. Without objection that can be done.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will merely state that I intend to withdraw this bill and present another one, inasmuch as the time at command will not give sufficient opportunity for the discussion of this measure.

Mr. WARNER. I trust the gentleman will allow the time to be so divided as not to have the discussion of this bill, which goes into the RECORD, all on one side.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am going to withdraw the bill.

Mr. WARNER. Well, that is one way to defeat it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, after the conference report is disposed of, twenty minutes will be given to the consideration of this bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7477) making appropriations to supply the deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 7668) to authorize the St. Louis, Avoyelles and Southwestern Railway Company to bridge Bayou Des Glaises and Atchafalaya River, in the State of Louisiana; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 859) for the relief of B. D. Greene.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bill of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. Res. 101) providing for clerical assistance in the Health Department of the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. 1713) to permit Commodore Louis C. Sartori, now on the retired list of the Navy, to be a rear-admiral on said list in accordance with his original position on the Navy Register.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I present the conference report on the bill (H. R. 7477) making appropriations to supply deficiences.

As the report is quite long, I ask that the reading of it be dispensed with, that only the statement of the House conferees be read, and that the report be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

For conference report see Senate proceedings.

The statement of the House conferees was read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 7477, making appropriations to supply deficiencies, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action recommended in the accompanying conference report, namely:

The bill as it passed the Senate appropriated $7,939,551.41, being an increase of $2,934,518.83 over the bill as it passed the House.

Of this sum, $1,809,539.70 is to pay a judgment in favor of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and upon this amendment the committee of conference have been unable to agree; $77,453.34 is for payment of certain so-called charter party cases and insurance claims, from which it is recommended that the Senate recede, together with other amendments involving appropriations amounting to $107,163.06.

It is recommended that the House agree to the amendments appropriating $940,362.73, to cover deficiencies, final judgments of the Court of Claims, and audited accounts certified to Congress since the passage of the bill by the House. An additional appropriation of $250,000, for fees and expenses of marshals, United States courts, is recommended in the conference report, in accordance with a recommendation of the Attorney-General, certifying that at least that sum will be necessary to settle accounts on account of the fiscal year 1894.

Exclusive of the judgment of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the bill as finally agreed upon appropriates $6,202,903.91, being $1,736,647.50 less than as it passed the Senate, and $1,197,871.33 more than as it passed the House.

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inform the House that all the differences between the two Houses upon this bill have been settled with the exception of one item, amounting to about $1,500,000 in round numbers, in relation to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and I suggest to my colleague on the conference committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], that the House be asked to agree to the partial report, leaving that item still open for discussion.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is, the gentleman desires the House to adopt the report?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. What has been done about the judgments for Indian depredation claims?

Mr. SAYERS. The item was increased $50,000. It passed the House at $100,000, and was increased $50,000 in conference.

Mr. PICKLER. And was the provision retained which the House adopted with regard to a future investigation?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to have a few minutes before this report is adopted. I understand that there is still one amendment upon which no agreement has been reached.

Before this vote is taken I would be glad to have two minutes to state generally my understanding as to the appropriations of this session——

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to my friend that when the deficiency bill comes back I will yield to him. We want to pass the sundry civil bill immediately; but when we come back with our final report on the general deficiency bill, the gentleman can have as much time as he wants.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. There will be no final report in a certain contingency. If the House should insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment, we would have to go into conference again; if the Senate should recede from its amendment, that would pass the bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly. I am willing to accommodate the gentleman from Illinois as to the time he desires to occupy.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think I had better take a few minutes now, as my friend from Iowa [Col. HENDERSON], who is now temporarily absent, desires to be heard when the deficiency bill comes up.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well, I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois as much time as he desires.

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman from Illinois begins, the House will receive a message from the Senate.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from consideration for a few minutes the report on the general deficiency bill in order that the House may agree to the report on the sundry civil bill. It is important that this bill should be enrolled and signed as quickly as possible.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the conference report on the deficiency bill will be temporarily withdrawn, and the House will take up the conference report on the sundry civil bill. The Clerk will read the statement of the House conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the sundry civil appropriation bill, submit the following written statement in explanation of the action recommended in the accompanying conference report on each of the amendments, namely:

On amendment numbered 11: Strikes out the appropriation of $100,000 proposed by the Senate for the purchase of sites for and commencement of buildings at Cheyenne, Wyo.; Boise City, Idaho; Helena, Mont.; and Spokane, Wash.

On amendment numbered 110: Strikes out the appropriation of $105,000 proposed by the Senate for the sufferers of the Ford Theater disaster, and inserts in lieu thereof provision for a joint commission of the two Houses to investigate and report upon the claims of said sufferers.

On amendment numbered 118: Appropriates $25,000, as proposed by the Senate, for a quarantine station at Southport, N. C.

On amendment numbered 119: Strikes out the appropriation of $40,000 proposed by the Senate for a quarantine station at or near the mouth of the Columbia River.

On amendments numbered 127, 128, 133, and 134: Strikes out the appropriations proposed by the Senate of $10,000 for the purchase of the etectric-light plant in the Senate wing of the Capitol and $10,000 for the repairs and extension thereof, and restores to the bill the provision proposed to be stricken out by the Senate authorizing the payment of $200 per month rent for the electric-light plants in the Senate and House wings during the sessions of Congress; and strikes out the provision proposed by the Senate authorizing the introduction of electric-light current into the Capitol building by any existing electric-light company in Washington.

On amendment numbered 145: Authorizes the use of $16,000 of the appropriation made for surveys of public land, for making a resurvey of lands in Grant and Hooker Counties, Nebr., and makes a verbal correction in the text of the bill.

On amendment numbered 238: Appropriates $45,000, instead of $86,000, as proposed by the Senate, for dry dock at Puget Sound, Washington.

On amendment numbered 261: Appropriates $5,000, instead of $16,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the Bureau of American Republics, and places said Bureau under the control and direction of the Secretary of State, and requires him to report to Congress at its next session the propriety of continuing said Bureau, or if any obligation exists on the part of the Government for its continuance.

On amendment numbered 270: Strikes out the provision, proposed by the Senate, fixing the salary of the assistant librarian in charge of the Law Library at $1,000, and allowing him $480 for laborer's service.

On amendment numbered 277: Strikes out the amendment, proposed by the House, providing for the purchase of additional land for the Government Printing Office, and for the construction of additional buildings thereon.

On amendments numbered 278 and 279: Appropriates $200,000 for the Cotton States and International Exposition at Atlanta, Ga., in terms substantially in accordance with the instructions of the House.

On amendment numbered 280: Provides for the reclamation of desert lands as provided by the House, with an amendment that not less than 20 acres of each 160-acre tract shall be irrigated, reclaimed, occupied, and cultivated by actual settlers.

The bill as finally agreed upon appropriates $34,209,776.05, being $1,991,390.65 less than as it passed the Senate, and $1,696,393.25 more than as it passed the House.

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
JOS. H. O'NEIL,
W. COGSWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Before the question is taken, I would like to occupy three or four minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire only to call attention to the receding on the part of the Senate from amendment numbered 11, providing an appropriation for the purchase of sites for public buildings in the four new States—in Boise City, Idaho; Cheyenne, Wyo.; Helena, Mont., and Spokane, Wash.

Taking into consideration the environment of this question, the conditions operating in that section of the Union, and the further fact that this amendment was placed on the sundry civil bill in the other end of the Capitol, it seems to me the House conferees might, in their extreme liberality, have granted to each of these new States a public building for United States courts, for marshals' offices, for postal purposes, and for other official uses needed by the Government. I believe that every State in the Union is provided with at least one public building except the States of Wyoming, Idaho, and Montana.

The difficulty in this case, Mr. Speaker, is that the responsibility for the failure of this appropriation will be regarded as coming with peculiar and particular hardship upon the Representatives of these States in the House. I do not know of anything in the nature of appropriations with which I have had any connection since I have been in the House that will cause me personally, perhaps, so much damage as the defeat of this amendment. By reason of the fact that when the amendment was placed on the appropriation bill it was telegraphed to the various newspapers of our locality, causing the people to become intensely interested; all the responsibility for the defeat of the amendment will now be regarded as falling upon the members from the various new States, to which the amendment appertains.

The postal receipts at the town of Spokane are $60,000 a year. It is the headquarters of a postal division. Besides, we have there the United States court, United States marshal's offices, United States land office, the offices of the deputy collector of internal revenue and deputy collector of customs, etc. It seems to me that now, when the opportunity offers, the Government should acquire a site there, because in the course of a year or two it may not be able to do so; for since the great fire of 1889 which swept over that city and destroyed $6,000,000 worth of property, the available sites for the location of a public building are being rapidly appropriated.

I am not here (in the language of a gentleman who addressed the House the other evening) asking for pity; but I do think that in view of the large appropriations embraced in this bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors; in view of the large appropriations made in every direction by this Congress, it would have been nothing more than fair and just to have granted to these four States these sites for the erection of public buildings. You must of necessity come to it sooner or later.

I had on this floor a controversy relative to an appropriation for a public building that was already constructed in the State that my friend from Texas represents so ably and honorably on this floor. There they had no United States court; there their postal receipts were not equal to ours. But they came here and got a provision for a third story to be placed on their building on this sundry civil bill. Now, if they could not pass that bill through the House; if I could not pass mine through the House for a similar purpose, it seems to me that if the new States are to be cut out from any consideration, then all of them should be placed upon the same footing, and all of this appropriation should have been stricken out.

I know, sir, and I make my public acknowledgment of the fact now, that the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has upon many occasions rendered not only to myself but to the people of my State great services, and I here and now wish to thank him for myself and for them for the many and extensive acts of courtesy shown through his committee. I am not here to criticise the gentleman on this subject; but I do think I may be permitted to say that all the responsibility for the defeat of this amendment should not have been placed on the members of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield now what time my colleague on the committee desires.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to occupy but a very few moments.

As the statement of the conferees set forth, the amendment agreed to in the report in regard to the Atlanta Exposition is substantially in accord with the instructions of the House itself. The only material variance is in retaining the Government building exclusively for the Government exhibit.

The House instructions involved the setting apart of the vacant space in that building for the exhibit of the colored people. It was thought best, however, that the Government exhibit should occupy the Government building exclusively; and this was yielded because of the assurance that the corporation itself would erect a proper structure for the colored exhibit; and in this connection, and at the request of the friends of that exposition, I desire to have read from the desk as a part of my remarks the following letter:

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 14, 1894.

Hon. JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Chairman House committee in conference on the sundry civil bill:

SIR: The Cotton States and International Exposition Company hereby guarantees that said company will provide upon their grounds a suitable building, to contain not less than 25,000 square feet of space, and as much more as may be needed for an exhibit by the colored people of the United States, free of all expense for rent and entrance fees for exhibits.

Said space so provided to be used exclusively by said race for the purpose of making exhibit of the progress of the said race in education, art, mining, agriculture, and all other pursuits and industries; said exhibit to be made at the time and under the rules and regulations governing all other exhibits.

In witness whereof, the said Exposition Company hereunto attaches its signature by its president.

THE COTTON STATES AND INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION COMPANY,
By C. A. COLLIER, President.
EVAN P. HOWELL, Director.
CLEMENT A. EVANS, Director.

In presence of:
J. B. GORDON, United States Senator.

Mr. SAYERS. I will yield a few minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire, as a Representative of one of the Northwestern States, to join in the commendatory words of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WILSON] in regard to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], for his uniform courtesy and consideration of the interests of our section of the country.

I desire now, with the gentleman's permission, to ask one or two questions in regard to the agreement just submitted. I understand the conference committee agree to the proposition to donate the million acres of land to the States, with an amendment?

Mr. SAYERS. With an amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman please state the purport of the amendment?

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman will recollect that the amendment of the House provided that the 160 acres of land should not only be occupied, but also cultivated. Instead of that, we now provide that at least 20 acres of the land shall be occupied, cultivated, and irrigated. We thought that if you let the House amendment stand, requiring the entire 160 acres to be cultivated and irrigated, it would be of little or no benefit to the States; but by only requiring that at least 20 acres of it shall be cultivated or irrigated, the real purpose of the House would be accomplished.

Mr. PICKLER. I did not understand the House bill required that; but I am glad that it is made certain and definite.

Mr. SAYERS. We consider it as more liberal to the States than the House amendment as it originally stood.

I will state to the gentleman that we have further increased the sum appropriated for surveys to $250,000. It was $175,000 as the House passed it, and we increased it $75,000 more, making $250,000 in all.

Mr. PICKLER. Then one more question, with the gentleman's consent. I have felt a great deal of interest, as I have constituents who are directly involved, in the Ford's Theater disaster. That question goes over, I understand.

Mr. SAYERS. The agreement reached by the conferees amounts to this: That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House appoint five Senators and five Members who shall investigate the matter and report to the two Houses.

Mr. PICKLER. When?

Mr. SAYERS. At the next session.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, will this matter be then disposed of?

Mr. SAYERS. That is for the House to determine.

Mr. PICKLER. But will they come to a conclusion and make their report?

Mr. SAYERS. That is for the commission to say. They have the power to act if they choose to do so.

Mr. PICKLER. If it were going to put the matter off indefinitely I should have very grave objections.

Mr. SAYERS. That was certainly not the intention of the conferees.

Mr. COOMBS. This is a very specific arrangement.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. It was the distinct understanding, I will state with the gentleman's consent, in the conference committee that this was not an attempt on the part of the conferees to evade any responsibility of the United States at all, but was an honest effort on the part of the committee, through a commission to be appointed in the manner suggested, to secure a report of all the facts by the time Congress meets in December for whatever action was proper to be taken at that time.

Mr. PICKLER. I think I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ONEIL] this morning in private conversation to say that it not only relates to death claims, but to all claims.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. To claims growing out of the Ford's Theater disaster.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to amend the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. O'NEIL] by saying that so far as my understanding goes, and speaking for myself, it was not intended to admit any responsibility on the part of the Government for that disaster.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. I meant simply the responsibility, if any existed.

Mr. HERMANN. What changes have been made by the conferees as to the arid lands provision?

Mr. SAYERS. The only change was, that instead of requiring the whole 160 acres to be occupied, cultivated, and irrigated, it only requires that at least 20 acres of the 160 shall be so occupied, cultivated, and irrigated, making it more favorable to the States than the House amendments.

Mr. HERMANN. Then, in that case, upon proof being made to the Secretary of the Interior, that 20 acres have been regularly cultivated and resided upon, that will carry the remainder of the 160 acres into title?

Mr. SAYERS. That is my understanding of the matter.

Mr. HERMANN. Then, I ask the gentleman further whether the precaution has been taken by the conferees as to requiring that these prerequisites shall be complied with before title vests in the State?

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to the gentleman from Oregon that the amendment adopted by the House was passed with the single amendment thereto, requiring that at least 20 acres of the land be occupied, cultivated, and irrigated before title should pass.

Mr. HERMANN. Otherwise the McRae amendment stands.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. COFFEEN].

[Mr. COFFEEN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SAYERS. I ask for a vote on the conference report.

Mr. BRYAN. Was there any concession made in regard to the arid lands on which we passed the resolution the other day?

Mr. SAYERS. The conferees amended the House amendment, by making it more favorable, putting 20 acres in as the minimum, instead of 160, to be cultivated and irrigated, and not requiring them to cultivate 160 acres.

Mr. BRYAN. Did you include Nebraska and Kansas, or did you consider them included in the present terms of the bill?

Mr. SAYERS. We adopted the resolution passed by the House.

The question was taken on the motion to agree to the conference report; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. TARSNEY] announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. COFFEEN. Division.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that demand. I am as much interested in this matter as the gentleman from Wyoming, and it is impossible to secure anything. I appeal to him to withdraw that motion. We can not help ourselves. If we could I would be with the gentleman until the last moment in attempting to accomplish something.

Mr. COFFEEN. I am not disposed to be captious, but you have given us no time to consider the injustice which has been done to our States.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I hope you will withdraw your demand. We are interested the same as you are.

Mr. COFFEEN. I withdraw on that plea.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes have it; and the report of the committee on conference is agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I have returned good for evil to my friend from Texas. [Laughter.]

INSPECTION OF LIVE STOCK.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to consider at this time a bill of great public interest to the entire meat industries of the United States, in relation to the enforcement of a section of the law now upon the statute books. If the Clerk will read the bill, it will explain itself or I will explain it to the House.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know how much time it will take.

Mr. HATCH. It will not take two minutes to explain it.

The report is only a few lines, and I will explain it to the House. I do not think that any gentleman will object, and if they do I will withdraw it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7910) to amend "An act to provide for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, and the carcasses and products thereof, which are the subjects of interstate commerce, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, etc., That the "Act to provide for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, and the carcasses and products thereof, which are the subjects of interstate commerce, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, be, and the same is hereby, amended by the addition of the following section, which shall be designated as "section 8" of said act, and which shall read as follows, to wit:

"SEC. 8. That the Secretary is hereby authorized to make such rules, regulations, and orders as he may decide to be necessary to prevent the transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, of the condemned carcasses or parts of carcasses of cattle, sheep, and swine, or the edible products of the same, which have been inspected in accordance with the act entitled 'An act to provide for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, and the carcasses and products thereof, which are the subjects of interstate commerce, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891. Any person, company, or corporation owning or operating any such slaughter-house, abattoir, or meat curing, packing, or canning establishment, or any employé of the same, that shall willfully violate any rule, regulation, or order made pursuant to this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished for each offense by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court, one-half of the fine to go to the informer."

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I would state to the House, in explanation of this matter, that it is simply to carry out the provisions of a law now upon the statute books in regard to the inspection of meats for interstate commerce, in which an omission was made as to any penalty for the violation of the law in taking the carcasses or any part of the carcasses condemned and putting it on the market for sale. The Secretary of Agriculture, in a personal conversation, and in a letter written, part of which is embodied in this report, states that he has ascertained, after having complied with the law and made the inspection of animals, such as lump-jawed cattle and cholera hogs, and they had been condemned and sent to the tanks for rendering into grease, he found portions of them had been stolen out of the tanks, after being put into them, and shipped outside of the State and sold for human food.

The Secretary says that it is impossible for him to execute the law properly without this additional legislation, and he asks that it be passed at once, and I have asked unanimous consent to pass it, so that it may be sent to the Senate and passed before we adjourn. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to consider this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOMBS. What is the usual course taken with condemned cattle after being slaughtered.

Mr. HATCH. I can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. COOMBS. I want to ask a question for information as to the disposition of these condemned cattle?

Mr. HATCH. The law is that after the meat has been inspected either at a slaughterhouse, a packing house, or a canning establishment, and has been found defective, and for any reason unfit for human food, it shall be condemned by the inspector, and under the regulation of the Department the owner of the carcass can only take it to a rendering establishment to be rendered into what is known as common grease, and it is for the violation of that rule (which had no penalty attached to it) that we ask this additional legislation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HATCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the general deficiency bill, and I ask consent that the members of the Committee on Appropriations have leave to print remarks on the subject of the appropriations made by the present and previous Congresses. That is a privilege which has always been granted to members of the Committee on Appropriations ever since I have been a member of this House.

There was no objection to the request of Mr. SAYERS, and it was so ordered.

[Mr. COFFEEN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague on the committee [Mr. CANNON of Illinois] such time as he may desire.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under our Constitution and laws the Congress appropriates the moneys for the public service and the President expends the same. In practice the Congress appropriates from year to year for the service of the succeeding year. The law requires the Executive to send to each session of Congress his estimates in detail for the public service and the amounts he desires therefor. There are, however, certain appropriations for the public service made by permanent law, and known as "permanent," as distinguished from annual appropriations. Among the permanent appropriations are those for the interest on the public debt, the collection of the customs revenues, the sinking fund, etc.

When the Executive forwards yearly to Congress his estimates for annual appropriations he also forwards his estimate of the amount that will be expended for the coming year under permanent law. Mr. Cleveland, by his estimates, asked Congress to appropriate for the public service, for the coming fiscal year, including permanent appropriations, $520,662,840.71, and Congress has appropriated for such service $490,668,369.51. This, in round numbers, is $30,000,000 less than the President asked for the public service. A large part of this $30,000,000, however, will be appropriated next winter by way of deficiencies.

I hold in my hand a table which I will submit, to be printed as a part of and at the conclusion of my remarks. It is a comparative statement of appropriations made at this Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, next, with appropriations made at the first and second sessions of the last Congress (the Fifty-second Congress), and at the first and second session of the Fifty-first, commonly known as the "Reed Congress."

This statement shows, Mr. Speaker—and such is the fact—that the appropriations this year are greater by $27,269,858.72 than were those made by the first session of the Fifty-first, or "Reed Congress." The statement also shows that the appropriations made this year are $28,835,989.70 less than those made at the second session of the last or Fifty-second Congress. The Democrats controlled the House in both the last Congress and this. But, Mr. Speaker, I ask the House and the country to notice that this reduction is covered by the item for pensions alone. There was appropriated this year for pensions $29,099,504.85 less than was appropriated last year. It will be noticed, therefore, that the appropriations this year, excepting pensions, are greater than the appropriations made last year by $263,515.15.

Mr. Speaker, the total appropriations for the Fifty-first, or "Reed Congress," two years, were $988,417,183.34; those for the Fifty-second, or last Congress, two years, were $1,027,104,547.92; and it is absolutely certain that, starting off at $490,000,000, as we do, for this year, when the deficiencies are added next winter to the regular appropriations then to be made for the coming year, the total appropriations will aggregate at least $1,050,000,000 for the Fifty-third Congress, unless by unfriendly administration further heavy reductions are made in payment of pensions.

In the main, Mr. Speaker, these appropriations are necessary. Ours is the greatest country on earth, and the demands of the public service will grow as the country grows. I would not call attention to this matter now were it not that in 1890, 1891, and 1892 the Democrats in the House, in the press, on the stump, and everywhere in the country, denounced the Republicans for having made the Fifty-first Congress a "billion-dollar Congress." You Democrats had two-thirds of the House in the last Congress, and in that Congress you increased the appropriations over those of the "Reed Congress" by $40,000,000, in round numbers, and now in this Congress you are to increase the appropriations over and above the "Reed Congress" by $60,000,000.

You were either guilty of misrepresentation and deceit then or you are guilty of fearful extravagance now. You can choose which defense you will make.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES OF 1894 COMPARED WITH 1893.

Mr. Speaker, under the law the Executive is required at the close of each fiscal year to make a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the United States Government for the past year. TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Warrant Division, July 2, 1894.

This statement does not include the postal receipts or expenditures therefrom, and as they balance each other it is not material to state them here. It shows the receipts of the United States for the twelve months ending June 30, 1894, to have been $88,859,292.78 less than the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893.

This alarming deficit was paid in part from moneys in the Treasury on the 4th of March, 1893, when President Cleveland was inaugurated, and in part from a sale of 5 per cent interest-bearing bonds made by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle, in February last, yielding $58,633,295.71, and increasing the annual interest charge against the Government $2,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, this statement shows also that the expenditures for the twelve months ending June 30, 1894, were $16,884,595.31 less than for the twelve months ending June 30, 1893; but, Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that this same statement shows that the payment for pensions made for the year ending June 30, 1894, was $18,180,272.91 less than they were for the year ending June 30, 1893.

In other words, exclusive of pensions, President Cleveland, for his first full fiscal year, expended $1,295,677.50 more to carry on the Government than was expended in the final fiscal year under President Harrison. Whatever was saved by President Cleveland was saved at the expense of the soldiers of the late war and of their widows and orphans by an unfriendly and unjust administration of the pension laws.

Mr. Speaker, during the whole of the Harrison Administration we were on the highway of prosperity. The Government was liberally and effectively performing its functions. Public improvements were being made where needed, and the Government, by wise and economical expenditures, kept step with a prosperous and happy people; whereas for the last year, under Cleveland, there has been great distress throughout the land. The revenues of the Government have fallen off and the expenditures of the Government have increased, except for pensions.

In other words, it is more expensive to enforce the law with great blocks of our citizens out of employment, the Government making its strong arm felt by force, than it is to expend the public moneys for the common good, for public objects, with our people profitably employed, and therefore contented—the people obeying the law from love, rather than from force.

The condition of the country under the respective policies of Harrison and Cleveland is known by all, and its future condition will depend upon the economic and fiscal policies which will be chosen by the people at the ballot box.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the great distress throughout the country, there have been many increases in the salaries of Democratic officials, especially in the diplomatic and consular service. I specify a few of them. The salary of the First Assistant Secretary of State is increased from $3,500 to $4,500. The minister to Belgium, Mr. Ewing, of Illinois, the former law partner of the Vice-President, is increased from $7,500 to $10,000. The ministers to Switzerland and Portugal, Messrs. Caruth and Broadhead, are increased from $5,000 to $6,500 respectively.

The minister to Mexico, ex-Governor Gray, of Indiana, who receives an annual salary of $17,500, has the salary of his secretary of legation increased from $1,800 to $2,650. The ministers to Nicaragua and Costa Rica, for the first time, are allowed secretaries of legation at $1,800 each, while the Bureau of American Republics, established under the auspices of Secretary Blaine to promote commerce and reciprocity—a real service—is cut down from $30,000 to $10,000. The six Auditors of the Treasury Department are increased from $3,600 to $4,000 each. The salaries of a great many consuls and other officials are largely increased, but I have not the time to enumerate them or you the patience to hear.

Mr. Speaker, all these Democratic officials have received their appointments under Mr. Cleveland. For years they declaimed, in common with all other Democrats, about the extravagant salaries of officials, and pledged that if they came into power there should be economy and reform. There is no excuse for the increase of most of these salaries. I call attention to the matter to show the difference between promise and performance.

Mr. Speaker, I ask how many more poor widows of soldiers of the late war and how many worthy veterans must have the small pensions which they receive taken away or reduced by an unfriendly Administration, to meet these and many other increases of salary to already well-paid officials? From every standpoint the Democratic party fails. The best interests of all the people demand that the Democratic party step down and out.

†This is the amount originally submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury as estimated to be necessary under permanent specific and permanent indefinite appropriations.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the figures to which the gentleman from Illinois has called the attention of the House seem to make it desirable that three facts should be emphasized to the people of this country.

It will be remembered that two and four years ago there rang all through this country denunciations of the Republican party, the Republican Congress, and the Republican Administration for alleged extravagance of appropriations and expenditures. We replied at that time, showing that there had been only the ordinary growth of the expenditures of the country, except so far as permanent work had been done which had been delayed too long, and that the charges were without foundation. Yet these unfounded charges were iterated and reiterated, and had more or less influence in bringing the Democratic party into power.

It is certainly a gratification, after the Democratic party has been in power in every department of the Government for one year, now to have it so clearly demonstrated that these gentlemen who, when out of power, made such denunciations of Republican extravagance two and four years ago, now find the boot is on the other leg. The extravagance now is on the part of the Democratic party in power, who denounced alleged Republican extravagance two and four years ago, and who find themselves now subject to the criticism of those whom they then criticised.

In short, it appears from the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, first, that the appropriations at the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, which had been denounced throughout the country as the "billion-dollar Congress," were $27,000,000 less than the appropriations at the corresponding session of this Congress, the round figures being $463,000,000 for the first session of the Fifty-first Congress and $490,000,000 for the first session of the present Congress.

Second, that the expenditures under the Democratic Administration, with both Houses of Congress Democratic, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, have been only seventeen millions less than the last fiscal year of President Harrison, and this reduction has been entirely in pensions, leaving an increase of one million in other expenditures.

And third, that while the revenue after the enactment of the McKinley tariff was more than enough all through President Harrison's Administration to meet all expenditures, including the increasing pensions, for the first year of the present Democratic Administration there is a deficiency of $70,000,000.

Having stated these three facts by way of reply to the billion-dollar charges of the Democratic party in 1892 against the Republican party, I desire to add—what is the simple truth—that there was no extravagance in 1890 beyond the requirements of the country; there is none now. The Government of this country two and four years ago was conducted as reasonably, economically, and efficiently as any government upon the face of the earth, and I do not stand here to declare that those who are now in power and who, two and four years ago, criticised us for extravagance have themselves become participants in extravagance, notwithstanding they have appropriated and expended more than we did.

This simply illustrates the fact that gentlemen who are out of power have little difficulty in criticising those who are in power, and that when the critics themselves come into power, if they do as well as the party they criticise, they will be doing better than our friends on the other side have done thus far.

I took up a few moments ago an editorial article in the Kansas City Times, in which the editor proceeded to say that the Democratic party had inherited a deficiency which had been created by their predecessors, and upon that ground to excuse the deficiency which now exists.

The editorial stated that a hundred million dollars of the bank-redemption fund was turned into the Treasury by the act of July 14, 1890, and was used for the purpose of meeting current expenditures. Gentlemen here very well understand that there is not a particle of truth in that statement. Fifty-four million dollars—not a hundred millions—of the bank-redemption fund was turned into the Treasury by the act of July 14, 1890, and that $54,000,000 was used not for current expenditures, but for the reduction of the public debt.

Every year since the passage of the tariff act of 1890 up to the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, the revenue was sufficient to meet the current expenditures. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, the revenue exceeded the expenditures by $37,000,000. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, the revenue exceeded the expenditures by nearly $10,000,000, and even for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, in the last portion of which the revenue was affected by the disturbance of business, resulting from the threatened tariff revolution, the revenue exceeded the expenditures by $2,500,000. Thus, for every year after the enactment of the tariff act of 1890 up to and including the fiscal year 1893, the revenue under that act was ample to meet all the current expenses of the Government, including the current expenditures for pensions.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, the revenue exceeded the expenditures by $105,000,000. Gentlemen will remember the demand that was made at that time by our Democratic friends that such a surplus should not be allowed to continue which necessitated the purchase of our bonds at a premium. We were told that a "condition" of a surplus and "not a theory" confronted us which called for a reduction of revenue by a revision of the tariff. In response to that demand the annual revenue was reduced $60,000,000 by the abolition of the duty on sugar, by the remission of the duty on sugar.

At the same time expenditures were increased from year to year by enlarged appropriations for pensions; yet, notwithstanding the fact that by the repeal of the duty on sugar $60,000,000 was thus remitted to the people in the fiscal years 1891, 1892, and 1893, as I have already said, we were able to meet all expenditures and leave a surplus each and every year. Every dollar, let me repeat, of the bank redemption fund which was turned into the Treasury by the act of June 14, 1890, was used for the reduction of the public debt.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What about the postponement of the payment of bonds and the running of contracts on them?

Mr. DINGLEY. What does the gentleman mean by the "running of contracts"? Surely the gentleman does not include the payment of bonded indebtedness a current expenditure in carrying on the Government. It is sufficient for me to repeat, Mr. Speaker, that every year up to the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, the revenue was ample to meet all current expenditures of the Government, and if it had not been decreed in 1892 that a Democratic tariff revolution should come upon the country, there is no doubt whatever that this condition of things would have been continued.

In the last fiscal year, the year ending June 30, 1894, for the first time in time of peace since 1860, we had a deficiency of $70,000,000. That deficiency has not been caused by an increase of expenditures. The expenditures, as has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], are $17,000,000 less than those of the previous year, but the whole of that $17,000,000 reduction, and one million more, has been brought about by reducing and discontinuing pensions for the boys in blue. The expenditures for the ordinary purposes of the Government are $1,000,000 more for this fiscal year under Democratic rule than they were for the preceding year, under Republican rule.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DINGLEY'S time was extended.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, as I have said, the deficiency for the past fiscal year has been brought about entirely by a falling off of revenue. There has been a decline of the revenue in the last fiscal year of $89,000,000, of which $71,000,000 is in customs revenue, $14,000,000 in internal revenue taxes, and $4,000,000 miscellaneous. In order to meet this deficiency of over $70,000,000, occurring for the first time in peace since 1860, bonds have been issued and money borrowed to the extent of $58,000,000, and $12,000,000 more have been taken from the gold redemption fund to meet current expenses.

Now, in this condition of things, with the gold redemption fund run down to-day to $52,000,000, while $100,000,000 is the amount contemplated by law and by the regulations of the Department, this amount being necessary to preserve the public confidence in the currency of the nation, the situation is such certainly as should command the serious attention of Congress and the people. Fifty-two million dollars only as the gold redemption fund to maintain at par $346,000,000 of greenbacks and $163,000,000 of Treasury notes!

This is a situation, Mr. Speaker, which if we will but carefully consider must inspire a feeling of alarm in the minds of those who understand that with so small a redemption fund the public confidence may be impaired at a single stroke.

And, Mr. Speaker, the other day when the "popgun" bill for the abolition of the duty on sugar imposed by the Gorman-Brice bill, was passed by this House, I could not but think that gentlemen of the majority who voted for it and also for the Gorman-Brice tariff, could not have considered the fact that the duty on sugar is absolutely required to meet the expenditures of this Government for the present fiscal year, if the bill which has been known as the Gorman-Brice act should become a law, as I presume it will, because the latter measure reduces the revenue from a large number of sources—particularly upon luxuries—to such an extent that it is impossible the expenditures of this nation can be met without the duty on sugar. And it must have been obvious to gentlemen here that this sugar bill was presented and put through, not with the slightest purpose of its becoming a law, but for buncombe, with the distinct knowledge that it could not be enacted into law in the present condition of the finances of the nation if the Gorman-Brice bill is to stand in the terms in which it has been enacted.

Why, sir, in that Gorman-Brice bill—just as there was in the Wilson bill—there has been a reduction of revenue to the extent of over $15,000,000 upon pure luxuries, such as liquors, cigars, leaf tobacco, opium, ostrich feathers, silks, kid gloves, etc., where there was no earthly call for a single dollar's reduction. In order to meet the deficiency created by such reductions, it is inevitable that the duty on sugar, as provided by the Gorman-Brice act, must remain, if that act in its other provisions is to become law as the Democratic majority have willed.

Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to enter upon any discussion of these questions. I simply desired to call attention to the fact that the situation in which this country finds itself at the close of the fiscal year just passed—the first year of full Democratic control since 1860—is one which may indeed attract the attention and arouse the alarm of every true friend of our institutions. I trust that before this Congress shall reassemble the clouds will to some extent have broken away; that gentlemen who have the responsibility of the government of this nation will feel the sense of that responsibility, and that from this time henceforth we shall have legislation designed to promote the interests of the people—legislation calculated to restore confidence—not the revolutionary threats which we have had throughout the past year, which have so destroyed confidence and excited alarm throughout the country that business has been shattered, industries overwhelmed, and millions of men have found themselves out of employment, with wages reduced, consumption diminished, and all the springs of industry dried up to an extent which may well arouse the commiseration of every friend of the American Republic. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the joint resolution (H. Res. 217) to continue the provisions of existing laws providing temporarily for expenditures of the Government.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of the conference report be suspended for the purpose of considering the resolution just received from the Senate.

There was no objection.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows.

In line 7, strike out the word "twenty-fourth" and insert "twentieth;" so that the resolution will read as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the provisions of joint resolutions approved June 29 and July 31, 1894, providing temporarily for the expenditures of the Government, be, and the same are hereby, extended and continued in full force and effect to and including the 20th day of August, 1894."

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible for the sundry civil bill to be enrolled and sent to the President to-day. The resolution of which this is amendatory expired last night at 12 o'clock; hence it is important that this resolution go to the President as soon as possible. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the vote just taken was laid on the table.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. I now call up, Mr. Speaker, for further consideration the report of the conferees on the general deficiency bill, and yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] such time as he desires.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I want the House of Representatives and the country to understand the leading facts touching the appropriations for 1895 and their relations to the appropriations in the near past.

THE REDUCTIONS BY THIS CONGRESS—THE FIFTY-THIRD.

The total appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, just made by the Fifty-third Congress, amount to $490,668,369.51. This includes the permanent annual appropriations as well as those for the postal service. It includes all appropriations. The total amount appropriated for the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1894, made by the second session of the Fifty-second Congress, amounted to $519,504,359.21. The details of these several appropriations will be found in a table appended to my remarks and marked "Exhibit A."

These figures give a reduction for 1895 of $28,835,989.70, and doubtless much credit will be claimed during the campaign now coming on for this reduction, and the cry of "demonstrated economy by the Democracy" will be heard on every stump.

First, let it be borne in mind that this is a reduction by one Democratic Congress below the appropriations of a former Democratic Congress, the former doing work under the watchful eye of Judge HOLMAN, the "watchdog of the Treasury." Let the question come up, If these are proper, were the former improper?

Let us now examine the appropriations for the two years 1894 and 1895, and find where these reductions come from. It will be found that in the single item of appropriations for pensions alone the difference can be accounted for, and not in a cutting down of the other current expenses of the Government.

The pension appropriations for last year amounted to $180,681,074.85, while for next year it is $151,581,570. Here is a cut of $29,099,504.85, more than accounting for the reductions in the bills just passed for the next year, and leaves a margin of $263,515.15.

But let us look a step further. The second session of the last Congress had to appropriate for the Eleventh Census $1,020,000. This session only had to give $356,580 for that work. Again, the second session of the last Congress had to give $958,000 for the World's Fair. This Congress had nothing to appropriate for that purpose. Now, let us take the three items of pensions, Eleventh Census, and World's Fair and see what the three cuts aggregate:

Cut in pensions	$29,099,504.85
Cut in Eleventh Census	663,500.00
Cut in World's Fair	958,000.00
Total	30,721,004.85
Subtract reductions for '95	28,835,989.70
And the difference of	1,885,015.15

is found over and above all reductions by this Congress.

The passing by of the great fair and the almost finished work of the Eleventh Census dropped, unasked, $1,621,500 from the appropriations for next year. Leaving out these three items, for doing which no credit can be claimed by this Congress, and it will be seen that there is an increase of the current expenses of the Government of $1,885,015.15.

THE OLD SOLDIER SACRIFICED TO ECONOMY.

These facts will demonstrate that the reductions made, the "economy" practiced, falls alone upon the old soldiers—the defenders of the country from 1861 to 1865.

Of the appropriations made even by the last Congress for pensions, the sum of $23,822,715.04 was withheld from them and covered back into the Treasury last year.

One is filled with horror when the brutal attacks on the pension roll by this Administration is examined. I call attention to Senate Executive Document No. 121 of the second session of this Congress, being a report of the suspensions ordered by the present Administration—a report called for by a Senate resolution introduced by the watchful, true-hearted Senator CULLOM of Illinois.

This report confesses that between March 4, 1893, when Harrison went out and Cleveland came in, and May 10, 1894, the pensions of 15,520 old soldiers and widows had been suspended. Of this number the Pension Office found that it had to reinstate at their former rates, 9,509, thus confessing the hasty and inconsiderate and unfeeling attack upon these deserving men. But 3,014 were reduced from former rates, cutting them mostly down to $6 and $8 per month, where they had been drawing mostly $12 and $10 per month; 2,671 were dropped altogether from the rolls, and 326 are still under suspension, pursued, undoubtedly, by the detectives of the Pension Bureau.

These men sent out to examine into pension claims are called "special examiners." The real aim of the law creating them was to look into doubtful cases and to help out ignorant but worthy claimants who did not know how to properly prepare their proofs. I fear that now instead of "special examiners" they are used as detectives to cut off pensioners from the great roll of honor.

As bearing upon this point it may be well to note that for the year 1893 there was appropriated for special examiners the sum of $225,000, while for 1894, at the request of the Pension Office it was increased to $400,000. Evidently an assault of deadly character was being made on the pension roll. It is however significant and gratifying that even an unfriendly Administration was forced to restore the 9,509 at the rates formerly allowed.

THE FIFTY-FIRST, FIFTY-SECOND, AND FIFTY-THIRD CONGRESSES COMPARED.

The Fifty-first Congress was Republican, and was denounced by the Democratic party as "the billion-dollar Congress," and I believe that the able, genial, and creative mind of the present chairman of the Committee of Appropriations in the House first gave birth to the name.

Time ought to make the blind see and the deaf hear. It ought also to cause some to blush. Let us see what these three Congresses have been at. The figures are now made up showing the work done, and I refer to table "A."

The Fifty-first Congress appropriated $988,417,183.34 for the two years of its service. But that amount includes deficiencies made by its Democratic predecessor, the Fiftieth Congress, amounting to $38,617,448.96, and included in that was a deficiency for pensions, amounting to $25,321,907.35. Deducting the above deficiency, which belonged to the Fiftieth Congress, and it leaves the appropriations of the Fifty-first Congress at $949,799,734.38.

The appropriations of the Fifty-second Congress were for its two years $1,027,104,547.92. The present Congress has only appropriated for one year, and it has done its best at cutting before the elections just coming on. At the next session, after the elections, look out for a large increase by reason of forced deficiencies and deferred appropriations. But let us assume that the appropriations for next year will be the same as those just made, and the total for this Congress will be $981,336,739.02.

Let us now look at the work of the three Congresses placed together:

Fifty-first Congress (Republican)	$949,799,734.38
Fifty-second Congress (Democratic)	1,027,104,547.92
Fifty-third Congress (Democratic)	981,339,739.02

Where, I ask my Democratic friends, is your cry of economy? You may slash at the defenders of your country in order to swell other bills, and yet you can not keep the appropriations down to the Republican standard.

ADDITIONS BY THE SENATE.

It has been one of the great pleasures of our Democratic friends to call attention to the fact that the appropriations, as made by the House of Representatives, were increased by the Republican Senate. But now the Senate is Democratic as well as the House, and yet the Senate increased the House bills to the amount of $15,372,977.34.

I am not questioning the constitutional right of the Senate to increase or to decrease the House bills, but I invite attention to it and hope that the Democratic press and stumpers will tell the country of the outrages perpetrated by the Democratic Senate.

The table marked "Exhibit B" will throw full light on this question, and give in detail the work of the two Houses.

INCREASE OF SALARIES, ETC.

While Republicans filled the public offices every effort was made by the Democracy in Congress to reduce the salaries of public officials; even to cutting the amount appropriated lower than the compensation fixed by law. But now that Democrats fill the offices their economic zeal has calmed down materially, and increases have commenced all along the line. They can find the heart to cut down pensions, while they are increasing the salaries of Democratic officials, and that, too, in the face of a hungry Treasury, with bonds being sold to meet the running expenses of the Government.

I will give a few illustrations:

Minister to Belgium is increased from $7,500 per annum to $10,000. The First Assistant Secretary of State increased $1,000. Secretary of legation to Mexico increased $850. Minister to Switzerland is increased from $6,000 to $7,500. Contingent expenses of foreign missions is increased $15,000. Two new secretaries of legation are created at $1,800 each. Salaries of two consular clerks increased $200 each. In the Departments at Washington there are several other increases in the salaries of bureau chiefs. No increases were made by the Fifty-first Congress, excepting a large clerical force given to bring up the work in the Pension Office.

CERTAIN OTHER REDUCTIONS AND INCREASES.

The bills showing reductions as compared with appropriations made at the last session of the last Congress are as follows:

The Agricultural bill	$101,476.94
The Army bill	632,755.10
The legislative bill	557,507.02
The Military Academy bill	26,033.94
The pension bill	14,949,780.00
The sundry civil bill	7,506,535.10
Deficiencies	10,456,540.60
Permanent appropriations after deducting for both sessions the amounts charged for "Refund of national-bank notes"	12,393,593.92
Total reduction	46,624,221.72

Of the reduction on the legislative bill, $345,000 is on account of 300 clerks dropped in the Record and Pension Office. This reduction was promised both by Secretaries Proctor and Elkins, Republicans, in their last annual reports, the work on which the clerks were employed in carding war records having just been completed. I presume that the claim will be made that because of these reductions great credit is deserved by this Congress.

The reduction in the pension bill is in accordance with recommendations of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Of the reduction of $7,506,535.10 on the sundry civil bill,

$5,766,153 is on account of contracts for river and harbor works.

The deficiencies of the last session of the last Congress included $14,149,724.85 for payment of pensions. Deducting that sum from the whole amount of deficiencies of the last session, only $8,127,361.51 remain, or $3,693,184.25 less than the deficiencies appropriated by this Congress.

The permanent appropriations show an apparent reduction of $14,393,593.92, which includes $11,000,000 for sugar bounty and $450,000 for expenses under election laws.

The bills which have been increased are as follows:

The diplomatic and consular bill	$6,473.76
The District of Columbia bill	131,396.66
The fortification bill	216,949.00
The Indian bill	1,475,408.11
The naval bill	3,223,065.34
The Post-Office bill	3,232,285.33
The river and harbor bill	11.473,180.00
Miscellaneous	29,500.82
Total increase	19,788,232.02
Net apparent reduction	28,835,989.70

During the last session of the last Congress there was appropriated for pensions, including a deficiency of $14,149,724.85, the total sum of $180,681,074.85. At this session there is appropriated for pensions only $151,581,570, or $29,099,504.85 less, which reduction in pensions exceeds the whole apparent net reduction in all appropriations by this session, under the last session of the last Congress, by $263,515.15. I have already alluded to this and to other items of reduction forced upon this Congress and not of its seeking.

WHAT HAS THIS CONGRESS DONE?

It has repealed the purchasing clause of the Sherman act, but wholly failed to keep the promise made at the time that during this Congress other legislation would follow for the proper utilization of both our metals.

It has let the Mormons into the Union of States.

It has wiped out the last vestige of Federal protection to the ballot box, and thus opened the door for frauds and a high carnival of crime.

It has utterly failed to keep its pledges touching a revision of the tariff, and after a surrender to the sugar trust, after stopping commerce, closing factories, throwing millions of laboring men out of employment, keeping order with fixed bayonets and the slaughter of the people, it winds up by giving the country an unwise revision of the McKinley law.

I see but one thing to commend it for, and over that the whole country will heartily rejoice, and that is that both Houses are without a quorum, and give promise of an early adjournment.

DEMOCRACY AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

I invite the attention of the House and the country to the terrible effects of Democratic control upon the foreign commerce of the country.

During the last year of President Harrison, and before the elections warned the people here and abroad that Democracy had the power, by carrying the legislative and executive branches of the Government, to carry out the dangerous doctrines of the national Democratic platform, the foreign commerce of this country reached the highest point ever attained by the nation, the aggregate reaching the enormous sum of $1,857,680,610 in 1892.

In 1893, after the Democracy were in power, it fell to $1,714,066,118, and in 1894 to $1,547,138,698.

Here is a falling off in 1893, as compared with 1892, of $143,614,494, and in 1894, as compared with 1892, of $310,541,912.

In 1892 the exports from this country exceeded our imports $202,875,686. We were doing a safe business, selling more than we bought; but after the advent of Democracy, in 1893, the imports exceeded the exports $18,735,728, and we were buying more than we were selling.

How did agriculture fare under Democracy? Let us see. We exported in 1892, under Harrison, $799,328,232 of our agricultural products. In 1893, under Cleveland, $615,382,986, and in 1894 only $628,318,773. Here is a falling off in 1893 of $183,945,246, and in 1894 of $171,009,459.

In support of my statement I refer to table from the Bureau of Statistics appended to my remarks and marked "Exhibit C."

REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES.

I come now to consider the management of the finances by this Administration.

In 1865 the expenditures of the Government exceeded revenues $936,840,619.33, and during the civil war our expenditures each year exceeded our revenues. But from 1865, the last year of the war, we have had no such experience until the fiscal year just closed, when we find that the expenditures exceeded the revenues in the startling sum of $69,803,260.58.

With this exception the revenues and the cash in the Treasury have met all of our necessities since 1865. (See Exhibit D.)

I find that the receipts, exclusive of postal, from March 1, 1885, to March 1, 1889, under President Cleveland, was $1,451,660,246.74, while from March 1, 1889, to March 1, 1893, under President Harrison, they amounted to $1,540,225,448.35. This gives an excess of receipts for the four years of Harrison of $88,565,201.61. This is the key to the efficiency of a Republican Administration executing Republican laws.

But here comes a sharper test of the two Executives, leaving out postal receipts:

Receipts:

For first sixteen months of Harrison's Administration (from March 1, 1889, to July 1, 1890)	$532,743,283.03
For first sixteen months of Cleveland's Administration (from March 1, 1893, to July 1, 1894)	422,147,849.48
For last sixteen months of Harrison's Administration (from November 1, 1891, to March 1, 1893)	493,601,074.39

A study of these figures will show that the first sixteen months of Harrison's Administration collected $110,595,413.55 more than the first sixteen months of the present Administration, and the receipts for the last sixteen months of Harrison's Administration exceeded the first sixteen months of the present Administration $71,543,224.91. Is it any wonder that a deficit in the Treasury is upon us, and that this Administration is selling bonds to pay the running expenses of the Government?

Let me give a further test of the administration of the laws by the different Executives. I call attention to "Exhibit E," appended to my remarks—a statement prepared in the Treasury Department at my request. Observe the receipts from "customs, internal revenue, and miscellaneous," which gives the true test of an honest and efficient enforcement of the laws:

Collected by President Arthur, $1,487,749,110.37.

Collected by President Cleveland, $1,451,661,246.74.

Collected by President Harrison, $1,540,225,448.35.

When President Cleveland came in the revenues in four years fell off $36,087,863.63, and when President Harrison came in they increased in four years over President Cleveland's work $88,564,201.61.

The moonshiners and violators of law evidently had an easy time of it under Mr. Cleveland's appointees.

"THE SURPLUS."

The favorite argument of the ignorant, or those who understanding wish to deceive the people is that Mr. Cleveland left a full Treasury on March 4, 1889, and found an empty one on March 4, 1893. Let us examine this question.

On the first line in "Exhibit E" will be found the amount available at the beginning of the several Administrations of Arthur, Cleveland, Harrison, and again Cleveland, and on the last line, opposite the word "surplus," the amounts over and above expenditures during each period indicated.

Mr. Arthur had, when he was inaugurated, in round numbers $170,000,000, Mr. Cleveland $159,000,000, Mr. Harrison $183,000,000, and Mr. Cleveland, second term, $124,000,000. President Harrison did start with $59,000,000 more than President Cleveland started with in 1893. Why? Because Harrison, during his term paid off $233,588,950 of the public debt of the country. During Mr. Cleveland's first term he paid off only $143,884,350, and had to be forced to pay off any by the passage of a resolution in the House of Representatives, assailing him for his delinquency in this particular.

Even after so lashed to his duty he paid off $89,704,600 less than Mr. Harrison paid during the four years following. Mr. Harrison applied the cash locked up in the Treasury to pay off the debt of the people, and in doing so he saved in interest $55,352,493.51, as against $42,832,538.38 saved by Mr. Cleveland.

The Democracy used to abuse the Republicans for keeping too much cash in the Treasury, but now when it is applied to lift the debt burden, they are displeased and regret that the money so spent was not left in the Treasury for them to spend.

There is nothing clearer to my mind than this: That if the Democracy had not come into power on their revolutionary platform the Republicans would have had plenty of money with which to run the Government, and that the $50,000,000 of bonds lately issued by this Administration would not have been needed.

I call attention to Exhibit F, following my remarks, being a statement of the bond purchases, prepared in the Treasury Department.

If Harrison left $59,000,000 less for Cleveland than he received, he paid off $89,704,600 more of the public debt.

I have demonstrated that the revenues were vastly greater under the Republicans, and if they had been continued in power there would have been plenty of cash to pay the Government bills.

It is a sad sight for this country to see the bonded debt increased, while the revenues that come from the foreigners are being transferred so as to come directly from the pockets of our own people. The burden is increased at home, while the laborer abroad is allowed to do the work of our people, thus lessening our ability to lift the burden.

IN CONCLUSION.

I do not see one claim that can be advanced by the President or this Democratic Congress for the continued support of the people. Leaving out the pension roll, and the current expenses are increased in the appropriation bills just passed.

In our dealings with foreign questions we have become the laughingstock of the people and the Administration the rich subject for the cartoonist.

The people are sick at heart, and hope for the first time has left the breasts of a large army of workers only willing and eager to earn their daily bread.

For the first time in the history of our country the capital city has become the camping ground and rallying place for an unemployed army.

But even Democracy can not destroy this great Republic. There is a sure remedy—the ballot in the hand of the sovereign citizen.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the adoption of the report.

Mr. DUNPHY. Before that, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question with his consent. I find on page 54 of the bill as reported by the Senate this provision:

And the clerks of the United States court may act as United States commissioners without receiving additional compensation for their services from the United States.

I see from the report that the Senate has receded from that amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNPHY. I would like to know the reason why?

Mr. SAYERS. Well, they receded, in the first place, because it is legislation on a general deficiency bill; and I am one of those who do not believe that there should be legislation on an appropriation bill. In the second place, it is believed that under the law passed at this Congress there was embodied a provision that no one man shall hold two offices unless hereafter or heretofore specially authorized to do so; and I was informed that there was a law which authorized this clerk to act as commissioner. I think these are the facts in connection with the matter, although I do not pretend to speak with absolute accuracy.

Mr. DUNPHY. I desired to have the explanation appear in the RECORD, because some question has come up between the members of the House on this point.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman understands me to say, however, that I do not pretend to speak with absolute accuracy on the subject.

Mr. DUNPHY. I understand that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TARSNEY). The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The report was adopted.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will call the attention of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], to the remaining question at issue, and ask how much time he would like to have in discussing that matter?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I can not tell exactly; but we will not occupy very long.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, say a half hour on each side.

A MEMBER. What is the amendment?

Mr. SAYERS. It is the amendment of the Senate appropriating $1,800,000, in round numbers, to pay the Southern Pacific Company.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman from Texas it seems to me as this is the last appropriation bill to be passed—I suppose about the last piece of legislation Congress will enact——

Mr. COGSWELL. Oh, no; there are four tariff bills in the Senate to be passed.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois (continuing). I think that a half hour on this side would be enough, although I would prefer not to be limited in that way.

Mr. SAYERS. We want to get through with the discussion of this matter with a view to adjourning.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think we can get through in a half hour, but I hope the gentleman will not regard it as absolutely necessary to close up the time definitely. I think my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] desires some time, and perhaps other gentlemen. The length of debate will depend a little on the course it takes. I think we can get through by 5 o'clock.

Mr. SAYERS. I suggest that we take a vote at twenty minutes to 5.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I will not occupy very much time.

Mr. SAYERS. I will divide the time with you. I ask consent that debate be closed at twenty minutes to 5.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think you had better let it alone. We will get through sooner.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think if the gentleman will just let the debate run along, we can close it up more quickly than if we make an agreement.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I first desire to have the amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Southern Pacific Company, $1,809,539.70.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE].

[Mr. MAGUIRE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. DALZELL. Do I understand the proposition to be one for the payment of any judgment in favor of the Central Pacific Railroad Company?

Mr. SAYERS. This bill proposes to pay a judgment in favor of the Southern Pacific.

Mr. DALZELL. I understand; but there are judgments existing in favor of the Central Pacific Railroad which, as I understand, this bill does not propose to pay. That is true, is it not?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DALZELL. This bill proposes to pay a judgment of the Southern Pacific, which is the lessee of a number of roads, among others the Central Pacific, but not for services on the Union Pacific or any of the nonaided lines.

Mr. SAYERS. That is so.

Mr. DALZELL. Then the proposition of the gentleman from California is that we shall punish this innocent company, between whom and the Government no relation exists.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Leave out the word "innocent."

Mr. MAGUIRE. The same men own it.

Mr. DALZELL. They are separate organizations, and this Government has connection with them.

Mr. MAGUIRE. This same set of men promoted and incorporated the Southern Pacific Company in Kentucky for the purpose of using it as a cover for the diversion of these funds and earnings of the Central Pacific road.

Mr. DALZELL. All of which would have been good matter to present in a trial of the cause.

Mr. MAGUIRE. No, sir; because the Central Pacific Company would have had a legal right to recover if it had sued.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to know why not?

Mr. MAGUIRE. Because the Supreme Court, in the case of the United States against the Union Pacific, held that these fraudulent diversions could not give rise to a cause of action or suit in equity in favor of the Government until the obligations of the Central Pacific Railroad Company to the Government shall have matured.

Mr. DALZELL. I understand the decision.

Mr. SAYERS. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois want?

Mr. DALZELL. Why, I am told there are 30,000 stockholders in the Southern Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Where is the evidence of that?

Mr. DALZELL. The evidence is quite as good as the evidence the gentleman has furnished.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The attorney of the company does not say so.

Mr. SAYERS. How much time shall I yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not know; several gentlemen desire to have some time.

Mr. SAYERS. How much time does the gentleman from Iowa desire?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I can not tell exactly, but I think not over ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. Will fifteen minutes satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I think that will cover my necessities. If I need more, I shall get it.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield the gentleman fifteen minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, it is my duty to explain this matter as I understand it. We have had repeated hearings before the Committee on Appropriations in respect to this subject. Now, let us not have any confusion in this discussion. Let us know exactly what we are talking about. This amendment provides $1,809,539.70 to be paid to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. Fix that in your minds. For what is that payment to be made? For carrying troops, mails, and freight for the Government of the United States. Is there any controversy between the Government and the Southern Pacific Railway Company as to the rates? None whatever. They have always been able to agree as to the compensation to be paid for the work done by the Southern Pacific Railroad. There is not to-day pending a single issue between the Government and that railroad company, not one.

Fix another point in you minds. The amount covered by this amendment, inserted in the bill by the Senate without a dissenting voice, is all in judgment. Suit has been brought for these amounts and they are covered by judgments in the Federal courts, and every question has been adjudged by the highest tribunal in this country. So much for that.

Now, an attempt has been made, I think, to confuse the House by a discussion of the Central Pacific Railroad and its relations to the Government. The Central Pacific and the Union Pacific Railroads are roads that were aided by the issue of Government bonds, the amount aggregating, I believe, without interest, some $27,000,000. The amount covered by this amendment for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company is for work done and for money earned wholly by nonaided railroads. Not a single Government bond was issued to one of the railroads that performed this work.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Is it not a fact, well known in the history of these railroads, that the Southern Pacific Road is owned by the Central Pacific Company, and that it was created out of the profits of the Central Pacific, which were diverted to the Southern Pacific? And is there not now pending litigation between the Government and the Central Pacific and its owners to recover money that they owe the Government by reason of the aid extended to them?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I do not so understand it at all. Let me read at this point from the hearings on this subject before the Committee on Appropriations a question which I put to Judge Payson and his answer. There are many gentlemen here who remember the attitude of Judge Payson in this House on these railroad questions, and I voted with him in every instance when a vote was taken for the forfeiture of the railroad land grants. Here is a question that I put to him when he was recently before the Committee on Appropriations:

Mr. HENDERSON. One other matter, because I am quite interested and we have gone into this thing more comprehensively than before, in order to bring up a question which has appeared in the discussion, as I am not clear as to what was done, and that is in relation to the idea that Governor Sayers brought out when he made clear from your answers that the same men owning the Central Pacific own the Southern Pacific.

It has been stated that the funds derived from the sale of Government bonds for the construction of the Central Pacific were diverted by the management of the Central Pacific for the purchase of lines and for the construction of lines of the Southern Pacific system, and that therefore an equity arises affecting the whole Southern Pacific as an offset, or equitable offset, to the claims against the Government for transportation, etc. Now, I want you to state whether that question has ever been investigated and decided in court, or in anyway adjudicated.

Judge PAYSON. I will answer first in a general way, and in the letter which I will prepare and send you I will give you a citation of the book and page where you will find a brief of it. First, I will state that every dollar which the Government aided the Central Pacific system was used upon that road. The entire amount of both the bonds furnished by the Government, $27,000,000, and the bonds issued by the railroad company, which were also $27,000,000, was sold on the market for gold. At that time, if you remember, the currency of California and west of the Rocky Mountains was in gold.

The official reports show that out of that amount of $54,000,000 there was realized only forty-odd millions—between $40,000,000 and $41,000,000 in gold. That had to stand the shaving; you understand as to that. So there was expended in cash on the Central Pacific system between $42,000,000 and $43,000,000 of cool cash in its construction before it commenced its practical operation. More money was expended upon this road than was realized from both sets of bonds. I will refer you to the book and page.

Now, if $54,000,000 was expended upon this road and the Government aid was $27,000,000, it would require a smart mathematician to demonstrate that there was a diversion of $52,000,000 or $62,000,000 or any other sum to build the Southern Pacific.

Here is Judge Payson's statement in the brief which he subsequently filed:

The report of the Pacific Railroad Commission of 1887 shows fully that there has been no improper diversion of funds by the Central Pacific Company, and that every legal requirement has been met and satisfied; that no dividends have been paid in violation of law, page 111; no diversion of earnings through constructive mileage accounts.

So much for the information that was furnished the committee on that point, and Judge Payson stated further that there was nothing now in controversy between the Southern Pacific and the Government. If there is anything I have no knowledge of it. I have only the information that we derived from the investigation we have made as a committee.

Now, let me say another thing. It is true, as Judge Payson stated before our committee, that the chief owners of the Southern Pacific are the same men who are the chief owners in the Central Pacific.

But I am assured that in the Central Pacific Railroad Company, as was shown before the committee of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REILLY] is chairman, there are some 10,000 stockholders, and that there are many thousands more in the Southern Pacific. Bear in mind that the whole attempt here is to keep back payment from the Southern Pacific on principles which might apply to the Central Pacific.

The Central Pacific being a bond-aided road, the statement is made (and it is a matter that has occupied my mind and troubled me not a little) that as the bonded indebtedness of that road will fall due or commence falling due in 1895, and they admit that they can not pay it, it might be well for us to hold back what is due to the Central Pacific road until that indebtedness matures, so that we may put it in as an offset.

But no such consideration can apply in the case of the Southern Pacific Road. If we were to-day in such a position that the bonds of the Central Pacific Road were due, there is no offset that can apply to the Southern Pacific or any of the branches that are entitled to this $1,900,000. Then why put this off? We should not have the benefit of any offset even if the time were come for a settlement between the Government and the Central Pacific Road.

But there is another consideration. Granting the stockholders, and the largest stockholders are common to both these lines, the one line aided, the other nonaided, what follows? If I owe a thousand dollars to the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] and the gentleman from Texas, Governor SAYERS, owes me a thousand dollars, does it follow that I can not settle with the gentleman from Texas because the gentleman from California has some arrangement with me? For my part, I can not understand such logic. I see no reason in it.

Here is another point that I want to impress upon this body. We have already been paying this very class of claims to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. Indeed, I believe we are paying them now. And I call attention to a circular which was issued by Secretary Fairchild June 4, 1886. Prior to that time there had been a general holding up of payments in regard to these railroads; then after matters were settled by the Supreme Court, he issued this circular:

The attention of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department is invited to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The United States, appellants, vs. The Central Pacific Railroad Company, respondents, No. 1291, calendar October term, 1885, rendered May 10, 1886, as to the right of the Government to withhold and apply under the Thurman act the compensation due the Central Pacific Railroad Company—for transportation and other services for the Government over the nonaided portions of the lines owned, leased, or operated by such company, and hereafter the accounts and claims of the company for such services will be settled, adjusted, and paid in conformity to such decision.

All Department circulars heretofore issued upon the subject are modified accordingly.

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Acting Secretary.

Under that order a large amount of these earnings was paid even to the Central Pacific Railroad Company. When Mr. Harrison came in as President a temporary suspension of that order was had, on the advice of an officer of the Department of Justice. But there was no revocation of the order, as I understand; there was merely a suspension until another question, not previously raised, in regard to these claims could be settled. That question was raised in the Court of Claims and unanimously decided against the Government; and so clear was the case that no one thought it necessary to appeal; no appeal has ever been taken, and the time for appeal has long since gone by.

Thus it will be seen that the Central Pacific Company cuts no figure in this case. That company is not here. No aided line is covered by this proposition. The only question now is whether Congress shall exercise a power, which I grant it may exercise, the power of refusing to pay an honest debt. The question is whether the Government will set to the people of the country the example of not paying debts that are justly due for services faithfully rendered, there being no controversy as to the legality of the claim.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Just a word more.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield the gentleman a few moments more.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I believe for one that the Government ought not to be adding to the distress, already mountain high, upon the railroad systems of the country. I believe in holding the railroads to a strict accountability to the people. I have voted for the most radical propositions that have come before Congress to so hold them. I believe in that doctrine. But with our railroads passing one after another into bankruptcy, and when they do so are throwing armies of laboring men out of employment, is it wise policy to hold back this sum of nearly $2,000,000 honestly earned, the work having been well done by a line of road which never had a dollar of aid from the United States Government? I state the facts; and this House can do as it pleases.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois rose.

Mr. SAYERS. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois want?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. There are a number of gentlemen here who want to speak.

Mr. SAYERS. I will yield to the gentleman if he will state what time he wants.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman yields to me, I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. SAYERS. I do not yield the floor to the gentleman. I have asked him how much time he wants?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, I do not know. The gentleman from Pennsylvania wants ten minutes; the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] ten, and I may want ten or fifteen minutes myself.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, and he can parcel out that time as he chooses.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. All right. I would be glad to hear from the gentlemen, however, on the other side. But I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL for ten minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the only interest I have in the pending controversy at this time is largely a personal one. It so happened that early in my service in Congress I was brought into a study of the relations existing between the United States Government and the Pacific railroads; and in a discussion in the Fifty-first Congress—in the second session of that Congress—I strenuously resisted, so far as I could resist, an appropriation then proposed for the payment of certain judgments which had been rendered by the Court of Claims and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, in favor of the Central Pacific Railroad Company and against the Government.

It has been said in the course of this discussion that the position I have assumed to-day, judging that position from the interrogatories I propounded to the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE], is inconsistent with the position I then assumed. I do not think that it is so in any sense of the word; in fact, I think it quite the contrary; and I desire to occupy the floor for a few moments in order to establish that fact.

Now, what was the question before the Fifty-first Congress? The question then presented was whether or not that Congress should appropriate a sum of money for the payment of certain judgments rendered in favor of the Central Pacific Railroad Company against the Government. These judgments were rendered for services performed by that company on the nonaided lines, and were rendered in favor of the Central Pacific Company, because the Supreme Court had held that, under the contract relations existing between the company and the Government, it had a right to be paid in full for all services rendered upon the nonaided lines.

The situation then was this: There was a judgment in favor of the Central Pacific Railroad Company against the Government for services rendered on what is known as the nonaided lines, for which services the Supreme Court of the United States said the company had a right to be paid in full. It was urged here on the floor of the House that the judgment having been so rendered, and there being no money due to the Government from these companies at the time, we could not set off the amount of money to be due by them in the future against the judgment that they had already recovered.

I conceded that principle; but I stood on this principle: That the Central Pacific Company having the judgment, was an insolvent company; that it had presented itself at the doors of every Congress within my recollection declaring that when the time came to pay the $70,000,000 which it owed to the Government of the United States it would be unable to meet its obligations, and I stood on the proposition that a court of equity would always grant an injunction to restrain an execution on the part of an insolvent judgment creditor issued against a party to whom the insolvent would be bound to pay a greater sum of money in the future.

That was the position I then assumed, and I stand on that proposition and the principles it enunciates now. No man on the floor of this House will go further than I will in resistance of the payment, on the part of the United States, of a single dollar to these subsidized railroads, whether for services rendered on the subsidized portions of the lines or upon the nonaided portions of the lines. But that is not the case here.

Mr. RILEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I think it is exactly the case presented here, the only difference being, as I understand, that the judgments before were in the name of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, whereas to-day they are in the name of the Southern Pacific, its lessor, but for the same services and over the same nonaided lines.

Mr. DALZELL. That is precisely the fallacy of the position that is assumed by these gentlemen. The gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] says it is true the judgment is not in favor of the Central Pacific Railroad, but in favor of the Southern Pacific. He says, however, that the stockholders of the Central Pacific and the stockholders of the Southern Pacific Railroad are one and the same.

Why, Mr. Speaker, is there any lawyer here who will have the temerity to claim that identity of stockholders makes identity of corporations? If it were a good defense that this is a scheme on the part of the stockholders of the Central Pacific road, under cover of another corporate name, to recover a judgment against the Government of the United States, it was a good defense to set up in court where the case was tried, but it is no defense here; and because we refuse and still refuse, and will continue to refuse to pay judgments, how many or how great it does not matter, rendered in favor of the subsidized lines, is no reason why we should refuse to pay a judgment in favor of another company for services rendered on roads not aided by the Government and having no connection with the subsidized lines.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Now, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, had the Central Pacific Company under the terms of its agreement with the Government in the first instance the right to make leases with the Southern Pacific Company, or any other company to deprive the Government of its opportunity to obtain services to be rendered, or which should have been rendered to it under the terms of its creation?

Mr. DALZELL. I understand the services were rendered on lines belonging to the Southern Pacific Company, a company which was not aided by the Government, and has no contract with the Government at all.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that. The services in this case were rendered on branches of the Central Pacific which were leased by the Southern Pacific.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, not at all.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. I understand from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REILLY] chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, that that is the situation of the case.

Mr. REILLY. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Now, I want to ask as to the validity of this lease made without the consent of the General Government.

Mr. DALZELL. I can not pass upon that question.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. If they had no power to make that lease without the consent of the General Government, then we are under no obligations to deal with them.

Mr. DALZELL. That is too big a question for me to pass on now. If your position is correct, why do you simply include in this appropriation bill the judgment rendered in favor of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company? Why do you not put in the judgments rendered in favor of the Central Pacific Railroad Company that are yet unpaid?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. You understand that this amendment was put into the bill at the other end of this building.

Mr. DALZELL. I understand, but they must be consistent.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes, but they are not consistent.

Mr. DALZELL. The mere fact that they have provided for the payment of this judgment and have not provided for the others is a declaration upon their part that there is a fundamental distinction between the Central Pacific judgment and this judgment. As I stated when I started, I have no interest in this matter except that I want to be consistent; and if any gentleman can convince me that the ground I now occupy is not the ground I occupied in the Fifty-first Congress, I will go back to that ground.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I wish the Chair, at the end of ten minutes, would call me down.

This is a Senate amendment that provides for the payment of a judgment rendered in favor of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company for carrying the mails and transportation of Government troops over the Southern Pacific Railroad—not the Central Pacific Railroad—prior to 1889.

Since the passage of the Thurman act the Central Pacific Railroad, which was built by Government aid and a loan of Government bonds, performed services over its line which have never been paid for, but under the law are held to reimburse the Government for the debt of that road hereafter to accrue.

But there came up a question between the Government and the Central Pacific Railroad, that was then operating itself and also operating certain leased lines built without Government aid, as to whether payment could be recovered for the service to the Government upon those lines, or whether under the law such earnings could be held by the Government to reimburse it for debts hereafter to accrue from the Central Pacific Railroad. Well, some said one thing and some said another. The question went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and was fully argued by way of appeal from the Court of Claims, and the Supreme Court of the United States, construing the Pacific railroad laws and the Thurman act, said that for services performed on the nonaided lines they were entitled to pay. The judgment was rendered and is still unpaid. That judgment is not only unpaid, but is not on this bill.

In 1885 or 1886, I am not sure which, a new corporation was organized, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and they proceeded to build railroads and bridges, and to build, own, and acquire 2,000 miles of railroad in that system. The Central Pacific Railroad is less than 1,000 miles long. Now, from that time up to 1889, on these 2,000 miles of railroad, owned and operated by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, they carried our mails and troops until we owed them $1,800,000. The Southern Pacific Railroad went into the courts and got judgment, which was finally adjudicated. This is on the Southern Pacific, upon its own lines, not upon the Central Pacific at all.

Now, the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] can talk. The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Ohio can talk, and I can talk about this question and that question and the other question, but the coördinate branch of the Government, the Supreme Court of the United States, was created to settle questions, and when it has solemnly settled them and rendered a judgment, that is the last guess, and is the guess that binds everybody.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Would it not be perfectly true if you owed one of your colleagues $2,000 immediately maturing, and he owed you $10,000 to mature within a few days after judgment was rendered; would not the court be bound to render judgment in his favor upon the note against you, notwithstanding the greater obligation in your favor about to fall due? That is the situation here.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is not the situation; and the gentleman does not state it fairly when he states it to be the situation. Not at all. The Southern Pacific Railroad system is an entirely different system from the Central Pacific. It was built independent of the Government. The Government never aided in its construction. It has different stockholders from the Central Pacific in part.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Did not the Government aid it to the extent of a grant of several millions of acres in aid of its construction?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes. I stated that it had not aided it in the issue of bonds. It aided the Northern Pacific and 10,000 miles of other roads; but that is not the question. The Southern Pacific Railroad owns 2,000 miles of road, has built and paid for its construction, and it has its own set of stockholders independent of the Central Pacific. I am told there are 20,000 of them. And now, after they have earned this money, and the highest court of the land has rendered a judgment in their favor, the gentleman seeks to come in here and muddy the water by not correctly stating the situation. Now, one further matter.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Where does this $1,800,000 come from? Is it an allowance for carrying the mails, etc., on nonaided roads; and is it proposed to hold this as security for the debts and obligations of aided roads?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, no; it is for money due by the United States for carrying the mails on 2,000 miles of the Southern Pacific Railroad, and not over a single foot of the Central Pacific.

Mr. HEPBURN. Over a nonaided road.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It has 2,000 miles of nonaided road, having no connection with the Central Pacific, but having different stockholders; and after exhaustive litigation the judgment has been rendered.

Now, let me tell you another fact, and I hope I will have the attention of the gentlemen from California, Ohio, and Texas. Under Mr. Cleveland's former Administration, a part of it, after the decision of the Supreme Court, and under Mr. Harrison's Administration, and under this Administration, and by our appropriations last Congress, and by Congresses before, and this Congress, we are paying money this day to this Southern Pacific Railroad Company for carrying our mails quarter by quarter. You have appropriated for it in the army bill, in the naval bill, and you have appropriated for it in the Post-Office appropriation bill; and in all these years we pay them every dollar that they earn, if there is enough appropriated; and there is substantially enough.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will take two minutes more.

Now, I can not say anything more about it. That is enough. If the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from California object to the payment of this claim after the money has been earned, and after the Supreme Court has rendered a judgment, pray, if you want to be consistent, why do you not withhold that money, or why do you permit its payment for current services? Why do you not amend this very amendment if you want to do that, and say that there shall be no money paid for services rendered by the Southern Pacific Railroad?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the chairman of the committee, under the present Administration, is reporting provisions for paying the Southern Pacific Company for carrying the mails, the class of services for which it refused to pay on a judgment—for carrying the mails prior to 1879?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. We refuse to pay if we vote down this amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is the same class of case.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It is the same thing.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The United States mails were carried in 1888 or 1889, or parts of those years, and troops transported to the amount of $1,800,000, which the Southern Pacific Railroad went into the court and recovered by a final judgment; and in the last quarter and the quarter before, and for years before, we have been paying the same company for similar services, and are doing it to-day.

Mr. HULICK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MARSH. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I will; both.

Mr. HULICK. In the suit in which that judgment was rendered was there any defense, legal or equitable, set up against the payment of the judgment bearing upon this defense now set up?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. On which defense?

Mr. HULICK. The claim that the Central Pacific Railroad Company would be insolvent, and that it could not pay.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. All the defenses were set up that could be set up, I apprehend. I have not read the pleadings; but I am satisfied that every defense was set up.

Mr. MARSH. This is just what I want to ask my colleague. The gentleman from California made the point, and it made some impression upon my mind, that four individuals, and he named them, are the owners of the Central Pacific, which railroad is about to default to the United States.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. And it is sustained by the testimony taken.

Mr. MARSH. I do not want to know anything from you. I want my colleague to answer my question. The point the gentleman from California made was that four certain men, whom he named, are the owners, and the sole owners, of the Central Pacific Railroad, and that the same four men are the owners of the Southern Pacific Railroad. And hence he says, properly, as I believe, if his statement is correct, that what the Central Pacific road owes the Government might, in equity, be set off against what the Government owes the Southern Pacific. Now, what is the fact? Are the same men the owners of the two corporations?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], answered that question in part.

Mr. MARSH. Well, will you not answer it in whole?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly. And I answer that, if Judge Payson's word can be taken, the stockholders of the two companies are different. I have no doubt that there are some stockholders common to each company; but all the stockholders in one company are not all the stockholders in the other.

Mr. MARSH. Then the statement of the gentleman from California is not correct.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I understand that it is not correct if that gentleman intended to make that statement.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Judge Payson is contradicting the testimony taken by the Pacific Railway Commission.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let us have the testimony, but in your own time. Now, Mr. Speaker, even if it were so, it would cut no figure. The corporations are different. Their debtors and creditors are different. Each one of these roads is bonded. The Southern Pacific Railroad, with its 2,000 miles of road, is bonded. Its bonds were sold to build the road step by step through Texas long after the Central Pacific was completed. They have different interests. Their creditors are different. Their stockholders are different in part, as I am informed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that they sold bonds to build the railroad through Texas?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, well, the road runs through Texas, and I made that as a general remark. I do not know specifically that they sold bonds to build the part of the road that runs through Texas; but I understand that the Southern Pacific Railroad, in whole or in many of its branches, did sell bonds for construction purposes.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman has any special knowledge on this subject I will yield to him.

Mr. CULBERSON. I would like to have three or four minutes on this question.

Mr. SAYERS. I will yield the gentleman time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman has any information on the subject that I have not, I will yield to him.

Mr. CULBERSON. I was simply asking the question for information.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I did not mean United States bonds.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] have used about twenty-five minutes, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] about fifteen minutes, making forty minutes altogether used on that side. Now, I intend to move an adjournment at 5 o'clock——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. You can not complete this matter this evening.

Mr. SAYERS. I am not going to try. I am going to submit a proposition to the House. I ask unanimous consent that, after the reading of the Journal to-morrow the debate on this amendment be continued for an hour and a half, when the vote shall be taken; the time for debate to be divided in proportion to the consumption of time to-day; that is, those in favor of the amendment having consumed forty-five minutes and those opposed to it twenty minutes, each side shall have its proper proportion of the remaining time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. There is no disposition to prolong the debate, but I think it would be better to let it run temporarily.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to reach an agreement because members will desire to know when they are required to vote. I ask consent that the debate continue now until 5 o'clock and for an hour and a half to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Why not say that you will not ask a vote before half past 1 or half past 2? We on this side have used a good deal of the time, and I do not know what may be said on the other side that may require a reply.

Mr. SAYERS. I am willing to give the gentleman time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, the gentleman has it in his power to move the previous question at any time. I will coöperate with him to close the debate as soon as it can be done reasonably.

Mr. SAYERS. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, and I do not want to yield it so that other motions may be made. What I desire is to reach some fair and equitable agreement between those who are in favor of the Senate amendment and those who are opposed to it. I do not wish to press a vote unless with the consent of the gentlemen who are in favor of the amendment.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I can say nothing further than I have said. There is no disposition on my part to occupy one minute of time for the mere purpose of consuming time, and I will, to the best of my ability, coöperate with the gentleman to bring this matter to a speedy vote, but I am not prepared at this moment to say just how much time we require.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman agree that the vote be taken at 2 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will agree that I will not ask the gentleman to call for a vote before 2 o'clock. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULBERSON. There are a few of us over here that want a little time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman from New Hampshire also wants ten minutes, and quite a number of gentlemen over here want to be heard.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think we can get through by 2 o'clock.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I hope so; but there is a morning hour.

Mr. SAYERS. No; I am going to call up the report the first thing after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will agree to two hours and a half, this side to have an hour and the other side an hour and a half.

Mr. SAYERS. All right, sir. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this question may be limited to two hours and a half—one hour and a half to be used by those gentlemen who are opposed to the Senate amendments, and the remaining hour by those who are in favor of those amendments, the hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and the hour and a half by myself.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is, two hours and a half to-morrow.

Mr. SAYERS. Perhaps the gentleman might be willing to go on now.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, I will not go on now. It is quarter before 5.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TARSNEY). The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that, after two hours and a half of further debate, the previous question may be considered as ordered and a vote be taken on the pending proposition. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SAYERS. With the understanding that this conference report will be called up as soon as the Journal is read to-morrow, I will move that the House adjourn.

EXCLUSION AND DEPORTATION OF ALIEN ANARCHISTS.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (S. 2314) to provide for the exclusion and deportation of alien anarchists.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. CALL. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from New York, but this seems to be a very long bill, and it will probably occupy some time.

Mr. HILL. I will explain it to the Senator, if he will permit me just a moment.

This bill is virtually a report from a conference committee. The other House passed a bill to provide for consular inspection abroad. The Senate did not like that bill, and we substituted another measure. A conference committee was appointed, and we finally agreed upon this bill; but the conferees on the part of the House did not wish to have their bill killed, but wanted the principle of consular inspection to remain open and go over until the next session. We consented to allow that bill to remain in conference, they in the mean time agreeing that we should pass this bill here and send it to the House, when that body would concur in it.

Mr. CALL. If there is to be no debate, I will withdraw my objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. When this bill or a similar bill was before the Senate the other day, on the motion of the Senator from New York there was a provision inserted that when any person had come into our country and had been naturalized, if it could be proven before the proper tribunal that he was not a man of good moral character, that he was not attached to the Constitution and principles of our Government, and was not disposed to the good order and happiness of the same, he should be deported. That language is omitted from this bill, and I do not see why it should not be contained in it.

Mr. HILL. By the provisions of this bill, in the first place, if an alien immigrant should be convicted of a crime and the judge should determine upon a further hearing that the person had been guilty of a crime involving moral turpitude, and that his presence in the country would be a menace to the Government and the peace and good order of society, he may be ordered deported. It was thought wise by the conference committee not to use the words "attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States," as it left too much open. As the man is an alien, of course it is not expected that he will be attached to the principles of our Constitution. An alien who behaves himself in this country would not and could not be touched under this bill, and we do not propose to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not propose to offer an amendment——

Mr. HILL. The bill was very carefully considered by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it does seem to me that every person who has been admitted under our immigration laws ought to be required to stand by the declaration we require for admission; and if it be proven afterward that he is not a man of good moral character, that he is not attached to the principles of our Government, and is not disposed to the good order and peace of the same, he ought to be excluded.

Mr. HILL. We do not touch the citizen who is naturalized. We do not think it wise to go so far as that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I see no reason why persons who are brought into our country under our naturalization laws should not only prove at the time they are admitted that they come within its provisions, but that they should maintain that condition, or else be liable to be deported.

Mr. HILL. I will simply say, as has been said heretofore in regard to other bills, that it is a step in the right direction. Sooner or later we may adopt the idea, which is an entirely good one, of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, but it is a little too early to do it now.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to say that it was not deemed advisable by the committee to provide that every alien should be deported whom we would not be willing to naturalize and make a citizen of.

This bill was drawn in the Treasury Department, and has been subjected to very careful scrutiny. It may not go so far as the Senator from Ohio would like to go, but it is an excellent bill, which has been carefully rewritten by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], the chairman of the Committee on Immigration, and there has been inserted by the committee a provision in reference to the writ of habeas corpus, which effectually guards any alien against being deported without all the proceedings which result in the order of deporting being carefully reviewed by a judicial tribunal.

The bill is stringent enough for the time; it is sufficiently well guarded, and it is of the highest importance, in the opinion of the committee, that it should be passed without delay and sent to the House of Representatives, where we are assured it can be immediately acted upon.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I desire to say in reference to the pending bill that, while I shall not resist its passage in any way, the language is so general that I fear under some circumstances it may be greatly abused.

With this remark I shall content myself with the action of the Senate; but if the yeas and nays were called on the passage of the bill I should not vote for it with its present loose language.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4686) to correct the military record of Alexander P. Magaan, of Battery H, Fourth United States Artillery, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1770) to place Maj. Robert P. Barry on the retired list of the Army, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2186) for the relief of the widow and legal representatives of the late Orsemus B. Boyd, captain in Eighth United States Cavalry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

REPORT OF LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

Mr. MILLS submitted the annual report of the Librarian of Congress for the calendar year 1893.

He also, from the Committee on the Library, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the annual report of the Librarian of Congress for the calendar year 1893 be printed, and that 500 extra copies, with paper covers, be printed for distribution by the Librarian.

PRINTING OF THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed in pamphlet form, for the use of the Senate, 15,000 copies of the bill (H. R. 4864) entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes."

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORT.

Mr. GORMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives for the printing of the tenth report of the Civil Service Commission, to report it without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 23,000 copies of the tenth report of the United States Civil Service Commission be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 20,000 for distribution by the United States Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I desire to say in reference to this concurrent resolution to print the report of the Civil Service Commission, that it is a resolution which came from the House of Representatives in the midst of the pressure of the public business here. The resolution had been lying in the Senate for some days, when the president of the Civil Service Commission called here ten days or two weeks ago to press its passage, and not finding it passed, the Commission, as has been usual with it, furnished to the public press malicious and slanderous statements about the delay, for the purpose, I take it, of creating a false impression in the country. I have reported the resolution at a time when it is convenient to the committee to report it.

I wish to emphasize the statement that that Commission had better in the future seek to have its reports published and printed by respectful communications to this body and to the other, and keep out of the public press.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

JOHN FINN.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1066) to authorize the Third Auditor of the Treasury to audit certain quartermaster's vouchers belonging to John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo., to report it with amendments.

I will state that this is a very brief bill of one page, intended to correct certain defects in a private act which was passed at the last Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments of the Committee on Claims were, in line 5, after the word "Missouri," to strike out the words "as owner" and insert "claimant;" in line 8, after the word "vouchers," where it appears the second time, to insert "it is alleged;" in line 10, after the word "now," to insert "alleged to be;" in line 15, after the word "authorities," to insert "and came rightfully and for value into the hands of said Finn," and at the end of the bill to insert:

Provided further, That all original payees who do not present claims for payment on said vouchers within thirty days from the date of the approval of this act shall be forever barred from presenting such claims, and said John Finn shall, after said thirty days, be entitled to receive the amount found to be due thereon upon the conditions aforesaid.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Third Auditor of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo., claimant of 371 quartermaster's vouchers, aggregating $6,363.95, more or less, to sign the receipts upon the said vouchers, which said vouchers, it is alleged, were presented by the said Finn to the Quartermaster-General, and are now alleged to be in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury; and the receipts so signed shall be acceptable as a sufficient compliance with the laws and rules regulating such cases: Provided, That it shall be found, upon examination, that the said vouchers were duly issued by the legally constituted authorities, and came rightfully and for value into the hands of said Finn, and that they have not heretofore been audited and paid: Provided further, That all original payees who do not present claims for payment on said vouchers within thirty days from the date of the approval of this act shall be forever barred from presenting such claims, and said John Finn shall, after said thirty days, be entitled to receive the amount found to be due thereon upon the conditions aforesaid.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Third Auditor of the Treasury to audit certain quartermaster's vouchers alleged to belong to John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo."

POWERS AND PRIVILEGES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. GRAY. From the Special Committee to Investigate Attempts at Bribery, etc., I beg leave to submit a report at their instance, which I ask may be printed as a miscellaneous document. The document will consist of decisions and precedents in the Senate and House of Representatives relating to the powers and privileges of the Senate and House of Representatives in respect to their members, investigations, contempts, libels, contumacious witnesses, and so on. It will make a very valuable volume, in the opinion of the committee. It is already in print, and I ask by authority of the committee that it may be printed as a miscellaneous document. The index will be very full and complete, and I think it will be a valuable document for reference and of much use to the public.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order to print will be made, in the absence of objection.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to bring up for consideration a resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. The bill I wish considered is an important one, as Senators will understand the moment it is read, and one to which there will be no objection.

Mr. CALL. I make no objection.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator not let us get through with morning business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Oregon to object?

Mr. CHANDLER. Senators will not object when they hear the bill read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

"The filing of such certificate so approved shall be and operate as a renewal of such charter for the time specified therein. "The provisions of section 553 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia shall apply to the record of all certificates of renewals of charters authorized by this act."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 553 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the organization of corporations within the District of Columbia."

DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2512) to authorize the preparation and publication of a descriptive catalogue and index of Government publications, which was reported yesterday from the Committee on Printing.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. JOSEPH H. RICHARDS.

Mr. GRAY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1558) for the correction of the military record of Capt. Joseph H. Richards. It is a small matter.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Delaware will not do that until the resolution which I desire to call up is considered.

Mr. GRAY. This is a matter which will not take five minutes. I think that when the Senator from Florida hears the bill read he will have no objection to it, and I shall have to leave the Chamber soon on public business.

Mr. CALL. I will yield for a moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "Volunteers," to insert "on the 26th day of April, 1864;" so as to make the bill read:

INTOXICATING LIQUORS IN SENATE WING OF CAPITOL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. KYLE, as follows:

Resolved, That during the recess of Congress no intoxicating liquors shall be sold or used in the Senate wing of the Capitol building; and the Capitol police board is hereby authorized and directed to enforce this resolution.

Mr. KYLE. I do not think there can be any objection to the resolution.

Mr. GORMAN. I desire to state that I interrupted the consideration of the resolution when it was up before in order to suggest that under the rules the resolution must go to the Committee on Rules; but I have no objection to waiving the point of order for the present if the Senator from South Dakota desires to be heard.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to ask why it is proposed to prohibit the sale of liquors only during the recess of Congress.

Mr. KYLE. I will answer the Senator from Connecticut.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland makes the point of order, as the Chair understands, that the resolution must be referred to the Committee on Rules. Is that the point of order?

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KYLE. I should like to know by what rule the resolution must go to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota will suspend until the Chair can hear the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. That is the point of order I made, but I suggested that if the Senator from South Dakota wishes to say a few words I would withhold the point of order until he can be heard.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from South Dakota upon the point of order.

Mr. KYLE. I merely wish to know by what rule the resolution must go to the Committee on Rules without first being considered here. I supposed that any current resolution was subject to the disposition of the Senate at any time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota whether there is any rule which authorizes the sale of intoxicating liquors here during the recess. If not, the Senator's resolution is clearly in order, unless it seeks——

Mr. KYLE. I will read the rule for the benefit of the Senator from Ohio. Rule 10, on page 181 of the Manual, states:

> No spirituous liquors shall be sold, furnished, or kept in the restaurant.

Mr. SHERMAN. If no rule of the Senate allows liquors to be sold during the session or during the recess, then it is clearly in order to prohibit their sale, because such sale would be a violation of the rule. Any change of the rules, of course, requires a notice, etc.

Mr. GRAY. Under those circumstances the resolution would be for the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would be for the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. KYLE. The resolution merely relates to the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is clearly in order.

Mr. KYLE. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] that it would be my wish to enforce the rule during the three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. It has been tried heretofore, but as everybody in the Senate Chamber knows, it has been an absolute and flat failure. The late Senator from Kansas, Mr. Plumb, on August 18, 1890, offered a resolution to the effect that the rule should be enforced and that no intoxicating liquors should be sold. It was discussed on three or four different days, as I notice in the RECORD of that date, but was finally passed over and was not agreed to by the Senate.

Now, there are those in the Senate Chamber, of course, who may object to the abridgment of their privileges along this line. I do not wish to abridge any Senator's privileges with reference to the use of intoxicating drinks. He can use them in his own private house, in his own private committee room, or wheresoever he chooses, but I do not think it proper and I never have thought it proper that intoxicating liquors should be sold openly over the counter of the Senate restaurant. There is not a Senator in the Chamber to-day who does not know that liquors are sold and sold openly, not to members of this body alone—I make no charge against anybody—but sold openly to visitors to the Capitol, sold to the young men—almost boys—who are occupied in the Capitol, and to clerks to Senators. I have seen these things; you have seen them——

Mr. COCKRELL. I never have.

Mr. KYLE. I refer to some Senators who have seen the same thing. I do not refer to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. Some Senators may, but not all.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to see this practice stopped at once and for all time; but if we can not stop it during the session of the Senate, we certainly can stop it during the time of the recess of Congress, when nobody is left here perhaps except the clerks around the Capitol. I ask therefore for the consideration of the resolution, and I hope it may be agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. Instead of the point of order, I shall move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules. I know how easy it is for Senators to pose in public and make a display of their personal virtues, or rather by introducing resolutions prevent other gentlemen from enjoying this life as they see proper. I happen to be one of the Senators who can, at all events, talk about and deal with the whisky question as one who does not understand the taste of liquor. I neither indulge myself nor encourage others to indulge, but I have never yet, in public or in private, and especially in public, imposed my tastes upon others and posed before the country as a special reformer, and then, as reformers frequently do, slip behind the door and take two or three private drinks.

The rules of the Senate prohibit the sale in this end of the Capitol of intoxicating liquors, and it is only a question of the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. KYLE. That is all, and that is all the resolution calls for.

Mr. GORMAN. But the Senator from South Dakota wants the sale to be winked at during the session of the Senate and prohibited during the recess. The rule says intoxicating liquors shall not be sold at all. The resolution proposes a modification, and a bad modification, of the rule.

Mr. KYLE. Will the Senator from Maryland vote to prohibit the sale during the whole year?

Mr. GORMAN. No vote is necessary. There is nothing necessary in this case except an opportunity to pose before the public. The rule is as perfect as it can be. If the rules are not enforced, it is the fault of those who are charged with their enforcement. If the Senator desires to reach the difficulty, let him ascertain who is the guilty party in the failure to enforce the rule and bring in his resolution condemning him. If the Senator has information, which I have not, that Senators have witnessed the sale of liquor to boys and other young people, it was his duty to report that fact to the Committee on Rules, who have charge of this matter, or to the proper officers of the body, and try and get a reform without this public display.

Mr. President, that is all there is in this case. I will change my motion, sir. I move that the resolution lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. KYLE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland that the resolution lie on the table, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that it would be very proper to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules for some investigation of the matter and for some proper enforcement of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. Very well; I will change my motion to gratify the Senator from New Jersey, and move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. PLATT. I understand the motion now is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the motion now made by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. PLATT. I shall support that motion. I doubt whether there is any occasion for this resolution. As I understand it, when we go away from here the restaurant is practically closed up; that it is not kept open during the summer, and there is no necessity for the resolution. I think it is clearly to be seen that there is no necessity for it.

I desire to say a few words further. I think that this talk which we read in the papers, and which to some extent has been to-day reaffirmed by the Senator from South Dakota, to the effect that we have a bar in the Senate restaurant, and that liquors are sold over it indiscriminately, is very much exaggerated, if not untrue. The Senator from South Dakota said that, as all Senators know, intoxicating liquors are sold there. I do not know it, Mr. President. I never saw it. I have never stood about watching to see whether that is the case. I never drink liquors of any sort myself; and I do not know that a practice is made of selling liquors in the restaurant of the Senate wing of the Capitol. I know it is against the rules; and I believe if there had been any serious infraction of the rules, and the fact had been brought to the attention of the Committee on Rules, it would have been remedied.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I wish to say just one word in answer. It is furthest from my thought to pose as a reformer along the line of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drinks in the Senate wing of the Capitol. It has not been the habit of my life to pose in any sense of the word. I never have done so, and I do not propose to do so now; but I do think that if people wish to drink they can at least go to the nearest saloon, which is only a very few hundred feet away.

Mr. BUTLER. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. How does the Senator from South Dakota know? [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. BUTLER (to Mr. KYLE). In which direction is the nearest saloon?

Mr. KYLE. The Senator from Delaware wishes to know how I know. If the Senator from Delaware will walk down Pennsylvania avenue, as I do very frequently for exercise, he will find that he can not pass perhaps three or four blocks from the Capitol without running against a drunken man at 6 or 7 o'clock at night. Those are facts.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, in order to relieve the mind of the Senator from South Dakota, I ask that the parts of Rules X and I, which I have marked, regulating the Senate wing, be read at the desk. Let the part of Rule X that is marked be read first.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE X.

* * * * * * *

No spirituous liquors shall be sold, furnished, or kept in the restaurant.

RULE I.

* * * * * * * *

The Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, under the direction of the Presiding Officer, shall be the executive officer of the body for the enforcement of all rules made by the Committee on Rules, for the regulation of the Senate wing of the Capitol.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MANDERSON. I simply desired to have the rule read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, that the pending resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KYLE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLANCHARD (when his name was called.) I am paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN].

INVESTIGATION BY THE COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the resolution proposing an investigation by the Committee on Patents, reported yesterday from the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate, be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents have authority to sit during the recess of Congress and continue their session during said recess for the investigation of the proposed change of the patent laws, to send for persons and papers and take such evidence as they may think proper and necessary, and visit such places as they may think advantageous for gathering information upon the subject and report the same to Congress at the next session, and also authority to employ a stenographer and the necessary clerical assistance, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. CALL. The resolution is recommended by the Committee on Patents unanimously. It was brought forward in response to a request from large numbers of people in the United States for radical changes in the patent laws. The committee are of the opinion that no such legislation should be attempted without a full consideration of the system of patents and of the persons interested in patents throughout the country. The petitions state that a vast amount of money is collected from the people of the United States under the existing laws relating to patents. The Bell Telephone patent system is under consideration, and several bills have been introduced in the House of Representatives looking indirectly to a continuance of the monopolies created under those patents. In view of this proposed legislation, affecting the entire system of patent laws, and the widespread feeling upon the subject, the committee are unwilling to undertake the investigation and to make recommendation without full conference with all the interests concerned.

I send to the desk for the information of the Senate a letter addressed to me from the former Commissioner of Patents, Hon. Mr. Butterworth, who was a member of Congress and is well known to the members of the Senate. I ask that his letter be read for the consideration of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 11, 1894.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I observe that you have asked permission of the Senate for the Committee on Patents to sit during vacation to investigate alleged abuses which have grown up under the patent system. I sincerely hope the Senate will grant the leave you ask, as the investigation you propose is of the first importance to the community.

The time has come when an end should be put to the opportunity of individuals and combines to use the United States courts and an old patent as agencies and the means to extort money from defenseless citizens. I say defenseless, for they are practically so, since there is no alternative left to them under a system that is practiced by certain combines in the country, except to pay tribute or submit to a greater wrong in the shape of paying ten times as much to resist the unjust exaction. The scheme adopted by the combines is fairly set out in the resolution introduced in the Senate by Senator WASHBURN and in the House by the Hon. JAMES W. COVERT, chairman of the Committee on Patents of the House.

The abuses complained of can be corrected without in anywise or to any extent impairing the usefulness and efficiency of the patent system.

I have, as Commissioner of Patents, and since, while engaged in the practice, observed these abuses grow until they have become unbearable, and are more dangerous to our patent system, unless corrected, than all the other influences put together that are arrayed against the patent law as it exists. The present Commissioner of Patents, Mr. Seymour, has taken hold of the office, as I believe, with a firm determination to correct any evils or abuses that may be found to exist, in so far as he can do so, by a modification or extension of existing rules. But the abuse we speak of, which has all the elements and characteristics of black mail, can only be corrected by legislation, and there ought to be no delay in providing that much needed remedial measure.

I will be very willing to go before your committee and give them the result of my experience and observation, and render any assistance in my power in providing a thorough and complete remedy for the evils that have grown up under the patent system, and are a source of complaint throughout the entire country.

Very respectfully,

BENJ. BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Florida a question? As I understood the Senator, he alluded, as one of the subjects for the proposed investigation, to the matter of the issue of the Bell telephone patents. Did I understand him correctly?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. Does not the Senator know that those patents are now the subject of litigation in the United States courts at the instance of the Government; that those conflicting claims require a judicial settlement, and that nothing could be gained by an investigation before a committee except to help one side or the other in that contest? In a great deal that the Senator has said about the necessity for an investigation of the patent laws I am in sympathy with him.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Delaware is right and he is wrong, as we frequently are. What I said was that several bills had been introduced, which are referred to in the letter of Mr. Butterworth, the former Commissioner of Patents, looking to the indirect extension of those patents, and that legislation is now pending, not in reference to the original right of the patentees, but continuing divers inventions subsidiary to the original patents, which it is claimed by Mr. Butterworth and others, and by petitions now before the Committee on Patents, will have the effect, whatever may be the legislation, of extending those patents. That is the question which is presented by the proposed legislation in part, and it is a question which requires investigation.

The Senator from Delaware may be right in reference to certain cases which are pending in litigation, and which are involved in the question, and the Commissioner of Patents may also be right in reference to the indirect effect of the bill now pending, proposing changes in the existing law. However that may be, the Committee on Patents have here given an expression of opinion which does not concern that inquiry. The patent system levies a vast amount of money upon the people of the United States every year. There is great discontent with it. It has distinguished merits. It has performed a great part in the civilization of the country and in its progress. In view of this fact, in order that there may be no action which is too radical, that it may be conservative and just, and at the same time do away with existing abuses, the Committee on Patents, after a full investigation, appreciating the magnitude of the subject, brought in the resolution which is before the Senate.

I may be permitted to say that this question is not less important than the tariff legislation which has attracted the attention of the country for so great a length of time. The annual imposition upon the people of this country by the patent laws, however beneficial they may be, will not be greatly less in amount than that levied by the tariff revenue system of the country, and the indirect effects are as great in the promotion of monopolies and syndicates.

Mr. President, this is a great interest; and yet, with the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Patents, with the recommendation, as I understand from this letter, of the Commissioner of Patents, of the former Commissioner, a distinguished member of Congress from Ohio, and notwithstanding the vast public opinion soliciting this action, the two gentlemen who compose the Committee on Contingent Expenses, while they hold that it is sufficiently important to make a rule of five or six lines that permission should be given and the expense paid of the Committee on Rules sitting during a vacation, hold that this great public opinion concerning a question closely connected with the progress of civilization to-day does not demand an inquiry, and that the Committee on Patents shall not have the privilege of making this investigation.

It is manifest that it can not be made during the coming short session of Congress. It is known that a great public opinion throughout the country is attacking the patent system and the existing laws, and it is only reasonable and fair and just to patentees and to the system which is intended to encourage invention that there should be a full hearing accorded to them.

Now, upon the question of expense, I wish to say a few words. It is less expensive for five or six Senators to attend at a particular place than to bring to the Capitol from a distance forty or fifty or a hundred persons in a prolonged inquiry upon this subject. The resolution is in the interest of economy, and it can not be sat down upon by saying they are to be a peripatetic and wandering committee. When such committees properly discharge their duty they are less expensive and more beneficial to the country than inquiries held at the Capitol with the expense of numerous witnesses summoned here. I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "the proposed change" and inserting "proposed changes," and by inserting, after the words "patent laws," the words "and of all bills concerning patents pending in Congress."

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMDEN. Mr. President, I desire to speak in behalf of the Committee on Contingent Expenses. The committee have no desire whatever to antagonize the wishes of the Senator from Florida, but the appropriation for the purpose of paying the expenses of investigations by committees is limited. The proposition is to incur a large expenditure by going over the country to investigate the operation of the patent laws, when, in the opinion of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, the matter can be just as well investigated at the Capitol. Therefore, the contingent fund of the Senate not being large enough to meet all the demands upon it, the committee reported adversely on this particular resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, this is almost the first time that I ever knew a resolution of this kind opposed on the ground that the United States could not afford to make the investigation. The usual course has been to allow committees of this body to decide for themselves whether an investigation during the recess would be advisable and beneficial, and the judgment of the committee has usually been accepted by the Senate. Now, the Committee on Patents state that the proposed changes in the patent laws require investigation, and in their judgment such investigation as they can not give during the present session nor in season for action upon bills to be brought forward at the coming short session of Congress. I submit that unless we wish to discredit our committee we can afford to trust the committee to make the proposed investigation.

I doubt if the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate have made a careful inquiry as to the purposes of this investigation; indeed, the Senator from West Virginia did not say that he had. He stated that the Government was too poor to make this investigation. I submit if the Committee on Patents is to be trusted as to its judgment that the investigation ought to be made, then the investigation should go forward, and the United States and the Senate will manage to find some way to pay the necessary bills. I do not know what expenditures the Senator from Florida expects will be made necessary; I do not know whether he expects that there will be a large expenditure for this purpose.

The Senator from West Virginia did not name any particular sum, but seemed to be apprehensive that extravagant expenditures were to be indulged in. I am not myself afraid that such will be the case. The chairman of the Committee on Patents is a member of the Committee on Appropriations and understands the policy of that committee, both concerning expenditures and the restriction of expenditures, and he would not propose an investigation, the expenses of which would run counter to the general policy of that committee. Therefore it seems to me that there ought not to be an objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the resolution may be read as amended in order that we may know what it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as amended will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents have authority to sit during the recess of Congress and continue their session during said recess for the investigation of proposed changes of the patent laws, and of all bills concerning patents pending in Congress, to send for persons and papers and take such evidence as they may think proper and necessary, and visit such places as they may think advantageous for gathering information upon the subject and report the same to Congress at their next session, and also authority to employ a stenographer and the necessary clerical assistance, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire—I do not know whether or not he is a member of the Committee on Patents—as the champion of this resolution, what necessity there is for visiting places throughout the United States to ascertain the effect of patent laws? It seems to me that if the Senator from Florida and his associates desire to visit the watering places or anywhere else in the United States they should say so frankly and plainly, and not ask for the passage of a resolution in this form for that purpose.

It seems to me the city of Washington is the proper place to investigate this question, if anywhere, because the Patent Office is the place to learn the effect of the patent laws; all the eminent patent lawyers are here, and if any place in the United States is the proper place it is the city of Washington. I see no reason for that part of the resolution, and I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will explain why it is necessary.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will allow me a moment, as an inquiry has been addressed to me.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Rhode Island has no right to assume nor to say that this resolution is intended to enable the committee to go to any watering place. That is a pure assumption and imagination of his. I remember, however, some years ago when the Senator spent nearly a whole summer at a watering place in the investigation of proposed changes in the tariff law, and I remember many such occasions, one where the Committee on Rules regaled themselves at a watering place for the purpose of determining what should be the rules of the Senate, and I remember that the Committee on Contingent Expenses have at this session and within the last day or two recommended that the Committee on Rules, of which I believe the Senator from Rhode Island is a member and has been for many years, should be allowed to sit during the recess, and a discretion given them as to where they should go or what they should do.

Now I will answer the Senator's question. As to so great an interest as that dependent upon the patent laws, which have been of such vast benefit to the civilization of the day, but which levy a greater tribute upon the people of the United States today than the Senator's pet tariff system does, before the committee undertake to recommend a radical change in the patent laws, which is demanded by existing legislation, shortening the patent life and providing for the condemnation by the Government and the purchase of patents in certain cases, it is important that the people who are interested in these patents should be permitted to express their views, opinions, and recommendations to the committee. How are they to do it? How are those who are not rich men, the poor inventors of the country, to do it unless they are summoned here?

Does the Senator desire to suppress the inventive intellect of the poor people of this country by such flings as that Senators will go to watering places, instead of performing their duty? Why should not this committee go where the brains of the poor people are inventing the wonderful changes in mechanical forces that are now being made in the great centers of thought and activity and summon them to come before that committee and express their opinions? Inventors are poor; they do not derive the benefits of their inventions; it is the moneyed men, the rich, the capitalists who take from the poor man his brains and the great thoughts which he contributes to civilization.

Sir, there is no more important subject than that of a proper encouragement of the inventive faculties of the country. There is no more important thing for any committee of this body to do than to place themselves in contact with the living thought of the people upon this subject; and as a matter of economy it is far cheaper to go to those people than it is to bring them here. They constitute thousands and tens of thousands of the 70,000,000 people in this country; they are to be found in New York, in Chicago, in Boston, and in the great centers of manufacturing industry; and it is the duty of this body, if they sympathize with the progress of intellect and of discovery, and the subjection of the mechanical forces to the uses of man—it is the duty of this body, if they are up with the spirit of the age, to see how best this inventive faculty can be encouraged and protected. That is the object of this recommendation, unanimously made by the Committee on Patents, and not to go, as my friend has done heretofore, to Bar Harbor or some other pleasant place.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I agreed with the chairman in an adverse report on this resolution. I did so because I understood the proposition was to examine the patent laws. I do not know a better place to examine laws than in Washington City, where there is more ready access to all the laws that I imagine can be found anywhere in this country. I can see no necessity for a committee being authorized to have a stenographer and to travel over the country to find out what the patent laws are. If they ought to be changed it seems to me all that is necessary to be ascertained can be done in the committee room here as well as it can be anywhere else on the face of the earth.

I can understand when a matter of fact is to be found out, when something not in the written laws of the land is desired to be known, that a committee might be sent to investigate the facts. A committee was sent some time ago to investigate some troubles which occurred at Pittsburg. I can understand why the Committee on Interstate Commerce might be sent to investigate facts bearing upon certain questions which would come within the jurisdiction of that committee, so that it could make a personal examination on the ground to obtain an understanding of the facts.

Mr. GRAY. Matters that are local.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Matters that are local; but why there could be any reason for a committee investigating the question of a change in the law to be sent out to make the investigation is absolutely beyond my comprehension and imagination. The Senator from Florida has cited an instance in the argument he has just made which perhaps might justify it. He says there have been instances where committees have gone to watering places to make such investigations. If such has been the fact I hope it will not occur again, and I hope it will not occur when this Senate is in session, and I shall not be a party to making it possible that any committee shall discharge any sort of duty in that way.

The Senator from Florida makes some criticism of the fact that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has reported favorably a proposition for the Committee on Rules to sit in Washington in vacation.

Mr. CALL. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not say anything about that.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The resolution which the Senator from Florida introduced is in the following language:

> That the Committee on Patents have authority to sit during the recess of Congress and continue their session during said recess for the investigation of proposed changes of the patent laws and of all bills concerning patents pending in Congress.

There is no objection to the committee having all the time necessary to make this investigation, but the resolution proceeds:

> To send for persons and papers, and take such evidence as they may think proper and necessary.

This is not to ascertain a fact, but simply to hunt up somebody who it may be supposed wants to make an argument about the patent laws. If any suggestions are to be made by people interested in the patent laws the mails are open, and they can easily reach the committee, as such arguments are made daily from all sections of the country in other matters which affect the general public. But here is another branch of the resolution:

> And visit such places as they may think advantageous for gathering information upon the subject and report the same to Congress at the next session, and also authority to employ a stenographer and the necessary clerical assistance, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

I can see no necessity for the adoption of this resolution. After a careful consideration on the part of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate there was no difference of sentiment among us. We believed there was no necessity for the resolution, and we reported it adversely to the Senate, and I hope the Senate will express itself positively upon the subject.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the terms of the resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], the chairman of the Committee on Rules. That resolution provided that "the Committee on Rules are authorized to sit during the coming vacation." The resolution does not limit the place nor does it say, as does this resolution, "at any place they may see fit."

As one member of the Committee on Rules, I desire to say that I see no necessity for that committee sitting anywhere except here at the Capitol. I do not know that it ever performed a duty elsewhere, but certainly under this resolution there would be no session anywhere except in this city.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I stated a moment ago that the resolution we reported authorizing the Committee on Rules to sit during the vacation was an authorization to sit here, and I think the provision was made that it should. I so understood it. I have no objection to that. I believe it is proper and right that they should sit and make an examination of our rules. We reported that resolution favorably, and we reported the other adversely.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think, unless some authority is given in the resolution to sit elsewhere than at the Capitol, it would be confined to the Capitol.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should think so.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, as reference has been made to the fact that the Committee on Rules many years ago met at a place other than the Capitol, I simply desire to state this fact, for I was then as now a member of that committee. A number of years ago—I do not remember exactly the date—when the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] was chairman of the Committee on Rules, the committee undertook to revise the rules of the Senate, and did revise them, during the recess of Congress, a revision which is now in force, so far as it was afterwards agreed to by the Senate. The Senator from Florida referred to the Senator from Rhode Island as a member of that committee. I do not think he was at that time.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was not a member of the committee at that time.

Mr. HARRIS. But I remember the fact that the Senator from Maine, then chairman of the committee, the committee being authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, summoned me as a member of the committee to a meeting at Bar Harbor, and I went there. But the Senator from Maine and myself, my recollection is, were the only members of the committee who met there. I think I remained there a couple of days and returned to the capital. The revision of the rules was made here. That is the whole story so far as Bar Harbor is concerned.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island alluded to me as the champion of this resolution. I disclaim that title. He also asked me if I were a member of the Committee on Patents. I am not a member of the Committee on Patents. I made two points in my brief remarks which caused the Senator from Rhode Island to again develop himself in this Chamber. One was that the Government of the United States was not so poor that it could not pay the bills of this committee if the Senate deemed it important that they should do the work specified in the resolution. I still adhere to that opinion, and I do not think any member of the Senate will dispute the truth of that proposition.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Which side of this proposition is the Senator on?

Mr. CHANDLER. I advocated the passage of the resolution, but I did not assume to be a champion of it. I would not have said that a speech which I made in its behalf constituted me its champion any more than I would say the Senator from Rhode Island had championed a resolution simply because he made a speech in its behalf, because, instead of resulting in its passage, it might, as it usually does when the Senator speaks, result in its defeat. [Laughter.]

In answer to the Senator from Oregon, who interrupted me when I reached my second point, I will make that point again and call it to his attention. All that I said in addition was that the Senate ought to be able to trust its committee. I spoke simply in behalf of the fair and reasonable treatment of a committee of this body. I do not know who constitute the membership of that committee. I did not know at the time that the Senator from Florida was the chairman of the committee, although I presume he is; but I simply said that when, in the orderly conduct of business in the Senate, a committee of the body states that there is work before it, that there is proposed legislation before Congress, and asks that it may have leave to sit in vacation and attend to that business, the Senate ought, in common courtesy, unless it wishes to put a stigma of condemnation upon the committee, to grant the power and leave it to the discretion of the committee to decide where it shall sit.

Mr. President, if this committee can not be trusted to determine that this investigation ought to be made, let us blot the committee from our list of committees; if it can not be trusted to stay where it ought to stay and go where it ought to go, and nowhere else in making the investigation, then let us strike it from the list of committees. But in every case I have ever known come before the Senate where a committee of this body has deliberately decided that its duties require that it should make an investigation of this kind, the request never has been refused. I simply say that we ought to accord to this committee the same privileges and the same weight in this body as has heretofore been accorded to other committees.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] very clearly shows, whatever may be the vote of the Senate upon this resolution, the propriety and the wisdom of it, and if he had addressed himself to the task of showing this in his remarks, he could not have reached it more clearly.

The Senator says that the resolution simply proposes to investigate changes in the existing patent laws, and all that it is necessary to do is to read the laws. The opinions of the great body of people interested in the matter, their mind, and their intellect he considers to be nothing.

The wishes of a great body of people protesting against these monopolies and asking for changes, and the desire of the committee not to make these changes without inquiry of those who are directly interested in them and give them an opportunity of argument, the Senator from Arkansas does not appreciate. He does not regard the fact that the great body of the inventors of this country are not literary people. He does not know that these great inventions come from the brains of the poor, of the energies and the manhood which live at the bottom of society. No, they must use the mails, though they may scarcely ever have written an essay or a treatise. Mechanics in the workshops of the country are not, in the opinion of the Senator from Arkansas, to be entitled to the privileges of investigation and inquiry into their ideas.

Mr. President, this will not do. This is a great question. The patent system is one upon which the pillars of civilization rest, and ought to be treated in reference to the character of the people from whom these inventions and discoveries come. They are the poor people of the country, the engineers upon the locomotives and the mechanics in the workshops; they are the people whose ideas ought to be inquired into, and this committee should go where they are.

Mr. President, how do these objections come from these two gentlemen who compose this committee, opposing seven members of the Committee on Patents who have asked for this investigation upon the request of all the Western States and many of the Middle States? How much money has the Senator from Arkansas expended in his tariff inquiries? Thousands and tens of thousands of dollars beyond the one or two thousand dollars which the Committee on Patents would have expended in investigating this subject. Witness after witness has been summoned, our corridors have been crowded, expense after expense has been incurred, and now the Senator gets up here and says that this committee, charged with the revision of the entire patent system and its revolution, shall not have one or two thousand dollars. Fresh from an inquiry in which the consumers of the whole country have been summoned to present their views and opinions upon these different subjects, the Senator objects to this resolution.

So in the tariff investigation which took place years ago, it was held at a convenient place. I do not object to it. I defend it. I am not governed by these small ideas that to save a penny and to lose a pound is wise policy. This is a country of progress, and it is a country where the people are to be considered, and where we recognize the fact that from the brains of the poor, and not those of the rich, great ideas and inventions come.

Mr. President, I have discharged my duty. I do not know that the committee would have found time or opportunity to have gone to any place outside of the city of Washington. I am indifferent myself to the matter, but I believe that something is due to this committee, to the great system of patent law, to the inventors, and to public opinion, which complains of the crying monopolies of the patent system.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, the Senate will remember that some years ago a very thorough investigation and inquiry was made by the Committee on Patents. Patent attorneys and inventors from all over the country came here and made their arguments, and all that matter is in print. A very elaborate report was prepared and made to the Senate, and discussed here. What necessity can there be for the Committee on Patents going all over the country and examining this man who is an inventor and that man who is an inventor? Forty thousand inventions every year are patented. Why hunt up forty thousand people throughout the length and breadth of the United States and consult them as to what the patent laws ought to be?

Mr. CALL. Have they not a right to be consulted?

Mr. COCKRELL. What good would result from consulting 40,000 claimants for patents scattered all over the United States who rely upon their attorneys for the transaction of their business? Every particle of information which is of any utility to the Committee on Patents can be obtained inside of the corporate limits of the District of Columbia. There is no occasion for them to go elsewhere.

It is no discrimination against the Committee on Patents to refuse to adopt this resolution. The Committee on Commerce have had a similar resolution before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which has been reported adversely.

It is time for the Senate to call a halt upon these peripatetic committees going all over the country hunting up Tom, Dick, and Harry to procure evidence, then presenting a report which never amounts to anything, wasting our contingent-expense fund, and placing upon committees here the unpleasant duty of making contests before the representatives of another body as to whether such expenses shall be allowed or not.

I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CALL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to lay the pending resolution on the table, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLANCHARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. PATTON], and withhold my vote in his absence.

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. MCLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and vote "yea."

Mr. DOLPH. I have agreed to pair with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Under the terms of my pair I am permitted to vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN. I am paired generally with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN], but have reserved the right to vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH. I have authority from my pair to vote in order to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

So the Senate refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 7971) to exempt from duty sugars, molasses, etc.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a vote on agreeing to the resolution proposing an investigation by the Committee on Patents.

Mr. BERRY. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7477) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes; insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 127 and 128 to the said bill and agreed to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky, Mr. SAYERS, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1007) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint a deputy coroner, and for other purposes.

FREE SUGARS, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 7971) to exempt from duty sugars, molasses, etc., is before the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I send up an amendment which I intend to offer to the pending bill, and I ask that it may be read for information, and printed.

Mr. MANDERSON. Before the amendment is read, I beg leave to suggest that the unfinished business is not House bill 7971, to exempt from duty sugars, etc., but the unfinished business is the motion to refer the bill, after the second reading and before it is placed upon the Calendar, to the Committee on Finance. The unfinished business is the motion, and not the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

Mr. GRAY. The bill has been read the second time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is upon the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. MANDERSON. That is the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To refer the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the amendment which I have offered may be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. Amend House bill 7971 by adding as an additional section:

SEC. —. That the act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. MANDERSON. I beg leave to send forward an amendment which I intend to propose to the bill when it is up for consideration. I ask that it may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That until July 1, 1905, the provisions of the act entitled "An act to reduce revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved October 1, 1890, authorizing the issue of licenses to produce sugar and for the payment of a bounty to the producers of sugar from beets, sorghum, or sugar cane grown in the United States, or from maple sap produced within the United States, contained in paragraphs 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, and 236 of said act, shall continue in full force and effect, and said sections of said act are hereby reënacted.

Mr. MANDERSON. I also send forward an amendment which I intend to propose to the bill when it shall be up for consideration. I ask that it may be printed and lie on the table. I do not care about its being read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments submitted by the Senator from Nebraska will be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. BERRY. Let the question be taken on the motion to refer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to refer.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the motion of the Senator from Tennessee be stated. My recollection of the motion is that it covered not only the pending bill, but the other three bills, one of which places iron ore, another coal, and another barbed wire on the free list.

Mr. HARRIS. My motion is to refer to the Committee on Finance the bill proposing to put sugars on the free list. I have given notice of a similar motion as to the other bills; indeed, in the form in which I first made the motion it was to refer the four bills——

Mr. QUAY. That was my understanding.

Mr. HARRIS. But according to parliamentary usage the motion must be made in respect to each bill, and inasmuch as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] made a motion with regard to the sugar bill, I apply my motion to that bill at present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BERRY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KYLE (when Mr. ALLEN'S name was called). I wish to state that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is paired on this question with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], but on the question of free sugar the Senator from Colorado and I agree. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. BLANCHARD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "yea." I am therefore entitled to vote, as he would vote the same way. I vote "yea."

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I am informed by his colleague [Mr. QUAY] that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "yea" on this proposition, and I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. QUAY (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called). I desire to announce that on this question my colleague [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. PALMER. I rise to inquire as to the state of the question.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is not in order.

Mr. PALMER. I supposed a parliamentary inquiry was always in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. Nothing in the nature of debate is in order during a roll call.

Mr. PALMER. I rose to inquire whether this particular motion supersedes the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] yesterday?

Mr. HARRIS. Necessarily.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to refer the pending bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PALMER. The pending bill and the amendments proposed by the Senator from Arkansas and other Senators?

Mr. MILLS. The amendments go with the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. All the amendments go with the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. All amendments will necessarily accompany the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

The Secretary resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. DOLPH (when his name was called). The announcement has already been made that on this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I should like to inquire of the other side how he would vote on this question?

Mr. ALDRICH. The junior Senator from Massachusetts undoubtedly would vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. HILL. I should vote "nay" if he were here. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MCLAURIN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and vote "nay."

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN], who is not present. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If he were here I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were here I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If he were present I should vote "nay," and I am told by his colleague that he would vote "yea."

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I should like to be informed, if anyone can tell me, how he would vote if present.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will take the authority of saying that the senior Senator from Massachusetts would vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. PUGH. Then I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], but I am informed that upon this question he would vote "yea," and I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS]. If he were present he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CALL. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. DAVIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], and withdraw my vote.

Mr. RANSOM. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that we transfer our pairs, so that we may both vote, if that is agreeable to the Senator from Minnesota. Then the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], with whom I am paired, will stand paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], with whom the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] is paired.

Mr. DAVIS. All right.

Mr. RANSOM. I vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 17; as follows:

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I wish to inquire whether the amendments which have been offered will be referred with the bill to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will be so referred.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I merely wished to have it understood.

Mr. HARRIS. Necessarily the amendments which have been read at the desk will go with the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be referred to the Committee on Finance in connection with the bill.

FREE COAL AND COKE.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the bill (H. R. 7968) to place upon the free list bituminous coal, shale, slack, and coke, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to refer the pending bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLS. Let us have the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KYLE (when Mr. ALLEN'S name was called). I understand that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is paired on this question with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE]. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. Our pairs have been transferred, so that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] stands paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCLAURIN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY] and vote "nay."

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If he were present I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE]. We have transferred our pairs. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BERRY. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], so that the Senator from Oregon and I can vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DOLPH. I vote "yea."

Mr. BUTLER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. May I inquire of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] how his colleague would vote on this proposition?

Mr. QUAY. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea" on all these motions to refer.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I will vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Jones, Nev.	Platt,
Allison,	Faulkner,	Kyle,	Pugh,
Blanchard,	Gallinger,	Manderson,	Quay,

FREE IRON ORE.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the bill (H. R. 7969) to place upon the free list all ores of iron be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], and I vote "nay."

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCLAURIN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and vote "nay."

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN]. I do not know how he would vote on this measure, and I therefore decline to vote.

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PLATT. Upon this vote and all the votes upon these bills my colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN], but the fact that he would vote the same way I would releases me, and I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 17; as follows:

FREE BARBED FENCING WIRE.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the bill (H. R. 7970) to place upon the free list barbed fencing wire and wire rods for the manufacture of the same be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF PRIVATE PENSION BILLS, ETC.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to dispose of a few pension bills on the Calendar reported favorably from the Committee on Pensions, mostly House bills. It will take but a few minutes.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that we first dispose of the House pension bills favorably reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the pension bills and also the bills correcting the military records of soldiers disposed of.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator from Ohio has made a request that a brief time be devoted to the consideration of bills reported by the Pension Committee and the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, pension bills and bills from the Committee on Military Affairs to correct military records of soldiers. There are only a few of them, and it will take but a short time.

Mr. PALMER. I desire to have the bills correcting military records included in the application.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GALLINGER. Before consent is given I want to include a bill that has passed the House of Representatives and will not properly come under the order. It is House bill 7294 requiring fourth-class postmasters to administer oaths to pensioners. It is in the line of pension legislation and is favorably reported from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no objection to including that bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the order of business?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is Order of Business 656. The Commissioner of Pensions recommends the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The first bill under the order will be announced.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GORMAN. Before the order is proceeded with, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few moments.

Yesterday the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] submitted the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill. That report was signed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and myself as the conferees on the part of the Senate. Among other provisions in the bill was one ingrafted on it by the vote of the Senate and the House of Representatives, donating to several States a million acres each of arid land and making provision for the settlement and improvement of the land.

I desire to say for myself that I am usually opposed to such legislation being ingrafted upon an appropriation bill. However desirable it may be to begin the development of that section of the country in this way, I do not want it understood that hereafter I am bound in any way to continue upon the scheme. I regret exceedingly that the provision should have found its way upon an appropriation bill, as it may not be, and I fear it is not, properly guarded. I submitted to it as the other conferees did in deference to the vote of the two Houses.

There is one other clause in the conference report to which I desire to call attention. It will be found on page 8510 of the RECORD:

That the House recede from its amendment to the amendment of the Senate numbered 277, from which amendment numbered 277 the Senate had receded.

That is the amendment relating to the Printing Office site. There was some controversy as to the right of the Senate to recede, the House having declined to accept the Senate amendment and having proposed a substitute for it which the Senate rejected. The conferees on the part of the House claimed that the Senate had no power or right to recede from its amendment and thus make the whole matter fall, in the absence of joint rules between the two bodies. With a firm conviction that the attitude of the Senate was correct, and that we had the right at any time to recede from our amendment, and that with the recession the amendment of the House fell, yet, as one of the conferees, without giving up any of the rights of this body, I agreed that that entry might be made in the conference report, so as to settle a matter which otherwise would have kept Congress in session for some time. For that reason, and that only, I agreed to the report with that clause in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Secretary will report the first bill under the order adopted by the unanimous agreement of the Senate.

IDA C. MARTIN.

The bill (S. 2032) to grant a pension to Ida C. Martin was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Ida C. Martin, widow of John A. Martin, who was colonel of the Eighth Kansas Regiment of Kansas Infantry Volunteers in the war of the rebellion, and to pay her a pension of $50 a month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration a House bill——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Arkansas that the Senate is now proceeding under an order adopted by unanimous consent.

Mr. BERRY. I hope that the Calendar will be proceeded with until this particular measure is reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill under the order will be announced.

JOHN MAHOLM.

The bill (H. R. 2920) to pension John Maholm, dependent father, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of John Maholm, dependent father of George Maholm, late of Company B, Seventieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, in the war of the rebellion.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HANNAH WELCH.

The bill (H. R. 1214) granting a pension to Hannah Welch was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Hannah Welch, widow of William Welch, late musician of Third Rhode Island Heavy Artillery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS.

The bill (H. R. 7294) empowering fourth-class postmasters to administer oaths to pensioners was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that hereafter, in addition to the officers now authorized to administer oaths in such cases, fourth-class postmasters of the United States are hereby required, empowered, and authorized to administer any and all oaths required to be made by pensioners and their witnesses in the execution of their vouchers with like effect and force as officers having a seal; and such postmaster shall affix the stamp of his office to his signature to such vouchers, and he is authorized to charge and receive for each voucher not exceeding 25 cents, to be paid by the pensioner.

Mr. VEST. I should like to make an inquiry. How would this proposed enactment be affected by the general law in regard to perjury? Suppose a man goes before a fourth-class postmaster and swears falsely.

Mr. PALMER. As I understand the existing law, perjury is made to include false oaths taken before any officer or person entitled to administer oaths by act of Congress. That is my impression. I gave the matter some attention when the bill was before the committee, and I suppose that is the true construction of the law.

Mr. VEST. I do not like the proposed legislation. I do not see why a postmaster should be authorized to administer oaths in this particular class of cases. It is class legislation of the worst sort.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. WILLIAM FLETCHER.

The bill (S. 2255) for the relief of Capt. William Fletcher, United States Army, was announced as the next bill in order.

Mr. BERRY. That is not a pension case. Is it included in in the agreement?

Mr. PALMER. I suppose it is not included.

Mr. BERRY. It comes from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it is not a bill to correct a military record it does not come within the terms of my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, and the next bill under the order will be announced.

RUFUS BETZ.

The bill (S. 2143) for the relief of Rufus Betz was announced as next in order.

Mr. BERRY. That is not a pension bill. It comes from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PALMER. I will state to the Senator from Arkansas that bills from the Committee on Military Affairs merely intended to correct the records of soldiers are included in the order under which the Senate is proceeding.

Mr. BERRY. They are included in the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the time unanimous consent was given, and will ask the Senator from Ohio whether he understands that this character of bills was included in the agreement?

Mr. SHERMAN. I requested that bills correcting records of soldiers should be included with pension bills, and that was agreed to by unanimous consent. If this is not that kind of a bill it does not come within the agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a bill for the removal of the charge of desertion, and comes within the agreement, the Chair understands.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 6, after the word "date," to insert "August 9," and in line 7, after "and," to strike out "sixty" and insert "sixty-two;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the charge of desertion standing against the name of Rufus Betz, late a private of Company A, Nineteenth Regiment of Ohio Infantry Volunteers, be removed, and he be granted an honorable discharge to date August 9, 1862.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE ISENSTEIN.

The bill (H. R. 3005) for the relief of George Isenstein was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to make a record of George Isenstein, late a private in Company A, Second Regiment Missouri Volunteers, three months' service, showing his enlistment to date from the date of muster in of the company, and to grant and issue to him an honorable discharge, to be dated of the date of the mustering out of service of the company and regiment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARLIN PARKS.

The bill (H. R. 562) for the relief of Marlin Parks was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to revoke the order of dismissal of Marlin Parks, late first lieutenant Company B, Eleventh West Virginia Volunteers, and issue to him an honorable discharge from the service of the United States, to date the 18th day of November, 1864.

Mr. PASCO. There is an amendment reported by the committee, but further investigation showed that the name was properly printed in the bill and in the title. So the amendment is withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET A. WOODS.

The bill (H. R. 6050) to pension Margaret A. Woods, widow of William W. Woods, late of Company E, Sixteenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension rolls the name of Margaret A. Woods, widow of William W. Woods, late a member of Company E, Sixteenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, but in the event the soldier is found to be alive this pension shall cease.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN P. BIEHN.

The bill (S. 501) granting a pension to John P. Biehn was considered as in Committee of the whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of John P. Biehn.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ABBY JANE WARD.

The bill (S. 1996) granting a pension to Mrs. Abby Jane Ward was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Abby Jane Ward, widow of James M. Ward, late of Company E, Sixty-third Ohio Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE C. ABBEY.

The bill (S. 890) granting an increase of pension to George C. Abbey was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the pension of George C. Abbey, late a private of Company M, of the First Connecticut Volunteer Heavy Artillery, to $30 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RUSSEL N. REYNOLDS.

The bill (S. 1383) granting a pension to Russel N. Reynolds was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "infantry," to insert "at the rate of $20 per month;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Russel N. Reynolds, late Company E, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $20 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

ADALINE J. PROPS.

The bill (H. R. 6228) granting a pension to Adaline J. Props was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension roll the name of Adaline J. Props, widow of Lewis C. Props, a soldier in the Southern or Sabine war of 1836, and to allow her a pension of $8 per month.

Menefee, widow of Richard Menefee, captain Company E, Eighth Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, in the late war, as well as a private in Company K, Extra Battalion Missouri Volunteers, in war with Mexico, and to allow her a pension of $8 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAULINE J. SMITH.

The bill (H. R. 6361) to grant a pension to Pauline J. Smith was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Pauline J. Smith, permanently helpless daughter of Lewis C. Smith, late a private of Company G, Eighty-fifth Illinois Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DRUZILLA J. RIGG.

Mr. PALMER. The next bill on the Calendar is not fairly within the agreement. It provides for the payment of a pension to the legal representatives of a soldier. I ask for its present consideration, but did not feel that I was authorized to do so under the general arrangement without calling attention to it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4290) for the relief of Druzilla J. Rigg, of Macomb, Ill. It proposes to pay to Druzilla J. Rigg, of Macomb, Ill., who is the daughter and only heir of James Depoy (who was second lieutenant in Company A in the Fifty-fourth Regiment of Ohio Infantry in the war of the rebellion, to whom pension certificate numbered 158723 was issued, and who died previous to the receipt by him of said certificate), the amount due upon that certificate at the time of the death of James Depoy.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JESSE DAVENPORT.

Edward Sheffield, Second Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers, commanded by Col. John Kelsay, in the Oregon Indian wars of 1855 and 1856, and to pay him a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS AT MERIDIAN, MISS.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to provide rooms for the accommodation of the United States circuit and district courts and their officers at Meridian, Miss., to report it favorably and without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow us to pass a few bills and not make that motion now. There are several private bills which should be passed.

Mr. VEST. I did not hear the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUAY. I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VILAS. I hope the Senator will not insist on that motion for a few moments, until we dispose of a number of small bills on the Calendar.

Mr. BERRY. There are a number of small bills which should be disposed of.

Mr. QUAY. I withdraw the motion, and give notice that I shall renew it at half past 3 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution reported by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY W. LEE.

Mr. VILAS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take up the bill (H. R. 5363) for the relief of Henry W. Lee.

Mr. VEST. From what committee is that bill reported?

Mr. VILAS. It is reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and was passed by the Senate in the last Congress. It has been very carefully and elaborately considered.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the object of the bill? I have not a copy of it before me; it was only reported yesterday, and we have had no chance to examine it.

Mr. VILAS. I can state to the Senator from Missouri in one moment the object of the bill. Henry W. Lee served the Winnebago Indians for years as their attorney, without having made in the formal manner required by law a contract for the purpose, approved by the Secretary of the Interior. For that reason he can not be paid, although the Indians are willing that he should be, and the bill stipulates that the amount of his compensation shall be settled by the Secretary of the Interior, and only be paid upon the consent of the Indians to pay it out of their money.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to inquire into and determine what services were rendered by Henry W. Lee, now of Stevens Point, in the State of Wisconsin, to the Winnebego Indians, or to any bands or families thereof; whether such services were rendered at the request of or under any agreement with or acceptance of such Indians; whether such services were of utility and value to such Indians and deserving of compensation, and to fix upon the proper measure of their value, not exceeding $10,000 and over and above any sums which may have been paid on account thereof; and if the Secretary shall determine that the said Lee is justly and equitably entitled to any such sum or compensation as he shall so fix, then to deduct the same from the accounts to be paid and distributed to the stray bands of Winnebagoes in Wisconsin, or to such of them as he shall find were justly answerable, in such yearly installments or portions as he shall think fit, and to pay the same to said Lee, in full discharge of all his claims, notwithstanding that a formal contract was never made in accordance with the statute in such cases made and provided; but said stray bands, or a majority of the heads of families thereof, shall give their consent to such payment in such manner as the Secretary shall direct.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES COURT IN LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2293) for the improvement of the buildings and grounds of the United States court and post-office at Little Rock, Ark.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GUNBOATS CONCORD AND BENNINGTON.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 967) to remit the penalties on gunboat numbered 3, the Concord, and gunboat numbrred 4, the Bennington.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to considered the bill. It requires the Secretary of the Navy to remit to N. F. Palmer, jr., & Co., of New York City, the time penalties exacted by the Navy Department under the contracts with that company for the construction of gunboat numbered 3, known as the Concord, and gunboat numbered 4, known as the Bennington, the United States having suffered no damage by the delay in their construction.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS WILLIAMS.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1571) for the relief of Thomas Williams, an employé of the Senate folding room for injuries received while in the discharge of his duties in the year 1892.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, after the words "sum of," to strike out "three thousand" and insert "fifteen hundred;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500 to Thomas Williams, who was injured while in the discharge of his duties as an employé of the Senate folding room in the year 1892.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY TELEGRAPH OPERATORS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now consider the bill (S. 1009) for the relief of telegraph operators during the war of the rebellion, which has been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and to which, I think, there will be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill will lead to discussion unless it is a different bill from what I think it is.

Mr. MANDERSON. It is a very different bill from what the Senator from Missouri thinks, because this bill gives no recognition in the way of discharge. It is a bill that I think the Senator from Missouri himself agreed to, and which is a substitute for the bill that he thinks would lead to discussion. I ask that the substitute may be read. I think the Senator from Missouri will agree that it is correct.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a bill going back and recognizing civilians who were connected with the Army during the war serving as civilians at from $75 to $100 a month, and they want to come in and be placed on an equality in some shape or form with soldiers. You might just as well bring the teamsters and every other class of persons who never were near where the Army marched, as to bring the telegraph operators in, unless the bill is guarded as we once guarded it.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is exactly what it is.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want a little more time to look into it. It will not hurt to give me a little time to examine it.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the bill were of the character the Senator from Missouri thinks it is, certainly I should not favor it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANDERSON. Let it be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. I must object, unless it can go over by unanimous consent until I examine it. I have a right to do so. I have been so occupied with the business of the Committee on Appropriations that I have not been able to attend the meetings of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. COCKRELL subsequently said: I have examined the bill to which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] referred, and with one or two words added, which I shall move, and which he will doubtless accept, I have no objection to it. It will then be exactly what the Committee on Military Affairs have heretofore reported.

Mr. MANDERSON. I now ask that the bill may be considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1009) for the relief of telegraph operators during the war of the rebellion.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to prepare a roll of all persons who served in the operation of military telegraph lines during the late civil war, and to issue to each, upon application, unless it appears that his service was not creditably performed, or to the representatives of those who are dead, suitable certificates of honorable service in the military telegraph corps of the Army of the United States, stating the service rendered, the length of such service, and the dates, as near as may be, between which such service was performed: Provided, That this law shall not be construed to entitle the persons herein mentioned to any pay or rights not herein specifically provided for.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 13, after the word "pay," I move to insert "pension, bounty."

Mr. MANDERSON. That is right. The bill means that, but it will do no harm to make it a little more binding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "pay," at the end of line 13, it is proposed to insert "pension, bounty;" so to read:

Provided, That this law shall not be construed to entitle the persons herein mentioned to any pay, pension, bounty, or rights not herein specifically provided for.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY J. HEWITT.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1274) for the relief of Henry J. Hewitt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANDERSON. I shall not object to the consideration of that bill, but I should like to know why at this late day it is necessary to pass a bill of that character?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PEFFER July 11, 1894:

The Committee on Claims, having had under consideration the bill (S. 1274) for the relief of Henry J. Hewitt, respectfully report as follows:

The facts in the case are set out in House Report No. 268, Fifty-first Congress, first session, when the Committee on War Claims reported favorably. That report was adopted as part of the report of the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-second Congress (see House Report No. 2157, Fifty-second Congress, second session), and again by the same committee of the Fifty-third Congress, second session (see House Report No. 576), all of which are hereto attached and made part of this report.

You committee will add that there appears to be an equity in this case arising out of laches for which the claimant was not responsible. He appears to have acted in good faith, and in view of the facts in relation to the status of the claimant and the use to which at least part of his property was applied, the committee see no reason why he should not have an opportunity to present his case to the proper officers for investigation and report.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 576, Fifty-third Congress, second session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3337) for the relief of Henry J. Hewitt, submit the following:

This claim was presented in the Fifty-second Congress, and was favorably reported upon by the House Committee on War Claims, to whom it was referred.

After a careful investigation of the facts involved, your committee adopt the report of the Fifty-second Congress, a copy thereof being hereto attached and made a part of this report, and recommend that the bill do pass.

[House Report No. 2157, Fifty-second Congress, second session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4096) for the relief of Henry J. Hewitt, submit the following report:

The facts out of which this bill for relief arises will be found stated in House report from the Committee on War Claims of the Fifty-first Congress, hereto annexed and made a part of this report.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report herewith a substitute for the bill and recommend its passage."

[House Report No. 268, Fifty-first Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1849) for the relief of Henry J. Hewitt, report as follows:

The affidavits of the claimant, Henry J. Hewitt, and ten other persons, several of them ex-Union officers and soldiers, and two or three of them employés of claimant in carrying the United States mails during the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865, show that a large quantity of forage and several horses and wagons belonging to claimant were taken by the United States military authorities in Northern Missouri during the years named. It also appears that at the time this forage and these horses and wagons were taken the claimant was a subcontractor for carrying the United States mails in Northern Missouri and Southern Iowa, one of these mail routes being No. 10481, and it is alleged by claimant in his affidavit that this personal property, so taken, was purchased by him for the purpose of fulfilling his contract in carrying the United States mails over the several mail routes.

The affidavits also allege that the hotel, storehouse, and barn owned by claimant at Macon City, Mo., and the barn owned by him at Lancaster, Mo., were occupied during the years above named by the United States military forces.

It also appears from the evidence on file that very soon after the war the claimant placed his claim in the hands of A. Slingerland, clerk of the court of Adair County, Mo., for the purpose of having it filed in the proper Department and prosecuted; that a short time subsequent thereto Mr. Slingerland went to Colorado on a visit for the benefit of his impaired health, and while there he died; that the claimant supposed that his claim had been properly filed by Mr. Slingerland in his lifetime, and did not learn to the contrary until long after his death and too late to file the same in the proper Department.

Your committee believe that this delay in presenting this claim was not due to any laches on the part of the claimant, and in view of the allegation that the articles taken were purchased by him for the purpose of fulfilling his contract to carry the United States mails, he should in all equity have the same opportunity as other loyal claimants have heretofore had to establish the justice of his claim.

Your committee are therefore of the opinion that the claim of Henry J. Hewitt should be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department, United States Army, as other claims of this character have heretofore been investigated.

They accordingly report herewith a bill as a substitute for the bill H. R. 1849, and recommend that the same do pass.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROVIDING LAND SUBDIVISIONS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1005) to prevent the recording of subdivisions of land in the District of Columbia in the office of the Recorder of Deeds.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow my colleague and myself to call up a bridge bill which will take no time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill indicated by him, which will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. These clerks are already provided for; but this resolution is made necessary by the decision of the Comptroller, who thinks they are not entitled to pay for the time mentioned.

The SPEAKER. The report and the accompanying bill will be printed and referred to the House Calendar.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the conference report on the general deficiency appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7477) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield four minutes of the time allowed for debate to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS].

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, in the short time yielded to me I do not hope to be able to discuss all of the questions relative to the Senate amendment appropriating $1,800,000 to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. It is important to know, however, who constitutes this company, and what the company is. This is the "blanketed" company. This is the company that for thirty years has been engaged in a conspiracy to defraud, and which has defrauded the people of the United States out of more than $130,000,000. This is the company that represents not only the Central Pacific Railroad but also the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. It is the company that contracts with itself for the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and against the Central Pacific Railroad Company with itself, in favor of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. It is the company that has diverted the funds that legitimately belong to the Government and the people of the United States fraudulently; that put these funds into the construction of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, together with the earnings of the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

I want to enter my solemn protest against the appropriation proposed here. It is unjust; it is inequitable; it is wrong, and amounts to a robbery on the part of this Congress of the people of the United States.

But gentlemen say that they have a judgment against the United States. This blanketed company, these foul conspirators have a judgment against the United States; and, therefore, because this appropriation is going to a railroad company we ought not to be unjust in administering what is right in the premises, because it happens to be a railroad company that is involved. I disclaim any motive to do what is otherwise than just, not only to these railroad companies, but to the people of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to this judgment that we have heard so much about. It is true that they have obtained a judgment against the United States, but under the contract and under the laws of the United States the debts due by these companies to the United States do not accrue until 1895, and they appropriate the value of the amount of the judgment and insist that although these roads owe millions of dollars to the people of the United States, and although the Central Pacific Railroad Company, who are the real beneficiaries of this appropriation, is to receive the money, still that we ought to pay this $1,800,000 to this company, and then for the millions of dollars they owe the people rely upon our right to collect against the insolvent, fraudulent corporation. I insist that we should act as a court of equity and enjoin this judgment till all the matters of equity which the people have against these railroad companies shall have been settled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[Mr. COOPER of Indiana addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE].

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it requires a good deal of audacity for these people who are setting up this claim against the Government to come and seek an appropriation for it under existing circumstances. Ever since the beginning of this session of Congress the Committee on Pacific Railroads has been honestly and faithfully and earnestly trying to devise some scheme by which the Government could get back even a part of the money that the Government has loaned to them; and now these men come, not in the name of the concern to which the money has been loaned, but in the name of one of the non-aided roads that composed their system, and ask that an appropriation be made to pay that particular line for the services it has rendered.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of that movement is clear. They know very well that if they came in and said that this money was properly due and payable to the Central Pacific Railroad the Government would say to them, "You must pay us before you can expect us to pay you the money that you claim for transporting the mails and for other services." Therefore they do not come in the name of the Central Pacific, but they come in and claim that this amount of money is due to the Southern Pacific.

Mr. Speaker, I wish we had time to go into this question fully now. During all this inquiry and discussion the idea has gone out, without being negatived positively by anyone, that the road which is now seeking this $1,800,000 was built out of the proceeds of the road that owes the Federal Government to-day about $70,000,000, not a dollar of which can be collected, because, according to the statements that have been made by the attorneys and by other gentlemen who have been connected with this system or who have investigated it, the concern that owes the Government this money is utterly and hopelessly insolvent.

For that reason I apprehend this claim was set up in the name of another party, instead of putting it in the name of the party to whom it will really go, if it were payable at all.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KYLE. Yes, sir; although I have only five minutes.

Mr. BOATNER. My friend, I believe, agreed to the report of the Committee on Pacific Railroads granting an extension of fifty years for the payment of the debt due to the Government. Now, is he not aware that the effect of such an act would be to abandon all claims that the Government might have against individual stockholders, and that the debt which is here sought to be offset could never be reached except by an action against the stockholders and officers, to render them personally liable?

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that question has anything to do with the proposition that is now under consideration.

Mr. GEARY. How is the gentleman going to accept the Riley bill, the majority report of the committee postponing the collection of this debt, and at the same time claim the right to follow these assets into another corporation? If he stands with the Riley bill, which postpones the debt, he vacates the claim against the stockholders.

Mr. KYLE. I am standing by the Riley bill. No rights are waived by that bill so far as these railroads are concerned. The question here is simply whether we shall retain this money in the Treasury. I admit that you could not go into court and plead this as a set-off against those judgments, but my idea is that these railroad companies, being virtually one and the same concern, this Congress ought to withhold this money until the principal railroad in the system does justice to the Government.

Mr. SAYERS. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will now use some of his time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. How much of the time of the gentleman from Texas has been consumed, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TARSNEY). The gentleman from Texas has sixty-one minutes remaining.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER].

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen who oppose the adoption of the amendment, or rather who oppose the payment to the Southern Pacific Company of the amount adjudged to it by the Court of Claims, take for granted, in their arguments, the very question which is in dispute, namely, the legal identity of the Central and the Southern Pacific Railway Companies. I believe that no one will contest the correctness of the legal proposition that two corporations may be composed of the same stockholders, and may nevertheless be, and in fact are, distinct legal entities as much as if there was not a single stockholder of the one who was a stockholder of the other, and that, in their relations with each other and with the general public, are legally distinct and separate.

In this case, then, Mr. Speaker, it is a complete begging of the question to say that the stockholders of the Southern Pacific are the stockholders of the Central Pacific, and therefore the Government of the United States is justified in withholding what it owes the Southern Pacific on the ground that hereafter the Central Pacific will be indebted to it. That is a legal proposition which would be demurrable in any court of justice, and would not be considered by a single one of the gentlemen here if they themselves were sitting upon the bench.

Mr. KYLE. Are not the stockholders of the two companies the same?

Mr. BOATNER. I do not know whether they are or not. But I say that from a legal standpoint the question whether they are or not makes no difference in this matter.

Mr. SNODGRASS. What I want to suggest is this, that the judgment was in favor of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, not of the stockholders; and I want to answer the gentleman's question——

Mr. BOATNER. I have only five minutes.

Mr. SNODGRASS. By asking him a question. If the proof shows (and the gentleman was a member of the committee that investigated this question) that the funds of the Government have been fraudulently diverted by the Central Pacific Company and used in the building of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company—not only the funds, but the earnings of the company—does the gentleman hold that we can not follow that fund into the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and make that company disgorge the amount that it fraudulently received by reason of this conspiracy?

Mr. BOATNER. Of course we may follow trust funds wherever we can find them, and if it be true that funds belonging to the Central Pacific have been diverted to the Southern Pacific Company by the fraud and collusion of the directors of both companies, the United States, when its right to do so arises, may demand an accounting and return of such funds to the Central Pacific, to be subjected to its demands——

Mr. SNODGRASS. That is the point.

Mr. BOATNER. But that question cuts no figure here. At present the Southern Pacific Company owes the Government nothing; its liability to respond for any debts of the Central Pacific is uncertain, and not only unliquidated, but may never, as a matter of fact, arise.

Mr. SNODGRASS. It cuts this figure——

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed, I propose to deal with that question.

Mr. SNODGRASS. It ought to be dealt with right now.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I am one of the two Democratic members of the Committee on Pacific Railroads who refused to assent to the report of the committee recommending an extension of the bonded indebtedness of the Pacific Railroads for fifty years. I dissented from that report for the reasons given by my colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. I do not think it is consistent with public policy or good morals that we shall permit the promoters, incorporators, officers, and managers of these railway companies to escape scot free with the enormous fortunes which they have filched from the United States—which they have acquired by legal fraud and moral turpitude.

But, Mr. Speaker, while I propose to advocate a prosecution of these parties to the very utmost extent of the law—while I am willing to vote for any appropriation necessary to carry those prosecutions to a conclusion—I am not willing to stultify myself as a member of this House, sitting here as a judge upon claims brought before us, or to take advantage of any clamor or any prejudice in the public mind, to avoid the performance of a public duty. There is no rule of law or equity which will justify us in withholding from a lawful creditor of the Government what is unquestionably lawfully due, because in the far future there is a possibility that this company may be adjudged a debtor of our debtor, and therefore a debtor of the United States.

It lies at the very basis of the law of "set off," or compensation, that the two debts must be equally due and liquidated.

Equity, it is true, might arrest an execution for a debt due, when the creditor was insolvent and attempting to escape the set off which would result from his own debt, not yet due; but certainly no court could arrest a judgment—the execution of a judgment—on the ground that the debtor held an uncertain, unliquidated, and conditional claim against the judgment creditor.

Now, sir, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company is an entirely different entity from the individuals who compose it. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company as a corporation is not responsible for the frauds which its stockholders and directors may have committed as stockholders and directors of other corporations. If the stockholders and directors of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company have committed frauds in their capacity as directors and stockholders of the Central Pacific Company, they are liable in their individual capacity, and not as directors and stockholders of this other company.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. One question——

Mr. BOATNER. Let me finish this statement.

Now, the proposition resolves itself, in my mind, to this legal conclusion——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOATNER. I should like to have five minutes more.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will give the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. BOATNER. I repeat, the proposition resolves itself into this deduction: The United States is the mortgage creditor of these Pacific railway companies. It has a statutory lien. What these roads will owe the United States can never be ascertained until its mortgage has been foreclosed, and the property sold. For the balance that will be due the United States it has its action by a creditor's bill or such other remedy as we may create by statute, against the stockholders, directors, and officers of those roads, making them responsible to the Government for all property of which they have wrongfully deprived the roads, and for all frauds which they have committed in their several capacities.

The right to claim the amount involved in this bill as an offset to what is due to the United States would only arise after we had foreclosed our mortgage upon the road, brought our bill in equity against the stockholders and directors of the Central Pacific, and obtained judgment against them. Then to the extent that the stockholders and directors of the Central Pacific were the directors and stockholders of the Southern Pacific, we would have to proceed against their interest in the property of the Southern Pacific Company if that company could be placed in liquidation and their interest ascertained, but the right of offset could never exist as against the Southern Pacific Company, because that corporation, as a corporation, could not be answerable for the personal obligations of its stockholders, whether they result from these contracts or these frauds.

But, sir, it seems to be taken for granted that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company has no interest, no property, and no rights, separate and distinct from those of the stockholders who compose it, which is a legal proposition that no lawyer will maintain for a moment. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that as a corporation the Southern Pacific road can not be held responsible for the frauds committed by its directors or other officers, as directors or officers of another corporation, and keeping ourselves in a position to enforce all of our rights against these companies, against their stockholders, and against all of their available property, it is our highest duty to accord to each company the rights which have been ascertained by the judgment of our own courts, a judgment which has not been appealed from, and is now res adjudicata.

The Southern Pacific Company is a lawful corporation, and possesses all the powers granted by its charter. As a common carrier it leased the lines of the Central Pacific and obligated itself to make the annual payments to the United States which the law imposed upon that company. It has made those payments, and amounts have been withheld from it which could not have been withheld from the Central Pacific had not the lease been made. Strong as is my desire to hold the Pacific Railroad companies to the strictest accountability to the United States for the immense indebtedness contracted on their account, earnest as I am in the support of legislation which will require the executive officers of the Government to enforce our demands not only against the property of the companies but against their officers and directors who have misapplied and practically embezzled their property and funds, I can not oppose the payment by the United States of what it legally owes, and can not withhold except by a violation of the very principles of law and equity upon which we must rely for the recovery of what is due the United States by these companies, and those who have managed their affairs——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield now ten minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, this question seems to be argued with reference to the larger and broader one as to the manner in which we shall deal with the Pacific railroads in their general relations to the Government of the United States. A great degree of odium is sought to be cast on the rights of these corporations—these entities—that are to exist, it may be, as long as the nation itself exists, by reason of the alleged malfeasance on the part of certain of their managers—their officers—in the past.

I think we should make a very careful distinction between the individuals who may have had to do with the original construction and subsequent management of the roads, and the corporations which are now existing and which are to exist in the long future.

The important question here presented for our consideration is whether or not a judgment of $1,800,000, obtained after full investigation on its merits, in the courts of the country, our own courts, in favor of the Southern Pacific Railroad, now due and long past due, shall be paid to that corporation according to the legal tenor of the judgment of the court.

There is no question that the Southern Pacific Railroad is one entity, and the Central Pacific Railroad is an entirely distinct one in law, and, so far as this question is concerned, in equity also. It may be true that the present managers of these two corporations are largely the same; it may be true that the majority of the stock is in each corporation controlled by substantially the same individuals; but nevertheless there is a vast minority in each corporation separate and distinct from those who are engaged in them as managers, and also distinct from each other, who are the owners of certain portions of the stock of the company, while there is no identity whatever among the bondholders whose claims cover the greater part of the value of all these roads.

The evidence before the Committee on the Pacific Railroads of the House shows that at least 10,000 stockholders were in possession of the stock of the Central Pacific Railroad; and it has been stated, and I have not heard it contradicted—in fact I understand it to be true from inquiry by myself and others—that the stock of the Southern Pacific road is distributed among not less than 30,000 different individuals; and for a very large proportion of that stock large value has been paid by those who are now its holders.

The bondholders and the stockholders of all these companies are distributed all over the country, and over most of the civilized world; and unless the honest earnings of the properties which their money has created is paid to them when due, bankruptcy must follow; and the loss must fall upon bondholders and stockholders alike, not upon the innocent bondholders first, whose money generally built and equipped these roads.

It is said that the Central Pacific is insolvent. It is not insolvent, Mr. Speaker, in any legal or just sense of that term. All of its obligations—and there is no evidence to the contrary; it is admitted by all, that all of its obligations to the Government from the beginning to now, according to the construction of the courts and the law—have been promptly met up to the present time. There is an anticipated default in the obligation to the Government when this large indebtedness shall become due, but not until then. That indebtedness matures in installments from January, 1895, until about the year 1900.

The interest has been met on the first mortgage bonds promptly; every claim of the Government has been met, so far as required to be met, by the corporation and will be met until the maturity of the bonds themselves. Then there will be a vast sum coming due to the Government; deducting the sinking fund and other accumulations of perhaps $16,000,000, a balance of over $50,000,000. The debt due to the Government on the maturity of the bonds will probably equal the value of the roads themselves, in the railroad markets of the world. But what would be the fate of any great civilized nation on the face of the earth, if called upon at the maturity of any national debt, to meet it and pay it in full and at once? It would result in absolute bankruptcy.

How would it have been with us, as our national debt matured at the close of the war, and at various periods since the war, if we could not have obtained by law a substantially forced loan or the extension of the debt? What great railroad is there in the country, or in the world, at this time that could meet its obligations for construction and equipment, or its existing debts when they fall due, without insolvency? Such obligations are universally extended, and if the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific ask to have their debts extended into the future by their creator and chief creditor, the Government of the United States, they are doing only what the United States itself had to do to preserve the life of the nation, and what every great nation on earth would be compelled to do under similar circumstances.

What would Great Britain do, with the wealth of the Indies at her command, if she had to meet the $4,500,000,000 of national debt at any given moment and furnish funds for its complete extinction? What would the New York Central Railroad do, or the great Pennsylvania Railroad, or the Baltimore and Ohio, or what would any railroad corporation in the United States do if called on at any given moment to meet and pay the vast accumulations of capital which are the basis of their construction and which represent their value, and which are, as investments, the safest and in many respects the best that are now offered in our country?

There is no reason why the debt of the Central Pacific road should be paid at its maturity any more than that of any other great railroad of the country. It is only incumbent upon that corporation and its creditors so to manage its plant and assets and earning power as best to secure the payment of the interest on its debts, and serve the public, for whose good its corporate functions and properties exist.

But gentlemen talk as though it was the business of this Congress to destroy these great properties because extensions of their debts are necessary, as is the fact in the case of all the great corporate agencies of a similar nature in the whole world.

These are times when a malevolent creditor could bankrupt or dispossess of their plants and franchises at least three-fourths of the railroads of the land and crush out and confiscate their earning power.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BLAIR. I have only ten minutes, and my time is slipping by more rapidly than I wish.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Just a question.

Mr. BLAIR. I want to strike at another point, and that is that I believe that great prejudice is sought to be excited in this House and this country, unjustly, against the men who constructed these Pacific railroads. Now, all the evidence obtained in this commissioners' report of 1887, the majority report to which allusion is constantly made—and there are eight or nine volumes of the testimony—and the conclusions of the majority of the committee, is and are to the effect that there should be an extension of these debts for seventy-five, one hundred and twenty-five, or one hundred and fifty years.

I refer now to the report which is being quoted here constantly against these roads. The very men who criticised the irregularities which undoubtedly took place in the construction and subsequent management of these roads recommend that there should be an extension of the time of payment of the Government claims against all these Pacific roads. The committee itself, appointed by President Cleveland, was not a friendly committee to these corporations. Anyone who reads the testimony, as well as the report, will be satisfied of that. But still that hostile majority reported and recommended bills for the extension of the Government's claims far more favorable than the bill reported by the committee of this House at this session, which has my support.

I ask the advocates of the confiscation of this property or of its absorption and control by the Government, to listen to the conclusion of the report of this committee, whose finding and action they constantly quote.

Criticising the recommendations of the minority of this committee which "were quite similar to the views expressed here by those who oppose the pending Senate amendment," the majority say on page 34:

> In concluding this portion of its report the commission desires to express its deep regret that a unanimous result has not been reached.
> We have patiently examined and endeavored to comprehend the reasons which appear to prevent the minority commissioner from uniting in the recommendations herein contained. Elsewhere we have replied in some detail to some of the specific matters referred to by him in his report. Its perusal certainly appears to lend additional force to the proposition that the existing relations between the United States and these companies should be severed and a permanent adjustment effected.
> The minority commissioner seems to have grouped together matters relating to these respective railroads without any attempt at a distribution of the actual wrongs complained of either as between the corporations themselves or between the corporations and the individual officers and directors, of whom complaint is made, and indicts them all under a sweeping bill of charges containing generally no specifications whatever, and based, so far as the companies themselves are concerned, on no acts which distinguish these companies from other railroad corporations in the United States, but on the stock in trade of all those who oppose what they call "monopolies" at all times, at all hazards, and under every possible circumstance.
> His report reads like a complaint in divorce for cruelty and desertion—an endless mixture of petty complaints united to real grievances, all tending only to show that the union of the parties can not produce a desirable result.
> This is the logic of the events themselves, and leads inevitably to the conclusion which the commission has reached. The sovereign should not be mated with the subject; and it is because we are so deeply impressed with that conclusion that we have devised and recommended the bills which, in our judgment, will as far as possible lead to a severance and adjustment of these relations.

The commission then proceed to recommend an extension of the Government claims against the aided roads of fifty years.

And now we come to this judgment of $1,800,000 in favor of the Southern Pacific, an entirely different entity, a corporation against which there are no charges, a corporation which has always met its obligations to the country and the Government and to individuals in every way, as far as we are advised. It is proposed to withhold the payment of this $1,800,000, at a time when the railroads of the country are passing into the hands of receivers, when this money is necessary for their ordinary management, and for the payment of its laborers and its current expenditures, when it is conceded to be due to them, and necessary to be paid in order that great misfortunes to them and to those who own their property may not occur.

Shall we withhold it at such a time as this? Why is this urged? Under the pretense that we are to collect of these roads the immense amount of this debt which they are soon to be owing, shall we create a state of things which will force them into the hands of receivers, and in carrying them down carry down immensely greater and cognate interests all over the country, and possibly extending to the world at large? For it is true, sir, that great amounts of this property are owned abroad, as well as in our own country.

COST OF THE CENTRAL PACIFIC.

All the evidence in the report of the commission of 1887 shows that the money obtained for the first-mortgage bonds, and the money obtained by the sale of the bonds given by the United States, amounting in the aggregate to some $54,000,000 or $56,000,000, on the face value, but which resulted in only about $41,000,000 or at the most $42,000,000 in actual funds—that this $41,000,000 and the $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 advanced by these four men (and repaid by land grant bonds, I believe) who are spoken of here, to wit, Huntington, Stanford, Hopkins, and Crocker, was used in the construction of that road, and when they got through every one of them had spent his entire personal fortune besides and was bankrupt.

In the process of construction there were seventeen days at one time when there was not a dollar in the till of the Central Pacific road, and when they got through in 1869, Mr. Stanford testifies and Mr. Crocker testifies and all of them testify, and there is no evidence to the contrary, that there was not a dollar left. As Crocker testified they "felt pretty blue," and this when the whole world was ringing with their praise. The stock could not be sold for a cent, was entirely worthless in the market. It was no asset whatever in raising this money. They took it subsequently at 12 cents on the dollar, as among themselves. The road was completed in 1869, seven years before the law required it to be done. This stock first paid dividend in 1873.

Gradually it was put upon the market, and it sold for large sums. It sold at par in many instances, and it was then six or seven years after the completion of these roads that these men, who are charged with this malfeasance, made their money in the sale of stock which they had held when it was worthless for years. That is the truth about it, and it is the evidence and substantially the report of these same commissioners of 1887.

Now, these same commissioners inquired as to the cost of the construction of the Central Pacific road, and they say that it was some $36,000,000. All the bonds, first mortgage bonds and Government bonds, netted $41,000,000. What, then, was the profit to these men who had assumed the whole thing, who had carried it forward when nobody had any faith in the result of the enterprise and the business men and newspapers of California were as hostile and clamorous against the great work as they are now, and when the country demanded that the roads should be built to preserve the integrity of the nation itself? It could not have been more than five or six millions of dollars to be divided among the whole four of them, and the testimony shows that they had nothing left at all but the worthless stock. Moreover, the evidence shows that there was no diversion of the funds or the moneys of the Central Pacific into the construction of the Southern Pacific at all; that the Southern Pacific was not built until years after the completion of the Central Pacific, as ought to be well known.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDSON. I hope the gentleman's time may be extended. I move that he have five minutes more.

Mr. REED. That must be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HUDSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire how these four men, Stanford and the others, made their millions if they did not make them out of the lands and other aid given by the Government of the United States?

Mr. BLAIR. That is what I did try to tell the gentleman. These men started rich, and at the completion of the Central Pacific road, in 1869, they were all poor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAIR. I understood that my time had been extended.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New Hampshire be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I object.

Mr. BLAIR. I will not trespass further——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. BLAIR. I would like to answer the question of this gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objected to the extension of the gentleman's time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I heard no objection. Who made the objection?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, well; I will have a chance——

Mr. BLAIR. You can give me one minute, and I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. My friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] can yield time for the gentleman to answer the question on his side.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I move that the gentleman be allowed three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would not be in order.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Then I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection has been made to extending the time of the gentleman five minutes. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I object.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is right. They always get us to consent to limit debate and then put up somebody to interpose an objection for an extension of time.

Mr. SAYERS. Does the gentleman say that I have put anybody up to object?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. SAYERS. I deal openly. If I want to interpose an objection I do so.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not make any intimation against the gentleman from Texas. I believe he is as fair as I am, and I believe I am as fair as anybody.

Mr. BLAIR. With permission, I will extend my remarks.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a little better order before I begin to speak upon this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. Gentlemen on the floor will cease conversation.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, when I came into the Forty-ninth Congress one of the questions to which I directed my attention was that of securing to the Government the great indebtedness of these Pacific Railroads.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will suspend until we can have better order. I am between two talks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can not be heard. The Chair can not hear one word of what is said. (After a pause.) The gentleman will now proceed.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I was then met in the study of this subject with the fact that the law stood in the way of proceeding immediately, in the best manner, to secure this indebtedness. To-day, when this question is up, which not only involves $1,800,000, but possibly involves many million dollars, the only argument that is presented to us is that it is a legal claim, and that the legal situation is such that we must pay this amount; that we must disregard everything else but the technical legal questions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to say in the presence of this House and of the country that certain railroad managements of this country have within the past few years perpetrated, legally, iniquities in the form of stealings, robberies, and other scoundrelly abstracting of other people's money than all the criminals in all the penitentiaries in this country combined. It is not a question simply of legality that we are to consider. It is clearly shown here by the testimony that was taken that this Southern Pacific Company was an organization to help evade the legal responsibilities of the Central Pacific Railroad Company; not only to help to evade the legal responsibilities, but to divert from its proper channel the moneys which should have come into the Treasury of the United States according to the law under which the Central Pacific Railroad was operating. Reading from the report of the Pacific Railway Commission, on the 95th page, I find:

> The railroad known as the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky, organized under a Kentucky charter, was selected as the common lessee of all these companies. The Southern Pacific Company is in a great degree controlled by Stanford, Huntington, and Crocker.

Then the testimony shows that these three gentlemen and one other were really the organizers, stockholders, the builders, the construction company of both of them—the Central Pacific Railway Company and the Southern Pacific Railway Company:

> The large amount of stock of the Southern Pacific Railway Company issued to them for construction has been converted by them into stock of the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company are leased to this common corporation.

That is the finding of the Pacific Railway Commission that investigated this subject at a large expense. On the next page——

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the date of that report?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It is Senate Executive Document No. 51, of the Fiftieth Congress, first session.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the date of the report that you read from?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. January 17, 1888, is the date of the report. On page 96 I find:

> The question, therefore, of the effect of the Government's earnings of the lease of the Central Pacific Railroad Company to the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky is merely a question whether the parties interested, having control of all the business operated on behalf of the Central Pacific Railroad and the Southern Pacific Railroad, would divert business naturally belonging to the Central Pacific Railroad to the Central Pacific Railroad, so as to affect the amount of earnings subject to the 25 per cent computation, or so as to advance their personal interests.
> It is doubtless true that a large portion of the through traffic from ocean to ocean since 1882 has been done via the Southern Pacific Railroad Company.

From this language it clearly appears that one of the objects for which this Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky was organized was to prevent the proper payment, under the law, of the 25 per cent which should have come to the Treasury of the United States. They diverted the traffic that should have gone over the Central Pacific, because it would be subject to this 25 per cent. While obeying the law in appearance, they violated it in spirit. Part of this sum of $1,800,000 which that company is here to-day suing to collect from the Government should have been paid in under the law as part of the requirements of the Thurman law. That company now seeks its legal rights as to this sum of diverted money.

Mr. BLAIR. If you will read page 115 of the report you will see the construction that is put upon that by the commissioners.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I have no time to yield. This diversion resulted in injury to the Government, in that the company thus failed to apply such funds to the sinking fund provided to pay off the bonds which are about to become due. During this fiscal year there are coming due certain bonds loaned by the Government to the Central Pacific for the payment of which the company has failed to provide. Must we pay them, and yet give up money to this company? According to the statement of the company's attorneys, according to the facts, the Central Pacific will not be able to pay those bonds, and the United States Government must go into the Treasury of the people and pay these bonds during this year. It must so continue to do until the many millions loaned that company are paid off by the people.

With that fact staring us in the face, with the fact that the Central Pacific Railroad has bonds coming due which must be paid out of the Treasury of the people, we are asked to pay to this "common corporation" $1,800,000 of the people's money. Is there any haste that we should at this time, when the Treasury is depleted, when an issue of bonds has been found necessary to keep it from bankruptcy, to pay this claim, about which there is no legal question to be sure, but about which, as an old squire down in Missouri used to say, there are some "e-e-quities" that ought to be considered? If the proposition be true that the bulk of the stock of this Southern Pacific Company is owned and controlled by the men who robbed the Government——

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes; certainly.

Mr. REED. The gentleman says the bulk of the stock is owned and controlled by certain persons. How does he justify his action towards the other "bulk" of it that is not owned by those persons?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will justify that. It was all originally owned by these gentlemen. They paid to themselves for construction. If they sold it to innocent holders without any knowledge on the part of those holders of the taint that was upon the stock, then the purchasers must look to them.

Mr. BLAIR. Does not the gentleman know——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. REED. Now I understand the gentleman's point of view.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I am simply admitting for the purpose of this argument a declaration made upon the other side that there are other stockholders; but there is no testimony or evidence here to that effect.

Mr. REED. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that there has been a very lively correspondence on the part of the English owners of this stock with the late president of the company——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No; I am not aware of that fact.

Mr. REED. Showing plainly that there is a large interest held by entirely innocent persons in England, not to speak of innocent holders in this country?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not know that they are innocent, in the sense of not having had knowledge of the transactions which covers this whole matter with fraud. There may be some English stockholders, but I am not particularly anxious just now to pay money out of the Treasury of the United States to be sent to these English stockholders.

Mr. REED. I think you are right, after having just passed a tariff bill which will put infinite money in their pockets.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Still "harping on my daughter."

Mr. REED. And a pretty bad daughter, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I wish that some subject could come up here which the late Speaker of the House would let go through without making some reference to the tariff.

Mr. DALZELL. Not their daughter, either, except by adoption.

Mr. REED. Do not interrupt the gentleman from Ohio. He means to be severe.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Oh, no; I would not attempt the rôle of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. I should think you would not.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No, I would not. The gentleman from Maine is superior in vulgarity in abuse of members, and I do not aspire to rival him therein.

Mr. REED. In what?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I have said it.

Mr. REED (in his seat). You have said it; of course you have.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Maine when addressing this House should rise in his place. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset, the question here is not whether there is a legal claim; the question is whether there is such a pure claim, so free from fraud, so free from taint of any kind, that in the present situation of affairs in this country we should make haste to put money into the pockets of these men who by their transactions are under obligation to pay many times more than this amount back into the Treasury of the United States.

Instead of attempting at this time to extend any of this indebtedness of these Pacific railroads, let us proceed to attempt to collect what is owing the Government and can never be paid by the companies, amounting to many millions of dollars, from these fiduciary parties, these directors, these presidents of boards of directors, who through contracts with themselves and other corrupt schemes robbed their own companies, and thus made way with the funds furnished by the Government. Let us proceed to pass legislation that will enable us, in the courts of the United States, to pursue them and get back at least a part of that of which they have robbed the Government. We can readily pass such legislation. The time has about come when no court can intervene to prevent us upon the ground that the indebtedness has not yet become due. Let me call the attention of the House to the second and fourth sections of the bill I introduced August 7 for that purpose:

SEC. 2. That the Attorney-General, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, shall institute proceedings, in the name of the United States, against any former or present directors, or against the estates of any such directors or their heirs, or personal representatives of former directors of Government-aided railroad companies, or against other persons who may be liable to the said corporations or to their creditors for property obtained contrary to equity, and particularly in respect of the following matters:

Contracts for construction or equipment, whether made by fiduciaries in their own names or through construction companies or other individuals. Contracts for the transfer of bonds or stocks of other railroads to the Government-aided companies. Any other contracts, or any acts, whereby the fiduciaries of Government-aided railroad companies have received from them securities or property of those companies, or the securities issued by other companies, and which securities belonged to the subsidized companies, or transferred to Government-aided companies the securities or stocks of other corporations, contrary to equity, or any other acts of said parties contrary to the equities of said companies. And the Attorney-General shall likewise institute suits against any former or present stockholders who may be liable by statute or otherwise for the debts of the aforesaid corporations.

SEC. 4. That upon the maturity of any of the bonds issued by the United States to Government aided railroad companies the Attorney-General shall institute common-law actions for recovery thereon, and the provisions of this act shall apply to those proceedings. And the United States shall have the right to allege its judgments so recovered, and proceedings thereon, by supplemental bills to the suits described in section 2 of this act, with like force and effect as if the said judgments had been recovered and proceeded upon at the time of the filing of the original bills by the United States. That the holders of overdue coupons and of any other overdue obligations of the said companies shall have the benefit of the foregoing provisions of this section. But nothing contained in this act shall be construed to abridge the right of the United States, or of any other creditor of the said companies, to proceed before judgment or maturity of debts by suits in equity against said companies when insolvent, and against any former or present directors of said companies, or against the estates of any former directors thereof, or against their heirs or personal representatives, or against their directors, officers, and transferees, to recover property obtained contrary to equity, and to have the benefit of all the provisions of this act.

No court can stay the hand of justice or equity in its attempt to follow these moneys of the Government into the possession of the fraudulent holders thereof. The men who own this indebtedness which our friends upon the other side are so anxious to pay, the men who are interested in receiving this money from the Treasury, are the very men who were guilty of the transactions by which the Government was so badly robbed in years gone by, both through construction contracts and the diversion of traffic to the other lines which they had under lease, which diversion enabled them to prevent payments being made to the Government that ought to have been made.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman give us the facts upon which he bases that statement, and also the legal principle upon which he confounds a legal corporation with the stockholders who compose it?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. These corporations confound themselves with each other. The one was organized for the purpose of confusion. As to the facts which the gentleman inquires about, here is a summary of those facts. This report of the investigations of the Pacific Railroad Commission fills several volumes, all going to establish beyond peradventure every statement that I have made as to the transactions of these people, and the fraudulent manner in which they constructed their railroads.

Mr. BOATNER. Now, I want to ask my friend whether as a lawyer he thinks that the statements and arguments he is making here would be considered at all in a court of justice——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I said that as a legal question this company may be entitled to this money; but I said also that under the shield of law, some of the greatest robberies ever perpetrated upon any people have been perpetrated upon the people of this country in the management of these corporations.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. I trust the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will now occupy some of his time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. How much time is there left on each side? I have consumed seventeen minutes, I believe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has forty-three minutes remaining; the gentleman from Texas fifty-one.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Does the gentleman prefer I should go on now.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] ten minutes or such additional time as he may desire.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, in the Fifty-first Congress an amendment to an appropriation bill was considered providing for paying the Central Pacific Railroad a million and more of dollars for which judgment had been rendered by the Court of Claims, and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. And although the Supreme Court decided that Congress could not lawfully withhold the payment of that money to the Central Pacific, since that company was in no manner in default, yet because the record did not show that another very important question in the case had been adjudicated and settled, I voted with my friends on this other side of the House to withhold the payment of the debt upon this ground: When Congress came to act upon the subject it was confessed on all sides that the Central Pacific Railroad Company was insolvent; that it would in a few years, if it did not then, owe to the Government of the United States a large amount of money.

I believed that upon the principles of equity we had the right to withhold the money and to appropriate it when the time came to the payment of the indebtedness of the Central Pacific Railway Company to the Government of the United States. I was influenced to vote as I did on this occasion by the same reasons which were presented in this House at that time by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. I believe that Congress did right in withholding the money to pay that judgment. I believe now, if there were an effort to pay the Central Pacific Railroad Company the judgments which they hold against the United States, we should withhold the money.

But, Mr. Speaker, the question involved here is quite a different one. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company was organized under a charter obtained, I believe, in Kentucky. That road runs through Southern California, through Arizona, through New Mexico, and through Texas to New Orleans; that is, the different Pacific companies which built and operated this line and which is leased and operated by the Southern Pacific Company, which I shall treat as the owner of the whole line.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company, which makes this claim, never owned a foot of railroad in the world. It was organized, we claim, simply as an agent of the Central Pacific people for the purpose of defeating the just claims of the Government.

Mr. CULBERSON. You claim that; but I dispute the claim. I say that it is a corporation doing business as a corporation, legally qualified to act, and is now the lessee of the Central Pacific system and the Pacific roads between San Francisco and New Orleans.

Now, this railroad company has performed services for the Government of the United States. The Government owes it about $2,000,000 under this judgment for carrying its mails and troops. Not one dollar of these earnings was made by the Central Railroad Company and its branches. This money was all earned by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company.

Now, we are told that Mr. Huntington and Mr. Somebody else owned both the Central and the Southern Pacific Railroads. I dispute that, as a matter of fact; but as a matter of law it would make no difference if the truth so existed. The fact is, that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company issued and sold $61,000,000 of bonds to aid in the construction of this railroad through Southern California and Texas. Who owns the bonds? Where are they? They are scattered throughout Texas, throughout the South, throughout California, and in foreign countries. How are these companies to pay their interest upon its indebtedness if the Government withholds from its lessee its just earnings?

Now, I want to submit, Mr. Speaker, that the mere identity of stockholders does not make the corporations identical. By no means. The gentleman from Ohio Mr. OUTHWAITE] states that this railroad was built for the very purpose of making a cover——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I said that the railroad company was organized for such a purpose—not that this road was built for that purpose. There are three legal entities here.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that. I say it has been claimed by the gentleman that this whole Southern Pacific system was a mere cover for the Central Pacific Railroad Company and other aided lines, in order to defeat the Government of the United States in the collection of its debts. Now, I do not understand the history of this transaction in that way. And he claims that the money which ought to have gone to the Government has been diverted from its legitimate purpose and placed in the construction of the road.

Now, the witness that was mainly relied on in this proposition is Judge Payson, and yet Judge Payson quotes in his testimony the report of the Railroad Commission of 1887, the report from which the gentleman from Ohio has read, that not a dollar of this money had been diverted from the proper purpose in the building of this Southern Pacific Railroad.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will not argue, because I can not discuss this question in five or ten minutes the logic of the question presented here. But I ask as a legal proposition what right have you to withhold this money from this railroad company, because of the fact, as alleged, that Mr. Huntington, and three other men, hold in their hands a large block of the stock? What right, I ask, have we to withhold payment under such circumstances? Are not other people who are interested, stockholders in this company, entitled to some respect and consideration? Are we to run over law and justice and everything else in refusing to pay an honest debt? Is that any ground for the refusal to pay an honest debt?

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Democratic party can well afford to swell this little appropriation bill by the sum of $1,800,000 in order to do a matter of justice, of fairness and right to these people.

But I would like to know whether the time can ever come, or will ever come, when you can take this money away from the stockholders of the Southern Pacific Company and put it into your Treasury to the credit of the Central Pacific? I answer that the time never will come, and that you never can do that; and if you can not, why not do now what is right, and let this just debt, which your own court has adjudicated, be paid? [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I understand the facts in connection with this case to be that the amount added to the appropriation bill by the Senate is an amount that has been adjudicated by the Court of Claims. Why is it then, sir, that the Government of the United States represented by its Attorney-General and its Solicitor-General who appeared in the Court of Claims for the purpose of defending the rights of the United States in the premises, why is it just, if the United States had a just and fair offset, as is now alleged, to this claim of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, that they did not interpose at that time and present their alleged offset?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It was not done for this reason——

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Very well; I can not yield to the gentleman from Ohio. He has had his own time and he can answer that query in his own time. Certain it is that no such offset was presented. They should have presented it there and then; and if such an offset existed they had a right to resist the decree of the court which declared this to be a just debt due by the Government of the United States to the railroad company.

Mr. BOATNER. If my friend will permit me to suggest, the legal question was presented and adjudicated by the court, and the officers of the Government, after perfecting an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, declined to prosecute it.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Precisely; and it stands as my distinguished friend from Louisiana says, as res adjudicata, in a court where both parties were represented, the United States by its attorneys and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company by its attorneys, and the question was adjudicated and the Government abandoned its right of appeal to the Supreme Court.

No one denies here, neither the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] nor the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. SAYERS] that the services were rendered by this railroad company, that the mails were carried, troops and munitions of war were transported for the Government, and that the debt is justly due. All of that is admitted by all parties; but when the question of the payment for the services comes up they say, "Oh, no, you must not pay this debt, although adjudicated by the court and found due, until this railroad company will satisfy the debt of somebody else"—a legal proposition which of course can not be successfully submitted, and was not made in the course of the proceedings before the Court of Claims or in any other court.

Mr. MAGUIRE. If the gentleman will allow me to state——

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I can not yield to the gentleman. If you could have made such a claim you ought to have made it and let the court pass upon it. There is the place to submit it, and if the United States had a just offset against the claim of the company, there was the place where the Attorney-

General and his subordinates, representing the United States, should have interposed the objection to the illegal and unjust demand of the railroad company.

But, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Ohio, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and everyone else who argues on this question admit that this is a legal claim, a just question, and a claim that has been adjudicated by a court of competent jurisdiction; and that all the parties in interest were before the court and had a proper hearing.

It is then a strange proposition that in the House of Representatives anybody will rise here and claim that when there has been a fair adjudication of a question of indebtedness before a court of competent jurisdiction, where both parties were represented by their attorneys, you will refuse to pay the party in whose favor the adjudication was made because you think the amount of the claim should go to somebody else! That is a strange principle of law to me. The true and manly course is for Congress to pay the adjudication of its own court, and when you come to the question of the liability——

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I decline to be interrupted now.

When you come to the question of the liability of the Pacific railroads, the Central Pacific and the other roads who have large land grants made to them by the Government, then we must take into consideration not only the law as bearing upon each case by itself, but all of the equities which may be presented. It is true that these companies have had large grants of lands, mainly sage bush and arid plains, but they have returned you populous towns, villages, and cities, which are paying, daily, taxes into the Treasury of the Federal Government, as well as into the governments of the States which have been created out of these grants. It may be that the grants were too large. It may be that the Government was too liberal. I think so myself, but at all events you have the results flowing from the grants. You have men on this floor representing great sovereign States which have been carved out of the grants to these Pacific railroads. But all this is out of the question. The simple question presented here is, Does this judgment of the Court of Claims represent a just and honest claim against the Government?

Was the transportation rendered? Did the court have a right to make the adjudication it did? And if it did, is it not in common honesty the duty of the United States Government to pay the debt? And when we come to deal with the Pacific Railroads upon an adjudication as to what they owe, upon a foreclosure of the mortgages which the Government had taken from them, when we come to do that, then, while we are adjudicating upon that question, we can say what is due to those roads, and what is due to the Government, and withhold it. Upon an adjudication by a court of competent jurisdiction, that a certain amount is due, when everybody concedes that the service has been rendered, why should we withhold the payment of a just and honest judgment rendered by a competent court?

Mr. SAYERS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, the proposition to provide in this or one of the other appropriation bills for the payment of this claim was, as I understand, submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and the parties interested were fully heard, and after consideration that committee decided to disallow it, or, in other words, not to include it in any of the bills, this or any other, reported by that committee. The bill reported by the committee, after having been considered and acted upon by the House, was sent to the other Chamber, and there the amendment which is now under discussion was first inserted in the bill.

If there were no other objections to the payment of this claim than that, I should regard it as sufficient to satisfy my own mind, but especially so in connection with all the history of this transaction. It has grown to be a custom here of late years to hold back matters of important legislation, and bring them in at the closing days of the session in the shape of Senate amendments to appropriation bills. I think this is a vicious practice, and one the House should discountenance and rebuke as often as opportunity presents itself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are some considerations which address themselves to my mind as a reason why this appropriation should not be allowed, notwithstanding the fact that it is asserted here that the claim has been adjudicated by one of our courts.

We all have respect, of course, for the adjudications of the courts, and bow to their decisions, but there are many considerations and suggestions that properly present themselves to the minds of a body such as this, when called upon to legislate, instead of deciding questions according to technical rules of law.

Mr. TERRY. Is it not a fact that hundreds of claims have been adjudicated which the committee have not found themselves able to provide for?

Mr. REILLY. Yes; and this House has refused time and time again to appropriate for claims that have been adjudicated by the courts, because, in the wisdom and discretion of this body, there were sufficient reasons, in the judgment of the members, to justify them in their action.

Now, in the brief time allowed me I can only give a hasty review of the facts connected with this matter, but hope the House may understand it, because it seems to me, from the tenor of the remarks of some of the gentlemen, particularly my friend from Texas, whose ability and sincerity we all respect, there is some misapprehension as to the real facts.

The Central Pacific Railroad Company embraces a system of railways of about 1,360 miles, of which about 860 miles were aided by the grant of Government bonds and the grant of public lands. The remaining 500 miles are not so aided.

Under existing laws the Central Pacific Railroad Company is required each year to pay into the Treasury of the United States a certain portion of its net earnings, equal to 25 per cent, which is made up by the Government retaining the whole amount that it owes to the company for transportation services, one-half to be credited to what is known as the bond and interest account, with 5 per cent of net earnings, and the other half to the sinking fund, together with an amount in cash to be paid by this company that would make the total equal to 25 per cent annually of the net earnings of the company.

Now, there were afterwards organized what were known as the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of Arizona, and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of New Mexico, and other roads, all of which were leased by the Central Pacific Railroad Company and operated by the Central Pacific Railroad Company as lessees for some years up to 1885. Since the passage of the Thurman act, in 1878, and up to 1885, the annual requirement of the law as to payment of portion of net earnings above explained, called for and obliged this company to pay a considerable sum of money in cash yearly; and the payments to the Government, while not sufficient to meet the annual amount that the Government was obliged to pay out, were largely in excess of the amounts that have been paid annually under the provisions of that act since 1885.

In 1885 this arrangement was just reversed, and instead of the Central Pacific Railroad Company being the lessee of these various lines and operated by it the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation created under the laws of Kentucky, was organized, and became the lessee of the Central Pacific and all of the lines that had theretofore been leased by it, the Central Pacific Company surrendering all such leased lines and leasing its own lines to said Southern Pacific Company.

Now, the fact is that during the last few years the amount that the Central Pacific Railroad Company has paid under the Thurman act has amounted to no more than the actual charges it had against the Government for transportation. Its earnings have been cut down to that extent, and in fact it practically has no earnings except the $1,350,000 rental that it receives under the terms of the lease from the Southern Pacific Company. Now, I do not say—perhaps this is not the time to say, perhaps I would not be justified in saying—that that lease was executed for the purpose of bringing about such a condition of affairs; but it has evidently had that effect, and I will ask the Clerk to read from the report of the Senate committee, in which they quote from the report of the Pacific Railway Commission.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Central Pacific Company operated the Southern Pacific road until 188 ?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. And that immediately thereafter the conditions were reversed so that the Southern Pacific Company now operates the Central?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, sir: the Southern Pacific became the lessor and the other became the lessee.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then there would seem to be something of a community of interests?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, sir. The Southern Pacific must not be confounded with other distinct corporations which existed previously, as the Southern Pacific Company of California, the Southern Pacific of New Mexico, the Southern Pacific of Arizona, and others. I ask the Clerk to read the extract I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

The lease of the Central Pacific Railroad to the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky in connection with the Southern Pacific Railroad to the boundary of Oregon, and thence to Portland, Oregon, has placed it in the power of the directors of the Central Pacific Railroad Company to effect a diversion of business which would have a very disastrous result upon the traffic of the subsidized portion of the Central Pacific Railroad.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. REILLY. If I had the time I would be glad to do so.

Mr. BLAIR. On page 115 of the report of the Pacific Railway Commission the gentleman will find a denial that the lease was made for any such purpose.

Mr. REILLY. I do not charge that. I quote from the report of the Commission, and I say that the effect of it has been as I have stated, and the fact is that the amounts paid for the last few years have been far below the amount which the Government has been obliged to pay out annually for interest alone, without mentioning the principal.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to discuss now either the legality or the validity of this claim. I am willing, for the sake of the argument, to concede both. What I say is that in view of the relations which exist between the Central Pacific and the Government of the United States, the large indebtedness which that company owes the Government upon the bonds which are about maturing, and in view of the close and intimate relation which exists between the Southern Pacific Company and the Central Pacific Company, as a matter of expediency and good, sound public policy, Congress, when it is upon the eve of being obliged to legislate upon this great and important question, ought not to appropriate this large amount of money at this particular time.

The fact that the Southern Pacific is the lessee of the Central Pacific, if that lease be valid, will make it necessary for Congress to legislate in relation to that company if it is to retain its interest for ninety-nine years under the lease now existing between it and the Central Pacific. So, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that there are in this matter grave and serious reasons apart from the question of the legality, or the validity, or the merits which, whilst they could not properly be presented before a court, address themselves to this House as reasons why this appropriation ought not to be made now. Next year, in January, the debts of this company will begin to fall due, both the first-mortgage bonds and the Government bonds, and Congress will be called upon to provide for the payment of those bonds, either by appropriating public money, or in some other way looking to an adjustment and settlement of the claims of this company. I deem it no injustice, under existing circumstances and in view of the community of interest between these two companies, the immense sum about to become due to the Government, and the admitted inability of the company to discharge the same at maturity, to defer action in this matter until the whole subject of the adjustment of the relations of these companies to the Government shall be considered.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of California. Mr. Speaker, having resided in California for over forty years, I am somewhat familiar with the proceedings of the Southern Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroad Companies. The Central Pacific at one time held leases of all the branch roads in California, including the Southern Pacific. After the Thurman act was passed they went to Kentucky and organized a new corporation called the Southern Pacific of Kentucky. There is no doubt in my mind that that corporation was organized for the very purpose of taking possession under leases of all the branch lines, including the Central Pacific Railroad. It was organized, in my opinion and in the opinion of Californians generally, for no other purpose.

There was no necessity in the world for them to go to Kentucky to get a corporation to lease all those branch lines. The Southern Pacific road was already built and was operated by the Central under a lease. The manner in which that lease was made indicated fraud upon its face. Mr. Stanford was the president of the Central Pacific and E. H. Miller was its secretary. They were also the president and secretary of the Southern Pacific Company.

In March, 1885, after this Kentucky corporation had been put in the hands of these men, Stanford and Miller resigned as president and secretary of the Southern Pacific Company and appointed William E. Brown president, and E. H. Nash, Stanford's private secretary, secretary of the Southern Pacific, and then Stanford and Miller entered into this lease with these two other officers, and all the branch roads in California and the Central Pacific were leased to the Southern Pacific of Kentucky. That, I say, was a fraud upon its face, and it was done for the purpose of beating the United States out of its 25 per cent of the net earnings of the Central Pacific Company.

And not only was it done for the purpose of wrecking the Central Pacific Railroad Company and diverting all the traffic over the southern line from the State of California. Now, there is a reason why they would divert the traffic—a natural reason. They only own the branch lines in California. The Central Pacific only runs to Ogden, and all the traffic they could get on the traffic arrangements would be to Ogden overland. On this other route they have the whole State of California under their control. They have their lines to New Orleans, and from there to New York by water. Consequently they could get all the freight and all the traffic by diverting it over the Southern Pacific lines.

Now, another thing. This was not the only instance in which they diverted the means and earnings of the Southern Pacific to their own private benefit. They had private corporations, the Contract and Finance Company, and the Pacific Improvement Company, and so on. These companies were organized for the purpose of distributing the earnings of the Central Pacific to Stanford, Huntington, Crocker & Co. This is well known to all Californians.

The Southern Pacific of Kentucky was organized for the purpose of leasing all the lines in California and beating the Government out of the net earnings provided by the Thurman act. It owns no railroads in California, nor anything else. It issued no bonds, and the poor bondholders gentlemen speak about will not suffer on account of a loss of interest. It is an organized pirate, to prey upon the industries of the people, and should receive no sympathy at our hands.

As an appendix to my remarks I desire to present and print the following speech delivered by me before the Committee on Pacific Railroads on the 12th of July last:

SPEECH OF HON. MARION CANNON, OF CALIFORNIA, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the committee, extending the time for the payment of the Pacific railroads debts, is one of the most important that has been presented to this body for many years. It is important to the United States in attempting to secure the payment of about $178,000,000, principal and interest, from the Union and Central Pacific roads, or from the Central Pacific alone about $77,000,000.

It seems to me that the main question to be considered by this committee is, whether the conduct of the "Big four"—Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker—has been of such a character as to inspire in us a confidence sufficient to grant them an extension of time in which to pay this debt; whether they have so administered the great trust imposed in them by the act of 1862 as to warrant such confidence in their honesty in the future?

It seems to me, that having violated every trust reposed in them by the people of the United States when we entered into a partnership with them in the construction of these great public highways, that they are not now entitled to any consideration whatever at our hands. After violating every contract and law creating the Central Pacific Company, I believe the partnership should now be forever dissolved and these bandits retired to private life, or the State's prison, where better men are serving the State.

If this great Government can not enforce its own laws against this corporation; if we must be continually harassed by the belittling suits that have so persistently occurred since the issue of these bonds; if we must abdicate our sovereignty, and through our officials be made to contend for petty successes or disastrous defeats in the forum of our own credits, then it is time for a complete divorce of the Government from this corrupt gang of bandits, who have preyed upon both the people and the Government for nearly thirty years.

There is another reason why we should wind up the business of this corporation, and this reason is the most important to Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker, and their estates. Under the laws of California, the stockholders of this corporation are individually liable for the debts of the company in an amount equal to the stock they hold. The law and the constitution of the State also declare that no corporation shall be granted a franchise for a longer period than fifty years.

An extension of time would be making a new contract with these corporators, and would release them from all personal liabilities for the rascalities and frauds perpetrated by them in the building and management of these roads up to the time the new contract is made. The charter of the Central Pacific was granted by the California Legislature June 27, 1861, and runs fifty years, and the State constitution forbids the renewal of any franchise after it has expired. Therefore, if the time of settlement is extended beyond the year 1911, the corporation will be dead and no power on earth can resurrect it.

You will therefore see by this brief statement the importance of this extension of time to the big four—Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker, and their estates. First, it will release them from all personal liabilities for their rascalities; second, by extending the time for settlement beyond the life of the corporation—June 27, 1911—they will beat the Government out of the whole amount of the debt. Mr. Huntington stated in his letters to Mr. Coulton that it had cost his company $1,700,000 to defeat Tom Scott and his "Texas Pacific" in Congress, and in view of this fact what should this Congress expect from his company?

To be relieved of all personal liabilities and an extension of time beyond the life of his company would be worth the whole amount of the debt, $77,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that these corporations are put upon trial before this Congress, when they come here and ask for an extension of time, for one hundred years, in which to pay their debts. I do not desire to do these corporations any injustice, and if their management of the great trust given into their charge has been conducted upon honest methods they should have the time extended. But if it shall appear to this House that the methods employed have not been honest, but the most corrupt and vicious, so much so that it has become a national disgrace, then no extension of time should be given, and they should be wiped out with all possible speed.

The partnership entered into between the Government and the Union and Central Pacific, Kansas Pacific, Sioux City and Pacific, and the Central Branch, as set forth in the several acts of Congress, were as follows: The United States loaned them $64,623,512 in bonds bearing 6 per cent interest and running thirty years. They also authorized the companies to issue first-mortgage bonds to an equal amount of $64,623,512. We also gave them 26,029,534 acres of land, from which they have realized $33,479,213, and they have remaining unsold lands worth $26,504,270, making a total gift of land which amounts to $65,983,483. We granted them a right of way 400 feet wide, with all necessary room for depots, machine shops, and side tracks. We vested these corporations with control of these great public highways across the continent, and gave them power to establish rates of transportation; that is, the power to levy toll upon all the traffic which might pass over these roads. We also gave them the right of eminent domain.

These two last great powers are vested alone in Congress, and they have been farmed out to these corporations. But in order to guard against all possible abuses of these great powers, and to insure good management and personal responsibility, Congress enacted that in return for the nation's liberality in granting these great powers and immense sums in bonds and lands, these companies should bind themselves to have their stocks fully paid up in cash; to build first-class roads; to carry freight for the Government at the same rates as for private individuals; to operate all the lines in the Pacific system as one connected, continuous line, and to give to each equal facilities in rates, time, and transportation, and to convey telegraphic messages upon equal terms to all persons. They also agreed to make annual reports to the Government, giving the names of their directors and stockholders, and the amount of their stock actually paid up in cash, and the amount of receipts, expenditures, and indebtedness, under oath. They also agreed to pay 5 per cent of their net earnings into a sinking fund and one-half the cost of Government transportation to pay the principal and interest upon the debt they owed the Government.

With these binding obligations resting upon them, what did these companies do? They organized construction companies, through which they let contracts to themselves at immense profits. The Union Pacific had her "Credit Mobilier," the Central Pacific had "C. Crocker & Co. Contract and Finance Company;" "Shoemaker & Co." built the Kansas Pacific, and John I. Blair built the Sioux City. The books of all these companies have been destroyed, so that the actual cost of building these roads can not be given, but the records from other sources are sufficient to give a very close estimate of the cost.

I will now give you the cost of constructing these roads and the amount of stocks and bonds issued by the boards of directors to themselves through these construction companies, as reported by the Pattison Commission, known as Senate Executive Document No. 51, Fiftieth Congress, first session: Union Pacific cost $38,824,000. The board of directors issued to themselves, through the Credit Mobilier, in stocks and bonds, $109,814,812, making a clear steal of $70,990,812. The Central Pacific, including the Western Pacific, was built for $40,000,000, and Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker issued to themselves stocks and bonds to the amount of $124,211,680, making a clear steal of $84,211,680. The Kansas Pacific was built for $11,800,000, and stocks and bonds were issued to the amount of $25,028,250, making a clear steal of $13,228,250.

The Central Branch was built for $2,731,347, and stocks and bonds were issued to the amount of $4,200,000, making a clear steal of $1,468,652.

The Sioux City Branch was built for $2,600,000, and stocks and bonds were issued to the amount of $5,047,720, making a clear steal of $2,447,720.

The Southern Pacific was built for $27,216,931, and Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker issued to themselves, in stocks and bonds, $82,756,486, a clear steal of $55,539,554.

The California and Oregon was built for $3,505,609, and Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker issued to themselves, in stocks and bonds, $12,500,000, making a clear steal of $8,994,391.

The Oregon Short Line was built for $14,000,000, and stocks and bonds were issued to the amount of $29,000,000, making a clear steal of $15,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before we go any further with this history of these bandits, let us group these stealings in such shape as to be handy for future reference, for they will have an important bearing upon the question whether these companies should be permitted to exist any longer.

Stealings of—

Union Pacific	$70,990,812
Central Pacific	84,211,680
Kansas Pacific	13,228,250
Central Branch	1,468,650
Sioux City Branch	2,447,720
Southern Pacific	55,539,554
California and Oregon from Delta	8,994,391
Oregon Short Line	15,000,000
Total stealings upon construction	251,881,057

This is not all the stealings these companies perpetrated by any means; they are only the commencement.

By the act of March 3, 1873, the Union Pacific was prohibited from the payment of dividends, except from actual net earnings, yet they declared dividends in violation of this act. By this act the Union Pacific was prohibited from issuing stock or mortgages or any pledges upon their company or its future earnings without permission from Congress. Yet in 1880 the company increased its stock from $36,762,000 to $50,762,000 by the consolidation of the Union Pacific, Kansas Pacific, and Denver Pacific in violation of the act of March 3, 1873, and a little later in the same year the stock of the consolidated company was increased to $60,868,500 in violation of law, whereby Jay Gould pocketed about $14,000,000.

In 1879 they issued collateral trust bonds for $4,852,000, and pledged securities of the company in violation of the law. In 1883 they issued trust bonds for $4,500,000 in violation of the law.

In 1882 and 1884 they guaranteed the payment of interest on the bonds of the Oregon Short Line for $14,000,000 in violation of law. This was done by the board of directors of the Union Pacific, many of whom held these bonds thus voting money from the Union Pacific treasury into their own pockets.

About the same time they guaranteed interest on the bonds of the St. Joseph and Grand Island Railroad, amounting to $6,961,922, in violation of the law. They also used the stock and bonds of the Union Pacific, in violation of the act of 1873, in the construction of about forty branch lines and in building up fifteen or twenty private corporations, in which members of the board of directors were the principal stockholders, and so long as these private corporations paid dividends the old Union Pacific was not "in it." But when they ceased to pay the board of directors voted the stock over to the parent company, and in some instances voted to guarantee the payment of the interest upon the bonds, as was done in the case of the Oregon Short Line. While the majority of the board of directors held the stock and bonds of these branch lines they leased them to the Union Pacific for large sums, amounting in the aggregate to about $38,800,000.

At the risk of being tedious I will here give you the names of thirty-two of these branch lines with a mileage of 4,015 miles:

Nevada Central.	Utah Central.
Utah Central.	Salt Lake and Western.
Lawrence and Emporia.	Junction City and Fort Kearney.
St. Joseph and Grand Island.	Echo and Park City.
South Park and Leadville.	Omaha and Black Hills.
Denver and Boulder Valley.	Salina and Southwestern.
Denver and South Park.	Soloman Railroad.
Kansas Central.	Salina, Lincoln and Western.
Greeley and Salt Lake.	Colorado Central.
Leavenworth and Topeka.	Utah and Nevada.
Manhattan and Alma.	Montana Railroad Company.
Denver and Middle Park.	Manhatten and Blue Valley.
Georgetown and Leadville.	Denver, Marshall and Boulder.
Laramie and North Park.	Golden and Cariboo.
Oregon Short Line.	Central Branch.
Omaha and Republican Valley.	Utah and Northern.

In addition to these branch lines, many other corporations were organized from the earnings of the Union Pacific, such as elevators, smelting works, street railways, etc. And farmers testified before the Pattison committee that they were charged from 5 to 8 cents more for freight to Chicago than these elevator companies, thus forcing them to sell their grain to these elevators.

We also learn from this report that the directors of the Union Pacific voted themselves a rebate to the Omaha Grant Smelting Works of $570,000, and upon the elevators to the amount of millions of dollars, thereby beating the miners and farmers out of their hard-earned profits.

The names of these companies can be found in the report of the Pattison commission. For the payments of these rebates the Pacific railroads voted to themselves and their pet companies, out of the funds which should have been applied to the payment of the Government debt, $25,866,235. They also refused to consider these rebates in their report of the net earnings of their roads, from which the 5 per cent payments to the United States were to be made.

The law required them to pay up their capital stock in full, and make oath to that effect, and file it with the Interior Department. They complied with the law so far as to making the oath, but all honest men will hold them guilty of perjury as to the amount of stock they swore had been paid up.

I herewith furnish a table compiled by the Pattison Commission from these affidavits on file in the Interior Department, and you will see by this table the amount actually paid up was $1,797,350, while these four men swore that it was $97,098,590—only a small lie of about $95,000,000. Had any of the common people made such an oath they very likely would have been serving the State in some penal institution. But here is the table, with the names of the parties:

Stock table.

Company.	Stock actually paid in.	Stock paid in as sworn to.	Names of deponents.	Date of affidavit.
Union Pacific	$400,650	$36,762,300	Oliver Ames	Sept. 27, 1870
Kansas Pacific	250,000	5,072,500	R. E. Carr	Sept. 28, 1872
Central Pacific	760,000	54,283,190	Leland Stanford	Sept. 18, 1871

It is no answer to the Government that the managers of these companies did only that which the managers of railroads in other sections did. These lines were built upon public credit. They were public highways in the broadest sense of that term. The managers were acting as trustees of a national highway, and they can not plead any lawful justification for making false affidavits, which state that $97,098,590 of stock was actually paid for, when in fact less than two millions had been so paid for.

Now, let us return to the big four in California, and if, when I get through with exposing their rascalities in the management of the Central Pacific and branch lines, this Congress determines to continue the management of these roads in their hands, the people of the Pacific coast will have to submit to their robberies for another hundred years. Much has been said about the ownership of the stock in the Central Pacific. Huntington denies that he owned a large block of this stock; but that the big four owned nearly all this stock is evident from the fact that they held possession of the board of directors, and voted contracts, made leases, and robbed both the people and the Government for nearly thirty years.

It is no answer to say that this was done through private companies organized by these men for that purpose. Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker can not shield themselves behind these private corporations which were organized for the purpose of plunder. Therefore, when the Contract and Finance Company voted the stock of the Central Pacific, it was the vote of the big four, as they, in fact, owned all the stock in these private corporations. When they contemplated a steal they generally put sufficient stock in the hands of one of these private companies to carry it through the board, and but few instances occur where the big four voted more than a few thousand shares of stock, as shown by the books of the company now in existence. When the capital stock was increased from $20,000,000 to $100,000,000, in 1868, the Contract and Finance Company voted 141,000 shares out of a total of 151,520 shares. Every one of these shares at that time belonged to the big four.

We also find that Stanford, in his testimony before the Pattison Commission (volume 5, page 2669), stated that the Contract and Finance Company distributed to them in stock $54,000,000, which was a net profit, subject only to an indebtedness of about $3,000,000.

This $54,000,000 of stock was divided in equal shares among the big four. The original stock in the Central Pacific was $8,500,000. In 1864 it was increased to $20,000,000. In 1868 it was again increased to $100,000,000. This increase of stock from $8,500,000 to $100,000,000 was voted by the holdings of the big four, and voted to themselves.

They then tried to force the original stockholders to exchange their stock, share for share, for the new stock. This the holders of the original stock refused to do, and all dividends were refused to these old stockholders unless they made the exchange. This led to suits being brought by Sam Brannon and others for an accounting. These suits were compromised by the big four paying from $400 to $1,000 per share for the original stock. (See evidence of Stanford, volume 5, page 2641; volume 6, pages 2775, 2779.) The evidence on which the successful prosecution of such suits would depend was contained in the books of the Contract and Finance Company, and rather than have these books produced in court, which would show up their rascalities, they paid these large amounts for the outstanding stock. You will also find in the evidence of Stanford (volume 5, pages 2655, 2666) that each of the big four, Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker, received $13,000,000 of the stock from the Central Pacific Company as his share of the profits of construction.

These suits alarmed the big four and they removed the contract and finance books from their office in Sacramento and destroyed them. Section 10 of the act of the Legislature of California, dated May 20, 1861, under which the Central Pacific was incorporated, provided that "the directors shall cause to be kept a book to be called Record of Corporation Debts," and in this book the secretary was required to record all contracts, etc. This book, if produced, ought to throw some light upon the construction of the road by the Contract and Finance Company. But, strange to say, there were many things recorded in this book that were of importance to the big four, and instead of destroying it, as they did the books of the Contract and Finance Company, they cut the leaves out from pages 48 to 111, inclusive.

If such methods of concealing their dishonesty is approved by this Congress, the people of the United States will place the responsibility where it belongs—upon the shoulders of a majority of this body. Another method they resorted to was to pass resolutions in the board of directors, by the votes of themselves, exonerating themselves from all rascalities and approving the actions of their president when he succeeded in making a steal of a few millions from the old company.

When the Pattison commission ran across one of these resolutions spread upon their minutes they were astounded at the bold attempt of these four big rascals to shield themselves and their private fortunes from the penalties of the law. As these releases have been studiously suppressed and kept from the public gaze, I will here produce one of them as a memorial of the unadulterated gall of the big four in their dealings with their creditors. It is as follows:

"Whereas the president of this company, Leland Stanford; the first vice-president of this company, Collis P. Huntington; the second vice-president of this company, Charles F. Crocker, and the treasurer of this company, Timothy Hopkins, have done various acts and things in the interest of and for the benefit of this company, and have made various payments of money for which vouchers have not been received from the parties to whom payments were made; and

"Whereas the nature of such acts and things, and the amount of such payments have been exhibited and fully made known and explained to us: Now, therefore,

"Resolved, That the stockholders of this company do hereby ratify and approve all such acts and doings and payments made by said persons, and do hereby expressly waive the production or filing of vouchers therefor; and the president or a vice-president and the secretary of this company be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to execute full and complete releases, under the seal of the company, to said Stanford, Huntington, Crocker, and Hopkins, and deliver the same to the respective parties; which releases shall be in substantially the following form, to wit:

"'Whereas Leland Stanford has been and is the president of this, the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and has, under and by virtue of the power and authority conferred upon him as such president, done certain acts and performed certain services for said company, both in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, and in the city of New York and elsewhere, and has collected and received certain moneys of the company, and has paid out and expended certain moneys for the uses and purposes and for the benefit of said company, and in its name, place, and stead, and on its behalf has made and indorsed its checks, notes, drafts, and bills of exchange, and has executed and delivered contracts, agreements, and instruments of various kinds, has borrowed money for said company, and has pledged and hypothecated stock, bonds, and other securities of the company as collateral for money borrowed, has made purchases for said company, has paid, laid out, and expended moneys for interest, freight, loans, insurance, commission, purchase, and for other obligations and purchases of said company, and has employed clerks, agents, counsel, attorneys, and others in and about the business of the company, in its service and for its benefit, and has paid salaries, wages, expenses, and compensation to persons so employed, and has compromised, settled, and adjusted claims due and owing to and by said company, and has done and performed various acts and things, and has attended to and managed generally the affairs and business of said company in the State of New York and in the State of California and elsewhere, and has, from time to time, rendered accounts and reported his acts and duties to said company, which said accounts and reports have been examined, audited, found correct, and approved by said company, about and of all of which this company has full advice and knowledge.

"'Now, therefore, the said Central Pacific Railroad Company, with a full knowledge of all of the facts and circumstances relating to said transactions, and each of them, in consideration of the premises and of the payments of moneys for the benefit of said company by the said Leland Stanford, and for and in consideration of the further sum of $1, lawful money of the United States of America, to it in hand paid by said Leland Stanford, hath ratified, confirmed, and adopted, and doth hereby ratify, confirm, and adopt all the acts and deeds of said Leland Stanford in the premises as its own acts and deeds, and hath remised, released, and forever discharged, and by these presents for itself and its successors doth remise, release, and forever discharge the said Leland Stanford, his heirs, executors, and administrators of and from all manner of action and actions, cause of action and causes of action, suits, debts, dues, reckonings, bonds, bills, specialties, covenants, contracts, controversies, agreements, promises, variances, trespasses, damages, judgments, executions, claims, and demands whatsoever, in law or in equity, which against him the said company ever had, now hath, or which it or its successors shall, can, or may have, for, upon, or by reason of any matter, acts, or things whatsoever done in and about the premises from the beginning of the world to the date of these presents, and particularly for all acts done by him as president of said company, or individually or otherwise.

"'In witness whereof the said Central Pacific Railroad Company hath caused these presents to be signed in its name by its first vice-president, and its corporate seal attested by its secretary to be hereunto affixed this 8th day of October, 1887.'"

These releases were passed periodically by the board of directors, after their president or other officers had been successful in one of their schemes to beat the Central Pacific out of a few million dollars. Their minutes will show that they passed one of these releases to Stanford, as president, on October 7, 1887, after he had let the contract to build the California and Oregon, from Delta to the State line, to his private company, the Pacific Improvement Company, whereby he paid $8,000,000 in stock of the Central Pacific, and $4,500,000 in the bonds of the Central Pacific, making in all $12,500,000, for work that cost but $3,505,609.

One would naturally suppose that, having built these branch lines with the earnings of the Central Pacific, they would be a part of that company's property. But it appears that the big four were not in the railroad business for their health, or for the accommodation of the people, or to increase the value of the Central Pacific debt to the Government, but for their own personal interests. They therefore, after using the earnings of the Central Pacific in constructing these branch lines in California, entered into leases with themselves, through their construction companies, whereby the Central Pacific paid to the big four, for rentals, $29,912,373.49.

By such a system of fraud and rascality they turned over to themselves all the earnings of the Central Pacific, and when this plan failed to absorb all the money in the treasury they usually appointed a committee to invest the surplus. For instance, at the Central Pacific meeting August 26, 1886, a committee was appointed to "loan or invest" the surplus, and at a meeting held September 30 following, the committee reported as follows:

"SAN FRANCISCO, September 30, 1886.

"To the Board of Directors, Central Pacific Railroad Company:

"GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned committee, appointed for the purpose of investigating the money in the sinking funds of this company, respectfully report as follows: No suitable investment presenting itself at present, we have, pursuant to the resolution of your board, dated August 26, 1886, loaned the amount in the sinking fund, namely, $2,032,410.23, to the Pacific Improvement Company on thirty days' call at 3 per cent.

"Yours, respectfully,

"TIMOTHY HOPKINS.
"C. F. CROCKER.
"W. V. HUNTINGTON."

You should always remember that the "Pacific Improvement Company" was organized and owned by Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker, as was also the "Contract and Finance Company" and others. These companies were organized for the purpose of receiving the earnings of the Central Pacific and distributing them to the big four. Usually the earnings are passed over to these private corporations on account of "leases," "constructions," "repairs," etc., and then distributed to the big four. This $3,032,400 was afterwards turned over to Stanford, Huntington & Co., in exchange for fifty-year bonds. If you will read the evidence in the examination made by the Pattison commission, you will find that Stanford & Co., as directors of the Central Pacific, loaned to the "Contract and Finance Company" $5,700,000, which was never returned to the Central Pacific.

Now, I have shown the necessity of these thieving corporations, in the distribution of the earnings of the Central Pacific. To credit Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker direct with the enormous profits they receive from the roads they operate would be stating the truth so the people could understand it, so they resort to these construction companies to cover up their rascalities.

The Pattison commission, after stating many of the facts in regard to the contracts, leases, etc., made by the big four to themselves, sums up their rascalities as follows, on page 84 of report:

"In general, it may be said to be established by the evidence that all the construction contracts, and all the important contracts for materials and supplies, were made between the Central Pacific Railroad Company and companies controlled by Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker. These four persons determined the terms of all these contracts, and the result has been that through the payments made by the Central Pacific Railroad Company they have received as profits a vast amount of stocks and bonds. Those resulting from the construction contracts above stated represent over $100,000,000 in stocks and over $5,000,000 in bonds.

"It appears from the books of the company that from the very inception of the enterprise down to the present time it has been the constant practice of the directors of this company to permit the expenditures of very large sums of money without requiring any sufficient vouchers disclosing the purposes to which they were applied. A detailed list of these insufficient vouchers will be found in Exhibit W, attached to Stevens's report, volume 8. These insufficient vouchers aggregate $4,818,355.67."

Soon after the Pattison commission was appointed by President Cleveland these rascals undertook to prepare their books as well as they could to meet this investigation. They knew that the books of "S., H., H. & C.," that is, Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker, showed standing to their credit over $35,300,000, and this immense sum would not look well standing to the credit of these paupers when Pattison cast his eye over the figures, so something had to be done before the commission arrived in California. I will here insert a letter from Huntington to E. H. Miller, jr., asking him to doctor up these books so that they would not show such an immense sum standing to the credit of the big four. Miller, who was so handy with the "contract and finance" books, shows Huntington how easy it can be done and proceeds to outline his plan in his reply to Huntington.

Here are both letters, and after reading them you will again see the importance to these rascals of their private corporations:

"NEW YORK, January 10, 1887.

"FRIEND MILLER: As you probably know, the account known as 'S., H., H. & C.' shows exceedingly large figures, which we propose now to cut down, since there are no assets to represent any such figures as these, which seem to show large amounts to be distributed. I do not understand this account myself, do not know much about it in fact, and Mr. Crocker does not know any more. I know it is asking considerable, but I would like to have you look over these accounts, assets, and everything connected therewith, so as to verify them, and then send me a statement. I have great confidence, as you know, in William E. Brown; but all men are liable to mistakes, and I would like to have you take this matter up and attend to it, as we propose to charge off to profit and loss enough to bring the figures down to the actual assets on hand. It is possible Willard can help you in this matter, if you call on him to do so. Mr. Brown will, of course, do all he can.

"Yours, very truly,

"C. P. HUNTINGTON."

"SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., January 25, 1887.

"DEAR SIR: Yours of the 10th instant duly received. I have looked into the matter of the very large balances to the credit of the individual accounts of Leland Stanford, C. P. Huntington, Charles Crocker, and estate of Mark Hopkins on the books of S., H., H. & C., amounting to over $35,300,000. These large balances arise from the following causes:

"As appears by the books, there has been distributed or divided at various times sundry properties, which have been currently charged to dividend account, amounting to $9,250,520.21; and various collections have been credited to same account, for dividends and interest received on stocks, etc., amounting to $655,535.53—the debt balance being $8,594,986.68. Among the items charged to dividend account the larger ones are: In June, 1877, 'S. P. bonds, divided,' $2,880,000; in 1878, Oakland water-front stock, divided, $474,601.37; Central Pacific Railroad Company stock (E. B. C.), $5,192,550.

"Since 1875 interest accounts have been made up yearly in favor of and amounts credited to the personal accounts of Leland Stanford, C. P. Huntington, Charles Crocker, Mark Hopkins, and estate of Mark Hopkins, and charged to 'interest account,' amounting in the aggregate, in round numbers, to $20,000,000. This was all right and proper, because the amount of capital contributed by each was unequal; and by making up interest on the full amount of credit balance of each from time to time each got in effect a credit to which he was entitled for interest on the excess he had in the company. This matter of equalizing the interest, however, led to the very large amount of debit which now appears in 'interest account.' This debit represents no assets, it being really a company loss, and might have been legitimately charged to profit and loss.

"Besides these large items of interest credited to the individuals, 'S., H., H., & C.,' above, there were large items of interest, both received and paid, leaving the balance of debit in interest account	$30,826,789.49
"There also appears on the books a debit balance to profit and loss account of	1,187,215.33
"The main item to credit of this account is balance transferred from Contract and Finance Company	2,608,292.20
A few of the larger items to debit of same account are:
"Transfer Market Street Railroad	2121893.01
"Ione property stock issued and divided	229,065.60
"Rolling stock furnished S. P. R. R. for account of C. & F. Co	236,681.92
"Estate of E. B. Crocker, amount of note given to E. B. Crocker, March 24, 1871, by Stanford, Huntington, and Hopkins	1,298,140.00
"Amount due on contract of S. P. R. R. Co. for rolling stock not furnished	548,435.20

"There are many other entries. The above are stated merely to give you some idea of the account.

"Now, these items to debit of dividend account, say $8,594,986.68; interest account, say $20,826,789.49; profit and loss, say $1,187,215.33, amounting in aggregate to $30,608,991.50, are properly and legitimately chargeable to the individual accounts of the parties 'S., H., H., & C.' in equal amounts, one-fourth each.

"This would reduce the amounts now standing to their credits, as follows:

"Present credits aggregate in round numbers, say	$35,300,000.00
"Charges as above	30,600,000.00
"Leaves to their credit	4,700,000.00

"Something like the amount of their actual assets. In the above are stated the amounts as they appear for December 31, 1885, the accounts of 'S., H., H., & C.' are, as you are aware, inactive, and Mr. Brown has not yet posted them up for 1886, but will do so as soon as your statements for December, 1886, are to hand.

"The interest accounts for Leland Stanford, C. P. Huntington, etc., for 1886, will, when made up and credited, of course, vary the amounts of their accounts; but you will, I think, be able to get from the above sufficient general facts to enable you to understand how it comes that such large amounts appear to credit of L. S., C. P. H., C. C., and estate of M. H., while the assets are so much less.

"Mr. Hopkins makes a suggestion to Mr. Brown, in which Mr. Brown concurs, and which I think would be well to carry out—that is, that since 'S., H., H., & C.' are now the only parties in interest in the Pacific Improvement Company, that the books of 'S., H., H., & C.' be written up, the accounts of dividend, interest, profit and loss, etc., be charged off as suggested, and the books balanced and turned over with the balances and assets to the P. I. Co.; the P. I. Co. to transfer the balances of 'S., H., H., & C.' books to the P. I. Co. books, and thus have only one set of books for the accounts of the parties, 'S., H., H., & C.' Trusting the above will be satisfactory,

"I am, yours, very truly,

"E. H. MILLER, JR."

"C. P. HUNTINGTON, Esq.,
"Vice-President, New York."

Mr. Chairman, you should not forget that this immense sum paid out for interest was paid to the big four, and not to the Government or the stockholders. When the Thurman act was passed, setting aside a certain per cent of the earnings of the Central Pacific to be applied on the debt they owed the Government, they tried to beat it in the courts, but failing in that suit, they deliberately set about to defeat the object of that act by fraud. To this end they incorporated the "Southern Pacific Railroad of Kentucky." They claimed, by incorporating under the laws of Kentucky, they could prevent the Government from inquiring into the management of the Central Pacific and branch lines by leasing them to this Kentucky pirate, and to fully carry out this infamous scheme they appointed two dummies president and secretary of this Kentucky abortion (W. E. Brown as president, and E. H. Nash, secretary), who entered into a lease of the Central Pacific for ninety-nine years, with Stanford and E. H. Miller, the president and secretary of the Central Pacific Company.

After securing the lease, these two dummies resigned, and Stanford and Miller were elected to fill their places. Then the wrecking of the Central Pacific commenced. They claimed that the Central Pacific had a floating debt of $12,873,945.61, which they assumed, and the remarking of the rolling stock, and the sale of the immense supplies of the Central Pacific were turned over to this Kentucky bandit to pay this assumed debt, and as this was the transfer of property upon which the Government held a lien, it was to that extent no better than highway robbery. The big four fixed the price at which this Government property was turned over to themselves, and from the character of their other transactions it is safe to say that they made millions by this transfer. Thus the parent company which had furnished all the capital to build up this bastard offspring was finally swallowed up.

Stanford, in his report of these transactions, touches the subject very gingerly This is what he says:

"On January 1, 1885, just prior to the lease to the Southern Pacific Company, there was a net floating debt of $12,873,945,61. This has been reduced each year, till, on December 31, 1887, the floating debt was wiped out and there remained a surplus of $1,970,194.65. The result has been chiefly accomplished by the sale of supplies and materials on hand to the Southern Pacific Company at the commencement of the lease, by the nonpayment of dividends for the period, and by the issue of bonds.

I may as well give the people some light upon this Kentucky pirate which assumes the prerogative of robbing the people of California, as well as the Government, of their just rights. It was incorporated by the Legislature of Kentucky March 12, 1884. The incorporators were Henry D. McHenry, William G. Duncan, Samuel E. Hill, Samuel M. Cox, and Henry McHenry, jr., who were dummies of Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker, and who assigned the franchise of the big four.

That act forbids the company doing business in the State of Kentucky, but gives it a license to prey upon all the rest of the world. Its capital stock is $1,000,000, with the privilege of increasing it to any amount deemed necessary for the transaction of its business; but in no event are the stockholders responsible for more than $1,000,000. After the big four possessed themselves of this franchise they increased the capital stock to $100,000,000, and later on they increased it again to the amount of $150,000,000. Thus the great State of Kentucky has sent out this pirate corporation with a commission to rob all the world whenever it pleases, using a capital of $149,000,000 free from any liability to stockholders, making only one exception—they must not enter the sacred territory of blue grass, fine horses, and whisky. Kentucky must be exempt from their operations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert here a few tables compiled by the Pattison Commission, showing the total amount of aid received by these bond-aided railroads, the earnings which have found their way into the pockets of the managers, and the principal and interest paid and to be paid by the Government at the maturity of the bonds, and the methods pursued by these companies.

OVER $25,000,000 FOR POOLS, REBATES, AND OVERCHARGES.

In addition to the gross earnings given as above, the bond-aided companies received the following sums, which they subsequently paid out on account of pools, subsidies, rebates, overcharges, etc.:

Pools, rebates, and overcharges.

Road.	Pools.	Rebates and overcharges.	Total.
Union Pacific Kansas Pacific	$4,005,512.48	$11,577,091.62	$15,581,604.10
Sioux City and Pacific			491,882.01
Central Pacific			9,882,799.61
Total			25,966,235.72

"Had the Pacific railroads been built and managed upon honest methods, had the Government loan been properly applied, these companies, regarded as a whole, could have declared dividends at the rate of 6 per cent per annum for eighteen years, from the date of actual completion to the present time, upon all the moneys that they would have been required to pay in to complete and equip the roads. They would have owned 2,495 miles of road free from all debt and worth $124,600,000, upon an original outlay of less than $35,490,381.44. Three of them, the Union Pacific, Central Pacific, and Central Branch, could have repaid every cent of the principal and interest advanced by the Government to date, and could have reduced their charges to shippers to the extent of over $140,000,000, or nearly $8,000,000 per year.

"For $1 the stockholders would have realized $1.07 in dividends in eighteen years and $1.11 in land sales. The property would have been free from debt, and for every dollar that they had invested the stockholders would have had in property over $4; so that in eighteen years each dollar would have yielded $5.18.

"But they chose dishonest methods. At the outset they divided $172,347,115 of fictitious capital, they dissipated over $107,000,000 which should have been applied to the payment of the principal and interest of the Government debt, and they taxed shippers to the extent of over $140,000,000, or nearly $8,000,000 a year, to pay for the inflation of the capital of these companies and for the vicious practices that crept into their management.

Method actually pursued.

I have treated these bond-aided roads as a whole, because if the policy of extending the time for the payment of their debts is adopted by Congress, they will all claim the same rights, and Congress can not with justice apply one plan for settlement with the Union Pacific and another plan for the Central Pacific. We must either extend all their debts or call them all to a settlement.

The Central Pacific, fearing justice will be done them for their many rascalities, and that they will be called upon to settle with creditors in the near future, have filed a lot of claims against the Government, which they dub "equities." I propose to briefly look into these "equities" and see what merit they have. Here is the first one (page 91, Pattison report):

1. The loss and interest thereon which the company sustained by being forced to sell the bonds received by it from the Government at a discount:

Loss	$7,120,073.55
Interest to maturity	12,816,132.39
	19,936,205.94

Here they claim $19,936,205.94 for loss on the sale of the bonds which the Government loaned them. If they sold these bonds at a discount nobody is responsible for that act but themselves; the Government has paid interest upon them since they were issued, and at maturity will have to pay their full face value, and it makes no difference to the Government whether they were discounted $7,000,000 or $40,000,000.

These men might as well put in a claim for $40,000,000 as any other sum, because they used them for the payment to themselves for constructing the road, and the "contract and finance committee" divided the surplus between the big four. But the cheek of these bandits in claiming $12,816,132.39 for interest upon this discount is equal to that of a Government mule.

The second "equity" is worse still.

"2. The amount which the Government saved in its transportation on the Central and Union Pacific line between the completion of the road in May, 1869, and time when it might have been completed under the contract, i. e., July 1, 1876, $47,763,178. This company's proportion, say 46 per cent, $21,971,-062."

Here they claim $47,763,178 for completing their roads seven years too soon. They had the use of the roads for seven years without any competing line, and charged what they pleased for transportation of freights and passengers, and on many parts of their roads fare was as high as 10 cents per mile. They received their bonds in payment for building the roads in 1869, and divided the earnings of these seven years which amounted to over $35,000,000, and yet they come here with a claim for $47,763,178 against the Government which is based upon the difference of transportation between the old ox team and their railroad. A set of men who would trump up such a claim after receiving such magnificent donations from the Government should not be permitted to operate these roads a day longer than the time when the Government can seize them for its debt.

These same men were so contemptible as to swear that their roads were completed in 1869, in order to draw their bonds, and they now set up this claim to beat the Government out of this large sum, as well as to avoid payment of the 5 per cent net earnings for this period of seven years.

Here is another "equity," which is absolutely false:

"4. The amount of loss which the company has directly sustained by reason of the refusal of the Government to grant the company patents for its lands as rapidly as called for, say $500,000."

They claim here $500,000 damages on account of the Government refusing to patent their lands.

Their land holdings when the Pattison Commission reported were valued at $26,504,270, and they absolutely refused to patent an acre until it was sold and paid for, in order to avoid paying taxes upon this immense property.

The State of Nebraska passed laws to compel them to take out patents for their lands, and they resisted them in the courts and defeated the law. There have been two bills introduced in this Congress upon this question, one by myself, to compel them to patent their land within one year or forfeit it to the Government, and the other by Mr. MAGUIRE, to refuse any patent until their debts are paid to the Government. Either of these bills will soon settle the ownership of these lands.

I give one more specimen of these "equities:"

"6. Loss by diversion of business from Central and Union Pacific to other subsidized roads, $37,000,000; Central Pacific's proportion of which, 46 per cent, is, say, $17,000,000."

Here they claim $37,000,000 for diversion of trade from the Union and Central Pacific. They set up a claim to all the territory between the Mexican border on the south and British Columbia on the north, and charge the United States $37,000,000 for permitting any other railroad to be constructed across the continent.

I can not use language strong enough to express my contempt for these men and their "equities." They have shown such a disregard for all decency in setting up these fraudulent claims that Uncle Sam should demand an immediate divorce from them. Our answer to these "multimillionaire paupers" should be, "Pay your debts or retire from business."

These great corporations have interfered with our elections in many States for the last quarter of a century. In my State they wielded such powerful influence that no man dared denounce them or expose their villainies if he expected to be elected to Congress.

Our railroad commissioners are generally believed to take their orders from "Fourth and Townsend streets," and when the people appear before them and demand relief from excessive rates of fares and freights they pop up like Macbeth witches and exclaim, "Say, if thou'dst rather hear it from our mouths or from our master's?" and then—

"The weird sisters, hand in hand,
Posters of the sea and land,
Thus do go about, about;
Thrice to thine, and thrice to mine,
And thrice again, to make up nine
Peace!—the charm's wound up."

And you get your orders from the great octopus.

I stand here in defense of the great State of California and her brave pioneers, who have been robbed for thirty years by this corporation, and demand that it retire from business and loose the fetters which have held us in their grasp for more than a generation.

I know that the power of this great corporation, which has not inaptly been compared to that of the devil-fish, has extended its influence in almost every direction. I know that the clank of its golden fetters has been heard along the corridors of the Capitol, and upon this floor in times gone by. I know the mildew of its corrupting influence has crept over the desks of those who should have defended the people. I know that its gilded finger of menace has been raised to stifle voices that should have been heard in defense of the people in all our great political conventions.

But, as yet, I believe its ministering messengers of corruption have had no influence upon the members of this House.

Although we may daily see its agents in the lobby and upon the floor of the House, and its officers appearing before our committees, yet I am pursuaded that they have not swerved a single member of the House or the committee from the duty they owe to the State. So long as this is so, we are safe; but should the time come again when these cormorants shall invade the halls of legislation, as they have heretofore, then the time for revolution has arrived and the days of government by law will be numbered, for the people of this country to-day are not in a humor to be trifled with longer upon this subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I suggest the following line of action by Congress: Foreclosure of the Government lien; take the management out of the hands of these corrupt and dishonest men who have wrecked the Central Pacific; bring suit to restore to the Central Pacific the leases of the branch lines, including the Southern Pacific, that it held in 1885, when, through fraud, they were turned over to the Southern Pacific of Kentucky. Push these suits against all estates and individuals to whom any portion of said assets and property can be traced, without fear, favor, or affection.

The Central Pacific, in the hands of the Government, with all the branch lines in California under its control, is a magnificent property, and in a few years will be able to command such a price on the market that the debt would be secured. The Government could then sell or lease the road, should it find ownership embarrassing.

Some of my friends from the South bitterly oppose Government ownership, claiming that it would inject a corrupting influence into the administration of the state. But their fears are groundless, for to-day the Government has control of 152 railroads, and is managing them through its courts without corrupting the administration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I will group the incomes from all sources of these bandits, so as to show their rascalities at a glance:

Profits upon construction	$251,881,057
Net earnings	338,023,357
Aid from all sources	247,939,220
Rebates	25,886,235
Leases:
Union Pacific	38,800,000
Central Pacific	29,912,373
Grand total	932,422,244

And yet these paupers come before Congress and ask an extension of time for fifty years to continue their rascalities, and expect us to leave the management of these great public highways of commerce in their hands for another half a century. Will you do it? This question must be answered by your action.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, the question presented is a very simple one. Shall we do the Government work as we do our own? The Southern Pacific Company sprung into existence under circumstances which tend to show that it was organized for the purpose of defrauding the Government. It never built a foot of road, but acquired by lease the Central Pacific and Southern Pacific Railroads on terms which suggest bad faith, and the effect of its conduct has been to cheat the United States. If, as is believed by those who are in a position to know, it was organized for a fraudulent purpose, those who incorporated it can not be innocent parties unless there is such a thing as a bona fide swindler.

But let us suppose, for the sake of the argument, that it was organized for an honest purpose, and that some of its stockholders are innocent of any wrongdoing, shall we allow them to shield the guilty parties? The Central Pacific will be in default next year in the sum of nearly $80,000,000. We know that it is insolvent and does not intend to pay. We also know that the road was wrecked by Messrs. Stanford, Hopkins, Huntington, and Crocker, and many millions of money fraudulently diverted from the road to their private use. The Government is trying to recover this enormous sum of money from them or their estates. It is also known that these four men or their estates own a large part of the stock of this Southern Pacific Company.

Mr. MAGUIRE. All.

Mr. BRYAN. It is said all. There can be no doubt that at least a large part of the stock of the Southern Pacific Company is owned by them. Shall we pay this sum of $1,800,000 to the Southern Pacific Company and let more than half, if not all of it, go to the same parties who will next year default to the amount of nearly $80,000,000 to the United States? What individual would deal that way with a debtor if he could avoid it?

If we make this appropriation the money is gone and we can not get it back; but if we refuse to make the appropriation we will yet have a chance to adjust the equities. No innocent party will suffer. We can find out how much would go to the Government debtors, and secure that, giving to innocent stockholders the share due them. If we make the appropriation the Government will lose all, and but little will go to innocent stockholders, if such there be. If we withhold the money we can save all but that due to innocent holders.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think the contention in favor of this amendment is made to turn upon the fact that a judgment has been obtained in favor of the Southern Pacific Company and against the Government, a judgment in a court of law. That I understand to be the ground occupied by my friend from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] in favor of this amendment.

Well, a court of equity will relieve against the rigorous action of a common law judgment. This is a common law judgment. I take it that the Government, the Congress of the United States, which is dealing with trust funds—for all the moneys in the Treasury are substantially trust funds—will exercise, when it comes to voting away the public moneys, as broad an equity at least as would be exercised by a chancellor.

I do not see, for instance, why one of the nine justices of the Supreme Court of the United States should be authorized to grant a writ of injunction restraining the collection of a part of a judgment at law, while at the same time the Congress of the United States, representing the people, whose court this is, and representing the Public Treasury, can not upon an equitable showing interpose an equitable injunction by setting off an equitable defense. It comes then, in my mind, to this question, whether any part of this judgment ought to be restrained.

It is traversing ground again which has been pretty well trodden to speak of the organization of these companies. The gentleman from California [Mr. CANNON] has told the local story very well; and I understand it to be the story which most nearly affects the real merits of the case. The people of California know all of the changes back and forward which have taken place in and among these railroad companies, which run from Ogden to San Francisco and from San Diego back to New Orleans, having their lateral lines leased, and covering the whole country, until now, first under one name and then under another, all the land for twenty years has been made to pay tribute to one company or corporation under different names, but really having the same common treasury.

Now then, the Southern Pacific Company was organized in Kentucky in 1885. It consolidated with it or leased in 1885 the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and four other railroad companies. They were all Government aided roads, either by land grants or by Government bonds, and the Southern Pacific Company, organized as it was, took possession of the five proprietary lines. It also leased shortly thereafter the Central Pacific Railroad as well as other lines.

At the time that the lease of the Central Pacific road was made it was indebted to the Government in a very great sum for interest due on bonds guaranteed by the Government, and owing to the failure of the railroad company to pay the interest from year to year that indebtedness has continued to increase until the present time, and now amounts, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to $32,811,803.24. To meet this it has accumulated a total sinking fund of $5,574,823.94.

The lease made by the Southern Pacific of the Central Pacific roads provided that the Southern Pacific should take possession of the Central Pacific property and all of its assets; that it should have entire charge of the Central Pacific, and that after operating the road it should pay back to the Central Pacific all the net surplus income earned the Central Pacific above annual charges of every sort and betterments. It guaranteed this net surplus income should be not less than $1,360,000 yearly.

Subsequent arrangements were made by which the land-grant bonds of the Central Pacific Road were extended for ten years, from October 1, 1890, to October 1, 1900, and were guaranteed by the Southern Pacific Company. It will thus be seen that the Southern Pacific Company had become in equity the owner charged with certain payments of everything but the mere franchise of being of the Central Pacific Road. It received, in other words, all the assets of the leased line of every description, and it is a familiar principle of law that where an entire assignment of such property is made to another corporation than the one incorporated by the State the corporation to which the assignments have been made becomes liable for the debts of the corporation absorbed. In other words, equity will not permit a transaction by which the total assets of a debtor corporation can be taken charge of by another corporation, thereby stripping the original creditors of all their rights.

Now, then, this indebtedness of the Central Pacific to the Government has not yet matured and will not mature until some months later. But in the meantime that indebtedness has constantly increased. The Central Pacific is substantially stripped of its existence. It is under the management of the Southern Pacific Company; and the Southern Pacific Company has so managed its lines, which are parallel and competing, as to greatly decrease the earnings of the Central Pacific, and thus diminish the chances of the Government to make good its claim.

The judgment in question and by which the amendment under discussion was framed is a judgment for services for the transportation of troops and the carrying of the mail, I think, from April, 1885, to 1889, and the suit was begun thereafter, probably in 1889. It seems to me under these circumstances, when it further appears as inevitable that the Central Pacific Railroad will absolutely fail to pay anything that is now due the Government, that its lessee and virtual owner should submit to allow the claim that it has reduced to judgment to be offset by the very greatly larger and older claims of the Government. Therefore I shall vote to strike out the amendment proposed by the Senate.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield nine minutes to the gentleman from California.

[Mr. MAGUIRE withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. MAGUIRE. I ask consent to extend my remarks.

Mr. SAYERS. I will ask that such permission be given to all gentlemen who have spoken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COOMBS). And to all gentlemen who will speak?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there is no objection, that leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, the question presented here is as to the propriety of appropriating for the payment of this judgment in favor of the Southern Pacific corporation as it now stands.

The evidence before the hostile commission, which has been continually cited against these roads, was to the effect that there were about forty separate corporations and great expense and confusion in their operation; and this Kentucky organization was created for the express purpose of leasing them, and managing them, as owner, or trustee, or lessee, in a more economical manner, and not in any way—and I call your particular attention to this—not in any way to the disadvantage of the Government of the United States or to the impairment of its securities upon the Central Pacific Railroad system.

That same commission finds—and I would like the attention of the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] to this fact, as he is familiar with the findings, which he so studiously ignores, of that commission, and yet which he cites with evident relish when he can against the roads—on page 115 of this hostile report they say:

> The fact that both the Southern Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroads are under one control jeopardizes the business of the bond-aided road and places it in the power of the Southern Pacific Company, if at any time it should cease to have an important interest in the Central Pacific Railroad, to divert a very large portion of its traffic.

It gives that power if they choose to exercise it and claim to have no interest in the Central Pacific. But they go on to say:

A considerable portion of the through transcontinental traffic has in fact passed over the Southern route during the past three years. This diversion is the natural consequence of the establishment of this route and of its superior advantages and more rapid and regular carriage and delivery of freight. The interest of the promoters and directors of this enterprise has led them to compete for this business, and they have succeeded in securing the greater part of the through transcontinental business. No evidence has been presented to the commission which establishes that the object of such diversion was to decrease the percentage of net earnings due to the United States.

And again they say earlier on the same page:

In the judgment of the commission the controlling motive which has led to this alteration in the transit of freight has been the question of convenience and public advantage. It has not arisen from an intention to reduce the net earnings applicable to the percentage due to the United States. In the report of the Postmaster-General it is stated that the same diversion is practiced by his Department and that he selects the best and quickest routes because he thereby promotes public convenience.

How, then, if the Government itself discriminates against its debtor, can it be expected to pay from its earnings, and how are other roads to blame if they act from the same motive that actuates the Government itself; or must the country go without new roads in order that everything may be forced over the original line?

Five other competing roads have been built across the United States which have taken away necessarily the earnings of this road; and the Southern Pacific was built on purpose, as all know, by the Central Pacific managers in the interest of the Central Pacific Road and to prevent the construction of the Tom Scott road from Easton, Tex., to San Diego, which would have been a competing line absolutely destructive of the interest of the Government in the whole Central and Union Pacific system.

Mr. DENSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question just at this point?

Mr. BLAIR. I have but a very few moments and can not yield to the gentleman.

I say that the construction of these several competing lines undoubtedly diminished the carriage and the earning power of the Central Pacific. The Government has allowed the establishment of five other great American lines, all in competition with the Central Pacific road, in the interest of the people at large; and to-day we are supporting the Canadian Pacific road, which like a gigantic syphon taps and drains the great Western country and affords still another and all-important transcontinental line for shipments from the whole Pacific coast, and in fact, from the vast orient, through Canada to the Atlantic, and constituting in the interest of shippers a most destructive competition to all the great central lines of American transportation.

Mr. DENSON. If the gentleman will permit me, I understand the Southern Pacific road is insolvent—not all now or prospectively if we pay it our debts, but I suppose the gentleman means to say the Central Pacific.

Mr. BLAIR. This road is insolvent precisely in the same sense that you might say the United States is insolvent, because it would be unable, if called upon, to pay the entire national debt in money at once. It must have time when its debt becomes due. It is not yet due, and the company is in no default.

Mr. DENSON. I understand the road is insolvent, and it is a fact that a judgment has been rendered in its favor against the United States——

Mr. BLAIR. It is not insolvent; I deny that. Besides, there are sixteen millions of sinking fund and other accumulations which will pay its installments of coming indebtedness for several years.

Mr. DENSON. Let me complete my sentence. A judgment has been rendered against the United States and in favor of the road. Now, is there not ground for equity in the claim that we should withhold the payment of that judgment, and file a bill of injunction on the ground that this is an insolvent debtor, against which the United States has an equitable claim which is more than an offset?

Mr. BLAIR. The judgment for $1,800,000 is in favor of the Southern Pacific Company. The same plea has been set up during the course of this debate and heretofore most persistently and against the fact, for the purpose of defeating the just claim of another and distinct corporation against the Government. It is insisted that these two corporations are identical, when it is proved over and over again that they are not.

That is not in any sense of the word true. They are separate in every detail. They are separate in law, and separate, largely, in the stockholders composing them, and the bondholders of both live all over the world. In law and equity we have before us the fact that there is a judgment here in favor of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against the Government of the United States. It is sought to defeat that obligation in one direction by interposing a claim in another. Paul is robbing Peter in order to get what Barnabas will owe him in a few years from now, provided it is not paid. The Southern Pacific Road, it must be remembered, was built with its own bonds, sold in the markets of the world; and the stock of the Southern Pacific Railroad, or a large part of it, was disposed of in the same way.

Not a dollar of the money of the United States went into the construction of the Southern Pacific road or roads. They were built exclusively without Government aid, except a land grant of small value in California.

The finding of this same hostile commission, to which reference has already been made, takes up the objections that have been made here in this discussion and disproves them.

As I undertook to reply to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HUDSON] when I was cut off before completing the answer in regard to the wealth of the individuals—public benefactors they have been, sir, and will be so recognized when they have been dead long enough for the bitterness of contemporaneous strife to pass away and the common faults of our disjointed times to be forgotten—who have been subjected to great prejudice because of the accumulation of wealth from these roads, let me add that they were at the termination of the construction of the Central Pacific road absolutely poverty-stricken, and the stock, which was substantially all they had left, was itself of little value at the time and wholly unmarketable. Four years afterwards, however, it began paying dividends, and was then put on the market, and they made the money; hence came the gigantic fortunes and accumulations which have been so much commented upon during the course of this discussion.

In fact I will say further, in reply to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HUDSON], I do not believe that any of these gentlemen ever had the colossal fortunes which they are popularly supposed to have possessed. While he was in the Senate I often heard Senator Stanford's wealth estimated at from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000—yet his estate is less than twenty millions, as I remember the inventory; that of Mr. Crocker is about the same sum, while that of Mark Hopkins was, I think, not over $30,000,000. Mr. Huntington is still alive, but I guess if our California friends have their way of him he will wish that he had died the first of any of them. But this great nation will be just in the end. Let that either comfort or terrify us all.

Mr. GEAR. I shall hardly take the time allotted to me by the kindness of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. It seems to me that this claim involves a simple question of business. The Southern Pacific has rendered the service claimed for it. It has not been paid. It went into the Court of Claims, the Government contesting the claim, and the Court of Claims gave a judgment. That judgment was appealed from by the Government to the highest court of arbitrament in the United States, the Supreme Court. They in turn have affirmed the judgment. That judgment, as I understand, is bearing 4 per cent interest, and it is honestly due. Wherefore, then, should we not pay it?

I do not understand the arguments of the gentlemen on the other side of this question. I can, perhaps, understand the argument of the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE], who, I understand, is to be the nominee of the Democratic party in that State, who is making a speech here adverse to this honest, just debt, and making that speech for campaign purposes. That is the view he takes, it seems to me.

Gentlemen on the other side allude to the fact that the Fifty-first Congress paid some French spoliation claims. Does anybody doubt the justice of the French spoliation claims? The Government received the money nearly a hundred years ago, in the settlement of the purchase of part of this country. The claims were justly audited. That class of claims frequently meet with defeat at the hands of Congress. No doubt Congress has the power to deny the payment of this claim. But it is a power that no honest individual would apply to his everyday, ordinary transactions of business.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the payment of this claim, believing that when the courts of my country have decided a case, after the Government has had its day in court, that there is nothing else to do except to pay the debt found to be due. I shall vote for the honest payment of the Government's debt, particularly when there is the supplemental fact that from the date of that judgment, as rendered, the Government itself has recognized the validity of the judgment by paying quarterly the amount accrued for carrying the mails, the transportation of munitions, supplies, etc.

A good deal has been said about the ownership of this road, that three or four men who controlled and built the Central Pacific Railroad, which was built under the stress of a great political necessity, using the word in its broad sense, have an interest in this enterprise. It may be true that they have. I do not know whether they have or not; but I do know that it is in evidence that there are thousands and multiplied thousands of people in this country who equally have an interest, who paid over their hard-earned money in the construction of this road, to whom the payment of this debt is but a simple act of justice, which should not be denied.

I yield back to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the remainder of my time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are twenty minutes remaining on each side.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I crave the attention of the House for the short time that I shall address it upon this subject. I understand the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS[is to close debate. Gentlemen who have not familiarized themselves with the facts in this case are very apt to become confused; whereas a careful, candid statement of the facts enables us to get the exact condition. If this amendment of the Senate is adopted it ought to be because it is right. If it is rejected it ought to be because it is right to reject it. I have no further interest in it one way or the other, except to see the right done. Knowing as I do the candid mind of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], I crave his attention while I refer to the facts in this case; and if I state anything that is not the truth, and he knows what the facts are, I will take it as a favor if he will stop me right at the point that I misstate.

The Central Pacific Railroad was constructed across the continent when it was doubtful whether any road could be built. It was built across the desert and over and through the mountains. Land and bonds were granted to aid in the construction. The acts of Congress under which this Central Pacific Railroad was constructed are two, passed in 1862 and in 1864, and then, under the power of amendment, we passed the Thurman act in 1878.

By these acts this is the condition that all the earnings for the carrying of troops and mails on the Central Pacific Railroad for the Government go, one-half to pay the interest on those bonds that we loaned them, and the other half into the sinking fund.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Will my colleague allow me?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would rather not. I am now stating the facts. I say that constitutes the contract, and every dollar of such earnings upon the Central Pacific Railroad goes for that purpose. Under the Thurman act we provided further that 25 per cent of the net earnings of the Central Pacific Railroad should go into a sinking fund to liquidate these bonds.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Will my colleague allow me to ask him how much has been accumulated or paid under that provision by the Central Pacific road?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Every dollar that the law provides.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. How much?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not recollect the exact amount.

Mr. BLAIR. Over $16,000,000.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. From sixteen to twenty million dollars. Every dollar provided to be paid under these three acts of Congress, including the Thurman act, has been paid by the Central Pacific Railroad. It never has been in default for a minute. It is about 900 miles long, built through the desert and over the mountains, and through the mountains very often, perhaps with the highest grades of any railroad on earth. Now, after this road was completed population increased in California, Arizona, and New Mexico. California wanted more roads. So did New Mexico, Arizona, and Texas.

The Southern Pacific Railroad of California was incorporated entirely distinct from the Central Pacific Railroad in California, issued its stock, and sold its bonds. I will tell the amount directly.

Mr. SAYERS. Which built what railroad?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The Southern Pacific of California. There was the Southern Pacific of California, of Arizona, of New Mexico, and the Texas and Pacific, and the Louisiana road. They sold the bonds and issued the stock. They sold the bonds all over the world to build the Southern Pacific Railroad of California. When they got to Arizona that was another enterprise, another extension of the same road, with a community of interests; but incorporated under that law.

There were the Southern Pacific of Arizona and the Southern Pacific of New Mexico, and the Texas Pacific; I think that was the name of the Pacific road, each road in the respective States or Territories issuing their stock and selling their bonds, which are unpaid to-day, with which they meant to construct these roads. And I assert here and now, and the record shows that not one dollar or one cent of the earnings or property of the Central Pacific Railroad ever went into the construction of those roads.

Why, gentlemen, here is the official report, the Interstate Commerce Report of 1891, in which this matter is set out. And I took the pains to make a table, which any gentleman can verify from the report before me. What does it show? Southern Pacific of California has $65,000,000 of stock, $47,000,000 of bonds, at 6 per cent interest, owned all over the world. The proceeds was to and did construct that road from San Francisco down to Los Angeles, etc. The Southern Pacific of Arizona has $19,000,000 of stock and $9,000,000 of bonds, built with the proceeds of those bonds. The Southern Pacific of New Mexico, $7,000,000 of stock in round numbers and over $4,000,000 in bonds. These three companies, with stock of $92,000,000 and bonds of $60,000,000, at 5 and 6 per cent interest, owned everywhere throughout the world; and thus they were constructed.

Now then, after the Thurman act of 1878, which provided that 25 per cent of the net earnings and all transportation of the Government on the Central Pacific Railroads should be retained, at that time the Central Pacific was the lessee of the Southern Pacific Railroad, and the question was raised by the Government whether the earnings of the nonaided lines of the Southern Pacific and of the Arizona Pacific should be retained by the Government; and that question was submitted to the Supreme Court, and I have the opinion here at large, where the court fully determines, and upon all the questions raised, that under the Thurman act, and the Pacific Railroad acts, that the earnings upon the Southern Pacific and those other Pacific Railroads were separate from the Central Pacific, etc., the Government had no right to retain one cent of the earnings of the nonbond-aided roads, and in that case the Government rendered judgment in favor of the Central Pacific Railroad upon its other lines which had reached to a large amount of money—two or three millions of dollars.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Which shows an identity of two roads.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is unpaid to-day, and it is not proposed to be paid now. In 1685 or 1886 the Southern Pacific Company—not railroad company, but company—organized in the State of Kentucky, acquired the Southern Pacific Railroad of Arizona, and acquired its right and lines, and the Southern Pacific of California, and of New Mexico, and of Texas, and of Louisiana, and owns them to-day by lease or by purchase, but taking them with every dollar of indebtedness, with every dollar of stock—$92,000,000 of stock of these roads and $60,000,000 of bonds; and that Southern Pacific Company to-day is constructing a work below New Orleans, building a bridge over the Mississippi, the like of which, everything considered, never was done upon the face of the earth.

The Southern Pacific Company to-day, with all its interests, pays promptly from day to day and week to week a hundred thousand men who work for it and operate it. They touch the business interests and they touch the interest of all the Southern country, the North, the East, and the West.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Just as quick as you can.

Mr. BOATNER. The question I desire to ask the gentleman is this. Would the Government under the law be entitled to withhold on the ground that it has a claim against the Southern Pacific if the Southern had not leased the Central Pacific and the Central Pacific had rendered the services for which these charges are now made?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. On the leased lines?

Mr. BOATNER. On the nonaided portion of the line.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is just what the Supreme Court decided—on the nonaided portion of the line, the Supreme Court rendered a judgment for the Central Pacific for services done the Government on the nonaided portion of the line.

Mr. BOATNER. The point which I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to is this: That we are now disputing and refusing to pay an award to the Southern Pacific Company upon the ground that we can reserve it as an offset against the Central Pacific. If the Central Pacific itself had rendered the service, on what ground would we be entitled to withhold it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly, we would not be entitled to it then, and that is the exact question which the Supreme Court adjudicates in the case I cited.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Why, then, do not you advocate the payment of the judgment in favor of the Central Pacific?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I did advocate it in the Fifty-first Congress, and it was such reckless statements as come now from the gentleman from California, made at a night session, that defeated it. The Senate has always put it in without dissent. We owe it; and whatever gentlemen may think as to the technical judgment in favor of the Central Pacific, I do not discuss that question now.

Here are services performed by the Southern Pacific Company upon these nonbond-aided lines since they have leased them, the Government furnishing them its mails and freights and accepting the services, and it does not lie in the mouth of the Government, it does not lie in the mouth of honesty, it does not lie in the mouth of justice, having accepted those services from this common carrier which could be compelled to do the work, to turn around and say: "We will not pay you." And, Mr. Speaker, my position is fortified by the fact that Congress, this year, last year, the year before; all the years under Harrison and two years under Cleveland, has paid this identical Southern Pacific Company, year by year, for carrying its mails and its troops. We are doing it now by appropriations in the army bill.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There is no specific appropriation for that, and Congress makes no appropriation whatever for that purpose. If the payment is made it is done by the Executive Departments.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But the estimates cover it exactly.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The estimates do not do anything of the kind. It is not mentioned in the estimates anywhere.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But the Department includes it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Neither does Congress make any specific appropriation to pay the Pennsylvania Railroad, or any other railroad, but when those roads do transportation for the Government the Government pays for the services like any other customer, and it has paid this road for three years under Cleveland and for four years under Harrison, and is paying to-day in an appropriation recommended by the gentleman from Ohio himself. He knew all these facts, yet he did not put in a limitation upon that appropriation.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There is a limitation and a strict one, not saying that the money shall not be paid to this company, but providing that it shall not be paid as much as other roads.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, you are paying this road according to law, just as you pay all other land grant roads. You are doing it now month by month and quarter by quarter. A few years ago, before this question was settled by the courts, we did not pay, and you drove the Southern Pacific, with its ninety millions of stock and its sixty millions of bonds on its leased lines, into the courts, and the company got a judgment against you which carries interest at 4 per cent. The gentleman from Ohio having swallowed that camel, now gags at this item. It is not consistent, Mr. Speaker.

Now, having presented this case, you have the power to repudiate, but it is a judgment of the courts such as we usually, I might say universally with this exception, pay. We are paying for like services to-day, and I for one will not stand here to combat a claim that is just under the law, a claim for services the like of which we are paying for now. I will not stand here to fight such a claim, to play the demagogue, and talk about Huntington as a "thief," and about Stanford as a "thief," and about tearing down the Stanford University in California, and all that kind of stuff. All that has nothing to do with this question.

C. P. Huntington, if he has any rights; the Central Pacific Railroad Company, if it has any rights; the Southern Pacific Company, if it has any rights or wrongs—each of them is entitled to vindication or redress, and they all must bow, not to this court of which my colleague [Mr. BLACK] speaks—this House is not a court—but to the court of last resort, the Supreme Court of the United States; and I would defend Huntington, I would defend the heirs of Stanford, or any other party that was rich, just as quickly as I would defend the poorest man in the land, and I would defend the poorest man in the land just as soon as I would the rich. All are, or should be, equal before the law. Thank God, justice, like the grace of the Almighty, reaches down and puts its arm about all the people, whether great or small, rich or poor, individual or corporate. [Applause.]

I again, in conclusion, ask my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], who is a fair-minded and candid man, what authority is there in law, in right, for withholding payment of this judgment? Here are the facts set forth by the Interstate Commerce report. People all over the earth own the bonds of this Southern Pacific Railroad Company, which is owned by the Central Pacific Company. If I talked two hours I could not say anything in addition. If this debt was due from the Central Pacific Company no court in the universe, and no just man anywhere, would make the bondholders who furnished the money to build the Southern Pacific road in California, in Arizona, in New Mexico, in Texas, stand aside until their claims were paid.

Now, I hope my friend from Texas will address himself to that matter. I hope he will explain why it is that we are paying for similar services upon these roads to-day. I thank the House for its attention.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] takes his seat, I would like to ask him this question: Upon what did this Southern Pacific Company ever issue a bond? It owns no road.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, that is but a play upon words. The Southern Pacific Company is the purchaser and lessee of the Southern Pacific Railroad of California.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Not the purchaser.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, a lease is a qualified purchase. Great heavens! Is a man incapacitated, because he lives in California, from understanding the English language. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAGUIRE. He may be incapacitated from understanding it as some Illinoisans speak it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not yield. Mr. Speaker, a lease is a qualified purchase. The Southern Pacific Company is the owner, as lessee, of these Pacific railways in California and these other States. It took the property subject to the lien of those bonds, amounting to $60,000,000, which are held all over the world, not only by capitalists alone, but by widows, orphans, and other persons of small means. That is all I have to say.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to enter a motion that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments numbered 127 and 128.

In order that the House may act understandingly, I wish to call attention to this bill, and especially those portions which have reference to the Pacific railroads. If gentlemen will turn to this general deficiency bill now before us, they will find not less than twenty items of appropriation from which the Pacific railroads are excepted.

In other words, accounts have been transmitted to Congress from the Treasury Department for payment, embracing a large number of items in each account; and it will be found that the House and the Senate have agreed to insert in each of these general items the phrase "exclusive of Pacific railroads." So that if the House should recede from the Senate amendment, it will be put in the embarrassing situation of paying to the Pacific railroads the judgment under consideration and at the same time refusing payment to the Pacific roads for other matters equally valid and honest.

Again, if gentlemen will examine the general deficiency bills of the Fifty-first Congress and the Fifty-second Congress, they will find that both those Congresses in making appropriations used the same language that is used in the present deficiency bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a moment on that point, for I know the gentleman is fair?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman is now speaking of deficiencies. But he will allow me to remind him that the principal sums paid to these roads in all these years have been paid from the army and navy appropriations. And it is the committee over which the gentleman presides that makes the exception in this case.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the House to consider the language of this amendment, which is not to pay any particular Pacific Railroad, but to make payment to the Southern Pacific Company. It becomes important, then, to know what is the Southern Pacific Company. Who constitute the Southern Pacific Company? Gentlemen throw themselves behind the legal breastwork that the law will not hold the stockholders of one company responsible for the debts of another company, even though the persons be the same in both companies and operating on the same line and for the same purposes. Let us see how the matter stands.

Are we to be guided exclusively by the technical rules of the law, or are we the lawmaking power in connection with the Senate of the United States and the President. If we are limited by the narrow terms of the law, all that this House can do in such matters as this is simply to make appropriations to pay the judgments of the different courts. Now, sir, I hold in my hand the testimony of a very accomplished lawyer, formerly a member of this House, and more recently a representative of the Southern Pacific Company, before the Committee on Appropriations.

I refer to Judge Payson. What does he say in reference to this company? He says that the Southern Pacific Company, which never built one line of railroad, which I am told never issued bonds to the extent of one dollar, is now the lessee practically of the entire transportation system of California, Arizona, New Mexico, and the southern part of Texas. Here is this company holding in its grasp the transportation facilities of three or four States and Territories. Who constitute this company? Let me read the testimony of the same witness in answer to a question to him by myself:

The CHAIRMAN. What relations did the owners of the stock of the Southern Pacific Company bear to the Central Pacific Company; were they not the same parties?

Judge PAYSON. They were the same parties. The Central Pacific Railroad was principally constructed, this is a matter of public history of the country, by four men, Huntington, Crocker, Hopkins, and Stanford, and the stockholders of the Central Pacific system were the principal stockholders of the Southern Pacific Company.

Mr. HAUGEN. Allow me to ask what relation Judge Payson bore to these companies?

Mr. SAYERS. He was their attorney, and came before the Committee on Appropriations to secure this appropriation.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. But when he so appeared he was not a member of this House.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let me remind the gentleman from Texas that the four men who have been referred to, though they were large stockholders in these companies, were not the only persons constituting those corporations.

Mr. SAYERS. I decline, Mr. Speaker, to be interrupted further.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas declines further interruption.

Mr. SAYERS. Here we have the four principal owners not only of the Southern Pacific Railroad, but also of the Central Pacific road, and of all those other lines, a company which was created by the Legislature of Kentucky, not for the purpose of the construction of a road, but for the purpose of buying roads. In other words, it is a "blanket" corporation. Now, it is admitted—there is no question about it—that the Central Pacific Railroad is in a state of bankruptcy. It is further admitted that it has been so conducted for the past ten years that the roadbed is almost worthless; in fact, it is in such a condition that if put on the market its roadbed and rolling stock would not sell for enough to pay the first-mortgage bonds.

Mr. BLAIR. If the gentleman will permit me, he is very much mistaken as to the condition of the road. It is in excellent condition.

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir; not from the testimony.

Mr. Speaker, it is in common repute that the Attorney-General of the United States, in order to fix the liability of one of these gentlemen, has already filed in the State of California, in one of the probate courts of that State, a claim against the estate of the late Mr. Stanford. I have no doubt these gentlemen who are standing on the narrow technicality of the law, if they were representing that estate, would say as they do to us to-day, "Why, you can not enforce this obligation against this estate; it is his private property, and the Government of the United States has no right to hold any person individually responsible for the debts of the Central Pacific Railroad."

But the Attorney-General will endeavor to maintain the claim of the United States against Mr. Stanford's property and establish its liability, in part, for this enormous debt to the Government.

Mr. DUNN. Is it not on the ground that the wealth of Stanford, and others of that syndicate, was practically stolen from the Pacific roads to weaken the obligations of the roads to the Government of the United States?

Mr. SAYERS. Well, I would not say that.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are told by the Secretary of the Treasury that in the next few years the Government will be called on to pay the sum of $2,362,000 as the principal of a part of the maturing bonds. We find also that the judicial branch of the Government is endeavoring to fasten the liability of the Stanford estate for its proportion of the bonds; and I ask you, gentlemen, if under these circumstauces you can or will consent to this appropriation.

Mr. DENSON. Would not the Stanford estate plead that as an estoppal against this very claim of the Government?

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman from Texas allow an interruption?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. Do I understand the gentleman from Texas to assume the ground that the Southern Pacific Company is liable to the National Government for the indebtedness of the Central Pacific Company to it, which indebtedness will soon become due?

Mr. SAYERS. I will give you an answer: If the owners of the stock of the Southern Pacific Company were honest and honorable men, they would meet the indebtedness of the Central Pacific Railroad without a murmur.

Mr. MARSH. If the gentleman will pardon me, that does not seem to answer the question, and I have asked it in perfect good faith, for I desire to get at the meat in this thing. Do you hold that the Southern Pacific Company, which controls this vast system running from the Pacific to New Orleans—do you hold that this company is liable to the Government of the United States for the indebtedness of the Central Pacific Railroad to it, amounting to the sum of $70,000,000 soon to become due? Because I am willing to say that it seems to me if they are liable for this $1,800,000 embodied in the Senate amendment to the appropriation bill, they are, on the same ground, also liable for the $70,000,000 nearly due.

Mr. SAYERS. I will answer the question:

The gentleman in his question, Mr. Speaker, builds up in front of him the breastworks of corporate law. I desire to brush these breastworks aside and reach the individuals themselves. I want to get at those who will receive this money if the appropriation is made.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I want to ask the gentleman a question with his consent.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I wish to ask if it is not true that there are a number of owners of stock of the Southern Pacific Company who are not at all interested in the Central Pacific?

Mr. SAYERS. The testimony of Judge Payson, which is contained in the pamphlet I hold in my hand, shows unqualifiedly that the vast proportion of the stock of these roads and of the Southern Pacific Company is in the possession and control of only four men or of their estates.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Would it be right now for innocent stockholders or owners of the stock of the Southern Pacific Company to be held responsible in any wise for the default of the Central Pacific Company or the stockholders of the Central Pacific Company?

Mr. SAYERS. They have their remedy.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Let them disclose themselves.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, let me ask my friend this question. Suppose it should be established that nineteen-twentieths of the stock was either owned by these four men or their estates, and one-twentieth by others, would he favor this appropriation?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think they should be segregated, as a matter of equity, and not suffer for the wrongdoing of the others.

Mr. SAYERS. But the Southern Pacific Company comes in here and demands payment of the whole.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. In what aspect do the stockholders of the Southern Pacific Company appear here? Are they not represented solely by the company itself?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Is not that company the recipient or assignee of the assets of the Central Pacific?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Is it not true, therefore, that every stockholder in the Southern Pacific Company is directly interested in the result of this claim, and in the disposition of the assets of the Central Pacific Railroad Company?

Mr. SAYERS. Unquestionably that is so.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman from Texas please tell me what becomes of the bondholders, the innocent purchasers of bonds, who built the road of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in California?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This Government has nothing to do with the bondholders of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California.

Mr. MARSH. But is it not proposed to take the earnings of that road from these people to pay the debts of the Central Pacific?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The answer to that is that there are no bondholders of the Southern Pacific Company.

Mr. MARSH. I did not say the Southern Pacific Company. I said the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and you ought to make a distinction between the two.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There are no bondholders of the company claiming this payment.

Mr. SAYERS. The Southern Pacific Company is owned and controlled practically by four men, the Central Pacific Railroad Company likewise, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company likewise, the Arizona Pacific Railroad Company, and other connections in California also. Now I say to those gentlemen, let them wait until they make a proper adjustment with Congress for the indebtedness of the Central Pacific Railroad. When that is done, if this judgment is outstanding, I will be willing to pay it, but not until then.

Mr. OATES. Will my friend from Texas allow me to see if I understand correctly the legal attitude? As I understand it, it is that the plaintiffs seeking payment of this amount are indebted to the Government of the United States, but that the debt is not yet due, and their condition is well known to the United States to be insolvent?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. OATES. And the payment is withheld on the principle of equity that you should not pay an amount of that kind to your debtor simply because his debt to you is not due, when if you pay it you would be likely to lose it.

Mr. SAYERS. That is my answer, if the gentleman will allow me further to say that while no rinally and technically the Central Pacific and the Southern Pacific are not one and the same, yet at the same time the very same men control and own the stock in both of these companies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House debate on this question is now exhausted.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to amendments numbered 127 and 128, and ask for a further conference with the Senate.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I move——

Mr. SAYERS. I submit that no other motion can be made until my motion is voted down. The previous question is operating now.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. SAYERS. That was the order.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman understands perfectly well that I am entitled to test the sense of the House to bring the two bodies together if I can.

Mr. SAYERS. All right; I will yield to the gentleman, although I do not think, under the rule, he is right.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House now recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments 127 and 128 and agree to the same.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 90.

So the motion was rejected.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments was laid on the table.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will announce the appointment of the following conferees: Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky, Mr. SAYERS, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois.

DEPUTY CORONER FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, there was laid before the House this morning a Senate bill, and my colleague on the Committee of the District of Columbia [Mr. COBB of Alabama] desired to ask unanimous consent that it should be considered to-day, but he gave way for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], who had a conference report, which took precedence. I now desire to ask that the bill be laid before the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1007) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint a deputy coroner, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to appoint a deputy coroner in and for the District of Columbia. That it shall be the duty of the deputy coroner to assist the coroner in the performance of his duties, and to perform the duties pertaining to the office of coroner in the absence or disability of the coroner. The deputy coroner shall, while acting as such, receive compensation at a rate not exceeding $5 per diem, to be paid as other expenses of the government of the District of Columbia are paid, and shall give bond, to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in the sum of $2,500, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties.

Mr. HEARD. I yield to my colleague [Mr. COBB].

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, there is no need of saying anything about this bill. It is apparent to everybody, or ought to be, that there is a great necessity for a deputy coroner. There is no deputy coroner now under the law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is that usual with the large cities?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Yes, sir; it is absolutely essential. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama what offici l has heretofore been discharging the duties of deputy coroner?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Nobody.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, have we not been getting along well enough without one?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. For a long time, Mr. Speaker, we had, as we supposed, in the District a deputy coroner. He went on and acted as deputy coroner, no question being made about his action until the question was raised at the time of the Ford s Theater disaster. Then his authority was questioned, and upon investigation it was found that he had no authority by law to act at all. And if you will remember, the whole proceeding at that time was declared void, all that he had done, because there was no legal authority for him to act.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does this bill provide for a deputy coroner in the absence of the coroner?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Only in the absence of the coroner.

Mr. DOCKERY. He would not receive the $5, then, unless the coroner were absent.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Unless the coroner is sick or absent from the city; and then only for services when he acts as deputy coroner.

Mr. COOMBS. I have investigated this matter and found it all right, and that a deputy coroner is necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COBB of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXCLUSION AND DEPORTATION OF ALIEN ANARCHISTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (S. 2314) providing for the exclusion and deportation of alien anarchists; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DOCKERY. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

OUTSTANDING MILITARY BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. NEILL, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported favorably the bill (S. 679) to provide for the location and satisfaction of outstanding military bounty land warrants and certificates of location under section 3 of the act approved June 2, 1858; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This concludes the call of committees for reports.

EXCLUSION AND DEPORTATION OF ALIEN ANARCHISTS.

Mr. BOATNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2314) to provide for the exclusion and deportation of alien anarchists.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill. Is there ob ection?

Mr. GEAR. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears none.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no alien anarchist shall hereafter be permitted to land at any port of the United States, or be admitted into the United States, but this prohibition shall not be so construed as to apply to political refugees or political offenders, other than such anarchists.

SEC. 2. That the board of special inquiry, authorized under the immigration act of March 3, 1893, shall diligently inquire of any alien seeking admission into the United States, who is suspected of being an anarchist, by pertinent questions, as to his antecedents, his opinions as to government, and whether he belongs to any society or association of known anarchistic tendencies; and it may examine the person of such alien for marks indicative of such membership; it may accept evidence of the immigrant's common reputation as an anarchist, and the orders, decrees, or judgments of foreign governments and police notifications as prima facie evidence, which may be deemed sufficient, unless successfully controverted, to prevent the admission of such alien.

SEC. 3. That where the Superintendent of Immigration is satisfied from oath or affirmation filed with him that any alien anarchist has been allowed to land or has come into the United States contrary to law, or such officer has reason to believe from oath or affirmation filed with him that any alien in the United States is an anarchist and that his presence in this country will be a menace to the Government or to the peace and well-b eing of society in general, he may issue a warrant and cause such suspected alien anarchist to be taken into custody and brought before such Superintendent, who shall proceed without unnecessary delay to hear the evidence upon such charge, and shall afford the suspected person an opportunity to submit evidence in his defense, and if, after such hearing, the Superintendent shall be satisfied that the person accused is an alien anarchist and has been allowed to land or has come into the United States contrary to law, or is satisfied that such person is an alien anarchist and that his presence in this country will be a menace to the Government or to the peace and well-being of society in general, the said Superintendent shall cause him to be conveyed to the port of departure and thence returned to the country whence he came; and if such anarchist was allowed to land or came into this country contrary to law, he shall be returned at the expense of the importing vessel, but if already in the country at the time of the passage of this act, or if he entered from an adjoining country of which he is not a citizen, then he shall be returned to the country of his nativity at the expense of the United States.

The Superintendent of Immigration, for the purposes of such hearings, shall have power to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to take testimony upon the questions involved, and may require any inspector of immigration or may specially authorize any other person to execute process, to make arrests, and to convey to ports of departure persons ordered deported. That upon any hearing before said superintendent, and upon any hearing provided for in the fourth section of this act, the same kind of evidence hereinbefore authorized to be received before the board of special inquiry on the admission of alien immigrants may be allowed and with the like effect.

It is further provided that any person arrested for being an alien anarchist and ordered to be deported by the Superintendent of Immigration shall have a right of appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall hear and dispose of such appeal under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and pending such appeal the order of deportation shall not be executed, but the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury upon such appeal shall be final and conclusive, but no final order of deportation shall be carried out until said alien anarchist has an opportunity, if he so desires, to apply for a writ of habeas corpus, to be issued by any judge of any United States court, and upon any hearing upon such writ the question of alienage, identity, and the regularity of the proceedings may be reviewed. The Secretary of the Treasury may authorize the collector of customs at any port to proceed against any alien anarchist, according to the provisions of this act, and in such proceedings to perform all the duties and exercise all the powers hereby conferred on the Superintendent of Immigration.

SEC. 4. That in cases where, upon the trial and conviction of any alien of any crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, in any United States court or court of record of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, it shall appear from the evidence produced at the trial that such alien is an anarchist, or that his remaining in this country will be a menace to the Government or to the peace and well-being of society in general, the presiding judge shall direct that a further hearing shall be had before him upon that matter at an early day, of which the convicted alien shall have due notice, and at which he shall be allowed to be heard and introduce evidence in his defense; and if the said judge shall be satisfied from the evidence produced at such hearing that such convicted alien is an anarchist, or that his remaining in the country will be a menace to the Government or to the peace and well-being of society in general, he may direct that in addition to other punishments adjudged, the said convicted alien, after undergoing such punishments, shall be taken before a commissioner of immigration at a port of entry, who shall order his deportation at the expense of the United States to the country from which he came. Should he thereafter return to the United States he shall be arrested and sentenced to confinement in a penitentiary for a period not exceeding four years and afterwards again deported.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his discretion to appoint such number of immigration agents as he may deem necessary, not exceeding twelve in number, at a salary not exceeding $2,500 each per annum, whose duties shall be to go abroad and make investigations in other countries, under such rules, directions, and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, pertaining to intended immigrants, and especially to diligently inquire and inform themselves as to the character of intended immigrants, whether anarchists, criminals, or alien contract laborers, availing themselves of police records, decrees of expulsion, and any and every source of information useful and obtainable so as to enable them to arrive at correct conclusions, and to report thereon from time to time to the Superintendent of Immigration, and to execute such other duties relating to the matters aforesaid as the Secretary of the Treasury may impose; and for the purpose of enforcing this law and paying the salaries of the said agents, the sum of $30,000 is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 6. That the fact that an alien has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States shall constitute no bar to proceedings against him under this act or under the acts to which it is an amendment.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman desires to discuss the measure——

Mr. TRACEY. How does this bill get before the House, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, is it open to objection?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). It is not. The present occupant was not in the chair when unanimous consent was asked, but the request for unanimous consent to consider the bill was put and no objection was made.

Mr. BOATNER. I will state for the information of the House that this bill——

Mr. HAUGEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Was unanimous consent given for the consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was.

Mr. TRACEY. No, Mr. Speaker; I did not hear any unanimous consent given.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, yes; it was given.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I move to refer the bill to the proper committee.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the motion is made to refer this bill to a committee——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] has the floor.

Mr. BOATNER. I will state, for the information of gentlemen, that I called up this bill and asked unanimous consent for its consideration——

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I beg to say to the gentleman from Louisiana that I did not understand his request.

Mr. BOATNER. Well, I made the request and no objection was made, and the bill is now before the House, unanimous consent having been given for its consideration.

Mr. TRACEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have been standing here all the time, and I heard no unanimous consent asked or given.

Mr. BOATNER. Then, I suppose that because the gentleman from New York did not hear it, no unanimous consent was given. Is that what the gentleman means to say?

Mr. TRACEY. The gentleman means to say that no unanimous consent was asked for by the Chair; none that the gentleman could hear.

Mr. BOATNER. Then, I state to the gentleman from New York that he is entirely incorrect.

Mr. TRACEY. Well, if the gentleman from Louisiana knows more about the state of my hearing than I do myself, it is quite extraordinary. I did not hear unanimous consent asked or given.

Mr. BOATNER. Oh, if the gentleman merely means to say that he did not hear unanimous consent asked or given, that is all very well; but when he states as a fact that no unanimous consent was asked or given, he is saying something that is not borne out by the facts or by the record.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, there are several gentlemen back here who are waiting for a chance to ask unanimous consent. I myself was listening, and, as I understood what occurred, the Speaker pro tempore put the request, and a gentleman upon the other side of the House asked that the bill be read. Then, as I understood—of course I may be mistaken—the Chair, in the ordinary way, directed the Clerk to read the bill, and we back here were waiting to hear it read, in order that we might judge whether or not unanimous consent should be given.

Mr. TRACEY. Let us have the Official Reporter's notes read, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state, for the information of the gentleman from New York, that I asked unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, and the Chair submitted the request to the House, and, after the usual pause, stated that there was no objection, and that the Clerk would read the bill. Thereupon the Clerk proceeded to read the bill, and it is now before the House for consideration by unanimous consent.

Mr. TRACEY. I make the point of order that it is not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant was not in the chair when the question was submitted——

Mr. BOATNER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the notes be read.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. OATES. I rise for the purpose of speaking to this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] has the floor.

Mr. OATES. I rise for the purpose of speaking to this question, and I think the gentleman from Louisiana will not object. I distinctly heard the question asked by the Chair whether there was any objection to the request for the consideration of this bill; there was the usual pause, and then the Chair said that no objection was made.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Louisiana to ask that the notes of the Official Reporter be read. I hope that will be done, to settle this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will have the notes read from the desk as soon as they are transcribed, and pending that will state his version of what occurred. The present occupant was not in the chair when the request was submitted, but the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TARSNEY], who was presiding, submitted the request for unanimous consent, the bill being read by title only. The request was submitted and no objection was made, and thereupon the bill was read at length. That is the recollection of the Chair of what occurred as he observed it from the floor.

Mr. BURROWS. There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is too late now to raise the question. Members must attend to their business.

Mr. BURROWS. The Chair asked whether there was objection; and there was none.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], who is in charge of the bill, has asked that the notes of the stenographer be read.

Mr. BOATNER. I have asked that the notes be read, because there seems to be some question raised here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The notes will be read in the time of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BOATNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2314) to provide for the exclusion and deportation of alien anarchists.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GEAR. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears none.

Mr. WARNER. Now, Mr. Speaker, the record shows that when the question was put whether there was objection, a member asked that the bill be read; and I respectfully submit that under the almost universal practice of the House, we were entitled to hear the bill read before we passed judgment upon the question whether it should be considered at this time. The bill having been read, and it appearing to be a bill to make a new crime and provide for its detection and punishment, I respectfully submit that, even if there has been a mistake or misunderstanding by means of which consent for the consideration of the measure was given, no advantage should be taken of that circumstance to put before the House at this time a bill coming from the Senate which has never been considered by a committee of this House, and which has not even been printed here that members may have an opportunity to read it. I may be in favor of the bill when I understand it. I am not in favor of taking it up in this way.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, my reason for calling up this bill by unanimous consent——

Mr. TRACEY. I object to the bill. I object to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, my object in calling up the bill for consideration at this time was because it was regarded as covering a very important question. It is a bill which was considered in the conference committee of the two Houses a few days since and agreed upon, having been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury as a matter which it was important should be acted upon at an early date.

Not anticipating any objection to the bill, supposing that the entire House had heard the request, which was submitted in a loud tone of voice, and the consideration of the bill having been ordered in the usual way, I had no idea that any gentleman would make objection. As it is, however, a matter of importance which I wish to be considered without the disadvantage of any factious opposition of this sort, I now ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can withdraw his request for the consideration of the bill; and without objection it will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Chair hears no objection; and it is so ordered.

JOHN AND SARAH GRIFFIN.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 561) for the relief of John and Sarah Griffin.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood that the regular order was called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] demand the regular order?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not. But the Committee on the Judiciary has twenty-three minutes unexpired in the morning hour. I do not make any objection, however.

Mr. CATCHINGS. This matter can be disposed of one way or the other in a very few minutes.

The bill, with the amendment of the Committee on War Claims, was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I can explain this matter in a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call for the regular order cuts off any request for unanimous consent. The regular order is the call of committees for the consideration of business during the second morning hour.

Some time subsequently:

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has withdrawn his demand for the regular order against the bill called up by myself, and I again submit the request for unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] has withdrawn his demand for the regular order as against the bill called up by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. That is correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there further objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. MAHON. I demand the regular order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House concurrent resolution relative to printing 23,000 copies of Tenth Annual Report of Civil Service Commission.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 2314) to provide for the exclusion and deportation of alien anarchists; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

EXTENSION OF ALLEYS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from a conference committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 971) to open and extend alleys in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
H. W. RUSK,
A. C. HARMER,
Managers on the part of the House.

CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
JOHN MARTIN,
JAMES MCMILLAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HEARD. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that there is no written statement accompanying the report, for the reason that the result of the conference is to recede from the amendment of the House. The House ingrafted an amendment upon a Senate bill, but it is receded from because the same amendment is included in the District appropriation bill, and there is no need for it here.

The report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HEARD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I submit a report from the conference committee on the deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 127 and 128 to the bill (H. R. 7477) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 127, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the last three lines of the matter inserted by said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 128, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,274,246.15;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. M. COCKRELL,
CALVIN S. BRICE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state, Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House that this action on the part of the conferees disposes of the general deficiency bill, eliminating the appropriation for the payment of $1,800,000, in round numbers, for the Southern Pacific Company.

I ask the adoption of the report.

The report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the morning hour for consideration.

The morning hour begins at twenty-five minutes before 4 o'clock, the call resting with the Committee on the Judiciary, which committee has twenty-three minutes of its hour of yesterday remaining unused.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call up for consideration the bill I now send to the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1892) to limit the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the district and circuit courts of the United States shall not take original cognizance of any suit of a civil nature, either at common law or in equity, between a corporation created or organized by or under the laws of any State and a citizen of any State in which such corporation at the time the cause of action accrued may have been carrying on any business authorized by the law creating it, except the court having jurisdiction of the domicile of the corporation, except in cases arising under the patent or copyright laws, and in like cases in which said courts are authorized to take original cognizance of suits between citizens of the same State; nor shall any such suit between such a corporation and a citizen or citizens of a State in which it may be doing business be removed to any circuit court of the United States, except in like cases in which such removal is authorized by the existing law in suits between citizens of the same State: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect suits pending in the courts of the United States at the time this act shall take effect.

The Committee on the Judiciary recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out of lines 9 and 10 the words "except the court having jurisdiction of the domicile of the corporation," and insert after the word "State," in line 18, the words: "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent a citizen of another State from suing a corporation in the State of its domicile."

Mr. CULBERSON. Let us have a vote on this, if nobody cares to debate it.

Mr. REED. One moment. I think that bill ought to be explained.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to press this bill to a vote until members of the House understand its scope and effect.

It is one of the most important measures now before this Congress, and I believe is a far more important measure, when viewed in its relation to the benefits it will bring to the people, than the Senate tariff bill, or any other bill that can be named now upon our Calendar.

This bill provides that the circuit and district courts of the United States shall not take cognizance hereafter of any cause of action arising between a corporation doing business in a State and any citizen of the State; or in other words it makes a corporation a citizen of the State in which it is carrying on business, within the meaning of the judicial power of the Constitution. In order to illustrate the entire effect of this bill, I will state that if a corporation is organized in New Jersey, where they breed corporations, and is doing business in the State of Maine or in the State of Texas, by comity or otherwise, when a controversy arises between that corporation and a citizen from Texas, or Maine, under the law as it is now interpreted by the Supreme Court, it brings its suit in the Federal court, or has that right.

If this bill is passed, that jurisdiction which the Federal courts now have to entertain such controversies will no longer exist. A corporation thus created under the laws of New Jersey or any other State in the Union, and doing business in another State, will be, for all judicial purposes, classed as a citizen of that State. Now, I beg to suggest that for fifty years after this Government was founded the interpretation of the law by the Supreme Court was that a corporation was not a citizen of a State within the meaning of the Constitution.

In other words, if a corporation brought a suit in a Federal court and a plea in abatement to the jurisdiction was entered, the plaintiff would be required to prove that all of the incorporators of that corporation lived in a State outside of the State in which the court was held and in which the suit was pending. For fifty years that was the rule. The Supreme Court then overruled its former ruling and announced the doctrine as I will state it now.

If a corporation brings a suit in the State of Michigan, and alleges that it is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Texas, the court will not permit a plea in abatement to the jurisdiction to show that the incorporators all of them live in the State of Michigan; but the plaintiff is only required to show a certified copy of the law creating the corporation in the State of Texas, and all other questions are concluded. Therefore, it follows from that state of the case that all the stockholders in a corporation may live in Kentucky, and yet if they get a charter from the State of Texas, but carry on their business in Kentucky, they can sue in the Federal courts of that State, although every one of the stockholders lives in the State of Kentucky.

Now, the mischief intended to be removed is this: Four-fifths of all the business of the United States is now conducted by the agency of corporations. More than one-third of the litigation of this country in the Federal courts arises out of controversies between corporations and citizens of the States in which they do business. This bill proposes to cut up this mischief by the roots and to require a corporation doing business in Texas, organized under the laws of Maine or New York, to be regarded by the courts as a citizen of the State in which it does business for judicial purposes.

Gentlemen will remember that the Constitution provides that the judicial power of the United States shall extend, among other things, to all controversies arising between citizens of different States. Therefore it was necessary for the Supreme Court to hold finally, for the convenience of corporations, that a corporation was a citizen in order to get a standing in a Federal court.

Now again, the jurisdiction of the Federal courts is dual in its character. All controversies arising between citizens of different States are cognizable in Federal courts, and all cases arising under the laws of the United States and under the Constitution and treaties of the United States, are likewise cognizable in those courts. This bill does not propose to interfere with that at all, but if there is a controversy between a corporation doing business in Texas, organized in another State, and a citizen of that State, and there is any construction of the laws of Congress to be invoked, and any construction of the Constitution, then the Federal court will maintain its jurisdiction, which is not affected by this bill.

Mr. EVERETT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there? In the case that the gentleman has stated, of a corporation getting a charter from the State of New Jersey, and doing business in several States—in Maine, for example, or in Kentucky, or in Texas. Would that corporation, under this law, be treated as a citizen of each of the several States in which it did business for judicial purposes?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I would like to ask another question if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. When a corporation is made up by the consolidation of other companies under the laws of the different States; in a case of that kind, where suit is brought against the consolidated company in one State by a citizen of that State where it is operating, does your bill take the jurisdiction from the Federal court?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not believe I heard the gentleman's question fully.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Here is a railroad built originally by more than one corporation and running through one State and partly through another. The roads are consolidated and operated by a single company. A suit is brought by a citizen of one of the States through which that line runs against that consolidated company. Now, does your bill, if it become law, prevent the right of the Federal courts to entertain that suit?

Mr. CULBERSON. There is an amendment proposed to the bill by the committee which will permit a citizen of a State other than that in which the corporation was organized to sue the corporation in the Federal courts of the legal domicile of the corporation.

But a consolidated company, as any other corporation, would under this measure be regarded as a citizen for judicial purposes of any State in which it conducted its business.

Mr. Speaker, this bill has passed the House of Representatives in three separate Congresses, but we have not been able to get the concurrence of the Senate in this measure. It was passed through the House originally in 1887. I believe it passed the Fifty-first Congress. I am sure it passed the Forty-eighth and the Forty-ninth; and I believe if you will pass the bill—if it can be enacted into law—it will relieve the people of this country of more hardships and more unnecessary costs than any member of Congress can now estimate.

Now, I want make another statement.

Mr. MARSH. Can I ask the gentleman a question there?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MARSH. Where a railroad corporation, for instance, runs through four States.

Mr. CULBERSON. Doing business in four States.

Mr. MARSH. And doing business in four States, becomes insolvent, and it becomes necessary to appoint a receiver, would there be four separate receivers—one for each of the States?

Mr. CULBERSON. No, sir.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say another thing in this connection. Every judicial circuit in the United States—nine of them—is now clamoring for another judge; every one of them. This Congress has already authorized the appointment of an additional circuit judge—for the eighth circuit. The ninth judicial circuit is asking for an additional judge, and so is the fifth. In fact, all the circuits want another judge. Nearly half of the States in the Union want more district judges.

The truth about it is now, they say, that the courts are overloaded and unable to dispose of the business before them. If this bill is passed, it will work off the dockets of the Federal courts more than one-third the business which now goes there, and these cases will be cognizable in the State courts, where they can get just as good justice as they can by taking a man a hundred miles away from his home.

Mr. BRYAN. It applies to all kinds of corporations as well as railroads, does it?

Mr. CULBERSON. All kinds. [Cries of "Vote."]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I hope before we pass an act of this sort that we will give it some consideration.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REED. Perhaps the gentleman had better let me be recognized in my own time or yield me unlimited time.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have only about seven or eight minutes.

Mr. REED. I frankly say to the gentleman that this bill can not pass unless we have an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I propose to give you every opportunity. How much time have we of the morning hour, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The twenty-three minutes the gentleman had have expired.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will simply state to the gentleman that this bill goes over until the next morning hour, the second morning hour.

Mr. REED. I would like to speak about it just now, while my mind is fresh from what the gentleman has said.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then, you would have to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent for ten minutes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, will the Chair be kind enough to let me know what is the parliamentary situation. I had twenty-three minutes of the first morning hour for the consideration of this matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. REED. If the matter goes over I will take an opportunity to discuss it. I thought from the clock that the morning hour began at twelve minutes to 4, in which case it would go around for an hour, and now I understand there were only twenty minutes, beginning at that time.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, I understand that the first morning hour has expired, and I ask unanimous consent on the part of my colleague [Mr. BOATNER] to offer a resolution.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to furnish to the House of Representatives a duplicate copy of the bill of the Senate (S. 1252) entitled "An act to provide for the times and places of holding terms of the United States courts in the State of Washington," the original having been misplaced.

The resolution was adopted.

ALCOHOL USED IN THE ARTS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back the bill which I send to the desk with the recommendation that it do pass, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all laws which authorize the rebate or repayment from the Treasury of the United States of the tax on alcohol used in the arts, or in any medicinal or other like compounds, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred bill H. R. 7277, having fully considered the same, report it back with the recommendation that it pass.

The following letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury fully explains the ills that would flow from the failure to tax alcohol used in the arts.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the letter referred to in the report be incorporated in the RECORD, unless some gentleman desires to have it read, and that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRACEY. Let it be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., July 6, 1894.

SIR: Referring to that part of the tariff bill relating to the internal revenue, as recently passed by the Senate, attention is respectfully called to section 61 of said bill, which provides for the rebate of tax paid on alcohol used "in the arts, or in any medicinal or other like compound."

I have carefully examined this section, and deem it proper to call your attention to certain objections which have occurred to me, both as regards its administrative features and as a revenue measure.

The section provides: "Any manufacturer finding it necessary to use alcohol in the arts, or in any medicinal or other like compound, may use the same under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and on satisfying the collector of internal revenue for the district wherein he resides or carries on business that he has complied with such regulations and has used such alcohol therein, and exhibiting and delivering up the stamps which show that a tax has been paid thereon, shall be entitled to receive from the Treasury of the United States a rebate or repayment of the tax so paid."

The proposition to exempt from tax, alcohol used in the arts and manufactures, has heretofore received considerable attention, and during the past ten or twelve years several bills have been introduced in Congress with the view of securing this exemption from tax. Many safeguards, including the methylation of the spirits so used, have been proposed, but it appears that, after careful consideration, Congress deemed legislation on the subject inexpedient, and this office has, without exception, when called upon for an expression of its views, objected to the proposed exemption, on the ground that the privilege of using alcohol in such cases would afford dangerous opportunities for fraud and would involve great expense in the matter of official supervision.

The danger to be apprehended in such cases would, of course, be greatly increased by the further increase of tax on distilled spirits, and for this reason additional restrictions and safeguards would seem necessary. The section, however, not only affords no additional protection against the fraudulent use of alcohol, or for fraudulently obtaining a refund of the tax, but it imposes no penalty for such fraudulent use or claim, and requires no bond, or other security, to be given by the manufacturers, to comply with such regulations as may be prescribed thereunder.

The section also contains no limitation or restriction as to the time, or place, or manner in which the alcohol is to be used; nor does it provide for any official supervision or inspection, or for the keeping of books or rendering accounts such as would enable the officers to verify the claims made. The section is also, in my opinion, further defective, inasmuch as it does not define or limit the word "manufacturer," which, as now used in the section would include rectifiers and dealers in spirits, who, as such, have been carefully excluded from the provisions of the bills heretofore offered. The words "medicinal and other like compounds" are also vague and difficult of construction, and would, in my judgment, greatly increase the danger of fraud.

As stated, the section does not provide for any official inspection of the spirits on which a rebate is claimed or any supervision of the business in which the spirits are claimed to have been used. Such inspection and supervision, however, are, in my judgment, absolutely necessary to prevent fraud, and the expense attending the employment of a sufficient force for this purpose is a serious objection to the proposed measure.

This office has no very satisfactory data on which to base estimates as to the quantity of alcohol used in the arts and manufactures, or as to the number of persons using alcohol for manufacturing purposes.

A measure similar to the one now proposed was introduced in the Forty-seventh Congress (first session), and according to reports received at that time from the various collectors, the quantity of alcohol so used each year was 4,269,978 gallons, while the estimated quantity which would be so used if exempted from tax was stated as 7,367,594 gallons.

The list of manufacturers forwarded with these reports is found to embrace: Manufacturing chemists, druggists, perfumers, manufacturers of flavoring extracts, manufacturers of patent medicines, photographers, hatters, varnish and paint manufacturers, tobacco and cigar manufacturers, machinists, and others.

This list, although incomplete, serves to show some of the difficulties which this office would experience in exercising ordinary surveillance, even in cases where the alcohol is intended, and is used, for legitimate purposes.

The foregoing statement of the quantity of alcohol which would be used for manufacturing puposes, if exempted from tax, was based on such information as the officers were able to obtain at that time. The quantity thus stated, however, is found to be some 2,000,000 gallons less than that subsequently estimated by my predecessor; and, in my opinion, the quantity so used each year would not be less than 9,000,000 gallons, exclusive of that used in the manufacture of bitters, cordials, and other like preparations.

At the proposed rate of tax of $1.10 per gallon, imposed by section 48 of the bill, the loss of revenue on this quantity of spirits would amount to nearly $10,000,000 yearly, or more than one-half of the estimated increase of revenue to be derived from the additional tax thus imposed.

From a revenue standpoint, and aside from the probable loss of revenue resulting from fraudulent claims, this proposed measure seems open to serious objections; and it may, I think, be fairly questioned whether the consumer of articles manufactured from free alcohol, would, to any extent, be benefited by its enactment.

Respectfully, yours,

JOS. S. MILLER, Commissioner.

HON. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] asks unanimous consent that this bill be now considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED. It is understood that there shall be fifteen minutes debate, at least on our side.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, what is the parliamentary status of this bill? Is there a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will say to the gentleman that under the rules the bill can be considered now. The request I submitted was that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Under the rule it is entitled to consideration now and I moved its consideration and then asked consent that it be considered in the House as in committee. I think the request of the gentleman from Maine, for fifteen minutes debate on each side, is reasonable and I make no objection to it.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, there are important business interests concerned in this bill from whatever point of view you consider it, and hence I have not felt at liberty to give the bill and the action of the Committee of Ways and Means the pillorying which they actually deserve and ought to have. We have passed here a bill agreed upon by a committee, and by the House acting under the advice of that committee, which contains an absurdity which seems to be impossible of belief, and the conference committee, and presumably the House, which was acting under the influence of that committee, knew it all the time.

The interesting tariff bill which we have passed, as you will see by the bill now under consideration, contains a provision by which free alcohol used in the arts is given, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in doing that the bill is so framed that the result is that all along the chemical schedule, and Heaven knows in what other schedules, the duty is raised beyond all belief; a raising which I am sorry to say was omitted from the elaborate table presented by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], although he was aware of it.

In addition to that, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in the letter which has just been read, practically informs this House that the tariff bill as it stands to-day, and as it has gone down the river [laughter], actually abrogates the internal revenue in large part and proportion; and yet the committee, knowing that, advised the Democratic caucus to "climb for it" at once. [Laughter.] I shall have to admit, in mitigation of their offense, that they were relying upon the patriotism of the Republican party not to stand in the way of the public good, even to expose thoroughly and practically burn into the public mind the blunders which their enemies have made. Of course there are plenty more blunders, but perhaps this is the most flagrant, the worst.

It is true that this proposition was presented in the Senate by a gentleman who probably had no idea of the extent of it, or if he had, it was understood in the Senate that the error would be corrected in the regular way; that is, that whatever was incongruous in it would be changed in conference, that whatever was wrong in it would be arranged by the meeting of parties who had that opportunity to carefully consider it. And it will be recollected, Mr. Speaker, that we were brought into an agreement to disagree to the amendments en bloc upon the ground that the conference committee would arrange the incongruities which the House might have discovered in the bill, and that we were disappointed entirely of that, and disappointed of it simply because of a quarrel between the high Democratic officials of the Senate and of the House and of—elsewhere. [Laughter.] I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, so far as any quarrel is concerned, this incongruity is not the result of anything of the kind. The situation is this: In that hurry in which measures so great as this are often closed out on the last day, and without that care which would probably have characterized its consideration on any other day in the Senate, the amendment that this bill seeks to correct was put into the tariff bill on motion of Senator HOAR, of Massachusetts.

So far as I know, there was no member of the conference committee who was not willing and did not desire—indeed, who was not anxious—that this correction should be made. There was no concealment from the House at any time as to the existence of this incongruity. And it may be further said that the bill was passed with a knowledge of its existence. But as we all know—a thing not necessary to be concealed, a thing I could not conceal if I wished, and would not if I could—it finally came to a point where we had to pass the tariff bill with the Senate amendments, this one included, or get no bill at all.

That alternative being left to us, we accepted the Senate amendments, as the country knows. We passed the bill; but in doing so, stood ready to try to correct, and so far as I am individually concerned intending to try to correct, this great impropriety in the bill.

Sir, the difficulty that we encounter is not simply what has been referred to by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; but the whole bill had been framed in this House and had been considered in the Senate on the idea that there was to be taxed alcohol in the arts; and that carries the schedule of articles into which alcohol enters to a very high rate of duty under all bills.

I suppose there never was a tariff bill here in thirty years in which the schedule embracing the articles into which alcohol enters was as low as 100 per cent average; and this results from that State where it is operating, does your bill take the jurisdiction from the Federal court?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not believe I heard the gentleman's question fully.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Here is a railroad built originally by more than one corporation and running through one State and partly through another. The roads are consolidated and operated by a single company. A suit is brought by a citizen of one of the States through which that line runs against that consolidated company. Now, does your bill, if it become law, prevent the right of the Federal courts to entertain that suit?

Mr. CULBERSON. There is an amendment proposed to the bill by the committee which will permit a citizen of a State other than that in which the corporation was organized to sue the corporation in the Federal courts of the legal domicile of the corporation.

But a consolidated company, as any other corporation, would under this measure be regarded as a citizen for judicial purposes of any State in which it conducted its business.

Mr. Speaker, this bill has passed the House of Representatives in three separate Congresses, but we have not been able to get the concurrence of the Senate in this measure. It was passed through the House originally in 1887. I believe it passed the Fifty-first Congress. I am sure it passed the Forty-eighth and the Forty-ninth; and I believe if you will pass the bill—if it can be enacted into law—it will relieve the people of this country of more hardships and more unnecessary costs than any member of Congress can now estimate.

Now, I want make another statement.

Mr. MARSH. Can I ask the gentleman a question there?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MARSH. Where a railroad corporation, for instance, runs through four States.

Mr. CULBERSON. Doing business in four States.

Mr. MARSH. And doing business in four States, becomes insolvent, and it becomes necessary to appoint a receiver, would there be four separate receivers—one for each of the States?

Mr. CULBERSON. No, sir.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say another thing in this connection. Every judicial circuit in the United States—nine of them—is now clamoring for another judge; every one of them. This Congress has already authorized the appointment of an additional circuit judge—for the eighth circuit. The ninth judicial circuit is asking for an additional judge, and so is the fifth. In fact, all the circuits want another judge. Nearly half of the States in the Union want more district judges.

The truth about it is now, they say, that the courts are overloaded and unable to dispose of the business before them. Mr. BRYAN. It applies to all kinds of corporations as well as railroads, does it?

Mr. CULBERSON. All kinds. [Cries of "Vote."]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I hope before we pass an act of this sort that we will give it some consideration.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REED. Perhaps the gentleman had better let me be recognized in my own time or yield me unlimited time.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have only about seven or eight minutes.

Mr. REED. I frankly say to the gentleman that this bill can not pass unless we have an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I propose to give you every opportunity. How much time have we of the morning hour, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will simply state to the gentleman that this bill goes over until the next morning hour, the second morning hour.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then, you would have to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent for ten minutes.

ALCOHOL USED IN THE ARTS.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back the bill which I send to the desk with the recommendation that it do pass, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all laws which authorize the rebate or repayment from the Treasury of the United States of the tax on alcohol used in the arts, or in any medicinal or other like compounds, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred bill H. R. 7277, having fully considered the same, report it back with the recommendation that it pass.

The following letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury fully explains the ills that would flow from the failure to tax alcohol used in the arts.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the letter referred to in the report be incorporated in the RECORD, unless some gentleman desires to have it read, and that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRACEY. Let it be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., July 6, 1894.

SIR: Referring to that part of the tariff bill relating to the internal revenue, as recently passed by the Senate, attention is respectfully called to section 61 of said bill, which provides for the rebate of tax paid on alcohol used "in the arts, or in any medicinal or other like compound."

I have carefully examined this section, and deem it proper to call your attention to certain objections which have occurred to me, both as regards its administrative features and as a revenue measure.

The section provides: "Any manufacturer finding it necessary to use alcohol in the arts, or in any medicinal or other like compound, may use the same under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and on satisfying the collector of internal revenue for the district wherein he resides or carries on business that he has complied with such regulations and has used such alcohol therein, and exhibiting and delivering up the stamps which show that a tax has been paid thereon, shall be entitled to receive from the Treasury of the United States a rebate or repayment of the tax so paid."

The proposition to exempt from tax, alcohol used in the arts and manufactures, has heretofore received considerable attention, and during the past ten or twelve years several bills have been introduced in Congress with the view of securing this exemption from tax. Many safeguards, including the methylation of the spirits so used, have been proposed, but it appears that, after careful consideration, Congress deemed legislation on the subject inexpedient, and this office has, without exception, when called upon for an expression of its views, objected to the proposed exemption, on the ground that the privilege of using alcohol in such cases would afford dangerous opportunities for fraud and would involve great expense in the matter of official supervision.

The danger to be apprehended in such cases would, of course, be greatly increased by the further increase of tax on distilled spirits, and for this reason additional restrictions and safeguards would seem necessary. The section, however, not only affords no additional protection against the fraudulent use of alcohol, or for fraudulently obtaining a refund of the tax, but it imposes no penalty for such fraudulent use or claim, and requires no bond, or other security, to be given by the manufacturers, to comply with such regulations as may be prescribed thereunder.

The section also contains no limitation or restriction as to the time, or place, or manner in which the alcohol is to be used; nor does it provide for any official supervision or inspection, or for the keeping of books or rendering accounts such as would enable the officers to verify the claims made. The section is also, in my opinion, further defective, inasmuch as it does not define or limit the word "manufacturer," which, as now used in the section would include rectifiers and dealers in spirits, who, as such, have been carefully excluded from the provisions of the bills heretofore offered. The words "medicinal and other like compounds" are also vague and difficult of construction, and would, in my judgment, greatly increase the danger of fraud.

As stated, the section does not provide for any official inspection of the spirits on which a rebate is claimed or any supervision of the business in which the spirits are claimed to have been used. Such inspection and supervision, however, are, in my judgment, absolutely necessary to prevent fraud, and the expense attending the employment of a sufficient force for this purpose is a serious objection to the proposed measure.

This office has no very satisfactory data on which to base estimates as to the quantity of alcohol used in the arts and manufactures, or as to the number of persons using alcohol for manufacturing purposes.

A measure similar to the one now proposed was introduced in the Forty-seventh Congress (first session), and according to reports received at that time from the various collectors, the quantity of alcohol so used each year was 4,269,978 gallons, while the estimated quantity which would be so used if exempted from tax was stated as 7,367,594 gallons.

The list of manufacturers forwarded with these reports is found to embrace: Manufacturing chemists, druggists, perfumers, manufacturers of flavoring extracts, manufacturers of patent medicines, photographers, hatters, varnish and paint manufacturers, tobacco and cigar manufacturers, machinists, and others.

This list, although incomplete, serves to show some of the difficulties which this office would experience in exercising ordinary surveillance, even in cases where the alcohol is intended, and is used, for legitimate purposes.

The foregoing statement of the quantity of alcohol which would be used for manufacturing puposes, if exempted from tax, was based on such information as the officers were able to obtain at that time. The quantity thus stated, however, is found to be some 2,000,000 gallons less than that subsequently estimated by my predecessor; and, in my opinion, the quantity so used each year would not be less than 9,000,000 gallons, exclusive of that used in the manufacture of bitters, cordials, and other like preparations.

At the proposed rate of tax of $1.10 per gallon, imposed by section 48 of the bill, the loss of revenue on this quantity of spirits would amount to nearly $10,000,000 yearly, or more than one-half of the estimated increase of revenue to be derived from the additional tax thus imposed.

From a revenue standpoint, and aside from the probable loss of revenue resulting from fraudulent claims, this proposed measure seems open to serious objections; and it may, I think, be fairly questioned whether the consumer of articles manufactured from free alcohol, would, to any extent, be benefited by its enactment.

Respectfully, yours,

JOS. S. MILLER, Commissioner.

HON. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] asks unanimous consent that this bill be now considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED. It is understood that there shall be fifteen minutes debate, at least on our side.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, what is the parliamentary status of this bill? Is there a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will say to the gentleman that under the rules the bill can be considered now. The request I submitted was that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Under the rule it is entitled to consideration now and I moved its consideration and then asked consent that it be considered in the House as in committee. I think the request of the gentleman from Maine, for fifteen minutes debate on each side, is reasonable and I make no objection to it.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, there are important business interests concerned in this bill from whatever point of view you consider it, and hence I have not felt at liberty to give the bill and the action of the Committee of Ways and Means the pillorying which they actually deserve and ought to have. We have passed here a bill agreed upon by a committee, and by the House acting under the advice of that committee, which contains an absurdity which seems to be impossible of belief, and the conference committee, and presumably the House, which was acting under the influence of that committee, knew it all the time.

The interesting tariff bill which we have passed, as you will see by the bill now under consideration, contains a provision by which free alcohol used in the arts is given, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in doing that the bill is so framed that the result is that all along the chemical schedule, and Heaven knows in what other schedules, the duty is raised beyond all belief; a raising which I am sorry to say was omitted from the elaborate table presented by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], although he was aware of it.

In addition to that, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in the letter which has just been read, practically informs this House that the tariff bill as it stands to-day, and as it has gone down the river [laughter], actually abrogates the internal revenue in large part and proportion; and yet the committee, knowing that, advised the Democratic caucus to "climb for it" at once. [Laughter.] I shall have to admit, in mitigation of their offense, that they were relying upon the patriotism of the Republican party not to stand in the way of the public good, even to expose thoroughly and practically burn into the public mind the blunders which their enemies have made. Of course there are plenty more blunders, but perhaps this is the most flagrant, the worst.

It is true that this proposition was presented in the Senate by a gentleman who probably had no idea of the extent of it, or if he had, it was understood in the Senate that the error would be corrected in the regular way; that is, that whatever was incongruous in it would be changed in conference, that whatever was wrong in it would be arranged by the meeting of parties who had that opportunity to carefully consider it. And it will be recollected, Mr. Speaker, that we were brought into an agreement to disagree to the amendments en bloc upon the ground that the conference committee would arrange the incongruities which the House might have discovered in the bill, and that we were disappointed entirely of that, and disappointed of it simply because of a quarrel between the high Democratic officials of the Senate and of the House and of—elsewhere. [Laughter.] I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, so far as any quarrel is concerned, this incongruity is not the result of anything of the kind. The situation is this: In that hurry in which measures so great as this are often closed out on the last day, and without that care which would probably have characterized its consideration on any other day in the Senate, the amendment that this bill seeks to correct was put into the tariff bill on motion of Senator HOAR, of Massachusetts.

So far as I know, there was no member of the conference committee who was not willing and did not desire—indeed, who was not anxious—that this correction should be made. There was no concealment from the House at any time as to the existence of this incongruity. And it may be further said that the bill was passed with a knowledge of its existence. But as we all know—a thing not necessary to be concealed, a thing I could not conceal if I wished, and would not if I could—it finally came to a point where we had to pass the tariff bill with the Senate amendments, this one included, or get no bill at all.

That alternative being left to us, we accepted the Senate amendments, as the country knows. We passed the bill; but in doing so, stood ready to try to correct, and so far as I am individually concerned intending to try to correct, this great impropriety in the bill.

Sir, the difficulty that we encounter is not simply what has been referred to by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; but the whole bill had been framed in this House and had been considered in the Senate on the idea that there was to be taxed alcohol in the arts; and that carries the schedule of articles into which alcohol enters to a very high rate of duty under all bills.

I suppose there never was a tariff bill here in thirty years in which the schedule embracing the articles into which alcohol enters was as low as 100 per cent average; and this results from the fact that the alcohol which enters into such commodities has cost, by reason of the internal-revenue tax placed upon it, four or five times its intrinsic value.

Now, when we got into conference and were unable to agree, unable to get the bill amended in that form, we had, as I stated before, either to take the bill in the form that we passed it, or to get no bill at all. Of the two, I selected the bill in the form in which it passed; and bad as this provision is, I would rather have it—as a patriot, as a man who wishes my country well, as one who legislates the best he can—I would rather have had the bill, even if this provision had to stay in it, than no bill at all. That was a matter the country was interested in.

But it is not best that this provision shall stay in, giving free alcohol in the arts and at the same time raising the duty on the things into which alcohol enters to rates varying from 100 to 200 per cent. That is the whole story. That is the situation. In addition to that, I may say thus much upon the merits of the proposition for free alcohol in the arts:

When we were framing the Mills bill in 1878 we made an effort so to contrive the schedule or the section relating to this subject as to give free alcohol in the arts as far as possible, on the principle of cheapening the materials out of which our manufactured products are made, that we might cheapen the products to the people. But after a very thorough investigation we found it was utterly impracticable to do so.

Later on, when the present law was framed in 1890 my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], my friend from Iowa [Mr. GEAR], my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and other gentlemen on the other side of the House who framed that bill will bear me witness that an effort was made then to see whether it was practicable to give alcohol to the arts free and not give it to the "alimentary canal" free.

As these gentlemen on the other side will testify, we were unable, either in framing the McKinley bill or the Mills bill or any other tariff bill of recent years, to come to the conclusion that it would be wise to recommend to the House free alcohol in the arts, because of the wide door it opened to the fraudulent use of alcohol, or rather to the abuse of the privilege that was given. So much for the merits of the proposition.

Now, as to this measure of correction. Propositions of this kind are not new, because at the very session during which we passed the McKinley bill, certainly at the next session, time after time we had to correct errors which were found in the various sections of that act. I do not desire to say anything further; and unless some other gentleman desires to speak, I will ask a vote.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. HEPBURN. On Monday last, when you made your statement of percentages of reduction and spoke of the chemical schedule, how did you regard this subject then? Was your statement based upon the bill as it then was, or upon the bill as it will be should this amendatory bill be passed?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I did not finish my statement at that time. When I was speaking on the chemical schedule, if the gentleman will remember the facts of that debate, he will also remember that I was cut off in the midst of a sentence, so that I did not have the opportunity to present all the figures as I desired to do, or to discuss the question so fully in the light in which I was undertaking to discuss it as I could have wished.

But so far as this provision is concerned, in justice to myself, as well as in justice to other members of the committee on this side of the House, it is only proper for me to say that everybody, I suppose, knew the effect of this provision. It is an internal-revenue provision, and not a provision affecting import duties.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am speaking of the percentages to which you called attention in the chemical schedule. On what were they based?

Mr. MCMILLIN. They were based on the law as it would be when passed.

Mr. HEPBURN. So that the effect of this is to destroy entirely the accuracy of the figures you submitted? The value of the percentages you then presented is destroyed, so far as the chemical schedule is concerned, by this provision?

Mr. MCMILLIN. No; the percentages I gave would afford more profit to the manufacturer with free alcohol than with taxed. That statement was given on the basis of the high rates provided, of course.

Mr. REED. How does the gentleman mean; on the percentage of free alcohol in the arts?

Mr. MCMILLIN. That statement was given according to the computations, which were made independently of the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. REED. That is, the computation was made with free alcohol in the arts?

Mr. MCMILLIN. No, sir; the computation was made on the basis of taxed alcohol in the arts, and afterwards it was made free. So that the statement was made on the provision of the law as it now stands in the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. How is that——

Mr. MCMILLIN (continuing). I may not have expressed myself felicitously. I meant to say——

Mr. REED. Well, I hope the gentleman will get it straight.

Mr. MCMILLIN (continuing). That that statement was based upon the rates of duty that would exist with taxed alcohol in the arts.

Mr. REED. Yes, with taxed alcohol. In other words, you did not quote the statistics that were applicable to the bill that you were passing, but to the bill that you were hoping to pass or the bill that you were passing, provided it was corrected.

Mr. MCMILLIN. As I have already stated to my friend, Mr. Speaker, the computation was made on the basis of the bill as it then existed. These computations, the gentleman must know, are the work of weeks; work that can not be performed in a day or a week or a month. They were made and completed before the section was added that we are seeking to amend.

Mr. REED. So the statement of the gentleman applied to the bill that you were passing with an amendment.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have made my statement.

Mr. REED. Very well; the gentleman has made his statement. Now I will make mine.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will be very glad to hear from the gentleman.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Tennessee gives to this House statistics about the percentages covered by the bill—a worthless set of statistics, that are worthless if they are accurate and doubly so if they are inaccurate—and gives this statement of statistics not founded on the bill as it passed, or the bill he was urging the House to adopt, but on a bill he expected to become law through modifications adopted by the good sense of the future.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman will allow an interruption.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. For I am quite sure the gentleman would not wish to do me an injustice.

Mr. REED. Most assuredly I would not.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Maine knows full well that the statistics I was giving were based on importations, and not on internal revenue. This provision that we are now considering relates exclusively to internal revenue, and has nothing whatever to do with tariff rates on imported alcohol or imported articles made of alcohol in part.

Mr. REED. In other words, the worthless set of statistics were based on a worthless set of importations, and the gentleman now appends to that set another set of statistics equally as strong and more worthless.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will again state for the benefit of my friend from Maine that the statement then made, to which he refers, was based on importations. This relates to the internal-revenue regulations, not a matter of importation at all; and my figures were correct from start to finish, and I stand by them.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not true that this bill simply reduces the profit of those who use alcohol in the arts? In other words, the import duties were adjusted so as to compensate for the internal tax on alcohol used in the manufacture of such articles and the amendment giving free alcohol without reducing the import duty to correspond, gave them an unfair and unintended protection. This bill, as I understand, restores the tax on such alcohol and leaves the import duties untouched, thus reducing the profit of the manufacturer without changing the rate of duty or the average of the schedule.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is unquestionably the effect of it.

Mr. REED. They were correct from start to finish, with this modification, that they were worthless on general principles; they were worthless in this particular instance because they were founded on importations under other bills, and also they were founded upon a bill which did not exist, instead of the bill which was being passed. Now I really could add to my former statement, thanks to my friend. I want to say to him that in all of this I do not in the least make any charge of disingenuousness against him. I have always found him straightforward, stating the thing as he understood it, and probably at the time it had escaped his mind that his calculation was based, not on the bill he was passing, but possibly on a bill that he would have loved to pass, if he had not loved and lost. [Laughter.]

Now, here is the situation. The Democratic party in Congress assembled, Senate, House of Representatives, and Executive, were all working together, so close together that you could not tell which our Committee on Ways and Means belonged to at any time, not knowing where the House left off and the President began; but notwithstanding all this harmony of thought and feeling, and of desire, the result is that they passed a bill, and the very first minute afterwards they had to pass four other humbug bills, in order to deceive the people in connection with it, and then in order to prevent the business of the country and the internal revenue of the country from going to pieces, they bring in a bill here the passage of which absolutely depends upon the magnanimity and patriotism of their enemies. For this bill is not a decent bill with reference to free alcohol, with reference to the purpose for which it was intended, and it is coupled with other things which make it still worse for the country.

Why, if we treated the business of the country in the way those men would treat it if they were in our places, there would be not only the ruin and destruction which they intended, but no end of ruin and destruction that they did not have the sense to anticipate.

Mr. BRYAN. May I ask the gentleman from Maine a question in regard to alcohol?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not true that this amendment merely affects the profit which the man manufacturing the article would make and not the rate of duty imposed by the bill?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not true that by simply amending this we do not give him free alcohol, and therefore lessen his profit without affecting the rate on the imported goods at all?

Mr. REED. Oh, no; the gentleman from Nebraska actually knows better than to ask me such a question as that.

Mr. BRYAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I do not.

Mr. REED. He may not know that he does, but he does. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. I ask the gentleman, because I am seeking information.

Mr. REED. I am well aware that I am making a mistake in talking about the Democratic party in this situation, just as I once before made a mistake in my own State. They endeavored in the most outrageous fashion to steal the State, and they would have actually stolen it if it had not been for the Supreme Court. I went around and told the people so, and it was so utterly incredible that they thought I was overstating it, and I have no doubt to-day that even some of these Democrats who listen to me think I am overstating it. The actual truth is so atrocious that they think I am overstating it; but the head ones do not. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine has not had his usual accuracy of discrimination to-day. The gentleman from Maine knows, as I do, that the bill we passed, and which this is to correct, is made up of two different classes of taxation, one that pertains to import duties, the other which pertains to the internal revenue or the collections from internal sources. Now, the amendment of Mr. HOAR which we are trying to correct, was never proposed to that portion of the bill which fixes import duties.

It is an internal-revenue regulation altogether, and hence does not affect the rates of duty one way or another, except that it would, if this bill failed to pass, enable, possibly, the manufacturers of the things into which alcohol enters to make a greater profit by reason of the high rate of duty that would exist, and the low cost of the alcohol used by reason of its being free from internal-revenue tax.

The gentleman knows this full well when he comes to think about it; and I know he would not do me any injustice.

Mr. REED. I know I would not.

Mr. McMILLIN. He knows that this amendment pertains to the internal revenue and does not affect the tariff rates on articles, and does not affect the calculations thereon one particle.

Mr. REED. Let me ask the gentleman whether, when he takes the tax off wool and leaves it on woolens the same, would not the protection be raised on the woolens 25 per cent?

Mr. McMILLIN. That is when they are imported. Both are regulated under tariff rates. One is not governed by an internal tax and the other by an import tax. These spirits provided for by the Hoar amendment are not imported.

Mr. REED. But what difference does it make?

Mr. McMILLIN. The wool is imported and the woolen goods to be imported; but this pertains to the internal revenue.

Mr. REED. Who knows that the alcohol is not to be imported?

Mr. McMILLIN. The importation of alcohol, as the gentleman knows, comes under a different section of the bill, that pertaining to import duties.

Mr. REED. When you make these tariff items you make them with an allowance for the tax. If you take the tax off you make the duties higher, and you make the hrotection higher.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman does not catch the distinction. This is a matter of the internal-revenue section, and has no relation to the duties at all.

Mr. Speaker, I now demand the previous question.

Mr. BURROWS. I would like to ask my friend when this measure, if it shall pass, is to become a law?

Mr. McMILLIN. When it is approved by the President, or within ten days after it reaches him.

Mr. BURROWS. This repeals the provisions of the existing act for free alcohol. There is no such law now. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this: That care must be taken to have the President sign this bill after he signs this other. If he should sign this before he signs the other, then we would have free alcohol.

Mr. McMILLIN. As he is our President, we will try to take care of that.

Mr. BURROWS. I only suggested that in order that care should be taken in the matter.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it true that about 9,000,000 gallons of alcohol are supposed to be used in the arts?

Mr. McMILLIN. It is not true that 9,000,000 gallons of alcohol are now used in the arts. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue estimates that there would be about 8,000,000 gallons consumed in the arts under the increased use that would come from free alcohol; but at the present time there are about 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 gallons only thus used.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then, this increases the taxation to the extent of that number of millions.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would say more accurately that the failure to pass this bill would cause a loss of that amount of revenue.

Mr. HEPBURN. And that this will increase the tax that will be raised under the bill passed last Monday about $8,000,000 or $9,000,000.

Mr. McMILLIN. No, sir. It will not increase it that much, because the calculations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are based upon the increased use that would come from the Hoar amendment. He stated it would cause a loss on that which is now supposed to be used in the arts of probably $4,000,000 or $5,000,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. Was it not expected, and was it not so stated, that the bill as it passed would yield a surplus revenue; and if that be true, why do you want to increase that revenue even to the extent of $6,000,000.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will state to my friend from Iowa that, even if we take his position to be correct, there is a higher ground on which to base this bill. The highest ground upon which this action can be taken is that it shuts the door to fraud and makes it impossible to defraud the Government, and prevents the whisky which it is claimed is taken for use in the arts from being used in another way, thereby preventing frauds on the Government.

Mr. HEPBURN. Assuming that is true, when that proposition for free alcohol in the arts was placed in the bill, was it put there without thought of any sort of the difficulties in the administration of the law?

Mr. McMILLIN. I can not state what were the motives of the gentlemen who put it in there. I have no wish to criticise their motives. I would not be allowed to criticise them if I wanted to; but it was done in the last night of that memorable contest, and in that hurry that often occurs in the passage of such bills.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is your motive in modifying it now, when you commended the bill so earnestly the other day?

Mr. McMILLIN. I have been chairman of the subcommittee having charge of the internal-revenue feature of the bill, and we never recommended it to the full committee when we framed this bill. We never did so on the Mills bill, and on the McKinley bill they refused to allow free alcohol for use in the arts. I was willing to take the bill with free alcohol in the arts rather than have no tariff legislation, trusting to amend it where necessary.

Now, I demand the previous question.

Mr. BRYAN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would be glad to have two minutes.

Mr. McMILLIN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that if there is any bill that ever passed this House and Senate that the Secretary of the Treasury and the President knew all about it is this tariff bill.

Over a month ago the Senate amendments had been so closely examined by the President that he wrote his letter to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON]. They were prepared, too, after the fullest consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury. Now the bill has gone to the President and I do not know whether it is going to be signed. Do you? Rumor says in ten days, or that it will never be signed. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] intimates that it has gone "down the river." I do know one thing, that every day until it is signed (if it is to be signed) a million gallons of whisky are being taken out of bond, and the day the bill is signed 20 cents in value per gallon will be added to that whisky. That is $200,000 a day.

I know another thing; that sugar is coming in, cargo after cargo—all of it that did not get in in advance—and the day that bill is signed every ton of sugar that comes in from now until then will have $25 added to its value. Now, how much longer the gentlemen who are taking whisky out of bond and importing sugar are to be allowed for their operations, I do not know, but it amounts to from $800,000 to $1,000,000 a day, and I wanted to call attention to it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to ask the gentleman who presents this bill another question. We have manufacturing warehouses where articles are manufactured in which alcohol is a component part. The present law provides for a rebate of the internal-revenue tax on the alcohol so used. I ask the gentleman if it is the purpose of this bill to repeal that law?

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is not the purpose to repeal the law on the subject of exportation at all.

Mr. HEPBURN. But does not this bill do it?

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is not the purpose of the bill, and I do not think it has that effect.

Mr. HEPBURN. This is so broad and general that it seems to me to repeal all laws authorizing a rebate on alcohol.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That was not and is not the purpose of it.

Mr. HEPBURN. But that is the only existing law under which there is a rebate. We have no other such law, and if the bill is not intended to repeal that, then it is entirely unnecessary, because there is nothing for it to operate upon.

Mr. MCMILLIN. There is no purpose to repeal those laws.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 122, noes 5.

Mr. HEPBURN. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MCMILLIN.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 145, noes 3.

Mr. HEPBURN. I withdraw the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MCMILLIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CLANCY, by unanimous consent, obtained indefinite leave of absence.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 17, 1894.

Prayer by Rev. J. H. M'CARTY, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PEFFER was, on his own motion, excused from attending the session of the Senate to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 127 and 128 to the bill H. R. 7477, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 971) to open, widen, and extend alleys in the District of Columbia.

The message further requested the Senate to furnish the House with a duplicate copy of the bill (S. 1252) to provide for the times and places to hold terms of the United States courts in the State of Washington, the original having been misplaced.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7977) to amend the internal-revenue laws of the United States; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 253) granting a pension to Maria Hall, widow of Joseph E. Doak, deceased;

A bill (S. 1772) extending the time for the completion of a railroad bridge over the Columbia River at or near Vancouver, in the State of Washington;

A bill (S. 1885) to extend the privileges of the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement to the city of Ocala, in the State of Florida;

A bill (S. 2268) providing for reconveyance by District Commissioners of certain lands to Andrew J. Curtis and Mary E. Curtis;

A bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 68) for the relief of W. D. Mack, a clerk in the Record and Pension Division of the War Department.

FINANCE COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate fill the vacancy on the Finance Committee, occasioned by the death of the late Senator Vance, by the appointment of the Senator from California, Mr. WHITE.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I object. I ask that the motion may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. I take it that this is a privileged motion, which is not subject to the ordinary suggestion as to resolutions in the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator cite some authority for that claim?

Mr. HARRIS. It is privileged owing to the fact that it looks to the organization of this body, and is therefore not subject to the ordinary rule as to an objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is rather late in the session to begin to organize this body.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the reading of the rule, which is that all resolutions shall go over one day if objected to. This is a substantial matter. Here is a vacancy on the committee that has existed for months, and it is proposed to fill it as the session is approaching its close. It is a vacancy that has stood without any attempt to fill it. When I inquired a few days ago of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] whether he proposed to have it filled, he said he did not.

Now, the filling of a vacancy upon a committee is a substantial thing. It is the same as if a formal resolution were offered that the Senator from California be appointed a member of the committee, and if that is not a resolution which must go over under the rule that all resolutions objected to shall go over one day, I can conceive of almost no resolution that would go over.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I take it for granted it is not necessary to address any argument to the Chair to sustain the position taken by the Senator from New Hampshire. During my service in the Senate there have been frequent cases where this precise question has been raised. It was raised at the present session upon a resolution to fill the same vacancy in the same committee. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], the chairman of the Finance Committee, made a motion that the vacancy be filled by the appointment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] objected to its consideration, and it went over under the rule.

I take it for granted that we are not at this time in the session to enter upon revolutionary proceedings in a matter of this kind, and I certainly believe that there will be resistance to any such revolutionary processes. I presume that the rules of the Senate will be carried out, and that the Presiding Officer needs no further suggestion in this connection.

Mr. MILLS. I think it proper for me to say that the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] to place me on the Committee on Finance was without my consent and without consultation with me, and I informed the Senator that under no circumstances would I accept that assignment.

Mr. ALDRICH. The question I was suggesting was not in regard to that matter, it was only as to the right of objection to a resolution of this nature.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, my motion looks to the completion of the organization of this body and is not subject, in my opinion, to the objection which the Senator from New Hampshire makes. But be that as it may, I want to say that it is with profound astonishment that I hear an objection from that side of this Chamber upon a question such as this. During the eighteen years I have had the honor of holding a seat upon this floor, no matter what party was in the majority, the members who sat over there have named at will, and without objection, criticism, or question, such committee representation as they were entitled to, and no voice was ever heard on this side of the Chamber to object, to criticise, or to suggest anything contrary to their wish. This side of the Chamber, no matter what party was in the majority, have named without objection, without suggestion, and without a word of complaint, their representation upon the various committees of this body.

This is the most revolutionary of all revolutionary ideas I have heard suggested since I have had the honor of holding a seat upon this floor. Let the Chair decide the question as he thinks the parliamentary law of the case demands, but I can not refrain from putting on record the facts as I have stated them and the expression of my profound astonishment, and, if I were to indulge myself, I should put upon record language perhaps not altogether parliamentary.

Mr. ALDRICH (in his seat). I hope the Senator will not refrain from doing so.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think the Senator from Tennessee has exercised any very great amount of restraint over himself.

Mr. HARRIS. He did not try to do so.

Mr. MANDERSON. His amazement only seems to be excelled by his excitement over an appeal to the Presiding Officer that he shall enforce the rules of this body.

Mr. President, what is this but a resolution—a resolution providing that a vacancy which has existed for months past shall be filled by the appointment of the Senator from California? It is called a motion by the Senator from Tennessee. It is a resolution; it is a resolution that on the demand of any Senator would be required to be reduced to writing. It is not a motion that pertains to some pending measure; it is a new matter.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me?

Mr. MANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. I dislike to hear the distinguished Senator from Nebraska waste his time upon the assumption that I have undertaken to draw a distinction between a motion and a resolution. The Senator from Tennessee said no such thing as the Senator from Nebraska attributes to him. My motion is a motion; but if put in writing, it would be in the form of a resolution. I make no such point as the Senator from Nebraska is attributing to me; I have made none such; I do not propose to.

Mr. MANDERSON. Then, Mr. President, it seems to me that the argument of the Senator from Tennessee is entirely pointless. Admitting that it is a resolution, it comes under the rule—

All resolutions shall lie over one day for consideration unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

Mr. President, here is a new matter brought before the Senate this morning, one that is entitled to the consideration of every member of this body. There can be no question about it that on the objection of any single Senator it must go over; and certainly that which conforms to the rule can not be revolutionary or objectionable. We have the right to appeal to the rules that govern us and compel their enforcement when a case comes within them.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, if I were at this moment to move that the Senate do now adjourn, and any Senator on this floor should require me to put that motion in writing, it would necessarily be in the form of a resolution: "Resolved, That the Senate do now adjourn." Would the Senator from Nebraska or any other Senator say that it had to go over a day? There are exceptions to the rules; and when a motion is made looking to the completion of the organization of this body it is a question of the highest privilege, and a question that is not within the rule of ordinary resolutions, in the opinion of myself.

Mr. CHANDLER. But a motion to adjourn, Mr. President, is always in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. By the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. By the express rules of the Senate. But a resolution to fill a vacancy on a committee is a substantial matter, made such by the rules of the Senate, and it must go over one day if objected to.

Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss any longer the question of order, the justice of which is apparent, but to protest against the philippic which the Senator from Tennessee has delivered against a Senator for simply asking that the rules of the Senate may be complied with.

The Senator from Tennessee assumes that I have objected to the filling of this vacancy by the appointment of the Senator from California. I have made no such objection. I have simply asked that the resolution for the appointment of that Senator shall go over in accordance with the rules of the Senate. When it comes up to-morrow, I do not know that I shall object to the passage of the resolution.

But, Mr. President, it comes with an ill grace from the Senator from Tennessee to denounce Senators for simply invoking the rules of the Senate, which he professes so well to understand and in the construction of which he is such distinguished authority. He condemns a mere request made under such rules, and denounces me and Senators upon this side of the Chamber for simply asking that the Senate may proceed in a dignified and an orderly way to do the rest of the business which it may wish to do at this session. I resent the imputation, and consider it entirely illegitimate and uncalled for. When the Senator from Tennessee attempts to put down Senators who simply ask that the rules of the Senate shall be observed, and is successful in doing it, he will have to be a great deal older than he is on this day.

Mr. HILL obtained the floor.

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator yield to me one moment?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANDERSON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that Rule XXIV requires—and this will show the very material difference there is between a motion to adjourn and a resolution to appoint a member of a committee—that unless otherwise ordered by the Senate all members of committees shall be elected by ballot. So that could be required if any Senator saw fit to demand it.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, in the discussion of this simple parliamentary question it is perhaps unnecessary that I should say a word in regard to the pending legislation in reference to which, or to effect which, it is suspected this vacancy is to be filled. So far as the bills which were disposed of yesterday by a reference to the Finance Committee are concerned, permit me to say that I am in favor of placing upon the free list coal, iron ore, and sugar. I voted that way when the question was legitimately before the Senate. I am not trying to escape from my record now. Having said this much, I shall go further, and say that I am ready again to vote to place those articles upon the free list.

I am not called upon to say that those bills may not require further amendment; I am not called upon to say that you ought to pick out simply these particular articles and pass these bills without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," and say that that is the test of true Democracy.

Certain concessions were made, not by myself, but by some of my personal friends and associates, during the tariff debate. Some of them voted, I think, against their better judgment on some propositions which I made to the Senate, because they felt honorably bound so to do by virtue of a caucus of which they were members, and in which they took part, and in regard to the proceedings of which it was well known I was not bound. If that agreement is to be rent in twain and special and separate bills are now to be passed in sections, I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate certain amendments to these bills, so that I may have a vote of this body upon the propositions which were voted down—not because they were disapproved, but because Senators felt they could not vote according to their individual judgment and conscience. I feel bound, if all caucus agreements are now to be cast aside, to present those questions again for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. President, having said this much, permit me to ask, it is proposed to do what? The bills have been referred to a committee of this body against my vote. I was yesterday willing to take them up and dispose of them without their having a vote of a committee, either with a favorable report or an adverse report.

I need not remind the Senate of the complexion of the Committee on Finance heretofore; I need not remind Senators that there was a majority of the Finance Committee against the income tax; and, if they had felt at liberty to vote according to their judgments and their consciences, there would have been an adverse report upon that portion of the tariff bill. What are you seeking to do now? Is it proposed to pack the committee in order that it shall again come before the Senate with an adverse report upon the amendments which I have offered?

One word more. Mr. President, heretofore in appointments to fill vacancies in committees the Democratic members of this body have usually been consulted. When the vacancy was filled upon the Commerce Committee and another committee—I now forget which committee it was—we were called together in conference, and the so-called steering committee submitted to our judgment certain names before the appointments were brought into the open Senate. They were agreed to. I have heard of no such consultation now; the Democratic members of the Senate have not been called together; but without my knowledge, without any opportunity for consultation, it is proposed this morning to fill this vacancy, at the suggestion I do not even know of whom; possibly of the steering committee. I may assume that to be the case.

I do not know why a different course is sought to be pursued in the filling of this most important vacancy than was pursued when the vacancies on the Commerce Committee and the other committees were filled. As a representative of a great State, with the largest population of any State in the Union, perhaps I might have been permitted to suggest that its interests and representatives here should have been consulted. I do not propose now to speak of the complexion or sectional character of the present steering committee or of the Finance Committee of the Senate. I shall wait and speak of that subject later if it shall be necessary.

Mr. President, I now address myself to the parliamentary question whether the filling of a vacancy upon a committee is a matter of privilege. It has not been made such expressly by the rules. I defy Senators to point to a single provision of the rules which says that the filling of a vacancy on a committee is a matter of privilege. It is not laid down among the privileged motions. Therefore it must be some implied power; it must be claimed that it arises from some other provision of the rules. The presentation of a conference report is held to be a privileged matter. Yet the other day, when I made a motion to discharge a conference committee, the Presiding Officer held that the motion must go over for a day.

Although the report itself was privileged, it was held that a resolution to discharge our own conferees, that they might make a special report, which I then contended was a matter of privilege or might fairly be held to be a matter of privilege, must go over for a day. If that was a sound ruling, and I did not test the sense of the Senate in regard to it, but assumed it to be correct, then I submit that the filling of this vacancy is not a privileged question which can be brought up at any time.

Mr. President, it matters not particularly when this vacancy shall be filled, if it is to be filled at this session. I do not think it is wise to make haste in a matter so important. I doubt the wisdom of a policy which seeks to fill a vacancy with a special view of immediate legislation upon particular matters. There will be legislation in the future. There will be matters of as vast importance as these four bills upon which we shall be called to pass. I suggest to Democratic friends upon this side of the Chamber whether it would not be wise to allow the resolution to go over until to-morrow, and let us have a consultation upon the subject, as we did before. Let some of us who have views, who represent large constituencies, be heard.

I agree with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] in regard to one point. This is our matter, not yours upon the other side. It is a matter which we ourselves should dispose of, and I regret to see thrown into the Senate a contest in which the other side shall be permitted substantially to select a Democratic member of the Committee on Finance. I think common courtesy and the rules require it, and the custom of the Senate heretofore fixes the precedent that we upon this side should settle it.

As a parliamentary question, freed from any feeling whatever, in my judgment the resolution is not privileged, and can not be called such without a great stretch of the rules. In the second place, as a matter of policy, I think it is wise that we should consult in regard to the matter. It can do no harm; it may do much good. Need I remind my Democratic friends here of the absence of consultation and of its results? From the commencement of the tariff legislation up to this hour it has been blunder piled upon blunder. We find the chairman of the Ways Means Committee with a ringing speech, presumably speaking ex cathedra, demanding of the House of Representatives that there shall be free sugar.

The Democratic public sentiment of the country recognizes that voice as the voice of the Administration. Democratic conventions meet in distant States and adopt resolutions in favor of free sugar, committing the party to that principle, of which I do not personally complain, and at the very moment when they were adopting those resolutions a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury was sending here a protest against placing sugar upon the free list as a suicidal policy.

Mr. President, it strikes me there had better be more consultation, in order that we may avoid these conflicting policies. If it is necessary for the Treasury that there should be a duty upon sugar, let there be consultation on the subject before further legislation. Let us mark out a policy upon which we can all agree, if we can. Let us try it. In the spirit of harmony, which should prevail, I suggest to my Democratic friends that we should adjourn and have a consultation or conference upon this subject.

Mr. HARRIS. I choose to put my motion in the form of a resolution, and rather than waste more of the time of the Senate this morning I ask that it be read, printed, and lie on the table until to-morrow morning, when I shall ask its consideration immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

Mr. QUAY. I make the point of order that the resolution is out of order at the present time.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the resolution be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the point of order raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. QUAY. I make the point of order that the resolution is not in order at the present time. The order of resolutions has not been reached. The routine morning business has not yet been called in its order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think if the Chair will proceed with the call, calling first for petitions and memorials, we shall soon reach the order of resolutions, and then the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee will be in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution presented by the Senator from Tennessee, to which objection is interposed, has been withdrawn. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Tennessee did not withdraw the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Tennessee to withdraw the resolution for the present.

Mr. HARRIS. I put my motion in the form of a written resolution, and I consented that it might go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will entertain the resolution when that order is reached, as there is objection to its reception at this time.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to call up the bill (S. 2307) to require the prompt prosecution and speedy determination of the claim of the United States against the estate of the late Leland Stanford.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I object.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the morning business be dispatched.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that petitions and memorials are in order.

MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented sundry memorials of citizens of Pekin and Zion, in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against the support of the Government in maintaining the present system of sectarian Indian education, etc.; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 79) for the relief of Peter Hagan, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2342) to reimburse George C. Tanner, late consul, etc., the sum of $200 paid by him for rent of rooms, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 284) to reimburse George C. Tanner, late consul, etc., the sum of $200 paid by him for rent of rooms, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2317) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Nicholas Swingle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PALMER, it was

Resolved, That any and all papers on file in the office of the Secretary of Senate or Senate Committee on Pensions in connection with Senate bill 1705 granting a pension to Isaiah Queman, be, and the same are hereby, withdrawn from said files, there having been no adverse report made thereon.

FINANCE COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the vacancy in the Finance Committee of the Senate occasioned by the death of the late Senator Vance be filled by the appointment of the Hon. STEPHEN M. WHITE, a Senator from the State of California.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let it be printed and go over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the action of the House——

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the order in reference to the resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What was the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARRIS. I consent that the resolution may lie over until to-morrow, when I shall ask for its consideration. I ask that the resolution be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule, and be printed.

INEXPEDIENCY OF FURTHER REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. MURPHY. I submit a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That in view of the statement in the letter of the Hon. John G. Carlisle, Secretary of the Treasury, dated Washington, August 15, 1894, addressed to Hon. I. G. HARRIS, acting chairman of the Finance Committee, that the estimated surplus revenue for the year will not exceed $15,000,000, it is the judgment of the Senate that no further legislation or change in the revenue laws should be made at this session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLS. I object.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution lie over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule on objection.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL. I submit a conference report on the general deficiency bill and ask that it be concurred in.

The only question in dispute is a part of Senate amendment 127 and Senate amendment 128. Senate amendment 127 included judgments of the Court of Claims and comprised nearly sixty pages of the bill. At the end of the amendment a provision was inserted to pay to the Southern Pacific Company $1,809,539.70 in satisfaction of a judgment of the Court of Claims, which the Committee on Appropriations thought was honestly and justly due and ought to be paid. That amount was inserted in the bill by the Senate and the aggregate was increased accordingly.

The House conferees have peremptorily refused to agree to the amendment, and the Senate conferees have been compelled to recede. Consequently, the language adopted in the report had to be used in order to state the amount properly. The report simply strikes out "To Southern Pacific Company, $1,809,539.70," and makes the total in Senate amendment 128 correspond to that change.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The conference report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 127 and 128 to the bill (H. R. 7477) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 127, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out the last three lines of the matter inserted by said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 128, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert $1,274,246.15; and the Senate agree to the same.

F. M. COCKRELL,
CALVIN S. BRICE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

ALLEYS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FAULKNER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 971) to open, widen and extend alleys in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

CHAS. J. FAULKNER,
JNO. MARTIN,
JAMES McMILLAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
H. W. RUSK,
A. C. HARMER.
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

RECENT ELECTION IN ALABAMA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] coming over from a previous day.

The resolution submitted by Mr. CHANDLER on the 11th instant was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be directed to inquire into the facts of the election held in the State of Alabama on the 6th of the present month of August, and to ascertain and report whether such election was full, fair, free, and honest, and resulted in the choice of a Legislature entitled to elect a United States Senator, and that said committee as a whole or by a subcommittee shall have power to send for persons and papers and sit during the approaching recess of Congress.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the resolution may go over until to-morrow and retain its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COURTS IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives for a duplicate copy of the bill (S. 1252) to provide for the times and places to hold terms of the United States courts in the State of Washington, the original having been misplaced; and by unanimous consent it was ordered that the request be complied with.

INVESTIGATION BY THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. BUTLER on the 15th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and is hereby, authorized and instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether the Southern Steamship and Railway Association has violated the interstate commerce law in the fixing of its passenger and freight rates differentials for the shipment of freight from the interior to or through its various port points, or otherwise, and whether said rates are not in derogation of the law of competition, intended to be preserved by said interstate-commerce law.

Second. And, if it should find said rates in violation of the interstate-commerce law, said committee is hereby further instructed to report in what respect said rates violate said law, and suggest a remedy for a correction of the same.

That said committee have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate at such points as may be most convenient for a full and complete investigation of the matters embraced in the foregoing, and shall have authority to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and examine witnesses and employ a stenographer; and the necessary expenses incurred by said committee in the conduct of the investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

INVESTIGATION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was recommitted the following resolution, submitted by Mr. RANSOM on the 10th instant, reported it without amendment, and asked for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to sit during the recess of Congress, and to visit and examine the Pacific coast between Points Duma and Capistrano, with a view to determining the best location for the construction of a deep-water harbor. Said committee is also hereby authorized to visit and examine such other works of river and harbor improvement on the Pacific coast, existing or proposed, as in their judgment the interests of commerce may demand, and shall have power to subpœna witnesses, to administer oaths, and take testimony, to employ a stenographer, and to appoint a sergeant-at-arms from the messengers of the Senate; and that the actual necessary expenses of said committee, properly incurred, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate in the usual manner.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I did not understand that the preceding resolution was to be reported and put on its passage, or necessarily I should have objected to it, as I shall have to object to the adoption of the pending resolution.

Mr. President, I protest that it is not right to appoint a whole standing committee to go to California or to any other place between this time and the convening of Congress in December next. Everybody knows that Senators will be engaged in the canvasses in their respective States, and there is not time to make such an investigation as ought to be made, and it ought not to be done by the whole committee. A subcommittee of three members, or not exceeding five, can do the work, and do it more efficiently than the whole committee; and we are piling up unnecessary cost.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words with reference to this matter. I think my friend from Missouri does not fully understand the situation. It is proposed by the Government of the United States, upon the recommendation of the War Department, to establish an extensive breakwater for commercial purposes on the Pacific coast between the points designated. There never has been any doubt about the necessity or desirability of the establishment of such a harbor, but there has been some doubt as to where it should be located. The Government engineers upon the one hand have taken a position, and certain Senators who are also familiar with the subject have taken another position.

Personally, though living in the part of the State affected by the measure, I do not agree with some of my fellow-Senators upon the committee. The leading business men in that portion of California came here and appeared before the Commerce Committee. There was a great deal of evidence taken, and after it was taken the full committee met and considered the matter carefully, and half of its membership were unable to express an opinion and declared that they could not vote until they saw the ground.

As far as I am personally concerned I care nothing about the pleasures of the trip, for I shall be on the ground myself, and go there before the committee can reach the State, and probably I shall have to leave at a different time from that when the committee will leave. But this is the most important work contemplated to-day upon the western coast of this country. It is a matter not only of local importance, but it is designed through this port to carry the Oriental freight across the United States to the Gulf of Mexico and from there by water to New York. It is a matter, therefore, of great national importance, and is so regarded by the War Department. It is impossible to obtain the necessary information through a subcommittee. The affair has been hung up already for two years awaiting a definite report from the committee. As to the expense, if the Government of the United States can not stand it, if it is too much for this great Government to pay, although there is an outlay contemplated of over $2,000,000, I am satisfied that I could in a little time raise the money by subscription in my own State.

But when the Committee on Commerce, composed, with the exception of myself, of some of the most distinguished members of this body, men of experience here and long standing upon the committee, unite as to the necessity of this investigation, I think there ought to be no question of its advisibility raised in the Senate.

I can assure the Senator from Missouri (who deserves the greatest credit for preventing disbursements in cases where they are not necessary) that this is an exceptional case, and it should be so regarded by the Senate as it is so regarded by every member of the committee. It is a matter of vital importance to my State. The Senate will recollect that even an item of $40,000 that was inserted in the river and harbor appropriation bill with reference to the stretch of coast included within the two points mentioned in the resolution was eliminated because of this discussion, and because it was impossible to tell where the appropriation could be placed at this time. We are waiting for the investigation of the committee. The whole of the country interested is waiting for it; and there is no method of reaching a satisfactory determination of the question except by having the committee make a trip to the Pacific coast as proposed. When the Senators whom I have mentioned agree upon the matter, I think it should be satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is now pending an existing order of the Senate directing the Committee on Commerce to make this investigation.

Mr. WHITE. That is true. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CHANDLER. It was passed more than a year ago.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that the chairman of the committee, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], was unable to call the committee together because of certain engagements at that time. I might here say that the objection made by my friend the Senator from Missouri, that it will be about election time will not avail, because every member of the committee has expressed a determination to go there immediately after election, regardless of his feelings.

Mr. CHANDLER. The order of the Senate last year was not carried out, I understand, because Congress was called in extra session on the 7th of August, and it was impossible for the committee to perform the duty which it was commanded by the Senate to perform.

Mr. RANSOM. If the Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me, I will state that I agree with him in his view as to the previous order, but the committee thought it was best to have the approval of the Senate upon this resolution, and not to trust to the one requiring an investigation last year.

Mr. CHANDLER. I recognize the propriety of the resolution, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there was a discussion in the Senate in reference to this harbor of refuge, which it was expected would cost many hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. STEWART. Two millions.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly, if it is to cost $2,000,000, the money of the United States will be well expended in allowing the Committee on Commerce to see the ground and the water which are to constitute the harbor of refuge. I repeat my argument of yesterday, which I hope will commend itself to the Senator from Missouri, that when an important committee of this body takes the responsibility of deciding how it shall investigate, in what manner it shall do its work, the decision of that committee, unless the committee is to be discredited by the Senate, ought to be accepted and adopted and approved by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, the pending resolution, which authorizes the Committee on Commerce of the Senate to send a subcommittee to California for the purpose of examining what point upon the coast of Southern California is the best for the location of a deep-water harbor, is a resolution that should be adopted. The question of establishing a deep-water harbor upon the coast of Southern California has occupied the attention of Congress for the last four or five years. Several Boards of Engineers have been authorized by different acts of Congress for the purpose of examining this coast and determining where is the best place to construct the proposed deep-water harbor. These commissions have reported, and hearings upon this question have been had repeatedly by the River and Harbor Committee of the House and by the Commerce Committee of the Senate. These hearings have resulted in creating considerable doubt and uncertainty as to the correctness of the conclusions of the Boards of Engineers as to the particular locality where the harbor should be constructed.

I know a good deal about this matter. I have had occasion to deal with it in the other branch of Congress. I am not satisfied myself that the particular locality which the Board of Engineers have recommended as the best place for the construction of a deep-water harbor is the one that Congress should adopt. I believe there is so much doubt about the matter that it would be wise on the part of the Senate to send a subcommittee of its Committee on Commerce to investigate the merits of the port of Los Angeles, known as Santa Monica, and the merits of the San Pedro Harbor. These are the rival claimants to this harbor. It would be well to do this, and thus, looking to the future needs as well as to the present needs of commerce, to determine which of these localities is the one where the deep-water harbor should be located.

Congress can not be too careful to avoid a mistake about this harbor. The Government will be called upon to expend millions of dollars in its construction. It is to be a harbor for the accommodation of the deep-draft vessels of the ocean. We do not want hastily to make up our minds as to its location. We want to be sure we are right and then go ahead. It is better to encounter a little more delay and expend a little more money in investigation than run the risk of error.

I think, therefore, it is wise to send a subcommittee out there, after the adjournment of the present session, in order that its members may by personal observation and investigation satisfy themselves which of the competing points is the one where the deep-water harbor should be constructed.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not know the exact nature of the objection which is made to the resolution, but I desire to say that if the Committee on Commerce of this body and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House could be authorized and induced to spend the recess between every session of Congress in examining the great river and harbor improvements in the United States, every dollar expended in that way would, in my judgment, save hundreds of dollars to the Government.

So far as this resolution is concerned, no one need fear that too many members of the committee will make the examination proposed. It will be very difficult indeed to get a sufficient number of the members of the committee to leave their homes and their own affairs to make the trip. It is understood that the investigation will not be made until after the November election.

There is great necessity for a deep-water harbor near Los Angeles, on the California coast. The Government has improved the inner harbor for light-draft vessels at Wilmington, which is but another name for San Pedro; an improvement at San Pedro for deeper vessels has been recommended. Members of the committee and others who have visited San Pedro and Santa Monica believe that Santa Monica, a few miles up the coast and at a less distance from Los Angeles than San Pedro, is a preferable point. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company expended about a million dollars at San Pedro, and until quite recently favored that place. It favored it at the same time the first report was made recommending an improvement there, but has abandoned that place and gone to Santa Monica, and built a wharf at an expense of about a million of dollars.

All these things have left the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, and I think of the House also, in doubt as to where this improvement should be made; and while there is pressing importance for the improvement, there are a number of members of the committee who do not desire to act upon the matter at all until it has been investigated by the committee. So far as I am concerned, I had made up my mind upon it and was ready to act.

I deem it very important that the committee should make this examination. As has been said, the committee was directed to do it last year; but Congress was called together on the 7th of August, and prior to that time the members of the committee had not found it convenient to get together and make the examination. No appropriation was inserted in the river and harbor bill for the work at this session, it being the understanding that the committee would examine as to where the improvement should be located.

It will not be an expensive examination. The expenses of the committee will not be great. There is no danger that all the members of the committee will go to make the examination. I think the chairman will find it difficult to get members of the committee who can make it convenient to attend to the matter. But I hope the resolution will be adopted, and that the committee will go to the coast and examine into the matter.

Mr. BERRY. I was told that the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] stated that it was the unanimous wish of the Committee on Commerce that that committee should make this proposed trip. I desire to say that I was not present when the resolution was considered in the Commerce Committee. It was done while I was out of the city, and I knew nothing about it until my return. I have been of the opinion that it is unnecessary for the committee, or any part of the committee to go to the southern coast of California in order to determine this matter. The Government engineers, as I have been informed and believe, have uniformly decided in favor of one point; and, so far as I am concerned, I do not believe that it is necessary for the committee to go to California in order to determine where the deep-water harbor shall be located.

Mr. CAREY. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas how much the trip will cost?

Mr. BERRY. I have not figured the cost, and I do not know how much it will be. If I did know I would inform the Senator. I have an idea that whatever the cost may be it is not necessary that the committee shall go there.

Mr. CAREY. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas whether he believes in keeping a duty on sugar for the purpose of paying the expenses of these junketing trips?

Mr. BERRY. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. CAREY. I ask the Senator from Arkansas whether he believes in keeping a duty on sugar so as to raise money to pay these expenses?

Mr. BERRY. I do not believe in keeping a duty on sugar for any purpose whatever; and if the Senator from Wyoming and others who have been opposed to the duty on sugar will permit that bill to come back and let us have a square vote on it, my impression is that a majority of this side of the Chamber at least will say that they are not in favor of anything like a duty on sugar.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President——

Mr. CAREY. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina how much this proposed trip will cost?

Mr. RANSOM. I will answer that question. Last year, when a similar resolution was passed by the Senate, it became my duty to inquire what would be the expenses of the committee in going to the Pacific coast. Mr. Nixon, the financial clerk of the Senate, made out the estimate, and it was under $5,000.

Mr. CAREY. We were denied money in the appropriation bills where it is absolutely necessary, and the denial was made because of the poverty of the Treasury of the United States. If I believed that the committee would know anything more about the matter after they had seen the water and the proposed harbor I might be willing to vote for such an appropriation. I do not believe that it will be possible for them to tell anything about it. They must take the judgment of experts and engineers on the subject. Now is a good time to retrench, as we have been denied appropriations in the West for necessary purposes because of the condition of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether, in his judgment, this question would not be submitted to the engineers of the Navy Department?

Mr. CAREY. It will have to be done in that way in the end. The committee can tell nothing about it.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I am somewhat surprised at the opposition to the resolution and the objections made by Senators. A debate similar to this took place here eighteen months ago. It was the debate referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] in his remarks. In that debate the matter was fully discussed, and the Senate determined almost unanimously to send the Committee on Commerce to the Pacific coast.

I will state the case, Mr. President. For years there has been a contest in the State of California and in Congress as to where the deep-water harbor on the Pacific coast should be located.

Mr. CAREY. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether a committee has not already been out there?

Mr. RANSOM. No committee has been there. The Senator is under that impression because an investigation by the same committee was ordered eighteen months ago. But the committee could not go there at that time.

As I was proceeding to say, there has been a most serious controversy as to where the deep-water harbor for that coast should be located. Every Senator can comprehend at once the importance of locating the harbor at the right place. The United States engineers reported in favor of San Pedro, and it was supposed that that was the right point. Then there came a serious protest from other people decidedly in favor of Santa Monica, and persons who had seen Santa Monica declared that that was the right place.

The Committee on Commerce for the last five years has been doing its best to determine which is the best location. Boards of United States Engineer officers have decided in favor of one place. Most able engineers who do not belong to the Army have given their opinion in favor of the other point. The people of California are, I may say, divided on the subject. Here is the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], who lives on the coast, asking that the committee shall go there. So with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], who is very familiar with the necessity for a deep-water harbor there.

Here are both the Senators from California, one belonging to our side of the Chamber, and the other belonging to the other side of the Chamber, asking that the committee shall go there and see for themselves. Here are the Senators upon the Committee on Commerce. I shall not designate them. Perhaps they are a little harder to convince than others; perhaps they do not see things quite as clearly and as intuitively as other Senators. They protest that they are in doubt upon the question and they wish to go to the coast and make an examination in person. For myself, after having been upon the committee all this time and never having determined as to which is the best place, for I could not do it, though having an earnest desire to do so, I believe the only way to settle this question is to have the committee go there in person and view and examine the harbors and settle the question, and the committee almost unanimously think as I do on this subject.

Senators ask what will the committee learn by going to those harbors and looking at the water? In asking such a question they are speaking without consideration and without experience. Do not Senators remember that six or seven years ago (I know the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] will remember it; I know older Senators here remember it) there was a controversy for years as to the building of the bridge across the Arthur Kill in New York? Suits were brought and many committees came here, until finally the Committee on Commerce, under the direction of the Senate, determined to go and visit the bridge and examine the locality for themselves. My friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST] was one of them. There are other gentlemen here who belonged to the committee and remember it. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], if present, could give a graphic picture of it. We had not seen the place half an hour before the committee were unanimous as to what should be done.

If Senators will look at the pending resolution they will see that it provides for the summoning of witnesses and the taking of testimony. It provides for an investigation, sir, an exploration and examination which shall be made with the assistance of the best engineers of the Army and Navy and of the country, and with all the light that can be gathered from persons who have lived for years near the harbors, so that the Senate can see and know what ought to be done. I was very sorry last year that it was impossible for me to go with the committee, for I do not believe that the dispute will ever be settled in any other way.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I think at least the Senators who have never seen that part of the country should perhaps pay a little more attention to one who has for a fifth of a century been in the neighborhood almost all his time. I am very familiar with the surroundings and I am very familiar with the status of this matter before the committee. Although it seems that my friend from Arkansas, who did not hear the discussion in the committee, as he was compelled to be absent at the time, does not agree with us—when I said the report was unanimous, I, of course, referred to those who were present, and I had forgotten the circumstance that he was not there; but there is no dissenting report on file—I am convinced, absolutely satisfied, that if the Senate does not send a committee there it simply means that the whole enterprise will be abandoned, or at least that nothing will be done, for I know from my experience upon the committee that it is impossible to get a vote or any definite or unanimous action without such an inspection. As I have said, it is not for my own benefit. I am pretty well advised with regard to the matter now; but I do know that the Committee on Commerce can not act, and until it goes there it certainly will not act, and Senators who have expressed doubt about the matter are just as conscientious and strong in their faith about it as any one of us who may be standing here is firm in his conviction upon any subject in the world.

I trust the Senate will take the judgment of the committee, and will remember, as I have said, the importance of this matter, and the fact that nothing has been done looking to harbor improvement recently in that neighborhood, because we are waiting for a report from the committee and action upon that enterprise indorsed by the War Department.

Mr. MILLS. I hope when the committee goes, as I suppose it will go, to California to investigate these two ports, that it will pay some attention to the land as well as to the water. In my judgment the ownership of the land around these waters is the principal part of the controversy now, and I should like to have the committee tell us who owns the land there.

Mr. WHITE. That is contemplated, I will state to the Senator.

Mr. RANSOM. That will be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ALCOHOL USED IN THE ARTS, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives, which will be read the first time by its title.

The bill (H. R. 7977) to amend the internal-revenue laws of the United States was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the bill may be read at length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all laws which authorize the rebate or repayment from the Treasury of the United States of the tax on alcohol used in the arts, or in any medicinal or other like compounds, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the bill may have its second reading by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object, Mr. President, and ask that it may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well; but I shall ask that it be read a second time to-morrow morning, and I give notice now that I shall probably ask the Senate to consider it to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope no accident or ill health will prevent the Senator from doing that.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. GORMAN. Very well.

Mr. MANDERSON. I rise with reference to the bill which has just had its first reading. I send forward an amendment which I intend to propose to that bill when it shall be properly before the Senate, and I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to have the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Nebraska read.

Mr. MANDERSON. All right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the first section it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, however, That until February 1, 1895, the provisions of the act entitled "An act to reduce revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved October 1, 1890, authorizing the issue of licenses to produce sugar and for the payment of a bounty to the producers of sugar from beets, sorghum or sugar cane, grown in the United States, or from maple sap produced within the United States, contained in paragraphs 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, and 236 of said act, shall continue in full force and effect, and said sections of said act are hereby reënacted: Provided, however, That the bounty hereby provided to be paid under said act of October 1, 1890, shall be eight-tenths of 1 cent per pound and no more.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be ordered printed, in the absence of objection.

Mr. QUAY. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. MANDERSON. That can hardly be in order. I have simply given notice of an amendment intended to be proposed by me when the bill is under consideration, and the Senator can hardly move to lay my intention on the table.

Mr. QUAY. I supposed the bill had been taken up, and in that case I intended to move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the amendment is not before the Senate for its consideration, and the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania can not be entertained.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer an amendment which I intend to propose to the bill, and I ask that it may be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That all the provisions of House bill 4864 relative to duties on imports, however entitled and by whatever name known or called, and whenever and wherever it may be found, which finally passed the House of Representatives on the 13th day of August, 1894, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, annulled, canceled, and made void and of no effect, from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment be printed to accompany the bill. It is very interesting.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

REVENUE DUTY ON SUGAR.

Mr. GRAY. I offer a resolution, which I ask may be read, printed, and lie over.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to report, without delay, to the Senate, the House bill No. 7971 referred to it, so amended as to provide for a revenue duty on all sugar without any differential duty on refined sugar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be ordered to be printed, and it will go over on the request of the Senator from Delaware.

HUTCHISON AND SOUTHERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2290) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory,'" to report it without amendment.

Mr. QUAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which has just been reported by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GORMAN. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PALMER. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. QUAY. What is the motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland has moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. QUAY. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion in order that the bill which has just been reported by the Senator from Arkansas may be considered and passed.

Mr. PALMER. I request the Senator to withdraw his motion that I may ask permission——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Maryland is pending, and it is not debatable.

Mr. QUAY. I trust the Senator from Maryland will withdraw the motion for a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, August 18, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 18, 1894.

Prayer by Rev. J. H. M'CARTY, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. QUAY. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana. The Journal will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, and having read for five minutes—

Mr. TURPIE. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. QUAY. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the Journal.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

HUTCHISON AND SOUTHERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. QUAY. Before proceeding with the morning business, I wish to say that I was interrupted, I think a little harshly, by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] when I was asking unanimous consent yesterday to put upon its passage a bill which had just been reported by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It will occupy but a moment; I think it will provoke no opposition, and I would be much obliged to the Senate if it would give unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 2290) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory.'"

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOME FOR DESTITUTE COLORED PERSONS.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7095) to provide for the erection of a national home for aged and infirm colored persons, and for the maintenance of the inmates thereof.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I must object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection. Petitions and memorials are in order. [A pause.] If there are no petitions or memorials, reports of committees are next in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1556) to relieve Titus Priest from the charge of desertion, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2295) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to correct errors where double allotments of land have erroneously been made to an Indian, to correct errors in patents, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6656) for the relief of P. W. Mitchell, M. C. Felmet, George H. Smathers, and others, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1585) authorizing the sale of timber on the Jicarilla Apache Indian Reservation for the benefit of the Indians belonging thereto, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BERLIN SILVER COMMISSION, ETC.

Mr. HARRIS. From the Committee on Finance, I report a translation of the report of the proceedings of the Berlin Silver Commission, together with the report of the proceedings of the International Bimetallic Conference held at London, May 2 and 3, 1894. The translation was made under the order of the Senate. I ask that the reports be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MCLAURIN introduced a bill (S. 2318) for the relief of B. F. Berry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAREY (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2319) to provide for the issue of certain land scrip to the representatives of Robert George, a captain in the war of the Revolution; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RECENT ELECTION IN ALABAMA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CHANDLER on the 11th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be directed to inquire into the facts of the election held in the State of Alabama on the 6th of the present month of August, and to ascertain and report whether such election was full, fair, free, and honest, and resulted in the choice of a Legislature entitled to elect a United States Senator, and that said committee as a whole or by a subcommittee shall have power to send for persons and papers and sit during the approaching recess of Congress.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask a renewal of the order of yesterday in reference to the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will go over retaining its place.

FINANCE COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HARRIS, as follows:

Resolved, That the vacancy in the Finance Committee of the Senate occasioned by the death of the late Senator Vance be filled by the appointment of the Hon. STEPHEN M. WHITE, a Senator from the State of California.

Mr. MANDERSON. There will be no objection raised, I think, in the Senate to the consideration of the resolution this morning. I wish to say for myself and some others as to the stand which was taken yesterday that in it there was no measure of disrespect intended to the Senator from California whose name is mentioned by the majority side: Recognizing the ability and fitness of that Senator, there was in this matter no personal feeling toward him whatever, but it was deemed desirable that this important vacancy should not be filled without full deliberation on the part of the entire membership of the Senate.

Mr. HILL. I concur in the expression of the hope that the resolution may be passed without any opposition whatever.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INEXPEDIENCY OF FURTHER REVENUE LEGISLATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY] coming over from a previous day. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. MURPHY, as follows:

Resolved, That in view of the statement in the letter of the Hon. John G. Carlisle, Secretary of the Treasury, dated Washington, August 15, 1894, addressed to Hon. I. G. HARRIS, acting chairman of the Finance Committee, that the estimated surplus revenue for the year will not exceed $15,000,000, it is the judgment of the Senate that no further legislation or change in the revenue laws should be made at this session.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask that the resolution may lie over for a few moments. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from New York.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MANDERSON and Mr. PLATT. What is the request?

Mr. GORMAN. Simply to allow the resolution to lie over, not to lose its place, but to be called up in a few minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is to go over for a few minutes, I understand.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the exact request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That the resolution may lie over temporarily, to be called up later. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

REVENUE DUTY ON SUGAR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. GRAY, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to report, without delay, to the Senate, the House bill No. 7971 referred to it, so amended as to provide for a revenue duty on all sugar without any differential duty on refined sugar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. I submit an amendment to the resolution, which I ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the word "instructed" and insert:

To report back House bill 7971, providing for free sugar, with an amendment reënacting the bounty provisions of the act approved October 1, 1890.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. GORMAN and Mr. MILLS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. TURPIE. The amendment by its text combines two subjects. One is to exempt sugar from a tariff duty; the other is to pay a bounty on sugar under what is known as the McKinley act. I ask for a division of the question upon those two subjects.

Mr. MILLS. I ask to have the resolution read as proposed to be amended. Then we can understand it.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution so as to make it read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to report back House bill 7971, providing for free sugar, with an amendment reënacting the bounty provisions of the act approved October 1, 1890.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I suggest that that is not a divisible motion. The bill that is in the hands of the Committee on Finance provides for free sugar. This is simply an instruction to the committee that it shall add to that bill the bounty of the McKinley act. I will ask that the amendment shall be again read, so that the matter can be clearly understood.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be again stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "instructed" in the original resolution and insert:

To report back House bill 7971 providing for free sugar, with an amendment reënacting the bounty provisions of the act approved October 1, 1890.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, the words "providing for free sugar" are words of identification of the bill rather than anything else, and are mere surplusage. I will modify my amendment by striking out the words "providing for free sugar."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. MANDERSON. So that the only instruction to the committee is that it shall report the bounty of the McKinley act.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska why, after his resolution has been so modified, it is still not divisible, inasmuch as it includes an instruction to report back a certain bill and also an instruction to report it back with an amendment? The instruction to report back House bill 7971 is a distinct instruction. That provides for free sugar. The amendment that it shall be so modified as to contain also a provision for a bounty is a distinct substantive matter which can be separated from it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that both his resolution and the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska provide for reporting the bill back. There is no division of sentiment about that. The only question is as to the nature of the instructions. The Senator from Delaware proposes one set of instructions and the Senator from Nebraska another. The question is simply about the nature of the instructions which shall be given.

Mr. GRAY. I will say to my friend from Rhode Island that I have not said that my original resolution was not divisible. It contained an instruction to report back a certain bill, which is a substantive matter, and in addition to report it back with an amendment striking off the differential in favor of the refiners.

Mr. MILLS. One resolution has reference to imported foreign sugar and the other has reference to domestic sugar; one is the bounty on domestic sugar and the other is the exemption from duty of foreign sugar.

Mr. GRAY. That is so.

Mr. MILLS. They are two as distinct propositions as could be made.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no difference of opinion whatever as to the first branch of the resolution, and any discussion or vote upon it would be simply a waste of time, in my opinion. We agree upon both sides of the Chamber that the committee shall be instructed to report back the bill. The only question is what other instructions shall be given.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

Mr. MANDERSON. There is nothing in the provisions of the amendment I have proposed that——

Mr. McLAURIN. I believe I have the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. MANDERSON. I beg pardon.

Mr. McLAURIN. There are two questions presented in this resolution. One is whether the Senate will instruct the committee to report back the bill; the other is whether it will instruct the committee to report it back with an amendment. Those two questions ought to be so divided as to allow each Senator to vote on each according to his judgment. A Senator may desire to vote to have the bill reported back and not vote for the amendment. There are two questions propounded to him—one whether he will vote to have the bill reported back, and the other whether he will have the amendment to it; so that the question is clearly divisible.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I ask how is the amendment to be reported back without the bill?

Mr. McLAURIN. The amendment can not be reported back without the bill. But the bill can be reported back without the amendment. This shows two questions: Whether the bill shall be reported, and whether it shall be amended. On one of these I want to vote in the affirmative, and on the other I want to vote in the negative.

Mr. HILL. You may report a bill without an amendment, but you can not report an amendment unless it relates to a bill or resolution.

Mr. McLAURIN. You can not report an amendment without a bill. That is true enough.

Mr. HILL. That is a necessary proposition.

Mr. McLAURIN. But there are two questions presented, the Senator from New York ought to understand. You have first to determine the question of whether you will report back the bill at all. Is not that one question propounded to the mind of every Senator? Then is it not a question to be propounded to every Senator whether, being reported, it shall or shall not be amended?

Mr. HILL. The question as to whether you report a bill back at all comes up after the amendment has been adopted.

Mr. McLAURIN. Not at all. The amendment can not be adopted until the bill is reported. It does not adopt the amendment to report the bill back with an amendment. The question would still be whether the Senate would adopt the amendment after the bill had been reported back with the amendment. There are two distinct questions.

Mr. HARRIS. I should be glad to have the amendment read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the resolution be read, and then let the amendment which is proposed to the resolution be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. The original resolution reads:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to report without delay to the Senate the House bill No. 7971, referred to it, so amended as to provide for a revenue duty on all sugar without any differential on refined sugar.

It is proposed to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "instructed," in line 1, and inserting:

Report back House bill 7971 with an amendment reënacting the bounty provisions of the act approved October 1, 1890.

Mr. MANDERSON. Now, I submit that the resolution as proposed to be amended does not present any question that can be divided. It is not an instruction to the committee to report in any particular way the House bill that has come to the Senate, except that they shall add to it, however they may change its form, the bounty of the McKinley act. The sole question involved in the amendment is whether they will report the bounty of the McKinley act.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. As I understand, the Senator's proposition is to amend the resolution which is pending. The question to be voted on, then, is whether the instruction proposed by the Senator from Delaware shall be stricken out and the instruction suggested by the Senator from Nebraska inserted. That is one question to be voted on as an amendment, and after the resolution is amended, the Senate will vote on the resolution as amended. The question stands now on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska pure and simple.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is right.

Mr. GRAY. Undoubtedly. If the resolution shall be amended, the question will be presented whether it is divisible or not.

Mr. MANDERSON. Exactly.

Mr. JARVIS. Mr. President, it does seem to me there ought not to be any trouble about this question. A resolution is introduced by one Senator. Another Senator moves to strike out and insert. The first question is whether we shall strike out. The Senator from Nebraska moves to strike out and insert certain other matter. The question is divisible in that the first question is on the motion to strike out the original resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator will allow me, the difficulty with that proposition is that under the rules of the Senate a motion to strike out and insert is not a divisible motion.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, if I understand the proposition of the Senator from Delaware, it proposes to instruct the Committee on Finance to report the bill in such a way as that there shall be no tax on refined sugar. The Senator from Nebraska moves to strike out that part of the resolution, and instruct the committee to report a provision in favor of a bounty. Those who vote for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be in favor of a bounty and opposed to the instruction to the committee to report against a tax on refined sugar. As I understand it, I think the question will be very clearly put as between those who favor a bounty and those who favor the striking out of all protection in favor of the sugar trust.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the resolution of the Senator from Delaware instructs the Finance Committee to report a certain bill back with an amendment which shall provide for a revenue duty on sugar. That is one proposition. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska proposes to strike from the original resolution that feature which provides for a revenue duty, and to incorporate into the bill a provision for a bounty on all domestic sugars. Here are two distinctive and conflicting propositions, the one directing the committee to report a duty upon sugar——

Mr. GRAY. Without a differential in favor of the refined sugar.

Mr. HARRIS. Without a differential, but a flat, square, ad valorem duty on all sugars.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will permit me, neither of these propositions provides for any differential in regard to refined sugar. There is no difference in the two propositions in that respect.

Mr. HARRIS. That cuts no figure whatever in my argument.

Mr. ALDRICH. In view of the remark made by the Senator from Arkansas, I desired that that should be distinctly understood.

Mr. HARRIS. There may be a little political capital in iterating and reiterating that idea. I care nothing for that. Here is a distinct proposition, to instruct a committee to report a bill back incorporating in it a revenue duty. That is one clear and distinct proposition. The amendment instructs the committee to report the bill back striking out the revenue duty feature, but requiring that an amendment shall be incorporated in the bill giving a bounty upon domestic sugars. There is another and a distinct proposition. If these two distinct and independent propositions are not divisible it is difficult for me to determine what question would be divisible.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate? It is this: A proposition to amend a resolution by striking out from it certain words and inserting certain other words. Is that divisible? Is it a motion to strike out and insert. Is the resolution amendable? Clearly so. A motion to strike out and insert under our rules is expressly declared not to be divisible. There is nothing here to divide. The motion is to strike out certain words in the resolution and insert certain other words. That is all of the motion, and that is in order. It can not be divided.

Mr. GRAY. May I interrupt the Senator to ask him a question?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. The rule, as I understand it, which forbids the division of the question to strike out and insert merely relates to dividing the direction to strike out from the direction to insert; but it does not at all touch the propriety of dividing a question which may otherwise be presented by the proposition.

Mr. PLATT. There is no other question before the Senate. The only question before the Senate is shall the resolution be amended by striking out certain words and inserting certain other words.

Mr. GRAY. I think with the Senator from Connecticut that perhaps the proper parliamentary procedure now would be to vote on the amendment, and, if the amendment is adopted, then the question whether the proposition is divisible will come up.

Mr. PLATT. That is certainly so; but this is a square issue, as has been stated by the Senator from Arkansas. The proposition is so to amend the resolution as that it shall carry a certain instruction, and that is an instruction for a bounty. We all understand that. If the amendment prevails, it will be an amendment to instruct the committee to report back the bill with a provision for a bounty. If it does not prevail, then the other proposition will carry.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, a good deal of confusion has been thrown around this very simple proposition. It is perfectly simple. The Senator from Delaware offered a resolution; the Senator from Nebraska offers to amend that resolution; and the question for the Chair to submit to the Senate is on the adoption of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is all.

Mr. GRAY. That is right.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is nothing more to be said. The Senator from Texas has stated the whole question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that the vote should be taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, and the amendment, in the opinion of the Chair, is not divisable. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KYLE (when Mr. ALLEN'S name was called). The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] upon this question.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN], so that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] and I can vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. PLATT. The Senator from South Dakota is absent.

Mr BERRY. The Senator from South Dakota was in the chamber two minutes ago, and will be here to vote. He told me so. If he does not return I shall withdraw my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not understand the statement.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from South Dakota is paired with some other Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I understand the matter, the Senator from South Dakota is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN], and the Senator from South Dakota proposes to transfer that pair to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS].

Mr. BERRY. My colleague [Mr. JONES of Arkansas] is paired with Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS].

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right, then.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator from South Dakota does not come into the Chamber in time to vote I shall withdraw my vote.

Mr. BLANCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN]; but I have ascertained from his colleague that if present he would vote "yea;" and as that is my way of voting, I vote "yea."

Mr. QUAY (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. If my colleague were here he would vote "yea" and the Senator from South Carolina, I presume, would vote "nay."

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL], but with the consent of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER], and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). On this question, at the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], I have consented to pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. HUNTON (when his name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. DANIEL] is absent by leave of the Senate, and during the whole of his absence he is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE]. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been stated to me that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY].

Mr. MCLAURIN. That pair was not transferred to the Senator from South Carolina, and there was no announcement of that kind.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] stated, if I understood him correctly, that he would vote the same way as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] would vote, and said nothing about the transference of a pair.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have the right to transfer the pair I I have with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN], and since I have voted I have agreed to transfer that pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY]. That is my right.

Mr. GRAY. I doubt the right to transfer a pair where there is no pair. There is no pair where Senators would vote the same way, and the Senator from Louisiana announced that the Senator from Michigan would vote the same way as he.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have a general pair, and it is that general pair for the purposes of this vote that I have transferred to the Senator from South Carolina.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state that he has nothing to do with pairs. The question of pairs is a matter for each Senator to determine for himself. The Secretary will continue the call of the roll.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS]. If he were present I should vote "nay." As he is absent I shall not vote.

Mr. MCLAURIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN]. I do not know how he would vote. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], with the reservation of the right to vote to make a quorum. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT. I desire to state that if my colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when the name of Mr. POWER was called). I was requested to state that the Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER] is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. MORGAN], who is paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], so as to enable the junior Senator from Pensylvania and me to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. QYAY. I vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). As stated by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. With the consent of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] my pair is transferred to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL], and I have a right to vote. I vote "nay." If the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] were here he would vote "yea."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I have an absolute pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TURPIE (when the name of Mr. VOORHEES was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] is detained from the Chamber by serious indisposition. If he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GORDON. I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to state that if my colleague [Mr. WILSON] were present he would vote "yea." I desire to ask how the pair of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] stands?

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Colorado is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN], so that both the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] and I can vote.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely desired to know, as I have a letter from the Senator from Colorado requesting a pair on this subject.

Mr. ROACH (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. I did not know until after I had voted that he is absent from the Chamber. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BRICE. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. WHITE. I desire to state that if my colleague [Mr. PERKINS] were present he would vote "yea" on this proposition.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I ask if a quorum has voted?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the pairs be read.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I understand that there is no quorum voting, and I reserved the right to vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY (after having voted in the affirmative). If that practice is to prevail I withdraw my vote, and a vote will be withdrawn on this side for every one voted on the other side.

Mr. MANDERSON. I simply desire to say that in order to secure a quorum this side is ready to make any reasonable sacrifice, but certainly a pair should not be broken that would change the result of a vote; and if it is to be the practice to ignore pairs and thus change the result of what would be the expression of the Senate in that way, there will be a general withdrawal of votes upon this side.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator from Nebraska seems to furnish the very information that I desired to obtain. I accept his statement, and I shall observe my pair, for I am exceedingly careful not to do what might be regarded as a violation of the rights of a Senator in his absence.

Mr. MCLAURIN (after having voted in the negative). I had the distinct understanding with my pair that on any occasion when it was necessary to make a quorum I should be allowed to vote. But as it is the desire of my political associates that I shall withdraw my vote, I will do so.

Mr. QUAY. Then my vote will stand.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the pairs be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pairs will be announced as soon as it is possible to arrange them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the result be announced.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 20; as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pairs will be announced as soon as the list is made up.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the roll be called.

Mr. HARRIS. Logically that is the next thing in order, no quorum having voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Faulkner,	Lindsay,	Pugh,
Allison,	Gallinger,	McLaurin,	Quay,
Bate,	George,	McPherson,	Ransom,
Berry,	Gibson,	Manderson,	Roach,

Davis,	Jones, Nev.	Pettigrew,
Dolph,	Kyle,	Platt,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GORMAN. Evidently upon this question we have not a voting quorum present, and there has been some confusion about pairs. It is not possible to proceed with the resolution to-day, and I ask that it may go over without losing its place.

Mr. ALDRICH. Possibly in the course of two hours or an hour we may have a quorum here, and I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that this question go over for an hour——

Mr. GORMAN. I have no objection to letting it go over.

Mr. ALDRICH. And in the meantime——

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it go over temporarily.

Mr. ALDRICH. Temporarily.

Mr. GORMAN. Let it go over, with the understanding that we can call it up when there is a voting quorum, and take a vote on it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

INEXPEDIENCY O ' FURTHER REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. MURPHY. I call up the resolution submitted by me yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY], coming over from a previous day.

Mr. JARVIS. I ask the Senator from New York to yield to me for just a moment, in order to have a House bill passed which was reported favorably this morning by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is a local matter, and will take but a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GORMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DOLPH. Regular order.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to the consideration of the bill at this moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection. The resolution submitted by the Senator from New York will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. MURPHY, as follows:

Resolved, That in view of the statement in the letter of the Hon. John G. Carlisle, Secretary of the Treasury, dated Washington, August 15, 1894, addressed to Hon. I. G. Harris, acting chairman of the Finance Committee, that the estimated surplus revenue for the year will not exceed $15,000,000, it is the judgment of the Senate that no further legislation or change in the revenue laws should be made at this session.

Mr. MURPHY. I modify the resolution so that it will read as I now send it to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the enactment of further legislation on contested matters at this session is impracticable and that Congress should adjourn at the earliest possible day.

Mr. MURPHY. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from New York as modified.

Mr. ALDRICH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KYLE (when Mr. ALLEN'S name was called). If the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN], so that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] and myself can vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BRICE (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. FAULKNER (when Mr. CAMDEN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is necessarily absent. If he were here he would vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called). I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] upon all questions. I do not know how either Senator would vote upon this question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] on this question.

Mr. GRAY. He is. That is a fact.

Mr. QUAY. That may be.

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], with the consent of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], and I will vote "yea."

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). Just before the departure of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], who was called from the city, he asked me to pair with him on this question, and I stand paired with him. If he were present I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT (when Mr. HAWLEY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] is absent. If he were present he would vote "yea." He is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. If he were present I understand he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HUNTON (when his name was called). My colleague

[Mr. DANIEL] is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE]. I vote "nay."

Mr. MCLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN]. I do not know how he would vote. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. I should vote "nay" if the Senator from North Dakota were present.

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If he were present I would vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. That pair has been by myself and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] transferred to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL]. I vote "nay." If the Senator from Maine were here he would vote "yea."

Mr. ROACH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "yea," and consequently I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GORDON. I am paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO. My colleague [Mr. CALL], who is absent from the city, is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. WHITE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. PERKINS] if present would vote "yea" on this proposition. He is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH].

Mr. ROACH. Under the circumstances I feel entitled to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER] is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON]. If the Senator from Montana were here he would "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Aldrich,	Davis,	Manderson,	Pugh,
Allison,	Dolph,	Mitchell, Oregon	Quay,
Blanchard,	Gallinger,	Murphy,	Roach,

So the resolution as modified was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF SUGAR DUTIES.

Mr. LINDSAY. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that this Congress should not adjourn until a bill shall have been passed removing and discontinuing all import duties on refined or discolored sugars that operate directly or indirectly for the benefit of the so-called sugar trust.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move to amend the resolution by inserting the following words:

And that the Committee on Finance report with all possible speed the amount of profit or revenue derived by the tariff bill now in the hands of the President to the whisky or alcohol trust.

Mr. GRAY. All right. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will accept the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to indulge in a little plain talk. Our friends upon the other side——

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, let us have order in the Senate, so that we can hear what the Senator from Ohio says.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution which I have offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Order must be preserved in the Chamber. As soon as order is restored the Chair will recognize the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have order. One can not hear a word.

Mr. QUAY. I object to the further consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio has been recognized as entitled to the floor, and he will proceed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Our friends upon the other side of the Chamber have given us examples of what they call plain talk, but I hope I shall not have occasion to say anything that will be displeasing to any Senator, nor to criticise the conduct of anyone except as a pure party question.

I recognize the ability of the honorable Senators who had charge of the tariff bill and the subject-matter of this very resolution. They have evinced great ability, great energy, and great industry. Two of the members of that committee being on other committees and not heretofore engaged in financial legislation labored under some disadvantage; but we will all concur on both sides of the Chamber that they evinced great ability, tact, and judgment. But they made three essential and vital mistakes, and whether they are chargeable for those, or the party to which they belong, is a question that it is not for me to solve.

The first mistake is that they undertook to pass the bill through the Senate of the United States without any conference with the Finance Committee of the Senate, the bill was referred to that committee, it is true, but the Committee on Finance was never called in a single session to act upon the bill. It was adopted by the Democratic members of that committee as a pure party matter, and withheld from the consideration of an almost equal number of Republican Senators, members of that committee. Thus there were necessarily created in the Democratic party the dissensions that usually occur among the members of the same party when they are left to deal alone with a political measure. That was the first mistake they made.

Then another mistake equally great was that when you, sir, performed your duty according to the usages of the Senate and placed upon the committee of conference three Republicans and four Democrats. The Democratic conferees neglected to call upon their associates to participate in the examination of the bill or to participate in the examination of the six hundred and odd amendments that were adopted in the Senate. The result was that it continued to be during all the examination a party question between the factions of the Democratic party. The Republican party, confessedly a strong and powerful organization, well represented on this floor, was represented on that committee by two able Senators familiar with tariff legislation, my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and myself. We were not allowed in any way to contribute to or take any part in the conference on which we were appointed.

It is certain that if the seven Senators instead of the four had met in conference together there would have been less discord and less contention. The minority of the conferees would have readily yielded to the will of the majority after the Democratic members had heard what we had to say on the various amendments and disagreements. If there had been a meeting of the conference upon the tariff bill the difficulties in which we are now very seriously involved would not have occurred.

Mr. President, these were radical mistakes. I do not, as I say, blame the gentlemen who participated in making them, because I have no doubt they were controlled by the action of their party. Indeed, from what the newspapers say, we know that they had caucuses upon the bill and the controverted amendments.

Sir, no bill upon which there is a substantial disagreement in the Senate or the House could ever pass if it is submitted to that kind of consideration. Nothing tends to solve questions and remove difficulties as much as conferences in committee between opposing political forces. They get together, and in the end the conversations conducted in the quiet of the committee room tend to promote peace and bring the two parties together.

But there was never any such consideration of the bill by the Committee on Finance, or by the representatives of the Republican party, either in the Senate or on the conference. That is clear.

Now, Mr. President, we are involved in a good many difficulties——

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. VEST. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I say anything that my friend does not agree with me in, I yield to him with pleasure.

There is another very radical error which was made in the committee of conference itself when they met together. According to the statement made by Senators here there were over six hundred amendments in conference between the two Houses. The great body of those amendments were upon comparatively unimportant matters, but they related at the same time to some important questions, and there was some little disagreement between the two bodies.

It is certain that if the bill had been treated in the usual way, by going through the whole of the six hundred or seven hundred amendments, most of them would have been settled by the concurrence of both parties, either by splitting the difference or in the various modes by which conferences are brought to an agreement. If the conference had gone through and agreed to all those amendments that were not really contested they would have cleared away all the rubbish from the bill. But instead of that, according to the statement of the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], they undertook first to deal with the most difficult question of all, and that was the sugar question, and being divided upon that question, they made no progress whatever and took no definite action on this great multitude of amendments.

If the committee of conference had reported upon those six hundred and odd amendments an agreement as to four hundred or five hundred of them, a matter which the Senator from Missouri knows could easily have been done, they would have been swept out of existence, and then there would have only been brought to the Senate and House a few contested subjects-matter, and they would have been settled by the separate vote of the two Houses, the Senate receding from some and the House agreeing to others. In that way only, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] will recognize, can all the difficulties that go into conference be adjusted. In that way the long appropriation bills are passed.

Now, these three vital mistakes were made by the other side of the Chamber. First, they never consulted the Republicans in the consideration of the bill before the committee. Second, they never allowed the Republican conferees to participate in their conference; and, third, they reversed the whole manner and order by which agreements are brought about by committees of conference. These are matters not chargeable to individual persons, but what has been the result? The result has been that the House was compelled to agree to a vast number of amendments from which the Senate would have receded or else defeat the bill. In this way the bill, although carefully handled, contains from fifty to one hundred amendments that will create embarrassment and trouble. Several of them have already been discovered. Four or five of them are now attempted to be remedied by bills introduced before the tariff bill has become a law. I think no such example as that exists in the history of the country, where four or five bills are brought in to amend a bill that has not yet been signed by the President. When did that ever occur before? And how could it have occurred, except for this manner of conducting the business?

There is another thing. One amendment has crept into the bill by the consent of both parties, and both parties are responsible for it, that will sacrifice the revenues of the Government to the amount of from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 a year. It is in the provision of the bill in regard to alcohol. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], while I was present and scarcely knew what was going on, stepped forward to the center of the aisle, and there said he wanted to offer an amendment, and he offered the amendment contained now in section 94½, on page 229, of this print of the bill:

> Any manufacturer finding it necessary to use alcohol in the arts, or in any medicinal or other like compound, may use the same under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and on satisfying the collector of internal revenue for the district wherein he resides or carries on business that he has complied with such regulations and has used such alcohol therein, and exhibiting and delivering up the stamps which show that a tax has been paid thereon, shall be entitled to receive from the Treasury of the United States a rebate or repayment of the tax so paid.

The question of relieving dealers in alcohol who use it in the arts has been the subject of controversy ever since the internal-revenue system has been founded, and really no feasible plan has ever been devised to allow the use of alcohol for the arts without greatly impairing the tax on spirits. The attempt has been made and it has always been defeated.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator answer the question whether, if alcohol used in the arts could be safely exempted from tax by the bill, it ought not to be done?

Mr. SHERMAN. That may be or it may not be the case. I do not want to discuss that point; but certainly the attempt to do it has always failed, because you could not exempt alcohol used in the arts without exempting all the spirit tax. Here is the RECORD, which shows that the Senator from Massachusetts never offered the proposition expecting it to be adopted in that shape as a part of the law. He only offered it as a tentative proposition, to give jurisdiction to the conference committee to act upon the subject; and he so says, and it was received by the honorable Senators on the other side in that way. Let me read what he said. After a very few remarks this is the end of the colloquy which led to the adoption of the amendment:

> Mr. HOAR. If the Senators having charge of the bill are willing to let the amendment go in, so that the subject will be in their power, I will say for one that I shall not only not oppose it, but I shall support them in striking it out and make no complaint if, either on consulting with the authorities of the Treasury or on further consideration themselves, they find that it is not practical.

The Senator from Massachusetts said he would vote cheerfully against it, but he wished the conferees to consider the matter when it was referred to them.

> Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have no objection to that.

The Senator from Arkansas having previously shown an opposition to the amendment, but the proposition being simply to refer it to the conference committee, he said: "I have no objection to that."

> The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.
> The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to nem. con.

Many Senators, myself included, did not know the scope of the proposition and regarded it as a mere suggestion, to be dismissed by the conferees.

Now, if the committee had gone on in the usual way, both sides would have agreed in striking out this provision. But they did not do it, or if they did go so far as to agree or disagree on these points, the agreements were not reported to the Senate or the House.

That provision creates a very grave trouble. It is certain that this provision will greatly impair the revenue from spirits. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue estimates that it will lose $9,000,000 to the Government the first year. What can be done? We have 250,000 licensed liquor dealers in this country. We have more than 40,000 authorized druggists who make drugs, etc. All they have to do is to mix with alcohol or spirits ginger, quinine, or some so-called medicinal compound to secure a refund of the tax.

It is just as certain as it possibly can be that under the loose language of the bill as it now stands practically the greater part of the revenue from whisky will be destroyed. I know that the gentlemen who composed the conference committee never would have agreed to that provision, but it was placed in the bill and the amendments of the Senate were adopted by the House nem. con., by the wholesale, by the hogshead, I may say, all at one vote. As a matter of course it is now to be dealt with by the Senate and House and corrected as seems to be best; and a bill has been sent here for that purpose.

So I might go over a great many other items, and refer to this question of sugar, and others, but I do not intend to do it. I merely wish to point out that the Democratic party have, in their mode of conducting this kind of legislation, placed themselves under a disadvantage, and they will be called upon not only during the brief remainder of this session, but through all the next session, over and over again, to correct inaccuracies in verbiage, in language, in rates, in classification.

Sir, at the very beginning it will be necessary to refer the law back to the two Houses in order to correct the mistakes that have been made. I have here a list of twenty or thirty mistakes which are palpable, that I could easily point out. For instance, the very date of the bill is wrong. The bill declares that it shall take effect on the 1st of August, and the President is away and will not sign it until probably the last of August, if he signs it at all. There are a good many incongruities, but I have not time now to point them out.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. It has been suggested to me, what difference does it make that the date on which the bill is to take effect is past? Will not the act take effect after its passage?

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill is retroactive by its terms. The provisions of some parts of the bill take effect at a future period. The Senator will see the difficulty if he will look over all these various matters. I have not time to do so. I have no doubt my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] could answer his question by giving a dozen or more cases where embarrassments occur growing out of the date.

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator will pardon me, I will say that my attention is directed to the single point that the bill is to take effect from the 1st of August. I had supposed that a bill is something like a deed, and that the date is immaterial, and that the time of the approval of the bill would be the true time of its taking effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the law itself declares that it shall take effect upon a prior date. Then the question arises whether Congress can pass a retroactive law.

Mr. PALMER. I think there is no such question involved. I think the law takes effect from and after its passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. The very first clause of the bill says "that on and after the 1st day of August."

Mr. PALMER. But it was not the law on the 1st of August, and it could not be. I suppose it is like a deed; it might be dated a year in advance of its delivery. I suppose a deed would take effect from its delivery, and that a law would take effect from and after its passage, whatever might be said in the law itself as to the date of its taking effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. In some cases the date is made very important. I do not wish to go into this matter, because it would lead me into details. I could give details undoubtedly and show that there are many cases in the bill where the enactment was not intended by the Senate. For instance, innumerable amendments were put on by Senators on both sides of the Chamber, merely, as the Senator from Massachusetts did in his case, to give the committee of conference a chance to think of the matter, and they are all adopted, whatever may be their language or the incongruity with other parts of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me, while the matter of date is under consideration, I wish to make a suggestion. When the bill says that from the 1st of August last certain duties shall be collected, if in the mean time the importer has paid higher duties under the old law, will he not be entitled to a rebate, so as to have the duties made according to the present law for what he has paid between the 1st of August and the time of the approval of the bill by the President?

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me to interrupt him for a moment in regard to the remark of the Senator from Connecticut—I understood the Senator from Ohio to decline to go into that subject, and therefore I do not myself propose to go further.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, I have here a letter, an official statement made in regard to the results of this unfortunate provision. It says:

The Hostetter Bitters Company, of Pittsburg, put up Hostetter's bitters having a spirit strength of about 65 per cent.

Not very far from alcohol strength.

They use in the neighborhood of two carloads of high-proof spirits per month, which would amount to about 140,000 gallons per year, upon which they would be entitled to a refund amounting to $154,000 per year. While this is one of the leading firms of the country engaged in this business, there are many more of equal magnitude, and thousands of less importance, who would become claimants for refund of taxes under the section for free alcohol in the arts, etc.

There is one establishment in Philadelphia, I am told, that consumes 5,000 gallons of alcohol every week; there are numbers of large establishments all over the country; there are establishments in Cincinnati making patent medicines; and under the provisions of the bill which has been passed all that it is necessary for them to do to escape the payment of the tax is to make an alcoholic compound and give it some high-sounding name. I have no doubt the Senate on both sides will concur in correcting this mistake.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask the Senator whether it would not be a great deal better to repeal and cancel the whole bill, instead of undertaking to tinker it in this way at this late hour of a session about to expire?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator and I no doubt would agree that it would be well to do that, but we can not do it. What will be done I have no doubt will be to tinker it.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is a majority, I think, of the Senate to-day in favor of repealing the whole bill, and why should we not repeal it and send the repeal bill to the House of Representatives?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will make one of a majority, if such can be found, to do that, but I do not know whether we can do it or not.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator, with his permission, whether he is not very fully convinced that the reason why the bill did not come back to the Senate by the usual parliamentary processes was because the Senate would have repudiated its own bill by a vote?

Mr. SHERMAN. That may be so; I do not know. I am not a prophet of what has not been.

Mr. President, in what is called the crockery schedule of the tariff bill, the Committee on Finance, in the first place, reported in favor of an increase of the duties on certain classes of crockery above the rates fixed by the House of Representatives.

Afterwards, by the action of the Senate, the rates on certain grades of crockery were reduced below the rates fixed by the House of Representatives. It has been shown by petitions from various persons interested in the industry that that action would be utterly destructive to the crockery industry, not only in New Jersey, where large interests exist, but in Ohio, and all over the country. I have no doubt, if the committee of conference had acted upon the crockery schedule, they would have advanced the rates rather than have lowered them. Now, those engaged in that character of business, which has been so unjustly dealt with, will probably suspend their operations until this can be corrected.

There is another thing to which I desire to refer. The President of the United States has been consulted about the tariff, and a letter of his on this subject has been read. In my judgment it is not within the constitutional power or duty of the President of the United States to have anything to do with framing the details of a tariff bill. By the established custom of all his predecessors the policy of protection and the policy of free trade have been freely discussed, but no President heretofore has ever interfered with the details of a tariff bill, and Congress has always been jealous of the power of the President in relation to financial questions. Therefore it is that the Secretary of the Treasury is required to make his reports directly to Congress. He does not make his reports in regard to the finances to the President, but they are sent to Congress. So it is to the Secretary of the Treasury that we must appeal for information on such subjects, and the Secretary is compelled to obey our will.

We can summon him before us and examine him under oath. When I was Secretary of the Treasury I was examined several times before committees of Congress, though I was not put under oath. The Secretary of the Treasury may be examined like any other witness; he may be called before the committees of the Senate or House of Representatives and freely examined, and conferences of this kind with the executive officers of the Government have had a tendency to smoothe the way of legislation, and the advice which the experience of the officers of the Treasury Department has enabled them to give to Congress has been beneficial. Therefore it was the right of the committee not only to ask Mr. Carlisle for information, but to require it, if necessary, and there ought to be no criticism on that ground. It is the bounden duty of the Secretary of the Treasury under the law to appear when called upon and be examined either in person or in writing.

As to the various amendments which are now proposed, most of them should be adopted in the face of the declaration made by Mr. Carlisle, who is the responsible head of the Treasury Department. If I shall be here at the time the vote is taken I shall unquestionably vote in favor of a straight ad valorem duty on sugar. I know, as a matter of course, that the party to which I belong is committed to free sugar. If we had a Republican Administration still in power I believe the revenues of the Government would probably have been sufficient to pay the current expenses. The difficulty is that from the very moment this Administration came into power business men became alarmed. Whether justly or unjustly, they were alarmed by the surrounding circumstances. The incoming Administration was known to favor a sharp reduction of duties, and therefore importations were stopped.

As to the other two bills which are pending, I certainly would vote against the bill in regard to iron ore. If iron ore should be made duty free it would operate in favor of no part of the people of this country, but in favor of Canada and probably a few persons who import pig iron from Cuba or from Africa.

Mr. GRAY. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact—I do not know how it is in his part of the country—that upon the Eastern Atlantic slope all the iron furnaces demand free ore. They mix it with the ore produced in this country, in Pennsylvania, in Alabama, and in Tennessee.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have in the Lake Superior country the largest body of iron ore in the world. Already that industry, which is only ten or fifteen years old, has been developed so that its output now amounts to more than ten million tons, an amount so great that you can hardly conceive of it. That has furnished a business scattered all over our Northern boundary. The ore which is the best probably for making steel of any in existence is the Lake Superior ore. This industry now gives employment

I do not know to exactly how many, but probably to fifty or sixty thousand active men engaged in the business of smelting and converting the iron into rails. The result has been that the price of ore and of rails has gone down more and more. Only a little while ago steel rails were worth $100 a ton; now they are sold as low as $23 or $24 a ton; and that has been brought about by the development of our own industry. Will Senators on the other side, to carry out some visionary theory of free trade, break down that industry which gives employment to thousands of men?

So it is with coal. If I were looking simply for the interests of the State of Ohio, I should be in favor of free coal. Why? Because we export more coal to Canada than can be imported from Novia Scotia to New England. We send a million tons of coal into Canada to supply all that country from Montreal clear west to Winnipeg. At the same time I believe the principle of protection which has been applied in the past ought to be adhered to, and the people of West Virginia and other portions of the country who are supplying coal and iron in competition with Nova Scotia ought to have at least a reasonable rate of duty to compensate for the difference in the rate of wages and cost of transportation between Nova Scotia and Boston.

I believe the Senate, when it comes to act upon the question, will be found to be in favor of the present duty of 40 cents a ton upon this article; but I said I should not discuss these matters of detail, nor shall I.

Mr. President, I think the present tariff bill, if it can be got into running order, after a good many amendments have been made to it, will yield revenue enough to pay the expenses of the Government.

We have heard a great deal of talk about free trade, and yet the McKinley law admitted free 54 per cent in value of all the goods imported from foreign countries into this country; and the bill which has been passed, called a free-trade bill, will probably admit only about 40 per cent. In every respect in which I have been able to contrast the two measures, the McKinley act and the mongrel bill which has gone to the President, I feel bound to say that as a revenue measure the McKinley act would have been ample, and if it had been continued this country would have had a greater era of prosperity than ever before. More than one-half of all the goods brought into the country under the McKinley act were duty free. No doubt many duties were increases, but they were made in order to build up our own industries. The great enlargement of domestic manufactures and farm products justified the hopes founded upon the McKinley act.

The only possible effect the bill which has passed can have will be to destroy or paralyze our industries by the importation of foreign articles of production at a lower rate of duty. If the revenue should be increased on account of the increased importations, it would be at the cost and sacrifice of our domestic industries, which would be brought into closer and sharper competition with the industries in other countries. The worst result of this act will be the enforced reduction of wages in this country and the inevitable strikes and labor contests which it will cause.

Under the circumstances, I most heartily concur in the resolution which has been adopted by the Senate. The sooner we adjourn the better. After a long period of almost continuous session, now running into a year, it is utterly idle, if the President signs the bill which has been passed, for us to attempt now to tinker or to deal with it.

It will need far more tinkering and dealing with than merely the three or four items named in the amendments which are before us. Every day's examination, every day's consideration of that bill by the officers of the Treasury Department, who naturally favor it, will point out inconsistencies which should be corrected. The first bill which ought to be introduced at the next session of Congress should be either a bill to repeal the bill which has been passed or to amend it in probably fifty or sixty particular items.

Believing that to be so, I think the best course to pursue is to act in accordance with the resolution of the Senator from New York—to go home, see our constituents, consult with them, and come back here prepared to tinker up and amend the bill which has just been passed and is now awaiting the action of the President.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, whatever may be the political fortunes of this body and the other House of Congress as determined by the election to be held this fall or in future elections, there is one thing which I think may be safely predicted, which will be agreed to by any careful observer of political events, that no tariff law like the McKinley law, no high-protective measure such as the McKinley law, will ever again gain for itself a place upon the statute books of the United States. There is one thing which is absolutely certain, it seems to me, if certainty can be predicated about human action and human opinion, which the past winter and past spring have demonstrated, and that is that the people are heartily tired of all tariff schemes which produce and bring about, as the McKinley law has brought about, such scenes as have been witnessed in this body and in the other during the last six months. They have found out that privilege dies hard.

Entrenched, as it is, by long continuance, accumulated wealth, great intelligence always ready to be suborned in its service, trained advocates always ready to appeal for it, it has been able, as I knew and those who had thought about this subject knew it would be able, to make a stubborn, desperate, hard fight to hold on to the advantages which it had possessed for so many years, and to still retain the privilege of levying tribute upon the labor and industry of this country.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] spoke of the McKinley law as a law under which nearly one-half of the imports into this country came in duty free.

Mr. SHERMAN. More than one-half.

Mr. GRAY. More than one-half. He spoke of it as a law which produced the largest measure of free trade which had obtained in this country for many years. How was that brought about? By putting on the free list the one article of sugar, which had been annually producing more than $60,000,000 of revenue, every dollar of which had gone into the Treasury of the United States, so as to make room to impose duties under which $9 out of every $10 went, not into the Treasury of the United States, but into the pockets of the privileged few and the favored classes in whose interests the duties had been imposed. That is the difference between the McKinley law and the law framed upon a policy which is opposed to taxing the many for the benefit of the few.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the bills which have been brought from the House of Representatives. I am in favor of free iron ore and of free coal. Why should the ironmasters of the Atlantic Slope be made to pay tribute to those who are so fortunate as to have discovered and to own those great iron deposits of the Lake Superior region? The Senator from Ohio has asserted that as a sufficient reason why the people engaged in smelting iron ore on the Atlantic coast should not be allowed to buy iron ore where they can buy it cheapest because, forsooth, there have been discovered these great deposits of bountiful nature to which he says these people should pay tribute.

If they are fortunate enough to own these great deposits of iron ore, in Heaven's name ought they not to be content with Heaven's bounty, and not seek in addition to levy a tribute upon struggling industries in other parts of the country. Why should these industries be compelled to forego the cheaper Mediterranean and Cuban ores to mix with theirs, and compelled to buy the ores whose transportation costs them so much more than those which they naturally could obtain?

Therefore, in the interest of the iron industries, in the interest of fair play, in the interest of morality, of justice, I am in favor of exempting this great raw material of industry from any taxation and from any restriction, so as to enable it to be used freely for the employment of labor.

I have heard, and I believe it is true, that a single steel industry in the United States when it was in full operation paid $1,000 a day duty on the ore which they were compelled to import in order to mix it with the domestic ores to produce the result which they desired. I say that is an infamous outrage upon that industry, which had the right to employ its capital and to employ its labor to the greatest advantage, and in order that it might seek its profit in a way which seemed to it best and most likely to secure it. Free raw materials are in the interest of the labor of the country.

So, Mr. President, I am in favor of free coal, not because I think free coal bears the same relation to the industries as free iron ore and free raw material, because in one sense free coal is not to be classed as a free raw material. When it comes from the mine it is ready for consumption; it has already been produced in the state in which it goes to the final user, but it does enter into manufacturing expenses, not to so great a degree as the raw material which is worked up in other forms, but it is an item; and I would strike from it, as I would from every other article, the duty which is taxed merely for the sake of protection and not taxed for revenue. Therefore, not only would I lower the duty, as the bill already passed both Houses does lower the duty on coal and iron nearly one-half of what it was in the McKinley law, but I would make both absolutely free. I want to unshackle the labor and industry of the country, and I believe we are bound to continue to make progress in that direction.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, the debate of the last two or three days on the opposite side of the Chamber has been provocative of reply upon this. We have not desired further to debate this general question at the present time, and I should not rise now were it not for the purpose of replying in a word to the challenge of the Senator from Delaware, that no such protective law as the McKinley law would ever again be put upon the statute books of this country, whatever the result of the fall elections might be.

I desire to say to that Senator that this triumph of free trade, which has been brought about by the methods and in the way in which the tariff bill has been passed, will be short lived, in my judgment; that the time which has elapsed since the principle of protection was declared to be unconstitutional and the time which this act must necessarily run as a law will be quite sufficient for the people of the United States, and they will be entirely ready to return, and anxious to return, to the principle of protection to American industries and American labor, which, with a few exceptions, has been a part of our history for more than a century.

There has been an object lesson, Mr. President, and the people who have been deceived hitherto by the professions and the jugglery of the party which desires to establish free trade in this country have had their eyes opened. I am quite willing to leave the question of whether we are to have protection or free trade to the voters of this country.

Mr. LINDSAY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest there is no quorum of the Senate present. In that connection I will say that I think one or two Senators have come in since the vote was taken upon the resolution of instructions offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], and I believe a roll call will bring a quorum into the Chamber.

Mr. LINDSAY. I believe I was recognized.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. I supposed that my suggestion that no quorum was present could be made at any time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island suggests the want of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Dolph,	McLaurin,	Pugh,
Allison,	Gallinger,	McPherson,	Quay,
Bate,	George,	Manderson,	Ransom,
Berry,	Gibson,	Martin,	Roach,
Blanchard,	Gordon,	Mills,	Sherman,
Brice,	Harris,	Mitchell, Oregon	Shoup,
Caffery,	Hill,	Murphy,	Smith,
Cameron,	Hunton,	Palmer,	Stewart,
Chandler,	Jarvis,	Pasco,	Turpie,
Cockrell,	Jones, Ark.	Patton,	Vest,
Coke,	Jones, Nev.	Peffer,	Vilas,
Davis,	Lindsay,	Platt,	Walsh.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I have said perhaps all that I desired to say, unless the question is to be opened for general discussion, when I shall be glad to be heard upon it, except with regard to some statements made by the Senator from Ohio respecting the amendment relating to the use of alcohol in the arts.

It will be remembered that the day previous to the time when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] had offered his amendment, I had introduced a long amendment providing for rules and regulations under which alcohol used in the manufactures and arts might be used. I desire to say that the amendment which I then introduced, consisting, I believe, of nine sections, was taken from a bill passed by the Senate in 1888, and that those sections which I incorporated in my amendment were then drawn at the Treasury Department and were supposed to be entirely adequate to prevent the fraudulent use of alcohol in the arts. I still think that there will be no special difficulty in the Treasury Department doing so, if they desire to throw around the use of alcohol such regulations and restraints as will prevent fraud.

There is a word in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts which I am sorry is in the amendment. The debate on that amendment was on June 30——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is compelled to interrupt the Senator from Connecticut. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Calendar under Rule IX is in order.

Mr. PLATT. I shall not speak more than a minute longer, if I may have the indulgence of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. PLATT. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was introduced, in the following words:

Any manufacturer finding it necessary to use alcohol in the arts, or in any medicinal or other like compound, may use the same under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, etc.

I am sorry that the words "or like compound" are in the amendment, because it is only because of those words, I imagine, that the argument can be made that the compounders and rectifiers of liquor, who manufacture from raw proof spirits so much of the liquor which is drunk in this country, would have any right to claim a rebate.

I do not think the language is broad enough to allow that to be done, but I am quite clear that whoever may avail himself of the benefits of the amendment may be so hampered and restrained by regulations to be prescribed by the Treasury Department that no fraud can be perpetrated under the provision. It may be that the language of the amendment is so broad that it would allow compounders and rectifiers of liquor to obtain a rebate, although I think not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed to the present consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], it goes over under the rule.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, and ask that it may be printed and go over with the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of the resolution after the word "until" and insert:

All the provisions of House bill 4864 relative to duties on imports, however entitled and by whatever name known or called, and whenever and wherever it may be found, which finally passed the House of Representatives on the 13th day of August, 1894, are repealed, annulled, canceled, and made void and of no effect.

Mr. HARRIS. That is an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, I believe.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is. The amendment will be printed and lie over.

TAX ON ALCOHOL.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the House bill known as the alcohol bill may be laid before the Senate for its second reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 7977) to amend the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let the bill be read at length on its second reading.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; let it be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all laws which authorize the rebate or repayment from the Treasury of the United States of the tax on alcohol used in the arts, or in any medicinal or other like compounds, are hereby repealed.

Sec. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. MANDERSON. What is the purpose of the Senator from Tennessee with respect to the bill? Does he propose now to move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance?

Mr. HARRIS. My purpose was first to let the bill have its second reading.

Mr. MANDERSON. That has been done.

Mr. HARRIS. That has been done. Then, if there be no objection, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered. It can not be considered to-day or carried to a third reading, of course, without unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRIS. Then the bill will lie on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MANDERSON. And with it the amendments which have been offered.

Mr. CHANDLER. With the pending amendments. The vacancy in that committee, I will state to the Senator from Tennessee, has now been filled, and there is a Democratic majority on the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Tennessee is quite well aware of the fact that the committee has been filled, and he did not need the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was afraid the Senator from Tennessee, not having moved to refer the bill, had forgotten that the committee is full.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Tennessee is not likely to forget any matter of duty.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. BLANCHARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. MCLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and vote "nay."

Mr. McPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN]. Otherwise I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. PETTIGREW (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] has transferred his pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROACH (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS].

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and vote "nay."

Mr. CAREY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (after having voted in the negative). I understand that some other Senator has arranged a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY]. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—14.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Dolph,	Jones, Nev.	Pugh,
Bate,	Faulkner,	Lindsay,	Quay,
Berry,	Gallinger,	McLaurin,	Ransom,

Cullom,	Jarvis,	Peffer,
Davis,	Jones, Ark.	Platt,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance.

P. W. MITCHELL, M. C. FELMET, AND OTHERS.

Mr. HARRIS. Pending that, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JARVIS. Will the Senator from Tennessee be kind enough to permit me to call up a little local bill? It can not lead to any discussion.

Mr. HARRIS. If the bill leads to no discussion I shall not object, but I beg leave to give notice that I can not yield further.

Mr. JARVIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6656) for the relief of P. W. Mitchell, M. C. Felmet, George H. Smathers, and others.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall not object if afterwards I can have unanimous consent that the Senate take up the resolution submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], proposing an investigation by the Committee on Patents during the recess.

Mr. JARVIS. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not couple a condition to the granting of unanimous consent. I am obliged to be absent from the Senate hereafter, and I shall be very much obliged if the Senator will allow the bill to be passed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Do I understand the Senator from North Carolina to say that he is going away from the Senate Chamber?

Mr. JARVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I withdraw all objection, Mr. President.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to P. W. Mitchell, $129; to M. C. Felmet, $150; to George H. Smathers, $77.50; to David Blythe, $30; to Jesse Reed, $7; to William Locust, $17, and to George French, $5, out of any funds in the Treasury belonging to the Eastern band of Cherokee Indians.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND ENTRIES IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. VILAS. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2038) for the relief of Oklahoma settlers. It has been considered and reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That every homestead claim to land in the Territory of Oklahoma initiated by settlement or entry more than three months after such lands were open to settlement, and every such claim whenever initiated if no contest was raised against it for one year after it was initiated, and the land was in the meantime in the undisputed occupation of such homestead claimant, shall, in the absence of any other sufficient objection, be held valid and approved, notwithstanding the homestead claimant entered said Territory before the hour when said lands became open to settlement pursuant to the act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 13, 1890, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889: Provided, That said claimant shall satisfy the Commissioner of the General Land Office that his premature entry and occupation were not made with willful purpose to violate the law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. VILAS. Since the bill was considered in the Committee on Public Lands, and the term of one year fixed as the limitation for contests, the Secretary of the Interior and the Assistant Attorney-General for the Interior Department have suggested that with entire safety and justice the period can be limited to six months. I ask permission to place those letters in the RECORD, without troubling the Senate to have them read unless Senators desire it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the letters will be printed in the RECORD.

The letters referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, August 15, 1894.

DEAR SIR: After further reflection and consideration of Senate bill No. 2038, entitled "For the relief of Oklahoma settlers," I am inclined to the opinion that six months would be a sufficient length of time within which contestants should initiate contests against persons who entered upon the Territory of Oklahoma prior to the time the lands were opened to settlement. I have before me a print of said bill, as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Public Lands, and I would suggest that the words "one year," in lines 6 and 7, be stricken out, and the words "six months" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH.

Hon. JAMES H. BERRY,
United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Washington, August 15, 1894.

DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith a letter to you from the Secretary in reference to amending Senate bill No. 2038, "For the relief of Oklahoma settlers." I called his attention to the fact that I thought it would be better to amend the bill so as to limit the time to six months as the time in which contests should be initiated after settlement and entry. He signed the inclosed personal letter to you, stating that after reflection he is inclined to the opinion that six months would be a sufficient length of time. I am myself decidedly of the opinion that a six months' limit would come nearer doing justice to the settlers than one year.

Of course the letter of the Secretary and this letter from me are personal communications, and you and the other members of the committee can take the suggestions for what you think they are worth. There is a delegation of Oklahoma people here who are anxious to have the change made, and doubtless they will confer fully with you on the subject, if they have not already done so.

Very respectfully,

JOHN I. HALL.

Hon. JAMES H. BERRY,
United States Senate.

Mr. VILAS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "one year," in line 6, and inserting "six months;" so as to read:

That every homestead claim to land in the Territory of Oklahoma initiated by settlement or entry more than three months after such lands were open to settlement, and every such claim whenever initiated if no contest was raised against it for six months after it was initiated.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER HAGAN.

Mr. QUAY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 79) for the relief of Peter Hagan. It will occupy but a moment. I trust the Senator from Tennessee will allow me to have the joint resolution passed.

Mr. HARRIS. I thought I had given notice some time ago that I should be obliged to object to other requests.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not intend to object to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania, provided I am permitted to state that I can not afterwards consent to the consideration of other bills. I must object.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Tennessee whether he includes in the term "bills" the resolution of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] for an investigation by the Senate Committee on Patents during the recess? I hope he will allow that resolution to be taken up.

Mr. HARRIS. I intend to include everything that requires a vote of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania for the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 11, after the word "Claims," to insert "with the right of appeal to either party to the Supreme Court;" so as to read:

That the claim of Peter Hagen, owner of the canal barge Mary Hagan, of Philadelphia, for damages sustained for the total loss of the said canal barge in consequence of injuries received while being discharged of a cargo of stone, by the military authorities of the United States, at Fort Monroe, September 23, 1891, and all papers relating thereto now on file in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury be referred to the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to either party to the Supreme Court, for examination and the allowance of the amount of damages actually sustained by said claimant by reason of said loss, the judgment rendered by said court to be paid out of the appropriations duly made to pay judgments rendered by said court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTON obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to call up and have passed a bill which will take no time at all?

Mr. HUNTON. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. I have given notice twice at least that, being anxious for an executive session, I should be compelled to object to requests of this character. Of course it is exceedingly disagreeable to object to the request of any Senator.

Mr. HUNTON. I beg leave to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that the Senate and the House have passed a bill authorizing a railroad from Arlington, Mount Vernon, and Alexandria into the city of Washington. To complete the project sought to be inaugurated it is necessary to get authority for the road to go through the Arlington reservation. It will take but a moment.

Mr. GRAY. Through the cemetery?

Mr. HUNTON. Oh, no; through the reservation. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], before leaving, came to me and suggested that he had serious objections to the bill. I myself do not know anything about it, but I should feel constrained to object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. HUNTON. I think the Senator from Maine ought not to leave objections behind him when he goes away.

Mr. VEST. He stated that he would be back in a short time if the session continues.

Mr. HUNTON. In a short time the Senate will have adjourned.

Mr. VEST. I have done no more than what Senators generally do for each other. I merely make the statement that the Senator from Maine has objections to the bill.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from Virginia whether the bill which he asks the Senate to take up contemplates granting a right of way through the Arlington Cemetery?

Mr. HUNTON. Oh, no; through the Arlington reservation, not the cemetery.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HARRIS. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, August 20, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate August 18, 1894.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 20, 1894.

Prayer by Rev. J. H. M'CARTY, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last; when, on motion of Mr. QUAY, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 220) instructing the Secretary of War to return to the State of Massachusetts the flags of certain regiments of Massachusetts volunteer infantry; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 971) to open, widen, and extend alleys in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. 1007) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint a deputy coroner, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 3005) for the relief of George Isenstein;

A bill (H. R. 4290) for the relief of Druzilla J. Rigg, of Macomb, Ill.;

A bill (H. R. 5363) for the relief of Henry W. Lee;

A bill (H. R. 6103) for the relief of Mrs. Mary A. Menefee;

A bill (H. R. 6228) granting a pension to Adaline J. Props;

A bill (H. R. 6361) to grant a pension to Pauline J. Smith;

A bill (H. R. 7294) empowering fourth-class postmasters to administer oaths to pensioners;

A bill (H. R. 7668) to authorize the St. Louis, Avoyelles and Southwestern Railway Company to bridge Bayou Des Glaises and Atchafalaya River, in the State of Louisiana; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 101) providing for clerical assistance in the health department of the District of Columbia.

LAND SUBDIVISIONS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill (S. 1005) to prevent the recording of subdivisions of land in the District of Columbia in the office of the Recorder of Deeds was called up by me a few days ago and was read at length. It will take but a moment to pass it, and there is urgency in the matter. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Gilchrist, Ill., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Galva, Ill., remonstrating against appropriating Government moneys for sectarian Indian education, etc.; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the memorial of Lucius H. Thayer, and 70 other citizens of Portsmouth, N. H., remonstrating against appropriating Government moneys for sectarian Indian education, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HOME FOR DESTITUTE COLORED PERSONS.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7095) to provide for the erection of a national home for aged and infirm colored persons and for the maintenance of the inmates thereof.

Mr. HARRIS. The routine morning business must be concluded before I can consent to the consideration of any bill.

Mr. TURPIE. One bill has already been considered.

Mr. HARRIS. I was not aware of it, and I regret that I was not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no further petitions or memorials, the reports of standing and select committees are next in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1793) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Robert Roby, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PUGH. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7461) to amend an act entitled "An act to create a new division of the northern judicial district of Georgia," approved March 3, 1891, to report it favorably and to ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

Mr. PUGH. The bill simply changes the time of holding the district court at Columbus, Ga., from January and June to May and December.

Mr. HARRIS. If I may be permitted to make some reports from a committee, I shall have no objection to the consideration of bills that Senators want to have passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports of committees, standing and select, are in order.

Mr. McLAURIN. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2318) for the relief of B. F. Berry, to report it with an amendment. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It will take but a minute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. I have objected to one or two before, and I can not discriminate between Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

DUTY ON SUGARS, ETC.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7971) to exempt from duty sugars, molasses, etc., to report it with an amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER and Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill go to the Calendar, and the amendment will be read, of course, if Senators desire it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be read.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That from and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all sugars and on all tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice, or of beet juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete, and concentrated molasses a duty of 40 per cent ad valorem.

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on molasses testing above 40° and not above 56° polariscope a duty of 2 cents per gallon; if testing above 56° polariscope, a duty of 4 cents per gallon.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should be greatly pleased if the Senator from Tennessee, who reports the bill thus amended, would inform the Senate concerning the amendments that were referred with the bill to the committee. I am prompted to make this request for the reason that so far as the bounty amendment is concerned that received the approval of a majority of the Senate. While there was not final action upon the resolution of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], it was very evident that a majority of the Senate favor a bounty clause. Did the committee consider that matter?

Mr. HARRIS. The committee voted upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I felt, as I have no doubt the majority of the Senate felt, that its vote was a practical instruction to the committee to report free sugar with a bounty, and I offered that amendment in committee.

Mr. MANDERSON. But a majority of the committee have favored the placing of a duty upon sugar.

Mr. ALDRICH. A duty of 40 per cent.

Mr. MANDERSON. Forty per cent flat, without a bounty.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I desire to say a word with reference to the report just made. What action did the committee take upon the amendment which I offered for the repeal and cancellation of the revenue bill? Was that acted upon?

Mr. HARRIS. Perhaps the briefest, the most pertinent, and quite as respectful an answer as I could give to these various inquiries may be found in the fact that the committee has reported the bill back with an amendment; and that is really all that I need say.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARRIS. But I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that there was a majority of the committee decidedly opposed to his amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to ask a parliamentary question, and that is whether the rejected amendments should not be reported back from the committee and go upon the Calendar? Have not those amendments some parliamentary status notwithstanding they have been treated with contumely by the committee?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, that is ridiculous. That has never been done.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not want the Senator from Missouri to answer a question that I ask the Senator from Tennessee. I am willing to take the ruling of the Chair. I should perfer that always when I make these inquiries, but the Chair does not always have an opportunity to answer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee reports back the bill, and it will go to the Calendar.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the status of the amendments which were referred to the committee and not reported back, I ask the Chair?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has no information in regard to amendments not reported by the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, I think I may safely say——

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not need to allow the Senator. The Senator need not ask my permission to make the statement. I will allow him with pleasure, although I might prefer that he should not make it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, it is the most innocent of all innocent statements; but neither the Senator from New Hampshire nor any other man who has served here for three hours ever heard of an amendment that was not favorably considered by a committee being reported back as a report.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I propose to report some other bills from the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will only say that I apologize for my ignorance, having served here more than three hours, in not knowing the rule which the Senator has laid down. I have not studied parliamentary law as much as he has, and I regret if it has given the Senator any pain, or agonized him to any degree whatsoever, that I made the inquiry.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I rise——

Mr. HARRIS. I want to put on record my certificate that the Senator from New Hampshire was not ignorant. Other motives controlled him than that of ignorance. I propose to report the following bill——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I rise to the report heretofore made by the acting chairman of the Committee on Finance, and I think I am entitled to be recognized before other reports are received.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Oregon upon the bill just reported.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I desire to give notice that if the bill just reported by the acting chairman of the committee is ever called up, when it is called up, and at the proper time, I shall offer an amendment to the bill, proposing to incorporate in it the provisions of the act of 1890 relating to the duty on wool.

Mr. QUAY. When the bills were laid on the table immediately after they were received from the House of Representatives I offered as an amendment to each one of the four the McKinley act entire. That amendment seems to have disappeared. It has not received the action or indorsement of the committee. I inquire of the Senator from Tennessee what has become of my amendments, because I intend to press them when these bills come up for consideration? They are not in print.

Mr. CULLOM. Those are small amendments that were lost in committee.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon subsequently said: I now submit the proposed amendment to House bill 7971, which I shall offer at the proper time, placing a duty on wool. I ask that it be printed.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Let it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). The amendment will be printed and laid on the table.

COAL AND COKE.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7968) to place upon the free list bituminous coal, shale, slack, and coke, to report it with an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the bill may be read as proposed to be amended before it goes to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be read.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That upon bituminous coal and shale and coal slack or culm, and coke, imported from any country, whether independent or a dependency, which imposes a duty upon bituminous coal, shale, coal slack or culm, or coke, exported from the United States, there shall be levied and collected the rate of duty existing prior to the passage of this act.

FREE IRON ORE.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7969) to place upon the free list all ores of iron, to report it without amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

FREE FENCING WIRE, ETC.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7970) to place upon the free list barbed fencing wire and wire rods for the manufacture of the same, to report it with an amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. Let us have the bill read, so that we may see how it stands as proposed to be amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to strike out all after the word "duties," in line 5, in the following words:

BARBED FENCING WIRE.

Wire rods of iron or steel when imported for the manufacture of barbed wire fencing under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Barbed fencing wire and all other fencing wire or strips, round, flat, or twisted, of iron or steel, and all wire rods of iron or steel, when imported for the manufacture of such fencing, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act, the following articles, when imported into the United States, shall be admitted free of import duties: Barbed fencing wire and all other fencing wire or strips, round, flat, or twisted, of iron or steel, and all wire rods of iron or steel, when imported for the manufacture of such fencing, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senator from Tennessee who reports this bill ought to explain to the Senate that as the bill came from the other House it did not put fencing wire upon the free list, but put the material of which fencing wire is made on the free list, in order to give those who manufacture fencing wire free material. There was no provision in the bill as passed by the House whereby fencing wire or barbed wire should be made free. On the contrary, the very reverse of it was provided for, namely, that the material used should be made free, while the duty remained upon barbed wire.

Mr. HARRIS. It is true that the construction the committee placed upon the House bill was that it made iron or steel rods free, but did not make barbed wire free; and therefore the committee has reported in lieu of the House bill the provision which has been read.

Mr. CULLOM. I inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether the Senate has not once or twice voted in favor of a duty on all these articles, both the barbed wire and the iron of which the wire is made?

Mr. ALLISON. I think I ought to say, as respects all these bills, that after a very sharp contest upon each of them in the Senate, the Senate by a decided majority voted in favor of a duty. The Senate voted, I think, three times, with only 4 dissenting votes, for a duty upon coal and iron ore. Finally, upon a test with the House of Representatives, on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], but 6 votes could be found in this body in favor of putting iron ore or bituminous coal upon the free list.

As to barbed wire, I think I ought to say that the tariff bill as it came to us from the other House, known then as the Wilson bill, provided for a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem upon iron and steel rods and upon fencing wire. The Senate, in the final adjustment of that paragraph, reduced the duty from the amount provided by the House. A very sharp contest was made in favor of a duty upon fencing wire, in which my friend from Illinois [Mr. PALMER], on the opposite side of the Chamber, took the lead; and after a very full and thorough debate, by a fair majority the Senator from Illinois was sustained in his contention, and we provided for a duty upon steel rods and also upon the wire. The Senator from Illinois nearest me [Mr. CULLOM] must remember that a duty was placed upon all these articles after a very sharp and close contest and thorough debate in this body; and the committee now practically reverses the conclusions of the body made within six weeks on all of them.

Mr. HARRIS. At the request of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and with the approval of the committee, I ask for the following order——

Mr. ALDRICH. Before the bills which have just been reported pass from the consideration of the Senate to the Calendar——

Mr. BERRY. Is the bill up for consideration now—the barbed-wire bill or any other bill? Is it before the Senate to be considered at this time?

Mr. ALDRICH. I desire to make a statement for the minority of the committee in regard to——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is not before the Senate, the Chair will state to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will be permitted to make a statement as a member of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Rhode Island, but the Chair was answering the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Arkansas. The bill is not before the Senate for consideration at this moment. The Senator from Rhode Island will proceed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I deem it proper to say that the bills just reported represent the views of the majority of the committee and are not consented to but are antagonized by the minority members of the committee.

I wish to say another word upon the bill which came from the other House, in regard to barbed wire, and which shows the value which can be attached to this precipitate action in favor of tariff reform by the House of Representatives. The disposition and desire as expressed here was to put barbed wire upon the free list, to reduce the profits of the barbed-wire manufacturers for the benefit of the farmers of the United States. The bill as it came from the House of Representatives maintained the duties upon barbed wire unchanged at a very high ad valorem rate, but gave those manufacturers free materials, thereby increasing enormously their profits in the manufacture of barbed wire, without reducing the price to any consumer anywhere in the United States.

This, as I say, shows better than any argument can the nature of the movement for tariff reform which has been so precipitately entered upon in another place.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I beg but a moment to make a single remark. Nothing, I think, illustrates the value of an amendment of the rules of the Senate more conspicuously and specifically than the remarks made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. The bills to which they have referred are not before the Senate, and therefore any debate upon them would clearly be out of order. I do not myself propose to violate the rules of the Senate, but I protest that Senators who, though not old men in some respects, are the Nestors of this body and are understood to be profoundly skilled in its rules, ought not to take advantage of this opportunity, in justice to those of us who are compelled to be silent.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I accept the mild and gentle reproof of my venerable friend from Illinois. I only answered an inquiry put to me by his colleague [Mr. CULLOM], and certainly, when such an inquiry is made, a fair courtesy would require that I should make an answer and not be dumb. So, if I have violated in any sense the rules of the Senate, I think I have a reasonable excuse for it in the question propounded by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to make a single remark with the permission of the Senate. I have no doubt the inquiry of my colleague was made in the most innocent and unsophisticated way [laughter], and I certainly feel grateful to the Senator from Iowa for his consideration of, and I tender him my thanks for his courtesy to my colleague. I shall, however, regard the rules, and say no more.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question respecting the duties on barbed wire. As the Senator has certainly investigated the subject, I ask him what is the equivalent ad valorem duty upon the returns of 1893 and 1894.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know what it is on the returns of 1893 or 1894, but the duty is a cent and a quarter a pound as fixed in the tariff bill which has been passed.

Mr. MILLS. But what is the equivalent ad valorem?

Mr. ALDRICH. The domestic price of barbed wire is about a cent and three-quarters a pound, nearly equal to the duty. The duty is pretty nearly 100 per cent ad valorem, I think.

COMPARATIVE TARIFF COMPILATION.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to ask for an order to print the tariff law of 1894, compared with the tariff law of 1890, the Mills bill of 1888, and the Wilson bill of 1894, in an abbreviated form. The information which this abbreviation will contain is already printed in a large volume, but very inconvenient for distribution. I am therefore directed to ask for an order to print the usual number of copies in the abbreviated form which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order to print will be made, in the absence of objection.

COMPILATION OF TARIFF LAWS.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report an order, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Ordered, That the Committee on Finance cause to be prepared a compilation of the tariff laws of the United States from 1789 to 1894, inclusive, with annotations of decisions of the Board of General Appraisers and the United States courts respecting such decisions.

Mr. VEST. Does that order come from the Committee on Finance?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was reported by the acting chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST. I was not in committee when that order was adopted, and I wish to examine it. Let it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will go over under the rules.

REPORT OF LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

Mr. GORMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] for printing 500 extra copies of the report of the Librarian of Congress, to report it favorably and without amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the annual report of the Librarian of Congress for the calendar year 1893 be printed, and that 500 extra copies, with paper covers, be printed for distribution by the Librarian.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 2320) granting a pension to Mrs. Harriet L. Mayo; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PEFFER introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 103) authorizing the Secretary of War to lend two cannon to the commissioners of Smith County, Kans., to be used in experiments to procure rainfall; which was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to lend two 20-pounder cannon to the board of commissioners of Smith County, in the State of Kansas, for the period of five years, to be used under direction of the said commissioners to produce concussions in the atmosphere with the view of producing rain.

GOLD AND SILVER PRICES.

Mr. CHANDLER. I submit a resolution which has the approval of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], the chairman of the Committee on Printing, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 2,000 additional copies of Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 262 of the present session, containing papers relative to gold and silver prices and bimetallism, with a suitable cover and title-page describing the three papers contained in the document.

Mr. COCKRELL. What will be the cost?

Mr. MILLS. I think the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a very little matter. I submitted it to the chairman of the Committee on Printing, who I see is in his seat. He makes no objection to it. It is the document in reference to bimetallism which I submitted to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. GORMAN. There is no doubt about the expediency of the printing. It is all right.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 18th instant approved and signed the act (S. 2280) to amend section 2 of the act approved February 15, 1893, entitled "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine Hospital Service."

RETURN OF BATTLE FLAGS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. Res. 220) instructing the Secretary of War to return to the State of Massachusetts the flags of certain regiments of Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution which has just come from the House of Representatives may be now considered. The War Department has been communicated with, and there is no possible objection to this action.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSFER OF LAND TO SAGINAW, MICH.

Mr. PATTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 5) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer a certain piece of land in the State of Michigan to the city of Saginaw.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be transferred to the city of Saginaw, in the State of Michigan, the piece or parcel of land therein described which was heretofore transferred by the city of Saginaw to the Government of the United States for the purpose of erecting thereon a Government building, the parcel of land not being required by the Government for that purpose, but provides that neither the land itself nor any building or buildings erected thereon shall ever be put to any use or uses detrimental or objectionable to the Government.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

B. F. BERRY.

Mr. McLAURIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2318) for the relief of B. F. Berry.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, after the word "payment," in line 9, of section 1, to insert the words "or tender;" so as to make the section read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to issue to B. F. Berry, of Simpson County, Miss., a patent to the east half of the northwest quarter of section 36, township 2 north, range 2 east, Choctaw meridian, situated in said Simpson County, Miss., conveying to said B. F. Berry the title of the United States to said land upon his payment or tender to Lloyd M. Kelley, of said county, of the sum of money paid by said Kelley into the land office at Jackson, Miss., for said land, on the 23d day April, 1894.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NORTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF GEORGIA.

Mr. PUGH. I renew my request for the present consideration of House bill 7461 in relation to the northern judicial district of Georgia, which has been reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7461) to amend an act entitled "An act to create a new division of the northern judicial district of Georgia," approved March 3, 1891. It provides that the terms of the circuit and district courts of the western division of the northern judicial district of Georgia, held at Columbus, shall convene on the first Monday in May and the first Monday in December, instead of the first Monday in June and the first Monday in January, as now provided by law, and each of the terms shall continue as long as the presiding judge may deem necessary.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOME FOR DESTITUTE COLORED PERSONS.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7095) to provide for the erection of a national home for aged and infirm colored persons and for the maintenance of the inmates thereof.

Mr. QUAY. That bill was read on Saturday, was it not?

Mr. TURPIE. The bill was partially read on Saturday.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, August 8, 1894.

Mr. GORMAN. I think there is no necessity for reading the report. It is impossible to pass the bill at this stage of the session. I know the bill does not propose to take any money directly out of the Treasury, but in the present condition of the Senate I must object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to say in behalf of the bill that it was very carefully considered by the House Committee on the District of Columbia. It relates to a fund which could hardly be appropriated for a more desirable or better purpose than the one designed by the bill. The matter has been carefully examined by the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate, and it seems to me that the bill is in a condition to be passed without objection. A report has been made which is before the Senate, and has been generally read by Senators. I hope the Senator from Maryland will withdraw his objection.

Mr. GORMAN. It is not possible for me to withdraw the objection in the present condition of the Senate. After full deliberation and discussion and with a full Senate it may be that the bill would be found to be a proper one to be passed, but I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that at this time it is not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being objection, the bill goes over under the rule.

ADJOURNMENT TO WEDNESDAY.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ESTATE OF THE LATE SENATOR STANFORD.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2307) to require the prompt prosecution and speedy determination of the claim of the United States against the estate of the late Leland Stanford.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General forthwith to cause to be instituted in the circuit court of the United States for the district of California such suit, or suits, as in his judgment may be necessary to enforce any claim of the United States against the estate of said Leland Stanford, deceased, and to cause the same to be prosecuted as rapidly as the interests of justice will permit. Jurisdiction in such case is hereby conferred upon said court subject to an appeal from the judgment therein to the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 2. That said courts are hereby directed to cause the same to be forthwith determined and to give precedence in the hearing of the same to all other business pending in either of those courts so far as in their judgment the interest of justice and of the parties will permit.

SEC. 3. That if in the opinion of the Attorney-General such claim must first be prosecuted before any State court, he is directed to cause the same to be prosecuted with all convenient promptness, and the provisions of the foregoing sections shall be applicable to any proceedings heretofore or hereafter instituted in said court which may be transferred to a court of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be at the disposition of the Attorney-General for carrying this act into effect.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HILL. I am advised that section 4, which proposes to appropriate a sum of money, is not necessary or desirable. I therefore move to strike out that section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York, to strike out section 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND ENTRIES IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. VILAS. In the bill (S. 2038) for the relief of Oklahoma settlers, which was passed Saturday, there is a reference to the act making appropriations for the Indian service for the year ended June 30, 1890. By some mistake in copying the word "thirtieth" was written "thirteenth," to which the engrossing clerk called my attention. It is necessary that the error should be corrected in order that the bill may be properly engrossed. I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. VILAS. In line 16, I move to strike out the word "thirteenth" and insert "thirtieth;" so as to make the title of the act read:

An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1890, and for other purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLANCHARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN].

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). A quorum not having voted, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; it does not require a quorum to make an order requesting the attendance of absent Senators. It is not necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stands corrected.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think there have been decisions both ways.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question about it.

Mr. MANDERSON. It raises a very grave question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to inquire——

Mr. ALDRICH. Debate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suspend his decision until the rule is read. The Chair will have section 3 of Rule V read.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE V.

3. Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no debate or motion, except to adjourn, shall be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that under clause 3 of Rule V a majority of the Senators present have a right to adopt the order which is involved in the motion of the Senator from Missouri. The Sergeant-at-Arms will therefore execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. Pending the execution of the order, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

After a little delay, Mr. HILL, Mr. STEWART, Mr. MCLAURIN, and Mr. ALDRICH entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Forty-three Senators having responded to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Rhode Island withdraw the motion temporarily that the Senate may receive a message from the House of Representatives?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 562) for the relief of Marlin Parks;

A bill (H. R. 898) granting a pension to Jesse Davenport, of Company A, Second Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers, in Oregon Indian wars of 1855 and 1856;

A bill (H. R. 1214) granting a pension to Hannah Welch;

A bill (H. R. 2920) to pension John Maholm, dependent father; and

A bill (H. R. 6050) to pension Margaret A. Woods, widow of William W. Woods, late of Company E, Sixteenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HARRIS. I renew the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to address a persuasive remark to the Senator from Tennessee. I ask him to yield until the Senate may take up the resolution of the absent Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], proposing an investigation by the Committee on Patents during the recess. It will take but a moment, I assure the Senator.

Mr. HARRIS. At least one Senator near me says that it is impossible to consider that resolution now, and in the present condition of the Senate I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not urge me. I would be glad to oblige the Senator from New Hampshire, as I would always be glad to oblige any and every other Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. Do I understand the Senator to ask me to withdraw the request?

Mr. HARRIS. I believe I will.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw it, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRIS. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

COLLECTION OF INTERNAL REVENUE, ETC.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for the collection of internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, namely:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to employ such additional force as may be necessary for the collection of internal revenue, $9,000.

To carry into effect the convention between the United States and Venezuela providing for a reference to arbitration of the claim of the Venezuela Steam Transportation Company against the Government of Venezuela, signed at Caracas on the 19th day of January, 1892, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the President in such manner as he shall deem reasonable and proper.

For the compensation of the commissioner and agent on the part of the United States and for the contingent expenses of the commission, including the moiety of the compensation of the third commissioner: Provided, That the compensation of the commissioner on the part of the United States shall not exceed the rate of $5,000 a year and that of the agent of the United States $4,000 a year.

There being no objection, the bill was read a first and second time; and the House proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Now, that this bill is before the House, I will ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] to give us a brief explanatory statement in regard to it, and to tell us the total amount that it carries.

Mr. SAYERS. The total amount is $14,000. The first clause in the bill provides for an additional force in the Internal Revenue Bureau, which becomes necessary on account of the increased work which devolves upon that office.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Is that for clerical force?

Mr. SAYERS. I suppose so.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. How many new clerks does it provide for?

Mr. SAYERS. Well, I do not know how many. Nine thousand dollars is all that the bureau asks.

The next clause in the bill carries $5,000. It provides simply for carrying into effect the arbitration treaty between the Governments of the United States and Venezuela upon a certain claim that is now pending against Venezuela. That commission will meet between this time and the next regular session of Congress; so that the appropriation ought now to be made.

Mr HENDERSON of Iowa. Neither of these items was before us when our regular bills were made up in committee?

Mr. SAYERS. They were not.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. These are matters transmitted specially by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SAYERS. They are. But I will state to my friend that the sum of $14,000 will not add anything to the statement I have made, because in that statement $550,000 appears for miscellaneous appropriations, while in reality only $515,000 was appropriated.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. It does not make much difference, because the gentleman's statement appeals largely to the imagination, at any rate. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. I can return the compliment.

Mr. LOUD. This item of $9,000 is for the purpose of carrying into effect the income tax, is it not?

Mr. SAYERS. And also the additional internal-revenue features which were incorporated in the new tariff bill.

Mr. LOUD. This is only a starter, I presume, notwithstanding the promise which was made when the bill was before us that there would be no additional cost for collection of the revenue.

Mr. SAYERS. I can give the gentleman no further information.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill (H. R. 8007) was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PAY OF SENATE AND HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire also to send to the desk a joint resolution to which I think there will be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint Resolution to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of representatives their respective salaries for the month of August, 1894, on the 23d day of said month.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of August, 1894, on the 23d day of said month.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. Res. 221) was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

WAR FLAGS OF MASSACHUSETTS REGIMENTS.

Mr. COGSWELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 220) instructing the Secretary of War to return to the State of Massachusetts the flags of certain regiments of Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, instructed to return to the State of Massachusetts the regimental flags of the Fifteenth, Nineteenth, Twenty-third, and Fifty-eighth Regiments of Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, as requested by the governor of said State.

There being no objection, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COGSWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ESTATE OF SYLVANUS SANDFORD.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I now send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 5215) for the relief of the estate of Sylvanus Sandford, deceased, now pending in the House, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts, under the provisions of the acts of March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Bowman and Tucker acts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PAYNE. Before consent is given I hope the gentleman from Texas will explain what this bill is, or let it be read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, empowered and directed, out of any money not otherwise appropriated by law, to pay to the estate of Sylvanus Sandford, deceased, late of Cass County, Tex., the sum of $16,718.75, the amount due him on account of supplies taken by the Federal forces for their use at Brashear City, in the State of Louisiana, in the year 1862.

Mr. BAILEY. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that Mr. Sandford was at the beginning of the war a resident of Cass County, Tex. He was opposed to the secession of the State, and was, and continued to be throughout the war, a loyal citizen. He disposed of as much of his property as he could possibly dispose of, and converted it into the most available shape; amongst other transactions, disposing of a lot of cattle and taking in exchange 107 hogsheads of sugar, which were shipped to Brashear City, La., which shortly before that time had been occupied by the Federal troops.

I have here a statement of Col. McMillan, to the effect that Mr. Sandford came to his headquarters with his wife and daughter, and asked to be permitted to see the sugar which he had shipped. It seems that there were some 400 hogsheads of sugar there at the time, but he gave Col. McMillan a description of the marks and brands and the number of hogsheads shipped, which Col. McMillan states in his testimony accords precisely with the description and number he had before given as belonging to him. After this sugar had been turned over to the Federal authorities and shipped to New Orleans, Mr. Sandford went to Illinois and remained there until after the close of the war.

That, Mr. Speaker, is all I know of this matter, and I gather it mainly from the papers in the case. The deceased had a son, who is residing in my district, and I know him to be a most excellent man. I observe from some of the papers accompanying the case an affidavit by Mr. Sandford, the father, which was made as long ago as 1876; so it is evident he was trying to prosecute this case in some form as far back as that period.

Mr. LOUD. In what form?

Mr. HAYES. What became of the sugar?

Mr. BAILEY. It was shipped to the United States officer in charge of such stores and supplies at New Orleans.

Mr. HAYES. Then it passed into the hands of the Federal authorities.

Mr. BAILEY. I think there is no question of that.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman states that this claim was being prosecuted. In what form was he trying to prosecute it?

Mr. BAILEY. I am not advised as to that fact.

Mr. LOUD. It appears on the face of it that after the death of the claimant somebody, either his heirs or his attorneys in the case, seemed very anxious to prosecute the claim.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the gentleman from California that the most I know in connection with the case is gathered from the papers accompanying it, and on one of these papers I find an indorsement to the effect that the affidavit of Mr. Sandford was taken on the 3d day of February, 1876.

I will state further, that if this was a proposition to pay the money claimed I might not myself with my present information be willing to vote for it. But inasmuch as it is a mere reference of the matter to the court, I can not see that there is any objection to its taking that course.

Mr. LOUD. It provides for an examination by the court and a reference back to Congress?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, under the provisions of the law cited.

Mr. LOUD. I think the case is a very old one and must be, but I will not object. If the gentleman from Texas can allow it to go to the court, I think I might be willing to have it take that course.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BAILEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RETURN OF ENGROSSED BILL FROM SENATE.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 743) entitled "An act for the relief of the citizens of the States of Oregon, Idaho, and Washington who served with United States troops in the war against the Nez Perces and Bannock and Shoshone Indians, and for the relief of the heirs of those killed in such service, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

CORRECTION OF A BILL.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution to correct an error in the bill H. R. 855.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution similar in character to the one which has just been adopted, and which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the bill (H. R. 855) entitled "A bill to amend an act granting a pension to Elizabeth Voss, which has passed both branches of the present Congress and is now in the hands of the President of the United States, be amended and corrected by changing the word "eighty" therein to "ninety," so that said bill shall refer to the act approved March 2, 1889.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF HOME MISSIONS, OMAHA INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 870) authorizing the issue of a patent to the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions for certain lands on the Omaha Indian Reservation for school purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the location of the old mission school on the Omaha Indian Reservation, in the State of Nebraska, has become unsuitable for school purposes, and it being necessary to replace the buildings thereon by such as shall be more convenient and commodious, the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions propose to relinquish all claims to the land situate in section 12, township 25, range 9 east of the sixth principal meridian, on said reservation in the State of Nebraska, occupied for mission purposes for nearly forty years; and

Whereas the Omaha Indians, in consideration of said relinquishment and the promise of said board to erect on a proposed new site a building, to be used for school purposes, of the value of $7,500, for the benefit of the children and youth of the Omahas, have agreed to relinquish to said board all their right and title in and to the following-described land, for the purpose above named, to-wit: The southwest quarter of northeast quarter and west half of southeast quarter and northeast quarter of southeast quarter of fractional section No. 29, township 25, range 8 east, of the sixth principal meridian, on said Omaha Reservation, in Thurston County, Nebr.: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States of America is hereby authorized and directed to issue to the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions a patent for the following-described land, to wit: The southwest quarter of northeast quarter and west half of southeast quarter and northeast quarter of southeast quarter of fractional section No. 29, township 25, range 8 east of the sixth principal meridian, on the Omaha Indian Reservation, in Thurston County, Nebr., containing 160 acres, more or less.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The Committee on Indian Affairs recommended the following amendments:

Add after the word "years," at the end of the first preamble, the following: "to the United States, the same to become a part of the reservation wherein it is located."

Add after the word "America," in the third line of page 2, the following: "upon the execution, by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, of a patent to the United States of the lands now occupied by them, as described in the first preamble herein."

Add after the word "less," on the twelfth line of page 2, the following: "to have and to hold the same so long as the said Presbyterian Board of Home Missions shall use and occupy the premises for educational, charitable, and religious purposes, and no longer."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 7451) to authorize the entry of lands for gravel pits and reservoir purposes and authorizing the grant of way for pipe lines.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement, which perhaps will be satisfactory without the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the statement of the House conferees, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The first amendment of the Senate makes it certain that no land except that which is now subject to entry under the laws of the United States and not occupied can be disposed of under section 1 of this act.

The second amendment provides for a forfeiture of the title to the United States for nonuses for a period of two years.

The third amendment allows the sale for reservoir purposes in quantities not exceeding one-quarter section of unoccupied public lands not reserved for public use, but reserves all mineral and prohibits the sale of any reservoir site heretofore reserved, or that may be hereafter reserved. It also vests in the Secretary of the Interior the power to declare a forfeiture for a violation of any of the conditions upon which lands suitable for reservoir or water-storage purposes are sold under this act. It vests in the Secretary of the Interior authority to withdraw other reservoir sites upon the application of any State, county, or district, or organization, and to allow them the use thereof for the storage of water for irrigation, mining, or useful purposes.

THOS. C. McRAE.
ROBERT NEILL.
JOHN F. LACEY.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the report will be agreed to.

The conference report was agreed to.

REPUBLIC OF HAWAII.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, which I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report favorably, and I ask that joint resolution No. 210 lie on the table. The joint resolution reported is in lieu of joint resolution No. 210.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution congratulating the Republic of Hawaii.

Resolved, etc., That the United States of America congratulates the Republic of Hawaii on the peaceful assumption of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of self-government, as indicated by the recent adoption of a republican form of government.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution reported favorably from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think that some later time had better be fixed for the consideration of this, so as to give us time to make arrangements about it.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, we have consumed much time in discussing Hawaiian affairs, and I do not suppose any one desires to open the debate again. I do not, and I hope that the resolution, which is simply a resolution to congratulate the Hawaiian Republic on having peacefully assumed the duties and responsibilities of self-government, will be allowed to pass without debate.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand that some members of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs desire to discuss this resolution, and I think it would be better to let it go over. Otherwise I shall have to object.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If the resolution is not adopted to-day there is danger that it will not be acted upon by both Houses at this session.

Mr. PAYNE. They have waited so long that I think they can wait another day. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

MRS. MARTHA FRANK.

Mr. LAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill (H. R. 7002) to pension Mrs. Martha Frank.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the regulations and provisions of law governing the payment of pensions, the name of Mrs. Martha Frank, widow of William Frank, member of the company of Capt. John Little in the Indian war of 1880.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read as follows:

Add after line 8 the words "and allow her a pension rated at $8 per month."

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill has been considered in Committee of the Whole at a Friday night session?

Mr. LAWSON. It has not. On account of the adjournment over last Friday there was no opportunity to consider it in Committee of the Whole. The bill was reported last week.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Why was it not considered earlier?

Mr. LAWSON. This lady is 100 years old and quite indigent, and whatever is to be done must be done soon to be of any benefit to her.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. What is the age of the applicant?

Mr. LAWSON. Over one hundred years.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the consideration of this bill?

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to object; but I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia why arrears of pension is proposed to be given in this bill. I understand the bill grants a pension from a date prior to the passage of this act. I also understand the practice of Congress to be only to grant pensions from the date of the passage of the act.

Mr. LAWSON. I propose to put her on the same footing with other pensioners of the Indian wars.

Mr. LOUD. I think it had better be considered at a Friday night session. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California objects.

B. J. VAN VLECK.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3402) for the relief of B. J. Van Vleck, administrator of Henry Van Vleck, deceased.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Treasurer of the United States shall pay, out of any money in his hands not otherwise appropriated, to B. J. Van Vleck, administrator of Henry Van Vleck, deceased, or to his duly authorized attorneys in fact, the sum of $4,520.20, being the amount due said Henry Van Vleck at the time of his death as a balance on account of extra work done on the locks of the Ste. Marie Canal, in Michigan, with interest thereon from October 2, 1882, the date of approval of said claim by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SAYERS. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that this bill has been approved by the War Department.

Mr. SAYERS. I object to the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

EXTENSION OF CHARTERS OF BUSINESS CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk and put upon its passage a bill with reference to business corporations in the District.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection. The bill has just come from the Senate.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 2263) to amend section 553 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 553 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding to the said section the following provision:

"That any corporation heretofore or hereafter organized under the provisions of this section may renew its charter for any stated number of years, not exceeding twenty, by filing in the office of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia a certificate in writing, signed by a majority of its trustees, and duly acknowledged, certifying that at the last regular meeting of the stockholders held prior to the date of such certificate, or at a special meeting called for that purpose, the stockholders of such company, by a vote of at least two-thirds of all the shares of the stock of the company, resolved to renew the charter thereof for a period designated by them: Provided, That the proposed renewal shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in writing indorsed on said certificate: And provided, That a duly authenticated copy of the resolution of the stockholders in respect of such renewal shall be attached to said certificate.

"The filing of such certificate so approved shall be and operate as a renewal of such charter for the specified time therein. The charter so renewed may afterwards be renewed from time to time: Provided, That no one renewal shall be for a longer period than twenty years, and that each renewal shall be authorized by the stockholders and be subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in the manner hereinbefore provided.

"The provisions of section 503 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia shall apply to the record of all certificates of renewals of charters authorized by this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request to consider this Senate bill?

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some explanation of this bill before consent is given.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I can explain it in a moment. By existing law the limitation on the existence of corporations in the District of Columbia is twenty years. There are corporations whose charters are about to expire under that limitation. There is no provision of law now for the renewal of those charters. This bill simply provides that these existing corporations, which are business corporations, may renew their charters for another twenty years with the consent of the Commissioners and of the stockholders of the respective companies.

Mr. COOMBS. I understand this bill does not apply to railroads?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It does not. It relates to business corporations. The bill has been examined by the House Committee on the District of Columbia and reported favorably, and now comes from the Senate.

Mr. BLAND. Under what law are they extended now?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. They can not be extended now. They have to apply for a new charter, which puts business enterprises to a good deal of trouble.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this Senate bill? (After a pause). The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COBB of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that motion until the enrolled general deficiency bill comes in? The Chair understands it is about ready.

Mr. BLAND. I withdraw that motion, but demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

TO PROVIDE FEMALE HELP WITH SEATS.

Mr. DE ARMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the bill (S. 1841) to provide that all persons employing female help in stores, shops, offices, or manufactories shall provide seats for the same when not actively employed; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EXCLUSION AND DEPORTATION OF ALIEN ANARCHISTS.

Mr. BOATNER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the bill (S. 2314) to provide for the exclusion and deportation of alien anarchists; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CONGRATULATING THE REPUBLIC OF HAWAII.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. Res. 225), in lieu of H. Res. 210, congratulating the Hawaiian Islands on their peaceable assumption of the power of self-government, and recognizing that Republic as free, sovereign, and independent; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed, and House resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

LEAD ORE AND SILVER LEAD ORES.

Mr. TARSNEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported favorably the bill (H. R. 7962) to amend paragraph 165, Schedule C, of an act of August —, 1894, entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TURNER of Georgia, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. McLAURIN, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

EXCLUSION OF ALIEN ANARCHISTS.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BOATNER. I rise to move to suspend the rules and pass Senate bill 2314.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman to move to suspend the rules.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

CORRECTION.

Mr. WOOMER. Mr. Speaker, on page 9950 of the daily RECORD, in the vote on the bill placing iron ore on the free list, I am recorded as voting in the affirmative, whereas in fact I voted in the negative. I ask that the correction be made. [See page 8486 of permanent RECORD.]

The SPEAKER. The change will be made in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

The Speaker laid before the House a resolution of the Senate, transmitting, in compliance with the request of the House, a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1252) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the times and places to hold terms of the United States courts in the State of Washington." The duplicate was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC BUILDING, LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

The Speaker also laid before the House a bill (S. 2293) to provide for the improvement of the building and grounds of the United States court and post-office at Little Rock, Ark.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill, and I wish to make a brief statement and to read a letter from the circuit judge there.

Mr. PAYNE. Is this one of the bills that were reported favorably by the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. TERRY. No, sir. It is a Senate bill. The same bill has been unanimously reported by the House committee. The work for which the bill provides is absolutely necessary, and the Government is being put to expense all the time for want of it. To show the necessity, I read a letter addressed to me by the circuit judge.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.
Little Rock, March 28, 1892.

MY DEAR SIR: I have just seen a copy of your bill relating to the United States building in this city.

I have said and written so much about this building in the past that I have grown weary of the subject. My letters are on file in Washington protesting against laying the foundations of the building under the limitations and restrictions of the act making the first appropriation.

I said then, and time has verified the correctness of my judgment, that the building which it was proposed to erect would be found totally inadequate to accommodate the public officers and business expected to be provided for within its walls. I knew this was so, so far as it related to the United States courts.

I pleaded for two court rooms, or a judge's chambers large enough for a chambers court room; but all in vain. There is but one court room, and the judge's chambers is barely large enough to contain my bookcases, a table, and two or three chairs.

The result is that when there are two judges here and it is desirable to hold two courts at the same time, as it frequently is, we are unable to do so except when the county court-house is not in use and is loaned to us, or we can get in the State house.

The want of another court room is a source of expense to the Government and of delay and costs to parties and witnesses.

The circuit court of appeals ought to hold its winter sessions at this place, and doubtless would do so if we had a court room; but under existing conditions it is out of the question.

I know nothing about the wants of the other departments. I only know that the present building does not furnish adequate accommodations for the United States courts.

Yours, truly,

HENRY C. CALDWELL,
Circuit Judge.

HON. W. L. TERRY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Now this bill is simply for the purpose of constructing an addition to the building, so as to give more room to enlarge the judge's chambers and the offices of the marshal and the clerk of the circuit and district courts, and also to put in an elevator, the whole at a cost not to exceed $54,000. I ask unanimous consent to have the bill considered at this time.

The building is in my home town, and the work is absolutely necessary, and certainly there is no economy in postponing it, because the Government is being put to extra expense for witnesses and jurors for want of these accommodations.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me from the letter of Judge Caldwell which the gentleman has read and from his own statement that he makes not only a proper but an urgent case, and I, for one, shall not object.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the following improvements to be made on the building and grounds of the United States court and post-office at Little Rock, Ark., and at a cost not exceeding the following, to wit:

First. To construct an addition to said building, for the purpose of creating more room therein, and enlarging the judge's chamber and the offices of the marshal and clerk of the circuit and district courts, at a cost not exceeding $54,000.

Second. To put an elevator in said building, at a cost not exceeding $4,000.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause proper plans and estimates to be made for each of the improvements above contemplated, so that no expenditure shall be made or authorized for the full completion of either of them beyond the amount above provided therefor; said amount to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SAYERS. I did not follow closely the reading of the bill, and I will ask the gentleman whether it contains an appropriation?

Mr. TERRY. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas for the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TERRY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXCLUSION AND DEPORTATION OF ALIEN ANARCHISTS.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill I send to the Clerk's desk.

The bill (S. 2314) to provide for the exclusion and deportation of alien anarchists was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no alien anarchist shall hereafter be permitted to land at any port of the United States, or be admitted into the United States, but this prohibition shall not be so construed as to apply to political refugees or political offenders, other than such anarchists.

SEC. 2. That the board of special inquiry authorized under the immigration act of March 3, 1893, shall diligently inquire of any alien seeking admission into the United States, who is suspected of being an anarchist, by pertinent questions, as to his antecedents, his opinions as to government, and whether he belongs to any society or association of known anarchistic tendencies; and it may examine the person of such alien for marks indicative of such membership; it may accept evidence of the immigrant's common reputation as an anarchist, and the orders, decrees, or judgments of foreign governments and police notifications as prima facie evidence, which may be deemed sufficient, unless successfully controverted, to prevent the admission of such alien.

SEC. 3. That where the Superintendent of Immigration is satisfied from oath or affirmation filed with him that any alien anarchist has been allowed to land or has come into the United States contrary to law, or such officer has reason to believe from oath or affirmation filed with him that any alien in the United States is an anarchist and that his presence in this country will be a menace to the Government or to the peace and well-being of society in general, he may issue a warrant and cause such suspected alien anarchist to be taken into custody and brought before such Superintendent, who shall proceed without unnecessary delay to hear the evidence upon such charge and shall afford the suspected person an opportunity to submit evidence in his defense, and if, after such hearing, the Superintendent shall be satisfied that the person accused is an alien anarchist and has been allowed to land or has come into the United States contrary to law, or is satisfied that such person is an alien anarchist and that his presence in this country will be a menace to the Government or to the peace and well-being of society in general, the said Superintendent shall cause him to be conveyed to the port of departure and thence returned to the country whence he came; and if such anarchist was allowed to land or came into this country contrary to law, he shall be returned at the expense of the importing vessel, but if already in the country at the time of the passage of this act, or if he entered from an adjoining country of which he is not a citizen, then he shall be returned to the country of his nativity at the expense of the United States.

The Superintendent of Immigration, for the purposes of such hearings, shall have power to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to take testimony upon the questions involved, and may require any inspector of immigration or may specially authorize any other person to execute process, to make arrests, and to convey to ports of departure persons ordered deported. That upon any hearing before said Superintendent, and upon any hearing provided for in the fourth section of this act, the same kind of evidence hereinbefore authorized to be received before the board of special inquiry on the admission of alien immigrants may be allowed and with the like effect:

It is further provided that any person arrested for being an alien anarchist and ordered to be deported by the Superintendent of Immigration shall have a right to appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall hear and dispose of such appeal under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and pending such appeal the order of deportation shall not be executed, but the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury upon such appeal shall be final and conclusive, but no final order of deportation shall be carried out until said alien anarchist has an opportunity, if he so desires, to apply for a writ of habeas corpus, to be issued by any judge of any United States court, and upon any hearing upon such writ the question of alienage, identity, and the regularity of the proceedings may be reviewed. The Secretary of the Treasury may authorize the collector of customs at any port to proceed against any alien anarchist, according to the provisions of this act, and in such proceedings to perform all the duties and exercise all the powers hereby conferred on the Superintendent of Immigration.

SEC. 4. That in cases where, upon the trial and conviction of any alien of any crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, in any United States court or court of record of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, it shall appear from the evidence produced at the trial that such alien is an anarchist, or that his remaining in this country will be a menace to the Government or to the peace and wellbeing of society in general, the presiding judge shall direct that a further hearing shall be had before him upon that matter at an early day, of which the convicted alien shall have due notice, and at which he shall be allowed to be heard and introduce evidence in his defense, and if the said judge shall be satisfied from the evidence produced at such hearing that such convicted alien is an anarchist, or that his remaining in the country will be a menace to the Government or to the peace and wellbeing of society in general, he may direct that in addition to other punishments adjudged, the said convicted alien, after undergoing such punishments, shall be taken before a commissioner of immigration at a port of entry, who shall order his deportation at the expense of the United States to the country from which he came. Should he thereafter return to the United States he shall be arrested and sentenced to confinement in a penitentiary for a period not exceeding four years and afterwards again deported.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his discretion to appoint such number of immigration agents as he may deem necessary, not exceeding twelve in number, at a salary not exceeding $2,500 each per annum, whose duties shall be to go abroad and make investigations in other countries, under such rules, directions, and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, pertaining to intended immigrants, and especially to diligently inquire and inform themselves as to the character of intended immigrants, whether anarchists, criminals, or alien contract laborers, availing themselves of police records, decrees of expulsion, and any and every source of information useful and obtainable so as to enable them to arrive at correct conclusions, and to report thereon from time to time to the Superintendent of Immigration, and to execute such other duties relating to the matters aforesaid as the Secretary of the Treasury may impose; and for the purpose of enforcing this law and paying the salaries of the said agents, the sum of $60,000 is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 6. That the fact that an alien has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States shall constitute no bar to proceedings against him under this act or under the acts to which it is an amendment.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I must object to the consideration of that bill in its present form.

Mr. BOATNER. I desire to make a brief statement with regard to this bill, and I trust the gentleman will not object until he hears it.

Mr. WARNER. If the bill is to be amended, the amendments can be proposed and arranged before we are plunged into a discussion of the measure.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, this bill has the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Secretary of State. It was unanimously reported by the Committee on Immigration of the other House; it was passed by the Senate unanimously, and it has been reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary of this House.

Mr. WARNER. My objection is not that the bill does not have good sponsors, but that in its present shape it is a bad bill. It is more likely to make anarchists than to punish them.

Mr. BOATNER. A word further, if the gentleman will permit me. The Administration also urges the very great importance of passing this bill at the present session of Congress, owing to the fact that we are advised that a large number of the most dangerous anarchists in the world are now on their way to the United States, and that at this time there is no law on the statute books which prohibits the landing of an anarchist in this country.

Mr. WARNER. And this bill does not even define the anarchy which it proposes to punish.

Mr. BOATNER. Just a moment. According to authority which is equal to that of the gentleman from New York all rights of those who are charged with being anarchists are safeguarded and taken care of in this bill.

For these reasons, I appeal to the gentleman not to put his judgment and opinion against the opinion and views of so many who are interested in this measure, which they regard as necessary for the maintenance of public order.

Mr. WARNER. Whenever it is proposed to put into the hands of administrative officers such powers as this bill proposes that they shall employ against so large a number—hundreds of thousands—of persons who are now in this country legally, and permits them to do this without what I consider proper safeguards, I must, without regard to the backing that the bill may have, object to its consideration in this form. The gentleman himself knows that this bill should be amended; and he knows that the proper method of procedure is to prepare the amendments and have them carefully considered before we plunge into a discussion of the subject in this House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does not the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER] know that there are now five hundred anarchists on their way to this country, the description of whom has been furnished to officers of the Government?

Mr. WARNER. No amount of panic can scare the "gentleman from New York" into putting into the hands of an administrative officer the detection and punishment of a crime which is not even defined in the measure which proposes to punish it by deportation. Nor will the "gentleman from New York" be scared by any other kind of panic into providing patronage for twelve men at $2,500 a year.

Mr. OATES. Allow me just a moment. The gentleman's objection is that anarchy is not defined in the bill. Does he not know that where a word or term is used in a statute without definition it always takes on its usual or common-law definition?

Mr. WARNER. Does not the gentleman know that there is no definition of "anarchy" to be found in the common law?

Mr. OATES. I think the gentleman is mistaken——

Mr. WARNER. Gentlemen inform me they have been looking for it and can not find it——

Mr. OATES. And if not, the word would be construed according to its ordinary or dictionary signification.

Mr. WARNER. The superintendent of immigration informs me that for several months he has been attempting to draw up a measure defining anarchy, and has not been able to do it.

Mr. BOATNER. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that doubtless he will be able to support with enormous strength of argument the position which he now assumes and will be able to impress upon the House the necessity of adopting such amendments as he advocates. The best way to get a good law on this subject is to consent that this bill be considered; the gentleman can then bring to our assistance in perfecting the bill his great ability and large information. Unfortunately he is not a member either of the Judiciary Committee or the Committee on Immigration, and therefore we have not had the benefit of his services in considering the measure in committee, but if he will consent to its consideration now by the House members can be enlightened, and a measure can be adopted which will reflect credit upon the gentleman from New York as well as the House.

Mr. WARNER. If anything could induce the "gentleman from New York" to do what he knows to be a foolish thing it would be the very persuasive suggestion of the gentleman from Louisiana. But I can not help thinking that by agreeing upon amendments which he may draft in cool deliberation and with mature judgment, not in the heat of debate, we shall arrive at better results than by any crude suggestions in that direction which I might make at this time and under the present circumstances.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I suggest to my friend from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] that if it was the intention of our friends over there to put this measure through it ought to have been brought forward when there was a quorum in both Houses.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I wish to suggest to my friend from New York that if the bill is not considered to-day there is danger that it will not be considered this session. It is legislation looking in a most important direction. I suggest to him, therefore, that he allow the bill to come up for consideration, and then propose any amendment he may deem proper to perfect it. Thus the House will act upon this bill as upon other bills. In substantially its present shape the bill ought to pass.

Mr. BOATNER. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON]——

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I am not opposing the bill, but simply suggesting that if gentlemen had intended the measure should pass they should have brought it forward when we had a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARNER. I object.

UNITED STATES COURT AT MERIDIAN, MISS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the joint resolution (S. R. 102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to provide rooms for the accommodation of the United States circuit and district courts and their officers at Meridian, Miss.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi addressed the Chair.

Mr. SAYERS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The call for the regular order cuts off all demands for unanimous consent; but there are several bills on the table to be referred——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi (after conferring with Mr. SAYERS). I understand the call for the regular order is withdrawn for a moment; and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause the public building heretofore authorized to be erected in the city of Meridian, in the State of Mississippi, to be so constructed as to provide rooms for the accommodation of the United States circuit and district courts and their officers.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will explain in a moment what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request for consent——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Before the request is submitted, Mr. Speaker, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, I will explain the resolution.

There has been hitherto appropriated the sum of $50,000 for the purpose of erecting a public building in the city of Meridian, Miss. At the time that this bill passed Congress no court was held there. This is merely a resolution to authorize the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Treasury so to remodel the plans of the building as to make room for the court and jury rooms, a court having been authorized to hold its sessions there since the bill was passed.

Mr. SAYERS. Does this make any addition to the limit of cost?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It makes no appropriation, I will state.

Mr. SAYERS. But is it within the limit of the cost as originally authorized?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not know about that.

Mr. SAYERS. If it increases the cost, I object to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It simply authorizes them to remodel the plans of the building and make room for the court.

Mr. SAYERS. If I understand the bill correctly, it does not authorize an increase of the limit of cost?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; it does not.

Mr. PAYNE. Has a court been authorized by law to be held there?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, sir; a division of the court in the State of Mississippi has been authorized to hold a term at this point.

Furthermore, I will state that plans were brought in and bids submitted for the construction of the building amounting to $13,000 less than the appropriation.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection to it, and think it ought to be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid upon the table.

JOHN FINN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1066) to authorize the Third Auditor of the Treasury to audit certain quartermasters' vouchers alleged to belong to John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not think we ought to pass such a bill by consent.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

PENALTIES ON CERTAIN GUNBOATS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 967) to remit the penalties on the gunboat numbered 3, the Concord, and gunboat numbered 4, the Bennington.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, a similar bill has been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs as well as from the Committee on Claims, and is now on the Calendar. It has been there for several months past. I simply ask unanimous consent to substitute now the Senate bill for the House bill on the Calendar.

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very well, the gentleman can object. But it will be reported anyway, in spite of him.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 6656) for the relief of P. W. Mitchell, M. C. Felmet, George H. Smathers, and others.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted Mr. CHARLES W. STONE to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers accompanying the bill H. R. 1921.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a privileged matter.

There was referred to the Committee on Printing a House resolution to compile and have printed a digest of contested-election cases in the Fifty-second Congress, and making an appropriation for that purpose. I think this resolution should go to the Committee on Appropriations, and I therefore ask that the Committee on Printing be discharged from its further consideration and that it be so referred.

Mr. HAUGEN. What digest does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The digest of contested-election cases.

The SPEAKER. There is no appropriation now for this digest.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No. The resolution carries an appropriation, and therefore it ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Printing will be discharged from the further consideration of the matter, and it will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRINTING TARIFF BILL.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Printing for a print of the tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House 20,000 copies of the tariff bill which recently passed Congress.

The committee have considered the House resolution to print 20,000 copies of the tariff bill (H. R. 4864), and direct me to report the same with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not yield the floor, but will answer any question.

The SPEAKER. This report does not give the estimated cost.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The cost is simply for reprinting the bill. I have no way to get at the exact cost.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is the form in which you propose to print this publication?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If gentlemen will examine the RECORD, they will find that on yesterday the Senate ordered prepared a print of the present law, the Wilson bill, and with it a comparative statement of the McKinley law and of the House bill as reported. Now, that is being prepared by the Senate Committee on Finance, and the Committee on Printing supposed that as soon as that was ready it would be desired that there be printed a considerable number for distribution by the members of the Senate and the House; and until that was done, we thought it would be well simply to pass this House resolution, which provides for the printing for the use of the House of 20,000 copies of this bill in its simple form.

The Senate have ordered a supply for their own use, and this will, in effect, be the printing of a large number of pamphlet copies, an edition of 20,000, for the use of the House. I will yield for a question.

Mr. FITHIAN. Why not have the comparison printed instead of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have just stated that the Senate has ordered that comparison, and as soon as it is ready we will order it printed.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Will we not adjourn before that time?

Mr. FITHIAN. We may adjourn before that time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It will take considerable work and I do not know how many we want printed; but that ought to be a separate resolution; and if some gentleman desires that printed, and will introduce such a resolution and have it referred to the committee, we will get an estimate of what it will cost and have that also passed, if we can have it done. It ought to be passed. But it seems to me there ought to be 20,000 copies of this bill.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Which bill is it you are going to print now?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The Wilson bill, which passed the House, amended by the Senate.

Mr. CAMPBELL. For the future use of members.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I ask to amend the resolution by making the number 100,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can not yield for that. Twenty thousand are enough for distribution. We shall want more of the comparison when that is prepared, but for the present it seems to me that 20,000 extra copies of the bill will be enough for distribution. Now I move the previous question.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will my friend yield for a question before he does that?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MILLIKEN. What I desire to know is simply this: You say you are going to print the Wilson bill. Are you going to print the Wilson bill, or the bill which passed the Senate?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I stated that it was the House bill with the Senate amendments; and I presume the gentleman understands what that means.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is this a concurrent resolution, or is it simply a House resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. A simple House resolution to print these copies for our own use.

Mr. HEPBURN. If I understand the gentleman, the Senate have already ordered published comparisons showing the Senate bill which recently passed, the Wilson bill as it passed the House, the present law, and the Mills bill, and the percentages of change. Now, why not reproduce that publication for the use of the House?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will tell the gentleman why I did not report it that way. That is a publication almost as large as this which I hold in my hand.

Mr. MARSH. Oh, no.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; it is a book of this size (indicating). If members will indulge me for a moment I will show them what was done in the Senate yesterday. This is the proper course for the House to take.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate on yesterday said:

I am directed by the Committee on Finance to ask for an order to print the tariff law of 1894, compared with the tariff law of 1890, the Mills bill of 1888, and the Wilson bill of 1894, in an abbreviated form. The information which this abbreviation will contain is already printed in a large volume, but very inconvenient for distribution. I am therefore directed to ask for an order to print the usual number of copies in the abbreviated form which I send to the desk.

Now, that large form is in a volume about this size [exhibiting a volume about an inch and a half thick], and we thought that that would be too large and unwieldy and too costly, and that there will be too much in it. But the Senate provided for the printing of it in an abreviated form. Now, my idea is, if we want it in the abreviated form, we could have a resolution passed to print for the House the number of copies that may be necessary. For the present this resolution provides for the pamphlet-law form with the Senate amendments. Now, I think that is necessary. After that we will print any other edition that may be determined on.

Mr. HEPBURN. Why not include that in your present motion?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The only reason is we did not have that before us, but did have the resolution I have reported, and therefore we acted on it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will you accept an amendment to include that?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I suggested to my friend from Iowa on yesterday that if he would prepare a resolution calling for this matter in an abbreviated shape we would report it immediately, and so we will. But I think we will need for ourselves in simple pamphlet form 20,000 copies of the law.

Mr. PAYNE. How much more will it cost to print the abbreviated form recommended by the Committee on Finance of the Senate than the other form?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not know.

Mr. PAYNE. It will only be the expense of the additional paper, and not be very much more, will it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think that is about all; but if the gentleman will prepare and introduce a resolution on what is wanted, I will get an estimate of the cost.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman thought "there was too much in it." I think the people want all the information they can get on this subject.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not object to printing the matter in any form that may be wanted, but I do know that we will need in this simple pamphlet form 20,000 copies for the use of the House; and that is all this resolution provides for.

Mr. DUNN. Does not the gentleman think that the gentleman from New York is facetious in what he says?

Mr. PAYNE. Can not the gentleman introduce a resolution for the printing of the comparative statement, and get an estimate of the cost in both forms?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would be perfectly willing to do that and report it to-morrow, and discuss it as much as gentlemen desire.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman for a question. How much time do you want?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Not over a minute.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I simply asked you to yield to me for a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. When I ask you to let me make a speech I will let you know it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Allow me to say this, then. I believe we do not want anything that has not become a law.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is not a question. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. We do not want the Wilson bill; we do not want the Mills bill. What has the Mills bill to do with it? It never passed. Give us the old law and give us the prospective law, and let them be compared together. That is all we want.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If my friend will introduce a resolution to that effect to-day we will report it to-morrow and then decide the matter.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Would it not come better from my friend from Tennessee instead of myself? We do not care anything about the Wilson bill or the Mills bill. They have both gone, although my friend from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] has not. We have great hopes for him yet.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I now demand the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DUNN. I would ask the gentleman from Maine if his question is not like that of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], all fun, and absolutely fun.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

STREET RAILROAD FRANCHISES IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I now report the Senate joint resolution (S. R. 99) to compile and publish the laws relating to street railway franchises in the District of Columbia. It is not privileged, but I ask for its consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed and bound into one convenient volume, at the Government Printing Office, all the various acts of Congress that may be in force at the end of the second session of the Fifty-third Congress relating to street-railway franchises in the District of Columbia, the same to be compiled under the direction of the attorney of the District of Columbia; and that 500 copies of the same shall be furnished for the use of the Senate 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of, and distribution by, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; but the usual number shall not be printed.

The report (by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee) was read, as follows:

The committee have considered the Senate joint resolution to compile and publish the laws relating to street-railway franchises in the District of Columbia, and direct me to report same with recommendation that it do pass.

The cost of same is about $100.

Mr. SAYERS. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman out of what funds the cost of this printing is to come?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This is a joint resolution which has passed the Senate, and it provides for the printing of a compilation of the laws relating to street-railroad franchises in the District of Columbia. It does not carry any appropriation, but it will cost about $100.

Mr. SAYERS. There is no appropriation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then it will be paid out of the appropriation made for printing in the sundry civil appropriation bill. It is simply a compilation of the laws relating to street-railroad franchises in the District of Columbia, in order that Congress may legislate intelligently in reference to them. The Senate has already passed it. The District Commissioners approve it, and desire that it shall be passed; and it will only cost, as I have stated, about $100.

Mr. SAYERS. Then I do not care to object to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

House joint resolution (H. Res. 212) on the same subject was ordered to lie on the table.

SUPPRESSION OF LOTTERY TRAFFIC.

Mr. BRODERICK. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1620) for the suppression of lottery traffic through national and interstate commerce and the postal service subject to the jurisdiction and laws of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who shall cause to be brought within the United States from abroad, for the purpose of disposing of the same, or deposited in or carried by the mails of the United States, or carried from one State to another in the United States, any paper, certificate, or instrument purporting to be or represent a ticket, chance, share, or interest in or dependent upon the event of a lottery, so-called gift concert, or similar enterprise, offering prizes dependent upon lot or chance, or shall cause any advertisement of such lottery, so-called gift concert, or similar enterprise, offering prizes dependent upon lot or chance, to be brought into the United States, or deposited in or carried by the mails of the United States, or transferred from one State to another in the same, shall be guilty of a felony, and be punishable in the first offense by imprisonment for not more than two years or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or both, and in the second and after offenses by such imprisonment only.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of sections 3929 and 4041 of the United States Revised Statutes as amended, respectively, and the provisions of sections 2491 and 2492 of the United States Revised Statutes, and of sections 11, 12, and 13 of the act of Congress of October 1, 1890, entitled "Chapter 1244. An act to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes," and all other provisions of law for the suppression of traffic in or circulation of any such tickets, chances, shares, or interests in or other matter relating to lotteries, or for the suppression of traffic in or circulation of obscene books or articles of any kind, shall apply in support, aid, and furtherance of the enforcement of this act.

SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall de deemed to repeal by implication sections 3894, 3929, or 4041 of the United States Revised Statutes, or any part thereof, nor any provisions of the act of Congress of April 29, 1878, entitled "An act to prevent the sale of policy or lottery tickets in the District of Columbia," nor any provisions of the act of Congress of September 19, 1890, entitled "An act to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes relating to lotteries, and for other purposes," nor any provision of the laws whatsoever against the establishment of lotteries, or games, or other schemes, or prizes, or chances, or the traffic in or circulation of tickets and other such papers or instruments, or the publication of advertisements or notices in anywise relating thereto.

SEC. 4. That the powers conferred upon the Postmaster-General by the statute of 1890, chapter 908, section 2, are hereby extended and made applicable to all letters or other matter sent by mail.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DAVEY. I object.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection until I can make a statement showing the necessity which exists for immediate action on this subject. I want to show that lotteries are being organized in three or four States of the Union, that the evil is growing, and that the demand for the suppression of the traffic is coming from the best people from all over the country. All the friends of this measure ask is for consideration and for a vote. I am not asking this for my constituents alone, though they are deeply interested, but am asking for a vote upon this bill in the interest of better government and on behalf of all the people in this country who are opposed to this species of gambling. I would like to read some letters and other evidences showing the extent of this evil, but owing to the objection am precluded from doing so.

HENRY HALTEMAN.

Mr. SORG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1526) for the relief of Henry Halteman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant an honorable discharge from the United States service to Henry Halteman, late of Company F, Second United States Artillery.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. JONES. I object.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BLAND, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLAND. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 57; so the House refused to adjourn.

DULUTH AND WINNIPEG RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill which I send to the Clerk's desk. This is a bill granting to the Duluth and Winnipeg Railway Company the right of way across an Indian reservation in the State of Minnesota. The railroad has now been built up to the limit of the reservation, and no further work can be done until permission is given to go through the reservation. The bill is in the usual form.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the Duluth and Winnipeg Railroad Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota, and to its assigns, the right of way for the extension of its railroad, and for a telegraph and telephone line, through the Chippewa and White Earth Indian Reservations in said State, commencing at some point on its already constructed line in said State and running in a general westerly or northwesterly direction, by such route as shall be deemed advisable, to some point on the western boundary line of the said State, or to some point on the northern boundary line thereof, between the Red River of the North and the Lake of the Woods, or to both such points. Such right of way shall be 50 feet in width on each side of the central line of said railroad, and said company shall also have the right to take from the lands adjacent to the line of said road material, stone, and earth necessary for the construction of said railroad; also grounds adjacent to such right of way for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, not to exceed in amount 200 feet in width and 3,000 feet in length for each station, and to an extent not exceeding one station for each 10 miles of road within the limits of said reservations: Provided, That no part of such lands herein granted shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as are necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad line, and when any portion thereof shall cease to be used, such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall be taken.

SEC. 2. That before said railroad shall be constructed through any land, claim, or improvement held by individual occupants according to any treaties or laws of the United States, compensation shall be made such occupant or claimant for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of said railroad. In case of failure to make satisfactory settlement with any such claimant, the United States district court at St. Paul or Duluth, Minn., shall have jurisdiction upon petition of either party to determine such just compensation in accordance with the laws of Minnesota provided for determining the damage when property is taken for railroad purposes; and the amount of damages resulting to the tribe or tribes of Indians pertaining to said reservations in their tribal capacity, by reason of the construction of said railroad through such lands of the reservations as are not occupied in severalty, shall be ascertained and determined in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, and be subject to his final approval: Provided, however, That said railroad company may file with the Secretary of the Interior a bond, in such amount and with such sureties as the Secretary shall approve, conditioned for the payment of just compensation for said right of way to said individual occupants and to said tribe or tribes, as hereinbefore provided, and said company may thereupon proceed to construct and operate its railroad across said reservations.

SEC. 3. That said company shall cause maps, showing the route of its line through said reservations, and including the grounds for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior before constructing any portion of said railroad.

SEC. 4. That said company is hereby authorized to enter upon said reservations for the purpose of surveying and locating its line of railroad: Provided, That said railroad shall be located and constructed with due regard to the rights of the Indians and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

SEC. 5. That the right herein granted shall be forfeited by said company unless the road shall be constructed through the said reservations within three years after the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BONDS FOR REGISTRY OF VESSELS.

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 588) to repeal section 4145 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to amend sections 4146 and 4320, also section 1 of the act amending section 4214 of the Revised Statutes, approved March 3, 1883, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4145 of the Revised Statutes, providing for bonds for registry of vessels, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That section 4146 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read:

"SEC. 4146. A certificate of registry shall be solely used for the vessel for which it is granted, and shall not be sold, lent, or otherwise disposed of, to any person whomsoever; and in case the vessel so registered shall be lost, or taken by an enemy, burned, or broken up, or shall be otherwise prevented from returning to the port to which she may belong, the certificate, if preserved, shall be delivered up within eight days after the arrival of the master or person having the charge or command of such vessel within any district of the United States, to the collector of such district; and if any foreigner, or any person for the use and benefit of such foreigner, shall purchase or otherwise become entitled to the whole, or any part or share of, or interest in such vessel, the same being within a district of the United States, the certificate shall, within seven days after such purchase, change, or transfer of property, be delivered up to the collector of the district; and if any such purchase, change, or transfer of property shall happen when such vessel shall be at any foreign port or place, or at sea, then the master or person having the charge or command thereof shall, within eight days after his arrival within any district of the United States, deliver up the certificate to the collector of such district. Any master or owner violating the provisions of this section shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding $500, and the certificate of registry shall be thenceforth void. The Secretary of the Treasury shall have the power to remit or mitigate such penalty if in his opinion it was incurred without willful negligence or intention of fraud."

SEC. 3. That section 4320, Revised Statutes, is hereby amended so as to read:

Mr. WISE. I desire to ask the gentleman whether this bill has been considered by any committee of this House?

Mr. FITHIAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WISE. By which one?

Mr. FITHIAN. The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. WISE. Is this Senate bill similar to the bill which has been considered by your committee?

Mr. FITHIAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. Is this the Frye Senate bill without amendment?

Mr. FITHIAN. Yes, sir; this is the Frye Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that a bill of this importance ought to be considered in this hurried way. It is impossible to tell whether it is a good or bad bill without having an opportunity to examine it.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

COMPILATION OF TARIFF LAWS.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be prepared and printed a compilation of the tariff laws of 1890, 1894, the Mills bill, and the Wilson bill as the same was originally reported from the Committee on Ways and Means to the House and also as the same passed the House, in such brief and succinct form as that each may be readily compared with the other, together with a table of comparisons and percentages.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have this referred to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. It will be so referred.

S. E. HALLFORD.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7407) for the relief of S. E. Hallford, of Alabama.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the title to the following-described lands, the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 18, township 3, range 26, and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 7, township 3, range 26, and the west half of the southwest quarter, and the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter, and 20 acres of the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter, and the west half of the northeast quarter of southwest quarter, and southeast quarter of southwest quarter, and northeast quarter of southeast quarter, and 20 acres of northeast quarter, section 21, township 5, range 24, which was bought by the United States at a sale made by the marshal of the middle division of said State, be divested out of the United States and be reinvested in the said S. E. Hallford as fully and completely as before the said sale.

An amendment recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary was read, as follows:

In line 3, insert between the words "lands" and "the" the following: "within the county of Dale and State of Alabama."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman ought to make some explanation of the bill. This land appears to have been sold on execution to make fines against this party.

Mr. OATES. I will gladly comply with the gentleman's suggestion and make a statement. The man for whose relief this bill is intended was surety upon the bond or recognizance of a defendant in the United States court at Montgomery, who was charged with the violation of the revenue laws. The defendant failed to appear when called, but this man afterward brought him into court, where he stood his trial and was acquitted. Mr. Hallford supposed the forfeiture was set aside. But through oversight or rush of business, the attention of the district attorney and the judge not being called to the matter, the forfeiture was in fact made final, without notice having been served upon Mr. Hallford that such action was to be taken.

In fact, his attention was not called to the matter until an execution was issued. When his land was levied upon under the execution (the amount of which was small—less than $300) he went to court and offered his defense, for the purpose of having the proceeding set aside. His attorney also made affidavit in regard to the matter; and the district attorney admitted the error which had occurred. But as another term of court had begun, the judge held properly that he had not jurisdiction to set aside the proceedings and grant the relief. The land of Mr. Hallford was levied upon and sold. The land is poor; and he is a very poor man, this property being about all that he was worth.

This bill proposes simply to restore to him this land which was sold under the execution, his bond having been forfeited by reason of a misapprehension, when he had in fact surrendered the defendant, the ends of justice being completely met. The Committee on the Judiciary, having had the bill under consideration, has unanimously made a favorable report.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the committee, inserting in lines 3 and 4 the words "within the county of Dade and State of Alabama," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TILL THURSDAY.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that when the House adjourns today it be to meet on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division (called for by Mr. HUDSON)—ayes 91, noes 7.

Mr. WISE. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division (called by Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota)—ayes 55, noes 41.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday next.

SIR: In obedience to the instructions of the Senate directing me to request the attendance of absent Senators, I have to report:

Of the forty-two Senators who did not answer to their names yesterday only two are in the city. Both of these have been requested to attend. One of them is too ill to be present.

One Senator is in Europe.

Telegrams were sent to all the others requesting their attendance immediately.

I am informed by his business associates that one is on his way to Europe.

The telegraph company reports three can not be found.

One responded that he would be present to-day.

One responded that he would be present to-morrow.

One telegraphs it will be impossible for him to reach here before this evening.

One responded that it would be impossible to come.

Four answer that they are ill.

I am advised that one had left the place to which telegram was sent, and no other address was given.

No response has been received from the remainder.

Very respectfully,

R. J. BRIGHT,
Sergeant-at-Arms, United States Senate.

Hon. A. E. STEVENSON,
Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. GRAY. I ask that the names of the absentees be read.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 23, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday was read and approved.

RECORDING LAND SUBDIVISIONS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1005) to prevent the recording of subdivisions of land in the District of Columbia in the office of the Recorder of Deeds.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered now.

I will state, if I may be allowed to make a brief explanation, that the existing law on this subject is so drawn as to make evasion possible. Maps or plats of subdivisions in the District of Columbia may now be recorded in two places; that is, in the office of the recorder of deeds, and also in the office of the surveyor of the District. The District Commissioners have sent to the committee a letter, in which they urgently recommend the passage of the Senate bill, which provides that these maps or plats shall be recorded only in one place. That, it would seem, is ample for all purposes in connection with the matter. It makes reference to such subdivisions more convenient, while the present system, which authorizes their recording in two places, simply involves unnecessary expense, and has heretofore led to considerable confusion in the opening of streets through such subdivisions.

I ask that the letter from the Commissioners be read in connection with the statement I have made, to show the urgency of this matter.

A MEMBER. Is this recommended by the District Committee?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The chairman of the committee [Mr. HEARD] a few moments ago asked me to make this motion. He is temporarily absent from the Hall.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the letter to which the gentleman from Tennessee refers will be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, August 21, 1894.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners earnestly request that you will do all in your power to secure favorable action by the House, and at once, on Senate bill 1005, "to prevent the recording of subdivisions of land in the District of Columbia in the office of the recorder of deeds," which passed the Senate yesterday without objection. The Commissioners can not too strongly express the urgency and importance of the enactment of this bill.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. ROSS,
President Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia.

Hon. JOHN T. HEARD,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its present consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to record any map or plat of the subdivision of land in the District of Columbia in the office of the recorder of deeds for said District, whether such map or plat be attached to a deed or other document or is offered separately for record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I understand from the reading of this bill that it refers to maps or plats only, and not deeds.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; that is correct. Under some construction of law they have been authorizing these subdivisions to be recorded in two places.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not understand from the language of the bill whether it has reference to the recording of deeds or not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No; it refers to maps or plats.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be again read, if there be no objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. PAYNE. That is all right.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, and being read the time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

B. F. BERRY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2318) for the relief of B. F. Berry.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to issue to B. F. Berry, of Simpson County, Miss., a patent to the east half of the northwest quarter of section 36, township 2 north, range 2 east, Choctaw meridian, situated in said Simpson County, Miss., conveying to said B. F. Berry the title of the United States to said land upon his payment to Lloyd M. Kelley, of said county, of the sum of money paid by said Kelley into the land office at Jackson, Miss., for said land, on the 23d day of April, 1894.

SEC. 2. That this act take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Has this been considered by the House committee?

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Speaker, it has not been considered by the committee, but with the consent of the House, I think I can explain very briefly the purpose of the bill, and then there will be no objection to it. There is no appropriation involved in it. Sometime between 1850 and 1860 the land mentioned in the bill was preëmpted, or the party who applied for it supposed he had preëmpted it, and it has been continuously held and occupied by him and those who held under him. In the early part of 1875 B. F. Berry, the party named in the bill and for whom relief is sought by it, purchased the land and since then has greatly improved it.

Last spring Lloyd M. Kelley, a neighbor of Berry's, learned that in the original entry a clerical mistake had been made in the description of the land. In other words, another quarter section had through mistake been described in the papers, and the land which Berry thought he was entering, and which has been held and occupied and improved by him and those under whom he holds, was left out, and Kelley homesteaded it.

Now, the bill simply provides that Berry, upon the payment of the fees, etc., due the United States, and the payment to Kelley of the amount paid out by him, may homestead the land. There certainly can not be any objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. KYLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2038) for the relief of Oklahoma settlers; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ESTATE OF LELAND STANFORD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2307) to require the prompt prosecution and speedy determination of the claim of the United States against the estate of the late Leland Stanford.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I object.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then I ask its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be so referred.

HUTCHISON AND SOUTHERN RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 2290) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory.'"

Mr. DURBOROW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill; and I shall be glad to say a word in explanation of it, if any gentleman so desires.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 2 of the act entitled "An act to amend an 'Act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory,'" approved February 3, 1892, be, and the same hereby are, extended for a further period of three years.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was read three times, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DURBOROW, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PETER HAGAN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the joint resolution (H. Res. 79) for the relief of Peter Hagan.

The SPEAKER. This is a House bill, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment. If no gentleman desires to make any motion respecting the bill, it will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill was referred accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 220) instructing the Secretary of War to return to the State of Massachusetts the flags of certain regiments of Massachusetts volunteer infantry.

JOHN AND SARAH GRIFFIN.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I send to the desk. Before the Clerk reads the bill I desire to make a brief explanation.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The object of this bill is to refer a claim against the Government to the Court of Claims for consideration by them and for a report upon the facts of the case, with such recommendations as they may choose to make.

It will be observed that as the bill was written it contemplated conferring upon the court jurisdiction to entertain the case and render a judgment; but the committee recommend that that part of the bill be stricken out, and that it be simply referred to the Court of Claims to be considered by them and, to report back what they think should be done with it. The House will understand the bill better with this explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 561) for the relief of John and Sarah Griffin.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the claim of John Griffin and Sarah Griffin, of the city of Greenville and State of Mississippi, for damage done to their realty, situate in the county of Jefferson and State of Kentucky, by United States troops, while the said troops occupied the said realty as a smallpox hospital from the year 1862 to the year 1867, both inclusive, be, and hereby is, referred to the Court of Claims, with full jurisdiction and authority in the said court to hear and determine all questions of fact and law in the said claim, and to render a judgment therein in such sum as the said claimants shall appear to be entitled to from the evidence submitted. And the said claimants shall be entitled to recover as aforesaid, any statute or statutes of limitation notwithstanding: Provided, however, That the said claimants shall file their petition for the recovery of the amount of the said damages in the Court of Claims within six months from the date of the passage of this act.

The Committee on War Claims recommended the following amendment:

After the word "claim," in line 12, strike out the following: "And to render a judgment therein in such sum as the said claimants shall appear to be entitled to from the evidence submitted. And the said claimants shall be entitled to recover as aforesaid, any statute or statutes of limitation notwithstanding: Provided, however, That the said claimants shall file their petition for the recovery of the amount of the said damages in the Court of Claims within six months from the date of the passage of this act."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"And said court is directed to take order in the premises, and as speedily as may be to report herein to the House of Representatives in all things as provided by law."

Mr. CATCHINGS. The bill provides for nothing but a report on the facts, whatever they may be.

Mr. CULBERSON. What kind of a claim is that?

Mr. CATCHINGS. A claim for damages to property while it was used by the Government as a smallpox hospital. This does not confer any jurisdiction on the Court of Claims except to report what the facts are, with such recommendations as they may choose to make.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand that the bill as amended does not authorize the court to render judgment?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on War Claims was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CATCHINGS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RAILROAD INDEMNITY LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 159) to authorize intervention of the United States in a suit to determine rights to lands in railroad indemnity limits in California.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in order to obtain a proper construction of the acts of Congress of July 27, 1866, and March 3, 1871, concerning grants of lands in California to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, so far as said grants relate to indemnity lands, and in order to determine the rights of the United States to lands within the indemnity limits of said grants, the United States attorney for the southern district of California is authorized to intervene on behalf of the United States in one suit now pending, or which may be brought in said district, involving rights to any such indemnity lands as a test case; and such suit may be appealed to the circuit court of appeals and to the United States Supreme Court as in other cases.

The report (by Mr. BRODERICK) is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House joint resolution 159, submit the following report:

Many thousands of acres of lands were granted to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, in the State of California and elsewhere, along the line of that road. Certain conditions were imposed upon the company in order to perfect its title to these lands. Since August, 1887, the Interior Department has held that these conditions were not complied with by the company and that the lands were forfeited to the Government. Acting upon this ruling of the Department hundreds of tracts have been sold by the Government to actual settlers, who have entered upon the lands and made valuable and lasting improvements. These settlers' lands, as well as all the vacant lands in the same category, are still claimed by the railroad company, and it has instituted suit against some of the settlers to oust them of their possessions.

The Government having sold and patented the lands to the settlers, and being largely interested in the result of these suits, your committee believe that the Government should intervene in at least one of the suits and defend its title. It is therefore recommended that the accompanying resolution be passed as a substitute

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. BYNUM. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BELL of Colorado, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. MEREDITH, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of John Vilevig, Forty-ninth Congress.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. HARTMAN, leave was granted to withdraw a petition filed by him, relative to the coinage of silver, on leaving a copy of the same.

ARMOR PLATE.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report, and with it a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The report which is asked to be presented, as I understand it, is accompanied by a resolution which is privileged. If the resolution should not be adopted, would that entitle the gentleman to have his report filed and referred to a committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Does the resolution accompanying the report, in case of the failure of the House to adopt the resolution, entitle the report to be sent to a committee?

The SPEAKER. It would not. This is a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs. The House referred to that committee a certain matter relating to the investigation of alleged frauds in the manufacture of armor plate, and authorizing the committee to report at any time, by bill or otherwise. This is a report made by the committee, and they accompany their report with a resolution which they ask the House to adopt. The House can either adopt or reject it. Of course it could not be again referred without further action of the House.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask that the resolution be read, so that gentlemen may understand what it is.

Mr. PAYNE. None of the minority members of the committee are present.

Mr. CUMMINGS. This is a unanimous report from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PAYNE. Made before the minority members went away?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Made with the concurrence of the minority members of the committee, and I am authorized by the committee to report it to the House.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The minority members are not present.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The minority members gave their sanction to the report.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. To this report?

Mr. CUMMINGS. They did.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I understand it differently, but I do not wish to contradict the gentleman. Is unanimous consent asked?

The SPEAKER. It is presented as a matter of privilege.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let the report be read, then.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove from the ships hereinafter mentioned the armor plates hereinafter mentioned, and subject said armor plates to the same ballistic tests in every respect as were given to the plates upon the ballistic tests of which the respective groups of armor plate containing the hereinafter mentioned plates were accepted. The armor plates to be tested, with the ships from which they are to be removed, are as follows, to wit:

From the ship Monadnock, the 9-inch belt plate, No. 19, starboard, manufacturing number 446.

From the monitor Terror, the 7-inch belt plate, No. 6, starboard, manufacturing number 678.

From the ship Oregon, the 8-inch barbette plate No. 587.

From the ship Indiana, the 4-inch casemate diagonal plate No. 14, port, manufacturing number 233.

From the ship Massachusetts, the 4-inch casemate door No. 379).

Be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the 13-inch belt plate K L, starboard, No. X 8, from the ship Monterey, and ascertain whether said plate contains a pipe hole 4 feet long, and if such pipe hole be found the Secretary of the Navy is hereby further authorized and directed to subject the said plate to a ballistic test identical in every particular with that which was given to the plate upon the test of which the group containing the said plate, X 8, was accepted, and that the first shot be placed in that part of the plate containing the pipe hole.

The Secretary of the Navy is further requested and directed to send to the Congress a full and detailed report of the hereinbefore directed tests, as soon as may be.

The members of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives hereinbefore engaged in investigating the armor-plate frauds, are hereby directed to witness, as far as possible, each of the hereinbefore mentioned tests; and said tests are to be made at the Indian Head proving ground.

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to pay from any moneys heretofore appropriated for the increase of the Navy, under the head of armor and armament, such sums as may be necessary for the carrying out of the hereinbefore directed tests, and for placing on the ships before mentioned other armor plates, in place of the plates removed for the purpose of being tested, as hereinbefore directed.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. As I understand this proposition it is to retest the plates for which the Carnegie Company, or the contractors, were fined on the presumption that the plates were not up to the standard.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Not in every case, I will state in reply.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But in some cases.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes, in some cases. The groups which were passed on the test.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I want to ask the gentleman if there is any proposition in this resolution to return the fines imposed on account of these plates?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Even if you find the plates up to the standard?

Mr. CUMMINGS. These resolutions, I will say to my friend, are drawn in strict consonance with the resolution passed by the House, which directed us to ascertain certain facts. We have now arrived at such a stage in our investigation that to do what the House has asked us to do it is necessary that we should know whether these plates will pass the ballistic test or not. The superintendents of the Carnegie Company have expressed a wish for such a test. The committee is not certain whether the plates will pass the test or not; but before it can make a final report it is absolutely necessary that it should know whether these plates will pass the test or not; and these resolutions are drawn up for the purpose of ascertaining that fact, and for no other purpose.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let me ask the gentleman one other question. Does not the report, which is already filed, which I have not seen, and which has not been read, prejudge this company and criticise it as having violated its contract?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Well, the gentleman can ascertain that by having the report read, if he desires. The resolutions are based on the report.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from New York allow me? I understand from the reading of the resolution that it is in the form of a concurrent resolution. It will have to be given the form of a joint resolution to make it effective. There is an error, doubtless, in copying it.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then I ask unanimous consent that it be amended so as to make it a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can change it to a joint resolution before he introduces it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman can change it before he introduces it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. All right.

The resolution was made a joint resolution (No. 226).

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I hold the floor.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I do, with pleasure always.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I had a talk with the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, about this report, and he stated to me that the minority, the Republicans, were in favor of this report and the adoption of this resolution.

This is merely a step in the direction of getting information necessary for the committee to reach a conclusion, and no final conclusion, as I understand, has yet been reached. I hope no objection will be made to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this, that the report is made for the purpose, and the sole purpose, of showing that it is absolutely necessary in the opinion of the committee that this test should now be had. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania wish the report read?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I would like to hear the report read. I do not understand what it contains.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire that the report be read. I could state the substance of it.

The report (by Mr. CUMMINGS) was read, as follows:

VIOLATION OF ARMOR CONTRACTS.

Mr. CUMMINGS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany H. Res. 226):

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution of the House passed on May 22, 1894, providing for an investigation into the armor plate, bolts, and other appurtenances delivered to the Government by the Carnegie Steel Company, respectfully submit the following report, with the evidence on which it is founded.

The full text of the House resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to immediately investigate and inquire into the condition and character of all armor plate, bolts, and other appurtenances delivered to the Government by the said Carnegie Steel Company, Limited, and by Carnegie, Phipps & Co., during the entire period of any of the contracts between said companies and the Government, and to investigate and inquire as to what amounts of inferior or damaged armor plate, bolts, and other appurtenances have been delivered to the Government by said companies and the amount of compensation which should be paid to the Government in settlement for such damaged or inferior armor plate, bolts, and appurtenances."

"That for the purposes aforesaid the said committee, or a subcommittee thereof, if authorized by the full committee, shall have power to send for persons and papers and visit any place or places which may become necessary to the full discharge of its duties, to administer oaths, to sit during the present session of the House and during the recess of Congress. Said committee shall have authority to report at any time as to the result of its investigations and what action should be taken by this House or by Congress.

"The sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House to defray the expenses of said investigation."

The following is a statement of the contracts for armor made by the Government with the Carnegie Steel Company, Limited, and with Carnegie, Phipps & Co.:

	Quantities.	Cost.

Contract of September 28, 1891	36	9,778.90
To be delivered within ninety days from date of contract.
Contract of April 7, 1892	9	1,493.61

Contract of February 28, 1893	2,927	1,878,904.66
Deliveries thereunder to be made at the average rate of 250 tons per month for the first six months after the first delivery becomes due, and thereafter at the rate of 300 tons per month. A penalty of $10 per ton on all armor thus due and not delivered shall be charged against the contractor.
Total	8,978	5,445,926.27

The committee has taken a large mass of testimony, submitted with its report. It has visited the works of the Carnegie Company, and has carefully analyzed the testimony taken. The alleged frauds, as elicited by the testimony, are specific. They are as follows:

THE CHARGES AGAINST THE COMPANY.

First. The plates did not receive the uniform treatment required by the specifications of the contracts. In many cases the treatment was irregular, and in other cases it was practically inefficient. The specifications of the contract of February 28, 1893, required that each plate should be annealed, oil tempered, and again annealed, the last process being an annealing one.

Second. False reports of the treatment of the plates were systematically made to the Government inspectors. This was in violation of paragraph 95 of the circular concerning armor-plate appurtenances, dated January 16, 1893, which was made a part of the contract. Paragraph 95 says:

"The contractor shall state for each article in writing the exact treatment it has received."

The specifications of the contract of November 29, 1890, paragraph 164, says:

"A written statement of work and contractor's tests to be commenced and in progress each day must be furnished to the chief inspector."

Third. No bolts received the double treatment provided for in the specifications of either contract. A report of a double treatment, however, was made to the Government inspectors.

Fourth. Specimens taken from the plates both before and after treatment to ascertain the tensile strength of each plate were stretched without the knowledge of the Government inspectors, so as to increase their apparent tensile strength when actually tested.

Fifth. False specimens taken from other plates were substituted for the specimens selected by the Government inspectors.

Sixth. The testing machine was repeatedly manipulated by order of the superintendent of the armor-plate mill so as to increase the apparent tensile strength of the specimens. These specimens were juggled in measurement so as to increase their apparent ductility.

Seventh. Various specimens selected by the Government inspectors were retreated without their knowledge before they were submitted to test.

Eighth. Plates selected by the Government inspectors for ballistic test were retreated with the intention of improving their ballistic resistance, without the knowledge of the Government inspectors. In one case, at least, the conclusion is almost irresistible that the bottom of another plate was substituted for the top half of plate A 619 after it had been selected by the Government and while awaiting shipment to Indian Head. Upon this ballistic test a group of plates containing 348 tons, valued at about $180,000, were to be accepted or rejected. In three cases, at least, the plates selected by the Government inspectors were retreated in this manner without their knowledge. These ballistic plates represented 779 tons of armor, valued at over $410,000. The groups represented by these three plates had all been submitted for premium of $30 per ton if they passed a more severe test than required for acceptance.

Ninth. In violation of the specifications of the contract, pipes or shrinking cavities, erroneously called blowholes, in the plates were plugged by the contractors and the defects concealed from the Government inspectors. These cavities, in some cases, diminished the resistance and value of the plate.

Tenth. The inspector's stamp was either duplicated or stolen, and used without the knowledge of the Government inspectors.

Eleventh. The Government inspector in inspecting bolts was deceived by means of false templets or gauges.

WHAT IS ADMITTED.

The superintendent of the company, C. M. Schwab, a stockholder, admits that the plates did not receive uniform treatment, explaining this by saying that uniform results alone were required. Specification 113 of the first contract says:

"All the members of a group shall receive a practically uniform treatment."

After the treatment was given, specification 115 says:

"The most important point to which attention will at this time be directed is uniformity of quality in the plates of the group."

Mark, uniformity of quality in the plates, and not uniformity of quality in the group.

Such was the language of the contract made November 20, 1890.

The contract of February 28, 1893, has this language (paragraph 30):

"All the members of a ballistic group shall receive a practically uniform treatment."

It then specifies treatment under the Harvey process, and continues thus:

"All other material is to be annealed, oil-tempered under such conditions as will give the best resistance, and again annealed. The last process must always be an annealing one."

Paragraph 34 says:

"The ballistic test is the chief one, and the object of all the other tests of plates is to insure, so far as possible, that the remaining plates of a group are capable of standing as severe a test as that to which the test plate has been subjected, and the conformity required among the plates of a group will be only such as may be necessary for this purpose."

This same provision is in the first contract (paragraph 116). Paragraph 25 of the contract of February 28, 1893, says:

"The tests (taken before treatment) are for the purpose of determining the question of the grade of the steel, which should be uniform, as well as the physical conditions of the plate itself."

In the first contract the requirements with regard to similar tests taken before treatment are that the variations in the ingot from the mean must not be large, intimating that uniformity in quality was required before treatment rather than after, which, of course, would follow a uniform treatment.

These extracts from the specifications certainly show that they meant what they said: Uniform quality before treatment, and practically uniform treatment, when practically uniform results would necessarily follow. If uniform results alone were meant there would have been no necessity for requirements as to process.

ADMISSIONS AS TO THE SECOND AND THIRD CHARGES.

The second charge is proved by the rough records of the company itself of over 700 plates and lots of bolts, which came into the hands of the Navy Department. These records originally gave the actual treatment of the plates. They were carefully examined by the committee. The figures were taken from the slates of the heaters employed at the furnaces, each morning, and reported to the superintendent by his clerk. That the original figures were correct is proved by their comparison with the time books of the heaters, in which every operation of heating was given by them in detailing their work each day. These books were also in evidence before the committee.

The figures were taken by the clerk of the superintendent, W. A. Cline, who had charge of the heating of the plates. The records show that the superintendent almost invariably changed the figures. In some cases he returned to his clerk an entirely new report in his own handwriting.

In one case the actual treatment of the plate was recorded and the treatment to be reported to the Government inspectors placed below it. There were "fake" reports of treatment of plates that had received no treatment whatever. The clerk, after sending the figures to the Government inspector, had marked upon the rough sheet the words "fake treatment," and had thrown it into his desk. Over 95 per cent of the records show similar changes, and many in the superintendent's own handwriting. These changes were evidently made for the purpose of deceiving the Government inspectors, making it appear that the plates had received the uniform and efficient treatment required by the contract.

A report of the treatment at the furnaces each day was required by the Government. The superintendent's clerk drew up this report from Superintendent Cline's alterations of the figures taken from the heaters' slates, and sent it to W. E. Corey, superintendent of the armor-plate department, who, through his clerk, turned it over to the Government inspectors. It is worthy of note that when Superintendent Cline was before the committee he refused to swear that the alterations were in his own handwriting, but would not swear that they were not.

The evidence that they were made by him is as clear as sunlight. He even refused to admit his signature to some of the reports, and when asked to write it beneath the alleged signature it proved a facsimile. (See cut, page 964.) A letter which he had written asking for the discharge of a workman was submitted to him, and he refused to acknowledge the handwriting. When asked to write a similar letter from dictation, the handwriting was not only the same, but the misspelling and capitalization of words were identical. (Cut, pages 964, 965.)

In endeavoring to account for these false reports Superintendents Schwab and Corey explained that Superintendent Cline had added to the original report taken from the slate the treatment the plates had received at previous times. In other words, where a plate had been heated for bending or for straightening, say days, weeks or even months before, this treatment was credited and added to the treatment which it had last received.

It is in evidence that a history of each plate was kept in books under Superintendent Cline's supervision. These books might have thrown some light upon the matter if they had not been thrown into the furnace by Superintendent Cline himself after the investigation was ordered. It is trite law that everything is to be taken against one who destroys the evidence. Every doubt is to be solved against him.

If the treatment the plates had received in times past had been added to the treatment recorded on the slate it is singular that Superintendent Cline should not only destroy the record of this treatment, but refuse to acknowledge his own figures and handwriting in making the changes. The apparent falsity of the explanation is shown where the second and even a third treatment of plates is recorded.

The company had the right under the specifications to give plates not passing the trial test after the first complete treatment the privilege of additional treatments. In such instances there could have been no previous treatments to add, yet similar changes of figures had been made on the rough reports.

The treatment of the bolts, however, thoroughly exposes the falsity of the explanation. All the superintendents acknowledge that they never received but one treatment, whereas in every case two treatments were reported to the Government inspectors.

It was of the utmost importance that they should receive two treatments. The peculiar shock to which they would be subjected in battle from projectiles and from ramming required it. Experiments had been made showing that unless this treatment was given the bolts would break under a heavy blow, rendering the armor in a measure useless. These experiments are detailed by Capt. Sampson in his testimony (page 848). It is a bad result of this acknowledged fraud that to-day the armor of our ships is held in place by bolts which the company acknowledges have received but one treatment when two were absolutely necessary.

In the light of admissions concerning Superintendent Cline's false reports, the following table will repay perusal:

"BUREAU OF ORDNANCE,
"Navy Department, August 9, 1894.

"W. T. SAMPSON,
"Chief of Bureau."

The investigation shows that there were only two furnaces for the treatment of plates and bolts at the works up to September 1, 1892. After this a third furnace was completed and used. These three furnaces did all the work up to August 1, 1893, when a fourth was added. After information of the frauds practiced in the works was given to the Navy Department and a penalty exacted by the decision of the President, other furnaces were added, until to-day ten are in use. The contract of February 28, 1893, required the contractor to "furnish and maintain the most improved and modern plant for the manufacture of the class of armor required under his contract. He is to use every endeavor and incur all the expense necessary to produce the most resisting and enduring plates."

Taking into consideration the number of tons of armor required by the new contract, the company evidently saw the necessity of increasing the number of furnaces. This may have been done in view of the penalties exacted under this contract for nonfulfillment of the requirements for the delivery of the armor.

It will be noted, however, that the contract of November 20, 1890, provided for the manufacture of a far greater amount of armor than the contract of February 28, 1893; no penalties being exacted for the failure to deliver specified amounts at specified times. When the contract of February 28 was signed the company was far behind in its deliveries under the first contract.

Its three furnaces were entirely inadequate to carry out the provisions of that contract, yet for five months they had only three furnaces in which to do the work required by all the contracts. This, in the view of the committee, clearly indicates one of the motives of the superintendents of the press shop and armor plate department in making false reports of the treatment of the plates and bolts to the Government inspectors.

It is clearly evident to the committee that there were not enough furnaces to turn out the work reported, if the plates were treated according to the specifications of the contract and in accordance with the directions of the Government inspectors.

ADMISSIONS AS TO THE FOURTH CHARGE.

The charge that "specimens taken from the plates both before and after treatment, to ascertain the tensile strength of each plate, were stretched without the knowledge of the Government inspectors, so as to increase their apparent tensile strength," is admitted by Superintendent Corey. When asked (p. 581 of the testimony):

"Q. Why did you tinker with specimens before the official tests, Mr. Corey?

"A. You mean to stretch them?

"Q. Yes.

"A. Well, it was tried as a method of bringing them up to the requirements."

He added that he did not see anything particularly out of the way about it, although he knew that the Government inspectors did not know it.

This method of deceiving the inspectors, it appears from the testimony, was also known to Superintendent Schwab. He was asked (page 652):

"Do you know anything about the practice of giving specimens a preliminary pull before the specimens were turned down to standard dimensions?"

He replied that he had heard of it from Superintendent Corey before the investigation and had talked over the matter with Superintendent Corey. He added that he would not have objected to it if he had any knowledge of it.

Again, Superintendent Corey was asked (page 583) if he did not know that the object in taking the tensile strength was to ascertain the tensile strength of the plate, and not of the specimen taken from the plate. He replied: "Yes; that was the object."

The testimony goes on:

"Q. So that if you stretched the specimen before putting it on the press for tensile treatment you did not get the actual tensile strength of the plate through the specimen?

"A. I knew the actual tensile strength of the plate.

"Q. You did?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Didn't you want to give to the inspectors the actual tensile strength of the plate? Didn't you know that the specimens were cut out for the purpose of ascertaining the actual tensile strength of the plate?

"A. Yes; that was the object.

"Q. And if you stretched the specimens before putting them on the press, you did not know the actual tensile strength of the plate by pulling the test, did you? You got the actual tensile strength of the specimen after it was stretched?

"A. Yes.

"Q. And that was not the actual tensile strength of the plate, was it?

"A. Not exactly, but it was very close to it."

When questioned concerning the stretching of these specimens (page 652), Superintendent Schwab said that he knew it before the investigation, but that it was done without his knowledge or sanction. He added, however, that he would not have objected to it if he had had any knowledge of it.

ADMISSIONS AS TO THE FIFTH AND SIXTH CHARGES.

The allegation that "false specimens taken from other plates were substituted for the specimens selected by the Government inspectors" is also practically admitted by Superintendent Corey (page 572). He said that he knew indirectly that such was the case; that he believed it to be true; that he had heard it mentioned in the works before it came out in the testimony, and that he had made no attempt to investigate it. When asked why he had not investigated it, he replied: "Well, it was a matter of small importance."

The further allegation that "the testing machine was repeatedly manipulated by order of the superintendent of the armor-plate mill so as to increase the apparent tensile strength of the specimens" is admitted by Superintendent Corey, and practically admitted by Superintendent Schwab. Superintendent Corey acknowledges that the man at the machine increased the apparent tensile strength of specimens by "jockeying (his own language) with the levers."

The tensile strength was by this "jockeying" made to appear from three to six thousand pounds greater than it really was. The man at the machine acknowledged this "jockeying." F. D. Buck, who had worked the machine for months under Superintendent Corey's supervision, not only testified how he had done it, but in the presence of the committee at Homestead showed how he did it, and apparently increased the tensile strength of a piece of metal 7,000 pounds by his manipulation. Buck testified that he was accustomed to do this by order of Superintendent Corey, and that he continued it after the first investigation.

The reason for the manipulation is shown in the evidence. The company itself was making private tests of the plates and knew beforehand, as Superintendent Corey testified, what the actual tensile strength of each plate was. If it was below the minimum the manipulation of the machine necessary to bring it within the minimum was made. It is in evidence that the required manipulation was indicated to the man at the machine by private marks on the record sent from Corey's office with the order to pull the specimen. The inspectors did not have this information, although specification 81 of the new contract and 164 of the old says:

"A written statement of work and contractor's tests to be commenced and in progress each day must be furnished to the chief inspector."

Utterly disregarding the absolute requirement of this specification, Superintendent Corey says that he would have given the Government inspectors this information if they had asked him for it.

But this is not all. The following is an extract from the evidence (page 635) given by Superintendent Schwab:

"Q. Well, there were three complaints developed in this evidence that appear to be substantiated. The jockeying of the physical tests, the fake reports, and the surreptitious treatment of ballistic specimens?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Those three seem to be substantiated?

"A. First, if you will allow me to reply. The jockeying of the tests, however bad, could have had no effect on the quality of the armor, because, as I have pointed out, all the other manufacturers of plate make these armor without these tests, and the change of the report is a similar condition.

"Q. In other words, you say that amounts to nothing?

"A. No, sir; it does not; even assuming it was true, I would say it amounted to nothing.

"Q. Now, you say these official reports to the inspectors, whether true or false amounted to nothing?

"A. Yes, sir; as far as the quality of the armor is concerned. They were information tests.

"Q. Information reports?

"A. For the Government, or information reports, we will say. The tests are not made to determine the quality of the armor; that is what I want to say.

"Q. What are reports made for?

"A. For information as to the regularity of the armor; for information for a man, for example, to select his ballistic test. They are not information as to the quality."

It is very evident that one important object of these tests was to determine the quality of the armor. The specifications prove this. Take paragraph 114 of the specifications of the contract of November 20, 1890. It says:

"After the plates have been subjected to all the treatments they are to receive, and are otherwise entirely finished (except blowholes), tests will be made from them for the purpose of exhibiting both absolute and relative quality; first, in those parts of the same plate which have received similar treatment, and second, between all the plates of a group."

These same words occur in the specifications of the contract of February 28, 1893, paragraph 31.

Moreover, a principal object of the tests was to ascertain whether each plate was up to the minimum requirements of the contract, without which it could not honestly be delivered to the Government at all.

In addition to his acknowledgment Superintendent Schwab admits that whenever it was necessary to bridg the tensile strength of a specimen up to the minimum the machine could be run very fast and that by its speed the specimen could acquire from 3,000 to 4,000 pounds increased tensile strength (page 669). He claims that this manipulation was legitimate and that the increased tensile strength obtained was the real tensile strength of the material. He says (page 669):

"Q. You would have done that knowing it was not a correct test of the tensile strength?

"A. It is correct; the tensile strength of a piece of steel is not a fixed quantity."

This, to say the least, is a remarkable statement, and must stand for what it is worth. A hardly less remarkable statement to the committee was Superintendent Schwab's additional statement (page 667) that anybody selling steel would manipulate the machine according to the result wanted.

THE SEVENTH CHARGE.

The charge that specimens taken for physical test were retreated, although not acknowledged by Superintendent Corey, is practically proven by a report from the ordnance board printed in the evidence. They say that 105 of the first 700 plates accepted were passed on a second test. To avoid the possibility of armor plates being rejected through specimens containing local defects the specifications permit the contractors in case of failure to reach the requirements to submit a second specimen from the immediate vicinity of the first and without additional treatment of the plate.

Of the 105 duplicate specimens submitted but 3 failed to exhibit an improvement in quality. And in the case of 59 specimens the increase of strength was accompanied by a decrease of ductility. High ductility, when increased, was accompanied by a decrease of strength, so that to clearly indicate that the second specimen had been hardened or softened so as to indicate the qualities required by the specifications.

When this statement is taken in connection with the testimony given by the workmen at the Carnegie works, the conclusion is irresistible that specimens for physical tests were retreated without the knowledge of the Government inspectors, and therefore did not represent the plates from which they were taken.

That the test specimens in some cases were retreated is shown by the testimony of John Daube (page 160), G. W. Kountz (page 100), C. H. Craig (page 72), George Stewart (page 124), and others.

ADMISSIONS AS TO THE EIGHTH CHARGE.

Superintendent Corey admits that part of the eighth charge that alleges the plates selected by the Government inspectors for a ballistic test were retreated without the knowledge of the inspector. He confines his admission to three test plates, A 468, A 531, and A 619. A 468 carried a group of 9-inch armor, intended for the Monadnock; A 531 carried a group of 7-inch armor intended for the Monterey; A 619 carried a group of 8-inch barbette plates to be used on the battle ship Oregon. Included in the same group were a number of deck and side plates for the ram Katahdin.

Superintendent Corey denies that his retreatment was given with the intention of improving the ballistic resistance of the plates. He says that he gave them this unlawful treatment and retreatment as an experiment, alleging that by this he could ascertain whether a retreatment and repeated retreatments benefited the plates. In other words, as he puts it, he did not treat the plates to improve them, but to ascertain whether or not the retreatment would improve them.

Under the contract he had no right whatever to experiment with the plates after they had been chosen as samples of the groups, either with or without the consent of the Government inspectors; and he acknowledges that he concealed this retreatment from them.

There is no doubt in the minds of your committee that your secret retreatment was given to increase the ballistic resistance of the plates, with the express purpose of passing inferior groups and securing premiums thereon, as the groups had been nominated for premiums. The company would hardly risk the rejecting of 779 tons of armor, valued at over $410,000, in making experiments unless they were positive it was safe to do so. The contention of Superintendent Corey is that he knew the plates were so good that they would bear the secret retreatment, which he called experimenting, without being injured thereby.

The real truth undoubtedly was that the sup rintendent and his assistants knew that the retempering and annealing could not but benefit the metal and increase the company's chances of passing the plates and obtaining premiums; and knowing this, and knowing that in many cases the plates had received no proper treatment theretofore, they secretly retreated the specimen plates selected for ballistic tests.

After selection for ballistic tests the plates were cut in two pieces. Superintendent Corey acknowledges that he secretly retreated the lower half of each plate. What the actual quality of the specimen plates was before they were retreated it is impossible now to say. But even after they had had the benefit of retempering and reannealing they failed to show superior excellence. The evidence shows that the bottom half of plate A 468, representing group 9, was secretly retreated once. Yet the plate did not secure a premium on the ballistic test.

The bottom half of plate A 531, representing group 10, had two secret retreatments. This plate also failed to secure a premium. The bottom half of plate A 619, representing group 11, the next in test, had three secret retreatments, but with all this it also failed to secure a premium. This would indicate that the group was certainly under the minimum contract requirement.

Superintendent Corey, in testifying regarding the secret retreatment of these three plates, excuses himself as follows (page 617):

"Now, here in this specification in the beginning they say, 'The manufacturer is to use every endeavor and incur all expenses to make the most resisting plate possible'—that is, the plate that will offer the most resistance to the shot; and I say the so-called alleged irregular retreatment those plates have been subjected to was for that express purpose of making the most resisting plate."

He thus quoted the specifications of the last contract to cover plates made under the first contract. In reply to the question, "Why did you not let the Government inspectors know it?" he replied that "It would have taken a man six months to determine it at the company's expense, whereas we determine it with these three plates at the same time."

This statement he made with the full knowledge that the top halves of these plates were practically in the possession of the company and that the Navy Department, at their request, at any time would have tested them for the purpose of experimenting with them. They had never failed to make similar experiments when the company requested it.

The absurdity of Superintendent Corey's attempted explanation is apparent when it is stated that the three plates in question were made under the specifications of the first contract, dated November 20, 1890, which allowed the company to give the plates all the treatment they saw fit before submitting them to a ballistic test.

But the conclusive answer to the superintendent's argument is that the necessary treatment should have been given honestly to all the plates of the group before a particular plate was chosen as a specimen, and not to the specimen plate alone, secretly and fraudulently, after it had been chosen for the test.

Superintendent Corey claims in his testimony that the retreatments of these plates were made upon his own responsibility and without the knowledge of his employers. This may be true, or it may be merely an effort to shield the company; for he admits that the secret retreatments were given to the plates after he had talked with Mr. Schwab, the superintendent of the company, and one of its stockholders concerning the matter (page 561). And it may be worthy of remark in this connection that the principal parties to these frauds, Superintendents Schwab and Corey, are still retained in the employ of the company.

THE SUBSTITUTED PLATE.

Further developments with regard to the treatment of A 619 are somewhat startling. This is the plate which Superintendent Corey testified received 3 secret retreatments after its selection by the Government inspectors in August, 1893, for a ballistic test. These retreatments, he alleges, were given to the bottom half alone.

In September following, the Secretary of the Navy received information that this plate had been retreated. To ascertain the correctness of this information he ordered test pieces to be taken from both halves of the plate. The top half was intact, while the lower half had been subjected to the ballistic test. The specimen tests, taken from both halves, were compared in tensile strength, elasticity, elongation, contraction of area, and fracture with specimen tests taken from the same plate at the works of the Carnegie Steel Company before its selection for a ballistic test. The comparison satisfied the Ordnance Bureau that the information concerning the secret retreatment of the entire plate was absolutely correct.

The board appointed by the Secretary of the Navy to investigate this matter was unanimous in its opinion that there was no doubt in their minds, from the experiments made, but that the whole plate had been retreated. The attention of one of the officers, Lieut. Ackerman, even at this early date, was drawn to the cut made in dividing the plate. It did not correspond in both halves. The testimony shows that he expressed the opinion at that time that another plate had been substituted for the top half of A 619 (page 908). He based his belief upon the character of the cut between the plates and upon the different tests taken from corresponding portions on each side of the cut.

After the beginning of the investigation by your committee the Carnegie Steel Company asked for a ballistic test of the top half of this plate. This test was made on June 23, 1894. It showed that the ballistic resistance of this alleged top half was greater than that of the lower half. This result was a surprise to the Ordnance Bureau, although they admit that the test was not as severe as the test of the lower half of the plate (pages 875 and 881). The top half of all plates had been invariably regarded as the weaker of the two halves.

On June 25, three days after the test was made, Superintendent Cline appeared before your committee. On June 28, five days after the test, Superintendent Corey appeared. On July 6, thirteen days afterward, Superintendent Schwab gave his testimony. It was while he was on the stand that the committee learned for the first time that any such test had been made. Indeed, Superintendents Cline, Corey, and Schwab knew the result of this ballistic test, while the committee had no information that any such test had been made.

Lieut. C. A. Stone, a retired Navy officer, then in the employ of the Carnegie Steel Company, and who had been in its employ for two years, on leave, before he was placed on the retired list, was present at Indian Head and witnessed this test as a representative of the company, while your committee were holding their sessions and entirely unaware that the company had asked for such a test, or that one was being made.

Superintendent Corey, when first before your committee, alleged that he had secretly retreated the lower half alone of plate A 619. This was at the time he informed the committee that he knew that the top halves of the plates he was retreating would pass the ballistic test. To use his words, he was taking no chances at all on it. Superintendent Schwab alleged that Corey's treatment had injured the lower half, basing his allegation upon the official report of the ballistic test June 25 of the alleged top half.

The result of the test and of Superintendent Corey's testimony elicited by it led to a closer scrutiny of the plate by the Ordnance Bureau. In October, 1893, they had taken nineteen test specimens from the two halves to ascertain whether the original information concerning the frauds was correct. Twelve of these specimens were taken from the middle, crossing the line of the cut. Six were heart specimens and six were surface specimens, taken from each plate correspondingly on each side of the cut. The marks of the cutting tool on the two halves of the plate were again examined. The two halves were brought together and the proximate cut surfaces were compared.

The utter lack of correspondence of the surfaces was manifest. More than this, it was discovered (Capt. Sampson's testimony, page 875) that there was one-fourth of an inch difference in the width of the two halves of the plate. This was evidence that they could not have been rolled at the same time. The suspicion that the top half was not the real top of A 619 was otherwise strengthened. A plate as hard as this would require a strong tool with a point at least half an inch in width to cut it. Superintendent Corey acknowledged this when placed on the stand. He said that it could not be cut with less than a half inch or nine-sixteenths of an inch tool. A measurement of the plate showed that it had lost only half an inch.

When Superintendent Corey was placed upon the stand to account for the difference in the cut, he testified that after giving the bottom half its three retreatments he had scraped the cut to remove the evidences of the retreatment from the plate. He said it had been done with a finishing tool on the planer. When confronted before your committee with the evidence furnished by the cut itself his explanation was not satisfactory. If he had used a finishing tool the result would have been shown upon the half of the plate which he had retreated.

As he testified before seeing the two specimens, it would have removed some of the ridges. The ridges, however, were all on the edge of the lower half, and the smoothness all on the edge of the upper half. If sufficient metal had been removed in the effort to conceal traces of retreatment to produce these ridges, in addition to the amount necessarily removed in cutting the plate in two pieces, the joint length of the two halves would have been more than one-half inch shorter than the original plate.

Horatio M. Steele, a mechanic in the Washington navy-yard, testified that he was familiar with the tools used in cutting 8-inch plates. Looking at the cut on the edge of the lower plate, he said that it was cut with a square-nosed tool—cut with one cut right through the plate and dividing the plate.

Other confirmatory evidence that the top half was not the real half of A 619 was shown by the test specimens. These were also before the committee. The corresponding halves in the two plates invariably showed phenomenal variations. These variations are recorded in Commodore Sampson's testimony (page 876). The elongation, tensile strength, elastic limit, contraction of area, and nature of fracture have been fully determined.

The upper plate, as the specimens showed when placed before your committee, was tough and fibrous, and the lower plate brittle; in each case the difference was more than strongly marked—it was abnormal; so much so that one of the committee remarked that it looked as though they were made of two different metals—one pot metal and the other forged steel. Superintendent Corey volunteered no explanation of these phenomenal differences.

These specimens were all examined by your committee, and in their opinion strongly corroborate Commodore Sampson's belief that the alleged top half of A 619 was really the bottom half of some other plate. Commodore Sampson says that twelve of the tests were taken from the middle sections of the plate; three heart and three surface specimens from each half, forming six pairs, the units of which were in exact prolongation of each other.

ADMISSIONS AS TO THE NINTH CHARGE.

The ninth charge, that, in violation of the specifications of the contract, pipes or shrinking cavities, erroneously called blowholes, were plugged by the contractors and the defects concealed from the Government inspectors, is admitted by Superintendents Corey and Schwab. They allege, however, that in all cases these plates would pass the requirements of the ballistic tests. Here is an extract from the testimony of Superintendent Corey (page 589):

"Q. Did you ever know of plugging being done without the knowledge of any of the inspectors?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Can you specify the time and what plate it was?

"A. No; I can not; I did not keep a record of it."

Superintendent Schwab, when questioned concerning the plugging of blowholes, said (page 647):

"Q. Do you know whether the company did really conceal the fact of blowholes in the plate?

"A. I think likely that was done.

"Q. Was it done with your knowledge?

"A. Well, the concealment was not; no; but I had knowledge of this fact, that they did not make any plates that did not have blowholes.

"Q. You had knowledge that these blowholes were plugged in many instances?

"A. No, sir; I did not say that. I said I had knowledge that the plates had blowholes, and that I should not be surprised if they were concealed.

"Q. That workmen under you had concealed these blowholes and covered them with dust and then exposed the plate to a treatment so as to prevent the Government inspector from ascertaining it?

"A. I should not be surprised at that. I would not have been surprised if they had, yet I know they would be all right.

"Q. Did you or Cline give orders to that effect?

"A. I certainly gave orders that blowholes should not reject the plate. I did, decidedly, and I can prove——

"Q. That is, the company would not withdraw a plate on account of blowholes?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. But that it must be subjected to a ballistic test?

"A. Yes, sir; and I can prove by competent experts a plate with blowholes is a proper plate.

"Q. Not with a blowhole 4 feet long and a pebble and card in the end?

"A. That is a plate that had a hole as big as a clock here?

"Q. No; that is not the one.

"A. I think I looked up the plate at the time, and my recollection is that that plate was accepted by express order of the Ordnance Bureau.

"Q. Did you look up a plate with a 4-foot-long blowhole with a card at the end of it?

"A. I am not surprised at all at anything like that. A blowhole in a plate is naturally pretty long, and such a thing is possible and not an injury to the plate."

Further on he was asked (page 648):

"Q. Do you acknowledge that the concealment of blowholes was a fraud against the Government?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. If they did plug them up so as to conceal them from the inspectors?

"A. I do not think so; we had to take the risk on that.

"Q. You do not think that would be a fraud?

"A. No, sir; I do not.

"Q. In other words, you think that treatment would be the same treatment you would expect from others if you were ordering plates?

"A. I would not object to it at all."

Again (page 649) Superintendent Schwab testifies:

"Q. Do you know of any case where they were plugged and filled without the knowledge of the Government inspector?"

"A. I do not, but I believe it was done."

Taken with these admissions, the statements of the other witnesses concerning blowholes is of some importance. T. F. Van Kirk, a workman, in an affidavit on page 87, says that he has assisted and helped plug numerous plates, with the assistance and under the direction of the general superintendent and superintendent of armor-plate department. He continues:

"The following is a partial list of plates: Plate x-9, 13 inches, April 11 and 12, 1892. Plugged and hammered up. Forty holes in top and bottom of plate. This plate was afterwards finished, stamped, x-8, 13 inches, April 23 and 24, 1892. A great many holes in top of plate run in wire 4 feet or more in presence of my helper. The material in this plate was very bad, and, in trying to plug, the plugs would fall in, but we finally doctored it up and it passed inspection."

The affidavit of Samuel Sheriff (page 88) says:

"The plugging and doctoring of plates was generally done at night, when no inspectors were about, but I seen one fixed one day at noon."

T. F. Farley makes an affidavit (page 88) in which he says concerning the plates of the Monterey:

"They were frequently imperfect, full of deep blowholes and defects. They were frequently taken off the planer in the daytime and hidden or covered up until night, so as not to be seen by the inspectors, and then worked upon in the nighttime."

He adds that the holes would be filled up and plugged by orders of those in authority about the mill.

G. W. Kounts (page 89) makes affidavit:

"I have known of heavy plates being plugged of holes from 4 to 6 inches unknown to the Government inspector. This fraud has been practiced upon the Government since long before November, 1892, and since September, 1893."

T. F. Farley testifies (page 147):

"I have seen them long enough for a person to run three fingers into them that way (illustrating). * * *

"Q. How were they plugged?

"A. When I first went there they were plugged by taking cuttings from the same plates, and with a small hand hammer those cuttings were taken and by pushing or placing small cuttings into these blowholes until they were full, then hammering them in with a punch and placing more and more in the hole until it was level, until it could stand no more plugging.

* * * * * * * * *

"Q. What was the largest blowhole or piping that you have seen plugged?

"A. The largest that I ever saw would not be over three-fourths of an inch in diameter at its mean diameter, and I could not say about the depth.

"Q. Why could you not say about the depth?

"A. Because they run in such a tortuous way.

"Q. Did you never try to search them?

"A. Yes, sir; I have used a small flexible wire and run it in. I have run wires in to the depth of 18 inches into the plates, and I know that plates that I run a wire into 18 inches passed and is now somewhere."

Samuel Sheriff testified (page 155) that two or three barbette plates of the Indiana were plugged and passed. He knew of a patch put on to one of these plates to fill a hole from two to three inches square.

Such are specimens of the testimony regarding the plugging of plates. In the opinion of your committee they bear out Commodore Sampson's allegation that "the concealment of the blowholes was a fraud upon the Government." Superintendent Schwab, however, when questioned concerning this allegation, said that he did not consider such concealment a fraud, and that he would expect the same treatment from others if he was ordering plates.

THE TENTH AND ELEVENTH CHARGES.

The tenth allegation, that the inspector's stamp was either duplicated or stolen and used without the knowledge of the Government inspector, is, in the opinion of your committee, hardly sustained. The stamp may have been used in some instances without the knowledge of the Government inspector while his attention was diverted to something else, but there was nothing systematic about it and there is no evidence that it was either duplicated or stolen.

The eleventh allegation, that the Government inspector in inspecting bolts was deceived by means of false templates or gauges, is unsupported.

THE GOVERNMENT INSPECTION.

The evidence discloses the fact that the Government inspection was negligent and defective. None of the inspectors were, however, charged with dishonesty, nor is there any evidence tending to show that any of them were corrupt. Some were diligent and others negligent. There was, however, a disposition on the part of most of them to assume that the company itself was watching its superintendents and employés. Mr. Frick, chairman of the board of managers, in his testimony (page 691) said that he always relied on the fact that the Government had inspectors there. He did not know what they were there for unless it was to see that the specifications of the contract were carried out.

The inspectors were thus relying upon the company and the chairman of the company upon the inspectors. Neither party, however, had any right to rely in this matter upon the other. Each had his own independent duty to perform. The company was bound to fulfill the contract in every particular and the inspectors were there to see that they so fulfilled it. The failure of either to perform his duty was no excuse for the other. The company can not shelter themselves behind the Government inspectors.

Moreover, the fraud has been traced home to their general superintendent, himself a stockholder in the company. Commodore Sampson in his testimony (page 882) alleges that if the Ordnance Bureau had sent officers to the works to act as spies upon the company they would have gone with very different instructions. They did not go there expecting to be deceived, and he thought it no excuse at all for the company to say that they were negligent in their duties. He says that they were slow to believe that frauds were being perpetrated, and not so quick to realize them as they perhaps ought to have been.

Certain it is that the inspectors were there to know of their own knowledge that the specifications of the contract were being faithfully carried out. They were not to rely upon others, but to know of their own knowledge that that everything was right. It was their sole duty to protect the Government. It is in evidence that while the manufacture of the armor was going on, day and night, including Sundays, the inspectors were on duty only eight hours each day, excepting Sundays, when they were not there at all.

Allowing the eight hours to have been spent in the works they were there only two-sevenths of the time. Their inspection covered only forty-eight hours of the one hundred and sixty-eight hours of work each week. Much of the eight hours of inspection was devoted to office work. At times only one inspector was on duty, and most of the time but two. While the committee believe that to-day the inspection is thorough, it is of the opinion, in view of what has happened, that the force of inspectors should be increased.

CRIMINALITY.

If the criminality of a wrongful act is to be measured by the deliberation with which it is committed, the magnitude of the evils likely to result from its perpetration, and the want of provocation with which it is done, the frauds which your committee have found are worthy to be called crimes. The servants of the Carnegie Steel Company (whether with or without the knowledge of the company), to increase their gains, deliberately continued for many months to commit acts whose natural and probable consequence would be the sacrifice of the lives of our seamen in time of war, and with them, perhaps, the dearest interests of the nation.

The company were hired to make the best possible armor plate and paid an enormous price for so doing. They were hired to make an armor that would stand the shots of an enemy and upon which the nation might rely in time of need. They were paid between $500 and $700 a ton and thousands of dollars a plate for so doing. Resting under these obligations the company or its servants have perpetrated manifold frauds, the natural tendency of which was to palm off upon the Government an inferior armor, whose inferiority might perchance appear only in the shock of battle, and with incalculable damage to the country.

No fine or mere money compensation is an adequate atonement for such wrongs. The commission of such frauds is a moral crime of the gravest character. Your committee do not consider it as within their province to draft a criminal statute; but they do feel under obligation to call the attention of the House to the importance of protecting in the future the interests of the Treasury, the lives of our seamen, and the safety of the nation by appropriate legislation, denouncing as crimes all such acts of fraud and deception practiced upon the Government in connection with armor plate and other material of war, and making such acts severely punishable in all persons who commit them or aid and abet their commission.

THE PLATES MUST BE TESTED.

Notwithstanding all the admissions made by the superintendents employed by the Carnegie company, they claim that all the plates paid for by the Government are up to the specifications of the contracts. They allege that they not only made the best plate that could be made at that time, but that the plates will all surpass the minimum acceptance test required by the Government without regard to the alleged false treatment, plugging of blowholes, or manipulation of tensile tests.

Paragraph 92 of the contract of February 23, 1893, states that the obligation is imposed upon the contractor to satisfy the inspector that everything has been done in strict accordance with the terms of the contract. It has been conclusively shown that the inspectors have been satisfied and the armor plates passed by the most notorious frauds.

The efforts of the company and of its superintendents, Cline, Corey, and Schwab, have been to satisfy your committee that the armor is up to the requirements of the contract, notwithstanding the false reports to inspectors, doctoring of specimens, plugging of plates, fraudulent retreating of test plates, and "jockeying" of the testing machine. The unblushing character of the frauds to which these men have been parties, and the disregard of truth and honesty which they have shown in testifying before your committee, render them unworthy of credence.

And everything bears against their contention. It is not to be supposed that such manifold frauds were continued for so long a time without an important object to be gained. As the individual plates, and the groups of plates passed in many cases by fraud, the fair conclusion is that without the frauds they would not have passed.

Two questions remain, however, first, whether, notwithstanding the frauds and the failure to attain the high standard required by the contracts, the armor is not still good steel and fair armor; and second, the extent to which the Government has been damaged by the frauds and irregularities practiced upon it.

The terms of the resolution under which your committee is acting require them to ascertain the amount of damages. It is impossible, however, for them to do this with their present powers. The only way to determine the actual condition and strength of the armor is by subjecting certain plates of the groups passed by fraud to ballistic tests. This your committee has no power to do. For the information of the House, in relation to the question of further continuing this investigation by making such ballistic tests, your committee have ascertained the whereabouts of fifty-nine representative plates, alleged to have been falsely treated. The following table shows their weight, cost, and defects, and the ships upon which they can be found:

The resolution of investigation directs your committee to inquire into the condition and character of all armor plate, bolts, and other appurtenances delivered to the Government by the Carnegie Steel Company and to investigate and inquire as to what amount of inferior or damaged plate, bolts, and other appurtenances had been delivered to the Government by said company, and the amount of compensation which should be paid to the Government in settlement for such damaged or inferior armor plate, bolts, and appurtenances. The committee can go no further into this investigation without knowing the actual ballistic resistance of groups of plates passed by a test of plates that did not really represent these groups.

The comany has admitted this charge. If the Government is precluded from making these tests at their expense by the settlement made January 18, 1894 (see House Executive Document, Fifty-third Congress, pages 37 and 38), they must be made at the expense of the Government. Believing that a test of these plates should be made, your committee have selected the plates which, in their opinion, ought to be tested. They recommend that the money necessary for such a test be taken from any moneys heretofore appropriated for the increase of the Navy under the head of armor and armament. They therefore recommend the adoption of the accompanying joint resolution.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE (during the reading of the report). Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to make a brief statement, and then I will withdraw my request to have the report read in full, and also my opposition to the resolution.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask consent that the minority of the committee, if they desire, may have permission to file a minority report.

Mr. CUMMINGS. There is no minority whatever in the matter. The subcommittee, and also the Committee on Naval Affairs, unanimously agreed to the report. The gentleman seems to be very anxious to scare up a minority, but there is none to be scared up. The report is unanimous both by the subcommittee and the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks the gentleman from New York to yield to him to make a statement. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I yield all the time he desires. How much?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, about three minutes. Mr. Speaker, the very fact that the minority of the committee are not here, whether they desire to file a minority report or not, is a reason for giving them permission to do so. I take the gentleman's word for the facts which he states; but the minority of the committee are not here, and for that reason I desire that, if they should wish to file a minority report hereafter, they may have leave to do so.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I object to it, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman seems to want to prowl around to find a minority where there is none to be found. [Laughter.] The entire Committee on Naval Affairs and the entire subcommittee who investigated these matters were unanimous in agreeing to this report.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Is there anything in this report which justifies, condemns, or exonerates the President for fixing the penalty for supplying these bad plates?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The resolution of the House did not cover that subject. It was specific. It provided—

That the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to immediately investigate and inquire into the condition and character of all armor plate, bolts, and other appurtenances delivered to the Government by the said Carnegie Steel Company, Limited, and by Carnegie, Phipps & Co. during the entire period of any of the contracts between said companies and the Government, and to investigate and inquire as to what amounts of inferior or damaged armor plate, bolts, and other appurtenances have been delivered to the Government by said companies and the amount of compensation which should be paid to the Government in settlement for such damaged or inferior armor plate, bolts, and appurtenances.

Now, until we ascertain what the damage is we can not ascertain the amount to be paid.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I had in my mind a recollection, somewhat general in its nature, that before that resolution was offered here the Secretary of the Navy had fined these contractors under the contract for not complying with the same, and that the President had modified the fine and permitted to be received, and that probably there had been received, a stated sum as indemnity for shortages found in materials furnished under the contract. Am I correct about that?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The gentleman will find all the information in the testimony submitted with the report.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But, substantially, am I correct in my recollection about the matter?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I believe so.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, is there anything in the report which on the one hand condemns the President and the Secretary, or on the other justifies them, for having made that kind of settlement?

Mr. CUMMINGS. How can we condemn them or justify them until we ascertain the actual amount of injury to the plates?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That answers my question.

Mr. CUMMINGS. That is what we are endeavoring to find out.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I want to ask the gentleman from New York one further question—whether the minority of the subcommittee have read this report?

Mr. CUMMINGS. They have not; but they unanimously authorized me to make report, and said that they would stand by it, every one of them.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Whatever report you made?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, I think they made a very bold promise in that regard.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Well, I think they made a very wise one. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Now, in the absence of the members of the minority of the subcommittee, I simply ask that, if they should want to file a minority report hereafter, they shall have leave to do so. That is all.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not see how there can be any objection to that.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Do you want to insinuate that the Carnegie Company can buy a minority report?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I want the Carnegie Company to have what they have not yet had—fair play in this thing—which they will not have if you have your way about it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. They have had fair play. I want to say to this House that the Carnegie Company has had in its employ an officer of the United States Navy, who, on leave of absence with pay, has been in the employ of the company for two years. He went upon the retired list last December, and is now in the employ of the Carnegie Company. He has represented the Carnegie Company at every meeting held by this committee of investigation, while the Navy Department (on trial, as might be said, with the Carnegie Company) has been entirely unrepresented.

The Carnegie Company has been represented from the beginning of this investigation up to the present time. It has had its own stenographer before the committee taking down the testimony. The company apparently would not trust the official stenographer of the House. What more do you want for the Carnegie Company? Have they had fair play or have they not?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No, certainly not, if you refuse permission to the minority to file their views, accompanying your refusal with a statement that the minority of this investigating committee has not seen your report.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I am not authorized by the Committee on Naval Affairs to accept any such motion, and I will not accept it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentlemen from New York allow me a single suggestion? I understood the gentleman just now, in offering the report, to make some request about the printing of it, and it was suggested, perhaps by the Speaker, that it be printed in the RECORD. Would it not be better to print it in document form instead of printing it in the RECORD?

Mr. CUMMINGS. If my friend will offer a resolution to that effect——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. A simple request will be sufficient. If the report be printed as a document instead of being printed in the RECORD, it will be much more easy to get at and more acceptable. In the RECORD it will probably be buried and lost.

Mr. CUMMINGS. It will be printed as a document, anyhow.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That will be better than printing it in the RECORD.

Mr. CUMMINGS. But there will probably not be a sufficient number of copies in document form to supply the demand. Consequently I have secured permission for the printing of the report in the RECORD.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman wants more copies of the report than would be regularly printed, then he might ask to have a double edition printed as a document. There would be no objection to a resolution to print a given number in addition to the usual number of printed reports.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If the gentleman will offer a resolution covering his suggestion I will accept it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will ask, then, that an order be made for printing. How many copies does the gentleman think would be necessary in addition to the usual number? Would 2,000 be sufficient?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I should say 5,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. To print 5,000 additional copies as a document would be better a great deal than printing the report in the RECORD.

Mr. CUMMINGS. But we already have permission to print the report in the RECORD.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman is anxious to have additional copies, those copies would cost much more if printed in the RECORD (possibly 10 cents apiece) than in document form.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The report has already been authorized to go into the RECORD.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But it will be almost wholly inaccessible in the RECORD.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Well, we can have the document, too.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But I want to get it out of the RECORD.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And I do not want to get it out of the RECORD. I want to get it into the RECORD.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not think it ought to be printed in the RECORD. It is unusual to lumber up the RECORD with such matters as this. It is an unnecessary expenditure; and we have a provision by which such reports can be printed in the usual form for distribution.

Mr. CUMMINGS. You can not get too much information on this subject.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman from New York allow me a moment?

Mr. CUMMINGS. With pleasure.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I want to say just this about the matter, as I understand it. The desire to test these plates that are now on the vessels, as provided in the resolution reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, is for the purpose of ascertaining whether the company that supplied the plates has complied with the contract or not.

Mr. CUMMINGS. That is it precisely; and let me say——

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Just one moment, to see if I am right in my impression. The company is interested in having this demonstrated just as much as the Government is.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. For I understand they claim that the tests will show these plates to be a percentage better than the minimum under the contract.

Mr. CUMMINGS. That is precisely what they claim.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. And the Government is interested in it, in having the best material for its battle-ships. Now, if this company had ten thousand Carnegies in it, for one I should insist upon the investigation [applause], and I think the gentleman from New York is entirely correct in the position he takes. The minority of the committee have not made any report, and have not asked the privilege of making a minority report.

Mr. CUMMINGS. They have authorized me to make the report.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. And when a member of the minority was present here I inquired of him whether there was any minority report, or if the members of the minority desired to submit one, and I was answered that there was no minority report, but that the report to be made from the committee represented the views of the entire committee.

Mr. CUMMINGS. That is it.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Under these circumstances I hope now that no member here present will antagonize the resolution. Let us put the knife of honest investigation into the question, and ascertain, as we ought to ascertain, what are the facts in connection with it. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, in so far as the Carnegie Company is concerned, they are just as anxious for this investigation as the gentleman from New York or any of the members of the Naval Committee. There is no disposition on their part to interfere in any manner or in any way, shape, or form with the investigation. But a report is brought here which prejudges the company, which condemns them, which criticises their action——

Mr. CUMMINGS. How do you know? You have not read it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, I heard enough of it read to satisfy me as to what is its character.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then you are easily satisfied.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Here is an investigation which has been going on before the Naval Committee for some months past. The people who appear here against that company have made their statements, and, with the exception of the informers, without being sworn. The people representing the Carnegie Company have all been compelled to testify under oath——

Mr. CUMMINGS. I say, if the gentleman insists upon that assertion, he states what is false. Put that in your pipe and smoke it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, well; it is hardly worth while for me to put that "in my pipe" or the gentleman from New York either. I state what is told me——

Mr. CUMMINGS. Oh, what has been told you!

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE (continuing). And the information I get is to that effect. Whether it be correct or not, I do not know personally, of course.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Let me say——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE (continuing). Here is a proposition brought in here which goes into the entire questions involved in the contract under which these plates were furnished to the Government. It has been said that they do not come up to the requirements of the contract. An inquisition was formed, and these people who furnished the plates, on the result of that inquisition, were fined a large amount of money. The proposition is now made to take these plates off the vessels and subject them to further tests. If they are up to the contract specifications, the Government takes the plates and the money also. Now, in fairness and justice, if these plates stand the tests, the money ought to be refunded to the contractors. That is the position that I have taken in regard to this matter. I only ask fair play.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am not inclined to stand in the way of investigation by obstruction; and under the declaration of the gentleman from New York that he will not consent to the filing of a minority report if it be desired to file one, or to refund the money if these plates are found up to the standard, the Carnegie Company will do as it has done heretofore, will bear the burden all the same and be compelled to submit to what I regard as an injustice.

I withdraw all opposition to the filing of the report and to the resolution which the gentleman submits.

Mr. HUNTER. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania takes his seat, I would like to ask him if this company has not had a fair and full opportunity to present their side of the question? Have not they had ample time and opportunity to present all their objections to what is required of them, and to submit their side of the controversy?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I make no objection to that. I do not object to the filing of the report or the printing of the report, but I do object to prejudging this company in advance; to "hanging a man and then trying him."

Mr. CUMMINGS. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this resolution is not based upon the testimony of what the Carnegie Company were pleased to call the "informers."

These resolutions are based on the admissions of the Carnegie Company itself, and upon no other foundation.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will not object to the resolution, but I denounce it as unfair, unless you propose to return the money if the plates stand the test, and I denounce your report as unfair and unjust in charging fraud when you admit that the facts can not be established without a test.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then I demand the previous question on the adoption of the report and resolutions.

The previous question was ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CUMMINGS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, before we leave this subject, I should like to ask unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of the report, testimony, and resolutions be printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The only objection which I would suggest would be that if it costs more than $500 it would not be in order to do it in this way.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think that a resolution which has not been read in the House should be so printed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS]?

Mr. PAYNE and Mr. WILLIAM. A. STONE objected.

Mr. SPRINGER. As I understand it, this report is to be printed as a document?

The SPEAKER. It will be printed as a document, and also in the RECORD. That has already been ordered.

REMOVAL OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. DURBOROW. Mr. Speaker, I wish to present certain resolutions from the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, 1. That the Architect of the Capitol is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be removed from the rooms in the basement and cellar of that portion of the Capitol south of the Rotunda hereinafter named all material of every name and nature, to the rooms in the terrace that are not now occupied.

Document room No. 1; document room No. 3; document room No. 6; south room in cellar; wood-storage rooms, and all other places where books and papers stored are not used during the session where practicable to do so.

2. That after removing the material from the rooms and places designated that the same be thoroughly cleansed, purified, and such portions kalsomined as will be improved thereby.

3. That all the rooms and spaces in the basement and cellar be opened and thoroughly aired each secular day until the meeting of Congress in December next; that so much of the force as now employed under the Doorkeeper of the House as may be necessary to assist in the work of removal of public documents and cleansing the rooms be retained by the Doorkeeper until the work thus ordered is completed, and they shall be paid for such service at the same rate they are now receiving.

Mr. SAYERS. Is this resolution reported by a committee?

Mr. DURBOROW. It is. In explanation of this resolution, I will state that it was adopted at a recent meeting of the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, and carries out the recommendations of the experts who examined the ventilating apparatus during the spring. They recommended this action, and it is believed that it will greatly improve the ventilation of this Chamber and of the entire south end of the Capitol.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of this resolution how many of the Doorkeeper's force will be retained to do this work? If the entire force is to be retained during the vacation, we want to know it.

Mr. DURBOROW. I do not know that I can answer that question.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman can not answer the question, then he ought not to present this resolution.

Mr. DURBOROW. It will be such part of the force as will be necessary to do the work, and that will be determined by the Doorkeeper himself, as it will be done under his charge.

Mr. PAYNE. I think this work ought to be done, and these documents ought to be removed. I do not see how they can be removed except by the Doorkeeper's force, which has them in charge and knows how they are arranged, and can arrange them after they are removed to the terrace. I have seen the documents, and I do not think it will require an extended time to do the work. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW] should limit the time in his resolution, so that the force will not be employed during the whole recess.

Mr. DURBOROW. I have no objection to any limit which the gentleman will suggest.

Mr. SAYERS. Where are the books to be removed to?

Mr. DURBOROW. To rooms in the terrace. That is stated in the resolution. They are to be removed from the rooms designated, and taken to other rooms in the terrace. The rooms where they are now are to be thoroughly cleaned and aired. They have not been cleaned and aired for a great many years.

Mr. PAYNE. A portion of the documents are now in the terrace.

Mr. DURBOROW. I have no objection to any time limit which the gentleman may suggest.

Mr. SAYERS. I would suggest to the gentleman that he withdraw the resolution for the present. We shall meet again to-morrow, and he can than furnish the necessary information.

Mr. DURBOROW. It is a matter for the House to determine. It is important to the health of the members.

Mr. SAYERS. When resolutions or bills are brought before the House for consideration, gentlemen in charge of them ought to be able to give the House information.

Mr. DURBOROW. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that this can be called up to-morrow morning I withdraw the resolution, and will call it up then. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] desires information as to the number of the force and the time it will probably require to move these books. I will investigate that and will call up the resolution again to-morrow.

Mr. SAYERS. All right.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is withdrawn. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

JURISDICTION OF THE POLICE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the bill (S. 1414) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to define the jurisdiction of the police court of the District of Columbia;" which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SACRAMENTO AND SAN JOAQUIN RIVERS, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CAMINETTI, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported a substitute for resolution authorizing the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to visit and examine, during the recess of Congress, the tributaries of the Sacramento and San Joaquin system in California; which was referred to the Union Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

COPYRIGHTS.

Mr. HICKS, from the Committee on Patents, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7853) to amend section 4956 and section 11 following section 4967 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to copyrights; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal of day before yesterday and the Journal of yesterday be dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to request a leave of absence for my colleague?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi for a moment.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask that an indefinite leave of absence be granted to my colleague [Mr. MCLAURIN], on account of serious illness in his family.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and an indefinite leave of absence is granted to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN].

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HARRIS. I renew my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JARVIS was, on his request, granted leave of absence for the remainder of the session.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. QUAY (for Mr. CAMERON) presented petitions of Council No. 109, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of McKeesport; Council No. 328, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Harrisburg; Council No. 507, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Port Marion; of Trade and Labor Council, of Reading; and of C. G. Creel, of Port Marion, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also (for Mr. CAMERON) presented sundry memorials of citizens of Brush Creek Valley, Hamburg, Broadtop, Philadelphia, and Lemont, all in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against appropriating Government moneys for sectarian Indian education, etc.; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BITUMINOUS COAL AND IRON ORE.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a communication from the Acting Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, transmitting certain information relative to imports and exports of bituminous coal and imports of iron ore for the last twenty years. I move that the communication be printed as a miscellaneous document.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPT. W. H. BIXBY.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7434) directing the issue of a duplicate of a lost check drawn by Capt. W. H. Bixby, Engineers, United States Army, at Newport, R. I., in favor of Messrs. Hughes Brothers & Bangs, to report it without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

I. H. HATHAWAY & CO.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2322) for the relief of I. H. Hathaway & Co., to report it without amendment, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The preamble recites that Thomas H. Handbury, major Corps of Engineers, United States Army, on the 14th of June, 1894, issued a check, numbered 269798, for $10,115.34, on the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, in favor of I. H. Hathaway & Co., in payment of contract work done at the mouth of St. Johns River, Florida, which check is alleged to have been lost in transmission through the United States mails between St. Augustine, Fla., and Philadelphia, Pa.; and that the act of February 16, 1885, amending section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing United States disbursing officers and agents to issue duplicates of lost checks, applies only to checks drawn to $2,500 or less.

The bill instructs Maj. Handbury to issue a duplicate of the original check, under such regulations in regard to its issue and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of duplicate checks under the provisions of section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MANDERSON. I introduced a bill for the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and I desire that it shall appear the bill is introduced by him, by request.

The bill (S. 2324) to consolidate the five regiments of the artillery of the Army with the Marine Corps of the Navy into a corps of marine artillery, and to organize the field artillery of the Army, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PUGH introduced a bill (S. 2325) supplementary to an act entitled "An act establishing a court of appeals for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved February 9, 1893; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. QUAY (for Mr. CAMERON) introduced a bill (S. 2326) to place James T. Peale on the retired list of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PENNSYLVANIA STATE CLAIM.

Mr. QUAY. On behalf of my colleague [Mr. CAMERON], who is necessarily absent, I introduce a joint resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 104) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to reëxamine the settlement of the Second Comptroller of May 22, 1893, of the claim from the State of Pennsylvania for expenses incurred in aiding the United States to suppress the late insurrection, etc., was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to cause the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to reëxamine the settlement by the Second Comptroller of May 22, 1893, of the claim of the State of Pennsylvania for expenses incurred in aiding the United States to suppress the late insurrection, for which reimbursement is provided in the act of Congress approved July 27, 1861 (12 Stats., 276), which directs "that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the governor of any State, or to his duly authorized agents, the cost, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such State for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting its troops employed in aiding to suppress the present insurrection," and to report the amount expended, crediting such payments as have been made to the State for the purposes mentioned in said act on account of troops employed by the governor in aiding the United States to suppress the said insurrection or by the adjutant-general, or any other of the military agents of the governor and being within the authority conferred upon governors of States by General Orders numbered 78 of 1861 and 18 of 1862, of the War Department, by which they are authorized to organize and prepare troops for the service as they may judge advantageous for the interests of the General Government and are made the lawful authority for raising volunteers, including such payments as were made by the State upon judgments rendered against the State for the use of fair grounds and buildings occupied by troops for recruiting and other purposes.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have the Senator from Pennsylvania make a little explanation of the object of the joint resolution.

Mr. QUAY. I never saw the resolution until it was handed to me this morning on behalf of my colleague. The object is to correct some errors which were made in settling the account of the State of Pennsylvania under the direct tax.

Mr. HUNTON. It merely calls for a report, I understand.

Mr. QUAY. It is an instruction to the Secretary of the Treasury to reopen and reëxamine the settlement and correct errors, if there are errors. That is all of it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the joint resolution come from a committee?

Mr. QUAY. No, it does not.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me it is a pretty important matter to consider without reference to a committee if it undertakes to instruct any officers of the Government as to what they shall do.

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator objects to its consideration the joint resolution can go over.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it ought to go to a committee.

Mr. QUAY. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CORRECTION OF ERROR.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 105) to change the initials of a name in the Indian appropriation bill; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the appropriation to pay "F. G." Niedringhaus for beef cows delivered at Fort Peck Agency be corrected to read "W. F." Niedringhaus.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WORLD'S COLUMBIAN COMMISSION DIPLOMAS.

Mr. LINDSAY introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 106) authorizing the printing upon the blank diplomas authorized by section 3 of the act of March 3, 1893, the names of the persons to whom the diplomas are to be awarded by the World's Columbian Commission; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, be authorized to print upon the blank diplomas authorized by section 3 of the act of March 3, 1893, making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1894, the names of the persons to whom the diplomas are to be awarded by the World's Columbian Commission, and the language of the awards as furnished by the committee on awards of the World's Columbian Commission; and the expense thereof shall be paid from the appropriation of $103,000 contained in said section 3, which appropriation is hereby made available for such purpose until expended.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT, HEAT, AND POWER COMPANY.

Mr. HARRIS. Some weeks ago the bill (S. 2146) to incorporate the National Gas and Electric Light, Heat, and Power Company of the District of Columbia was adversely reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia and indefinitely postponed. I ask unanimous consent that the order indefinitely postponing the bill may be rescinded, and the bill recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY CLAIMS.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration. Before it is read I will state that it is a resolution similar to two others which have been passed at the present session, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to reëxamine and certify certain accounts about which there is some controversy.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution be read.

The resolution was read, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to cause the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to reëxamine the certified claims of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and its leased lines against the United States for transportation, numbered 4889 of the year 1884, for the sum of $14,878.93, and to submit the reasons in full for said certification, with a detailed statement of the facts upon which said claims originated.

OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate such information as they can procure concerning the ownership of railroads by foreign governments, the rates charged for carrying passengers and freight, as compared with the charges made by the railroads of the United States for like service, the cost of operating roads owned by governments, and the net revenue as compared with the roads of the United States. Also the wages paid to railroad employés by the governments operating roads, and also the wages paid to railroad employés for like services in the United States, and such other information as they may be able to furnish.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 226) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to have certain armor plates removed and tested; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 28th day of August, instant, at 2 o'clock p. m.; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 1005) to prevent the recording of subdivisions of land in the District of Columbia in the office of the recorder of deeds;

A bill (S. 2290) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory;'"

A bill (H. R. 2842) to reimburse George C. Tanner, late consul, and so forth, the sum of $200 paid by him for rent of rooms;

A bill (H. R. 6529) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the St. Croix River between Wisconsin and Minnesota; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 223) to correct an error in the act entitled "An act to amend an act granting a pension to Elizabeth Voss."

BACK BAY BRIDGE.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5478) to authorize the Biloxi and Back Bay Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge over that portion of the bay of Biloxi, in the State of Mississippi, known as Back Bay.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR INTERNAL REVENUE COLLECTION, ETC.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8007) to provide for the collection of internal revenue, and for other purposes; which I report back from the Committee on Appropriations favorably.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $9,000 to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to employ such additional force as may be necessary for the collection of internal revenue; and $5,000 to carry into effect the convention between the United States and Venezuela providing for a reference to arbitration of the claim of the Venezuela, Steam Transportation Company against the Government of Venezuela, signed at Caracas on the 19th day of January, 1892.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 221) to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of August, 1894, on the 23d day of said month, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the Senate to take up Order of Business 692 for present consideration. It is a resolution of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. CAMDEN on the 13th instant from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate, what revision of, or amendments to, the rules, if any, should be adopted to secure a more efficient and satisfactory disposition of the business of the Senate; and for this purpose the said Committee on Rules is authorized to sit during the coming vacation, and any expense incident thereto shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and report also a code of joint rules for the government of the two Houses, if, in their opinion, it is expedient to do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I feel constrained to object to the resolution.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will state that the object of the resolution is to authorize the Committee on Rules to sit during the recess for the purpose of revising the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BLANCHARD. That is just why I object to it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

C. P. GOOCH.

Mr. COKE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 3334) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the heirs or legal representatives of C. P. Gooch certain money due him for carrying the mail.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to the heirs or legal representatives of C. P. Gooch $65, being balance due him for carrying the mail on route No. 8237, in the State of Louisiana, from January 1 to March 31, 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MOUNT VERNON ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 7515) granting the right of way through the Arlington reservation for electric railway purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment in section 1, line 25, after the word "passengers," to insert "on such plans;" so as to read:

And the said company shall repair at its own expense, in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War, any damage, injury, or displacement that may be done to roads, footways, bridges, or fences upon or through the Government lands referred to in this act by the construction or operation of the said electric railway company, and shall erect such sheds or other shelter for the comfort and convenience of passengers on such plans and at such points as the Secretary of War shall direct.

Mr. HUNTON. To this amendment I would have no objection if we could get the bill back to the other House and have it concurred in there; but I have consulted with the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. HARRIS] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], and they do not object to having the amendment disagreed to. I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to say as to the amendment that under the circumstances I withdrew my desire to have the clause inserted, believing that the bill by its terms will give to the Secretary of War full power to exercise supervision over the plan or style of any building that may be erected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOME FOR DESTITUTE COLORED PERSONS.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7095) to provide for the erection of a national home for aged and infirm colored persons, and for the maintenance of the inmates thereof.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I am compelled to object to this measure. It is a bill which would take from the Treasury a very large amount of money, which under its terms would be placed in the hands of a corporation organized under the general laws of the District of Columbia. I trust the Senator from Indiana will not press the bill. It seems to me it ought to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and if this money is to be expended in the interests of the colored people, it ought to be done under greater safeguards than are provided for in the bill.

Mr. TURPIE. The Senator from Indiana would be exceedingly glad to have the bill passed if it could be done. All he can do is to ask that every Senator present shall consent to its present consideration, and if the Senator objects I have no remedy. But no member ought to object on the ground stated by the Senator from Maryland. This is entirely a local bill. It takes not a penny from the National Treasury. It was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and carefully considered and favorably reported. Those objections ought not to obtain. But if through personal caprice, or from any other motive a Senator wishes to object, I have no remedy.

Mr. GORMAN. I never object to the consideration of a bill from personal caprice, and certainly I have none towards the Senator from Indiana and those who are bringing forward this measure. I object from public considerations and as a matter of proposed legislation, and nothing beyond that. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that after a careful examination of the bill and after reading the report I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that it would be unwise to pass the bill. Now, I differ with the Senator from Indiana and the gentlemen on the committee who have reported the bill. Still I do not believe that the bill can be passed without careful consideration, and certainly not without amendments being offered on the part of others. Under the circumstances, and without the slightest feeling against the Senator from Indiana or anyone else who supports the bill, I do not think it ought to be pressed at this time.

Mr. TURPIE. The Senator from Maryland is mistaken in supposing that this bill has not been considered, or that it has been carelessly considered. I assure the honorable Senator that the bill has been very carefully considered. It was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and it has been fully discussed there.

Mr. GEORGE. I object to the further discussion of this question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The consideration of the bill is objected to.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolution from the House of Representatives fixing a time for the final adjournment of the two Houses of Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 28th day of August instant, at 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. VEST. On what day of the week is the 28th?

Mr. COCKRELL. Tuesday.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that when the Senate adjourn today it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ALLOTMENTS OF LAND TO INDIANS.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2295) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to correct errors where double allotments of land have erroneously been made to an Indian, to correct errors in patents, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in all cases where it shall appear that a double allotment of land has heretofore been, or shall hereafter be, wrongfully or erroneously made by the Secretary of the Interior to any Indian, by an assumed name or otherwise, or where a mistake has been or shall be made in the description of the land inserted in any patent, said Secretary is hereby authorized and directed, during the time that the United States may hold the title to the land in trust for any such Indian and for which a conditional patent may have been issued, to rectify and correct such mistake and cancel any patent which may have been erroneously and wrongfully issued, whenever in his opinion the same ought to be canceled for error in the issue thereof, or for the best interests of the Indian, and, if possession of the original patent can not be obtained, such cancellation shall be effective if made upon the records of the General Land Office; and no proclamation shall be necessary to open the lands so allotted to settlement.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

S. E. HALLFORD.

Mr. PUGH. I ask that House bill 7407 be laid before the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 7407) for the relief of S. E. Hallford, of Alabama, was read twice by its title.

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to reinvest in S. E. Hallford the title to certain lands in Alabama bought by the United States at a sale made by the marshal of the middle division of that State.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MATHEW S. PRIEST.

Mr. PASCO. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 1314) for the relief of Mathew S. Priest. I call up the bill at the request of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE], who takes an interest in the case.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments: In line 3, before the word "dollars," to strike out "six hundred" and insert "three hundred and seventy-five;" and in line 8, before the word "day," to strike out "twenty-seventh" and insert "seventeenth;" and to strike out section 2 of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the sum hereby appropriated is made immediately available

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $375 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to compensate Mathew S. Priest for services rendered by him for the Government of the United States from the 16th day of March to the 17th day of August, 1863, as engineer of the steamers Silver Wave and Moderator, in passing the batteries of Vicksburg, Warrenton, and Grand Gulf, and for repairing steamers.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PASCO. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. PASCO, Mr. MCLAURIN, and Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon were appointed.

OSAGE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7571) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Osage River, in the State of Missouri.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7572) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at De Witt, Carroll County, Mo., and to establish it as a post-road.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TARIFF COMPARISON.

Mr. GORMAN. I report from the Committee on Printing a concurrent resolution and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. TURPIE. I object.

Mr. GORMAN. There can not be any objection made to the report. An objection to the consideration of the resolution can be entertained.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 60,000 copies of the Comparison of the Tariff Law of 1890 and 1894, prepared under the supervision of the Senate Committee on Finance, 25,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate and 35,000 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-third Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland what comparison it is proposed to print?

Mr. GORMAN. It is a comparison prepared by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST. There have been two or three of those comparisons.

Mr. ALLISON. It is the last one, I presume.

Mr. GORMAN. It is the last one, prepared by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALDRICH. Would it not be well enough to find out whether the bill will become a law before an order is made to print? I believe we have no official assurances in regard to the exact status of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose everyone will want to have it printed. Every Senator will want copies.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, yes; I should like to have it printed.

Mr. GRAY. It will be in demand whether it becomes a law or not.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are numerous applications for it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not making any formal objection. I merely made an inquiry.

Mr. VEST. It is the last comparative statement, I understand, that is to be printed.

Mr. GORMAN. It is the last comparative statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that there is objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. RANSOM subsequently said: As to the concurrent resolution reported by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] just now from the Committee on Printing there is a misunderstanding. It was the impression that an objection was made to its consideration. There was none, and I ask that the resolution be passed.

Mr. TURPIE. I withdraw my objection to the resolution. I have looked at it, and I find that it has been carefully considered. My bill was not carefully considered, it seems.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana withdraws his objection to the consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PETER GRANT STEWART.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 118) for the relief of Peter Grant Stewart, of Oregon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Allow me to make a statement, and I think the Senator from Missouri will not object. The beneficiary in this case is an old man, 93 years of age, living in my State. The bill has been reported twice. It has been on the Calendar for a long time. It proposes to pay for property taken for a military reservation forty-four years ago. It is tardy justice, to say the least, and I should like to be able to say to the old man, who can not live many months longer, that his bill has passed the Senate. It has been unanimously reported twice from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the Order of Business?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It is Order of Business 700. It is a very short bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think I once had that case in my hands. I hope the Senator from Oregon will not insist on calling up the bill. I investigated one of those cases about property taken in that reservation years and years ago, and unless there is a great deal of additional evidence there is a very shadowy foundation for the existence of the claim.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Let me say to the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not insist on it in the present condition of the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from Missouri is evidently laboring under a misapprehension about this matter. There were three of these cases. The Congress of the United States has paid $25,000 for a precisely similar case growing out of property taken in the same reservation. This is the second case, and the other case is pending, involving a similar amount to this, before the Committee on Claims. The report states the case fully. There can not be any question about it. I hope the Senator will allow this to be done.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think the Senator from Oregon ought to insist on it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from Missouri ought not to object to the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator knows I am not in the habit of objecting, but I examined some of those claims and I found them to be without one particle of foundation.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. When the Senator makes that statement, I can say that the Committee on Claims have considered this case twice favorably, and have reported it twice unanimously to the Senate, and they are of opinion that it is a meritorious case. The Senator can not say that he has examined this case.

Mr. COCKRELL. It will not hurt the Senator from Oregon to let this case go over on the reasonable request of a Senator who does not make a captious objection.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It will not hurt me at all whether the case goes over or whether the bill is passed. I will say, before it goes over, if it has to go over, that it would be a great satisfaction to me if I should be able to say to this old man when I return to Oregon, who is now 93 years of age, that the Senate of the United States has adopted the report of the committee that was made twice in his favor. That is all.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will look at it. I will not insist on my objection if the Senator will let the bill be laid aside until I can examine the report.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. All right. Here is the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have the report here, but I have not had time to examine it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The consideration of the bill is objected to.

PROCEEDINGS UNDER CALL OF THE SENATE.

Mr. HARRIS. There is pending a call of the Senate not yet fully executed. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT ST. LOUIS.

Mr. PALMER. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5645) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River to the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, from some suitable point between the north line of St. Clair County, Ill., and the southwest line of said county.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to say to the Senator from Illinois that I have an amendment. If it is accepted, I have no objection to the bill being passed. Otherwise I must object to it. My amendment is to add the following proviso at the end of the bill as it now stands:

Provided, That no bridge constructed under this act shall be located within a distance of 2 miles above or below either of the two bridges across the said river at St. Louis, Mo., at present known as the Eads Bridge and the Merchants' Bridge.

Mr. PALMER. Of course I can not accept the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a very important amendment.

Mr. PALMER. It is a very important amendment—too important to be accepted, if I can help it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PALMER. I hope that we shall be able to dispose of the bill.

Mr. VEST. Oh, yes; let us dispose of it.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Missouri to withdraw the motion.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will withdraw it for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object unless my amendment can be agreed to.

Mr. VEST (to Mr. PALMER). Let the amendment go in.

Mr. PALMER. I can not accept the amendment, and if consent is dependent upon my acceptance of the amendment, of course the objection must be regarded as final.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the bill.

BARK SKUDESNAES.

Mr. RANSOM. I beg leave to report back from the Committee on Commerce without amendment the bill (H. R. 6888) for the registry or enrollment of the bark Skudesnaes. It is a very small bill, and it is my neglect that it has not been reported and attended to before. It is all right, and I hope the Senate will consider it and pass it. There is not a dollar involved in it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information.

Mr. RANSOM. That is right.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to admit to registry as a bark of the United States the bark Skudesnaes, a foreign-built vessel, wrecked in American waters, purchased, repaired and owned by C. C. Pinckney, jr., of Charleston, S. C., a citizen of the United States.

Mr. RANSOM. The law has been complied with, and the Secretary of the Treasury is in favor of the passage of the bill. I ask that it be put on its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 561) for the relief of John and Sarah Griffin was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 5740) incorporating the Society of American Florists was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 226) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to have certain armor plates removed and tested, was read twice by its title.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to send an amendment to the Committee on Naval Affairs to accompany the joint resolution instructing the Secretary of the Navy to test certain armor plates.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be printed and referred with the joint resolution.

Mr. QUAY. Very well. The amendment simply provides that if the plates when tested prove to be equal to or above the requirements of the contract of the Carnegie Company with the Government the fine heretofore imposed upon them for defective plates shall be refunded. That is fair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution and the proposed amendment will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the amendment will be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask for a leave of absence for the remainder of the session on account of the sickness of my wife, who is at Cape May.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and leave of absence is granted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HARRIS rose.

Mr. QUAY. I understand that the Senator from Tennessee is about to move an executive session. Before he makes that motion I desire to mention to the Senate that it is more than probable that no further legislative business will be transacted at the present session, and if a Senator has any business of that character which he wishes to have disposed of to-day it had better be done now before the Senator from Tennessee takes us back into executive session.

Mr. COCKRELL. I supposed we were through.

Mr. QUAY. If we are through, it is all right.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one minute spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, August 27, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

To Mr. MADDOX, for the rest of the session.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. BROSIUS obtained leave to withdraw the papers filed in connection with the bill (H. R. 3801) for the relief of the legal owners of the Columbia bridge, at Columbia, Pa., for reference to the Treasury Department for further examination and report.

PRIVILEGE UNDER LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUDSON. Is it proper, under the privilege to print a speech concerning any particular subject, to discuss subjects wholly different from that particular subject, and not germane to the question?

The SPEAKER. That is a very hard question for the Chair to decide. There is always a great deal of latitude exercised by members under leave to print.

Mr. HUDSON. I wish to know if it is proper and if that may be done. If one may discuss individuals, or the records of individuals, under leave to print a speech concerning the tariff bill that was recently before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not like to determine an abstract question like that.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish to know whether the gentleman refers to anything already done or something which he proposes to do.

Mr. HUDSON. To something already done.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 28th day of August instant, at 2 o'clock p. m.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LOUD. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 10.

Mr. LOUD and Mr. HUDSON. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. CATCHINGS, and the gentleman from California, Mr. LOUD.

Pending the count of tellers,

Mr. LOUD said: Mr. Speaker, with the assurances that I have that there is no show for repentance on the part of the Executive, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Then the ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

BILLS PASSED THIS CONGRESS.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a request of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I want to ask unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD, after we have adjourned, statement showing the bills that have passed this Congress, by title; also the bills that have passed this House, but have not been passed by the Senate. I think it would be a matter of useful information for the House. It is to be published without comment.

Mr. PAYNE. I would not object to a list of the bills which have become laws, but can hardly see the force or necessity for the publication of those that have not become laws.

Mr. SICKLES. It shows the amount of work that has been done by the House.

Mr. CATCHINGS. It would be a matter of information to members as to what they have done.

Mr. LOUD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I do not think there ought to be any objection to it; indeed, I think such a list ought to be published every Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. I think I shall object to publishing any beyond those that have become laws.

Mr. CATCHINGS. It would be a matter of great usefulness to members, and I hope my friend will not make that objection. I say to my friend that the statement can do no possible harm, and will be useful to many members. Every member is interested in showing what bills have passed and what bills have not passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD, without comment, a list of the titles of bills passed by the present Congress, and also of those passed by the House but not acted upon by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will get it into the RECORD before this House adjourns. If I can not do it in one way I will do it in another.

ALIEN ANARCHISTS.

Mr. TERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2314) to provide for the exclusion and deportation of alien anarchists. I send to the desk an amendment which I propose to offer to the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no alien anarchist shall hereafter be permitted to land at any port of the United States, or be admitted into the United States, but this prohibition shall not be so construed as to apply to political refugees or political offenders, other than such anarchists.

SEC. 2. That the board of special inquiry, authorized under the immigration act of March 3, 1893, shall diligently inquire of any alien seeking admission into the United States, who is suspected of being an anarchist, by pertinent questions, as to his antecedents, his opinions as to government, and whether he belongs to any society or association of known anarchistic tendencies; and it may examine the person of such alien for marks indicative of such membership; it may accept evidence of the immigrant's common reputation as an anarchist, and the orders, decrees, or judgments of foreign governments and police notifications as prima facie evidence, which may be deemed sufficient, unless successfully controverted, to prevent the admission of such alien.

SEC. 3. That where the Superintendent of Immigration is satisfied from oath or affirmation filed with him that any alien anarchist has been allowed to land or has come into the United States contrary to law, or such officer has reason to believe from oath or affirmation filed with him that any alien in the United States is an anarchist and that his presence in this country will be a menace to the Government or to the peace and well being of society in general, he may issue a warrant and cause such suspected alien anarchist to be taken into custody and brought before such Superintendent, who shall proceed without unnecessary delay to hear the evidence upon such charge and shall afford the suspected person an opportunity to submit evidence in his defense, and if, after such hearing, the Superintendent shall be satisfied that the person accused is an alien anarchist and has been allowed to land or has come into the United States contrary to law, or is satisfied that such person is an alien anarchist and that his presence in this country will be a menace to the Government or to the peace and well being of society in general, the said Superintendent shall cause him to be conveyed to the port of departure and thence returned to the country whence he came; and if such anarchist was allowed to land or came into this country contrary to law, he shall be returned at the expense of the importing vessel, but if already in the country at the time of the passage of this act, or if he entered from an adjoining country of which he is not a citizen, then he shall be returned to the country of his nativity at the expense of the United States. The Superintendent of Immigration, for the purposes of such hearings, shall have power to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to take testimony upon the questions involved, and may require any inspector of immigration or may specially authorize any other person to execute process, to make arrests, and to convey to ports of departure persons ordered deported. That upon any hearing before said Superintendent, and upon any hearing provided for in the fourth section of this act, the same kind of evidence hereinbefore authorized to be received before the board of special inquiry on the admission of alien immigrants may be allowed and with the like effect.

It is further provided that any person arrested for being an alien anarchist and ordered to be deported by the Superintendent of Immigration shall have a right of appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall hear and dispose of such appeal under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and pending such appeal the order of deportation shall not be executed, but the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury upon such appeal shall be final and conclusive, but no final order of deportation shall be carried out until said alien anarchist has an opportunity, if he so desires, to apply for a writ of habeas corpus, to be issued by any judge of any United States court, and upon any hearing upon such writ the question of alienage, identity, and the regularity of the proceedings may be reviewed. The Secretary of the Treasury may authorized the collector of customs at any port to proceed against any alien anarchist, according to the provisions of this act, and in such proceedings to perform all the duties and exercise all the powers hereby conferred on the Superintendent of Immigration.

SEC. 4. That in cases where, upon the trial and conviction of any alien of any crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, in any United States court or court of record of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, it shall appear from the evidence produced at the trial that such alien is an anarchist, or that his remaining in this country will be a menace to the Government or to the peace and well-being of society in general, the presiding judge shall direct that a further hearing shall be had before him upon that matter at an early day, of which the convicted alien shall have due notice, and at which he shall be allowed to be heard and introduce evidence in his defense; and if the said judge shall be satisfied from the evidence produced at such hearing that such convicted alien is an anarchist, or that his remaining in the country will be a menace to the Government or to the peace and well-being of society in general, he may direct that in addition to other punishments adjudged, the said convicted alien, after undergoing such punishments, shall be taken before a commissioner of immigration at a port of entry, who shall order his deportation at the expense of the United States to the country from which he came. Should he thereafter return to the United States, he shall be arrested and sentenced to confinement in a penitentiary for a period not exceeding four years, and afterwards again deported.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his discretion to appoint such number of immigration agents as he may deem necessary, not exceeding twelve in number, at a salary not exceeding $2,500 each per annum, whose duties shall be to go abroad and make investigations in other countries, under such rules, directions, and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, pertaining to intended immigrants, and especially to diligently inquire and inform themselves as to the character of intended immigrants, whether anarchists, criminals, or alien contract laborers, availing themselves of police records, decrees of expulsion, and any and every source of information useful and obtainable so as to enable them to arrive at correct conclusions, and to report thereon from time to time to the Superintendent of Immigration, and to execute such other duties relating to the matters aforesaid as the Secretary of the Treasury may impose; and for the purpose of enforcing this law and paying the salaries of the said agents, the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 6. That the fact that an alien has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States shall constitute no bar to proceedings against him under this act or under the acts to which it is an amendment.

Mr. TERRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have sent up an amendment, which is intended to obviate certain objections that have been made to the bill as it passed the Senate. I ask that the amendment be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add at the end of section 1 the following:

"The word 'anarchist,' as used in this act, shall be construed to mean one who advocates the destruction by violence either of all government or of the Government of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this Senate bill?

Mr. ENGLISH of New Jersey and Mr. BOEN. I object.

LIST OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report, which I send to the desk. I ask that the resolution accompanying the report be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized and directed to supply the Public Printer, as rapidly as possible, with the copy of the digested summary and alphabetical list of private claims presented to the House of Representatives from the Forty-seventh to the Fifty-first Congress, inclusive, as the same is prepared by him; and the Public Printer is hereby authorized to cause the same to be printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That resolution simply provides for printing the index of private claims. I wish to add an amendment at the end of the resolution, providing that only the usual number shall be printed.

Mr. PAYNE. Why not continue the publication down to the present time? I understand from the reading of the resolution that it includes only from the Forty-seventh to the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The list has been completed only that far. The Clerk of the House is required to prepare the list, and he has it completed only down to the Fifty-first Congress. I move to add at the end of the resolution, "but only the usual number shall be printed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The report accompanying the resolution is somewhat long, and I do not think it is necessary to read it, but I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

The report is as follows:

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following report (to accompany resolution submitted by Mr. KRIBBS, December 12, 1892, providing for the printing of the index of private claims from the Forty-seventh to the Fifty-first Congress, inclusive):

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution above mentioned, having considered the same, report it back with the recommendation that the usual number of said index be printed.

This index has been prepared by the Clerk of the House pursuant to numerous resolutions and acts of Congress, and is supplementary to the indexes of private claims published heretofore and covering a period from the First to the Forty-sixth Congress, inclusive, in three volumes.

As shown by the accompanying letter of Hon. Edward McPherson, Clerk of the House during the Fifty-first Congress, the work was completed up to and including that Congress so far as the preparation of the cards, but to complete it will require the arrangement and alliteration of the cards for the Public Printer.

This consolidated index will be a great convenience when printed, but in its present shape is of no value. We therefore recommend the adoption of the resolution.

The cost of printing the usual number will be, according to the estimate of the Public Printer, $15,700.

[House Miscellaneous Document No. 31, Fifty-second Congress, first session.]

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 8, 1891.

SIR: I have the honor to report that within the last two years this office has completed the index of private claims presented in the Forty-ninth, the Fiftieth, and the Fifty-first Congresses. Under my predecessor the Forty-seventh and the Forty-eighth Congresses were covered.

This index is a digested summary and alphabetical list of private claims, and exhibits the action of Congress on each claim, with references to the journals, reports, bills, etc., elucidating its progress.

The work is a continuation of a volume published in 1882, which gives the like facts from the Forty-second down to and including the Forty-sixth Congress.

The printing of these indexes would greatly facilitate the transaction of public business. Nothing remains to be done but the proper arrangement of individual cards as copy for the Public Printer.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWD. MCPHERSON,
Clerk of the House of Representatives, United States.

Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

CATALOGUE OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present another matter which I think is privileged, the bill (S. 2312) to authorize the preparation and publication of a descriptive catalogue and index of Government publications.

The SPEAKER. That does not appear to be privileged.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think it is, Mr. Speaker. The list is printed simply for the use of the two Houses, and for that reason I think this is a privileged matter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be prepared and published, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, a classified, analytical, and descriptive catalogue and index of all Government publications issued subsequent to March 4, 1881, the date at which the Descriptive Catalogue by Poore, prepared under act of July 27, 1882, terminates, and prior to the Fifty-third Congress; and upon the request of the said joint committee the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives and the heads of all the Executive Departments and of the bureaus and offices thereof, shall furnish to the said joint committee all such information and assistance in reference to said publications as will facilitate the completion of said work; and the sum of $2,500 is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this act.

Mr. SAYERS. Before unanimous consent is given for the consideration of that bill I would like to hear an explanation as to the necessity for its passage.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It simply provides for printing the catalogue of Government publications. A catalogue has been printed bringing the list down to 1881. Down to that date it was prepared by Ben: Perley Poore, who was for many years clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing, and this is simply for the purpose of bringing the list down to date from the point where Mr. Poore's work stops.

Mr. SAYERS. Who is to prepare the list?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It has been prepared, as I understand, under direction of the Senate committee.

Mr. SAYERS. Does the bill only provide for printing the list, or does it also provide for paying some employé for preparing it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask that the bill be again read, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk again read the bill as above.

Mr. SAYERS. I have no objection to the passage of the bill, provided it does not carry an appropriation for an official who is already drawing a salary. If the gentleman will put in a provision that no portion of the money appropriated shall be paid to any person who is now drawing a salary from the Government I shall not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. As I have already said, the catalogue down to a certain date was prepared by Ben: Perley Poore, who for many years before I came to Congress was clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing, and this bill simply provides that the work shall be continued by his successor in office, the present clerk of the joint committee.

Mr. SAYERS. Who is he?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. T. W. Cox. He is clerk of the Senate Committee on Printing and also of the joint committee.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word right here There will be found in one of our appropriation bills an appropriation to pay this same official $1,200 in addition to the salary which he already receives.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman means the clerk of the House Committee, he is very much mistaken.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not mean the clerk of the House committee, but the clerk of the joint committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That being understood, I want to say that this is a Government publication and a very necessary one, a catalogue of Government publications. If it is a necessary publication, it must be compiled by some one. Now, if you are going to pay some outside party to do this work, you might just as well pay an employé of the House or the Senate, whose duties do not compel him to attend to this business. I have no personal interest in the matter, but I regard this as a necessary publication.

Mr. SAYERS. I will remind the gentleman that he was one of the committee who reported the bill which has now become a law preventing persons who draw official salaries from receiving additional compensation from the Government unless specially authorized to do so.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is exactly what we want to do here; we want to give special authority by this bill.

Mr. SAYERS. I will agree to the consideration of the bill provided the gentleman will strike out the provision for the extra payment of this officer and insert simply a provision to pay for the printing.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But who will do the work? Who is going to compile this catalogue?

Mr. SAYERS. I understood the gentleman to say that the work has already been done.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Not at all. Now, who is going to compile this catalogue of Government publications, running back to 1881, without compensation?

Mr. SAYERS. If you propose to pay the very same officer who is now drawing a large salary——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing is drawing salary, he is drawing it for his services as such clerk. Now, if we want this work done somebody must be paid for doing it.

Mr. BLAND. What is the necessity for this work anyway? I never saw any good in publications of this kind.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We have a great lot of publications—many thousands—and we have no way of knowing what they are. The work here proposed is simply a catalogue to show the publications made by the Government. That is all there is in it. I have no personal interest in the matter. If members of Congress do not want this publication, they can object to this resolution.

In reply to my friend from Texas, let me say that if we put duties upon an officer, I can see no reason why we should not pay him for such service just the same as we would pay a third party.

Mr. SAYERS. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. One moment. My friend from Texas has said, if I understood him, that he would not object to authorizing this work to be done if some person not an employé of the Government is to do the work.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman knows very well—and I ask him to correct me if I make a misstatement—that there are clerks and employés in the Departments here who are in the habit of getting up data on one subject or another and then asking from Congress an appropriation to pay for the preparation and publication of such matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct in that remark. A number of such applications have been before the Printing Committee; but not one has been favorably reported to the House, because we did not believe such work was necessary. But it seems to me members do want a catalogue of Government publications; and if we want it, then we ought to be willing to pay for it.

Mr. BLAND. I have heard a great deal about these "catalogues," and have seen some of them. I believe that about the only utility they have is to inform the junk-shop dealers what publications we are making, so that they may get hold of them. I think we ought to discountenance this whole business, and ought to repeal any law which authorizes it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We ought to quit printing the documents, if we are not going to catalogue them so that they may be made accessible and useful.

Mr. BLAND. I think if we would quit printing them it would be still better.

Mr. GOLDZIER. I would like to ask my friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] whether the gentleman who prepared the former catalogue of this kind was paid extra for the work?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. He was. That work was done by Ben: Perley Poore, who was for many years clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. BLAND. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 223) to correct an error in the act entitled "An act to amend an act granting a pension to Elizabeth Voss;"

A bill (H. R. 2842) to reimburse George C. Tanner, late consul, etc., the sum of $200, paid by him for rent of rooms;

A bill (H. R. 6529) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the St. Croix River between Wisconsin and Minnesota;

A bill (S. 1005) to prevent the recording of subdivisions of land in the District of Columbia in the office of the recorder of deeds; and

A bill (S. 2290) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory.'"

WINNEBAGO INDIANS, MINNESOTA.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7731) for the relief of certain Winnebago Indians in Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas by the fourth section of an act entitled "An act for the removal of the Winnebago Indians, and for the sale of their reservation in Minnesota for their benefit," approved February 21, 1863, it was made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to allot to said Indians in severalty "lands which they may respectively cultivate and improve, not exceeding 80 acres to each head of a family other than to the chiefs, to whom larger allotments may be made, which lands, when so allotted, shall be vested in said Indian and his heirs, without the right of alienation, and shall be evidenced by patent;" and

Whereas by the ninth section of the Indian appropriation act approved July 15, 1870, the Secretary of the Interior was "directed to cause to be investigated and to determine the claims of certain Indians of the Winnebago tribe now lawfully residing in the State of Minnesota; to issue patents, without the right of alienation, to those of them whom he shall find to be entitled thereto for the lands heretofore allotted to them in severalty," etc.; and

Whereas by the Indian appropriation act approved May 29, 1872, it was declared to be the intention and meaning of said ninth and tenth sections of the act of 1870 "to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be patented to each and every Winnebago Indian lawfully resident in the State of Minnesota at the date of this act, in accordance with the conditions of said two sections, an allotment of land," etc.; and

Whereas such a restriction for all time, without the right of alienation, by anyone, under any circumstances, is an entailment upon the land, which it is not deemed to be desirable: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the fourth and ninth sections of the act of 1863 and 1870, respectively, so far as they relate to the lands of the Winnebago Indians in Minnesota, be, and the same are hereby, modified so as to permit the alienation and conveyance of said lands, with the consent and approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before consent is given to the consideration of the bill, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire who reported it to the House?

The SPEAKER. The report was made by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CLAIM OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. ALDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the governor of the State of West Virginia the sum appropriated by the act of Congress entitled "An act to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861."

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its present consideration.

The joint resolution was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. PAYNE. I object.

I. H. HATHAWAY & CO.

Mr. REYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7685) for the relief of I. H. Hathaway & Co.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears that Thomas H. Handbury, major Corps of Engineers, United States Army, did on the 14th day of June, 1894, issue a check numbered 269798 for $10,118.34 on the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York in favor of I. H. Hathaway & Co., in payment of contract work done at mouth of St. Johns River, Florida, which check is alleged to have been lost in transmission through the United States mails between St. Augustine, Fla., and Philadelphia, Pa.; and

Whereas the provisions of the act of February 16, 1885, amending section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing United States disbursing officers and agents to issue duplicates of lost checks, apply only to checks drawn to $2,500 or less: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the said Thomas H. Handbury, major Corps of Engineers, United States Army, be, and he is hereby, instructed to issue a duplicate of said original check under such regulations in regard to its issue and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of duplicate checks under the provisions of section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SAYERS. I understand that this bill is merely to authorize the issuance of a duplicate check to these parties, the original never having been paid?

Mr. REYBURN. That is correct. The check was sent to the contractors, but was lost in transmission through the mail. Payment was stopped at the assistant treasurer's office in New York, and the money has never been paid to these parties.

Mr. SAYERS. Does this bill provide for the execution of the ordinary guaranty bond required in such cases?

Mr. REYBURN. It does.

Mr. LOUD. This bill is drawn under the statutory provision in such cases.

Mr. REYBURN. The contractor must give surety in double the amount of the payment.

Mr. LOUD. It is in the usual form.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit a question?

Mr. REYBURN. With pleasure.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to ask what time this loss occurred? I was not able to gather from the reading of the bill, owing to some confusion in the Hall.

Mr. REYBURN. This check was issued on June 14, 1894.

Mr. McMILLIN. Are the facts set forth in the report?

Mr. REYBURN. The report states them briefly.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think, perhaps, you had better have the report read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. MUTCHLER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7685) for the relief of I. H. Hathaway & Co., for check No. 269798, drawn by Thomas H. Handbury, major, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, on the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, issued June 14, 1894, in favor of I. H. Hathaway & Co., report as follows:

It appears to your committee, from the evidence submitted, that the said check was duly mailed, and since that time no trace of it has been found. Payment on said check was duly stopped on June 19, 1894. Under the present law no duplicate check can be drawn for a larger amount than $2,500, and the only relief for sufferers of this character is by special act.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. What bond does this act require?

Mr. LOUD. The usual statutory bond.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is to say, double the amount of the sum lost?

Mr. REYBURN. Yes. In other words, the contractor must give bond in the sum of $20,000, and is compelled to wait six months after the passage of the act before he can secure the money.

Mr. HUDSON. How long would he have to wait under the law before a duplicate check could be issued?

Mr. REYBURN. It would require a special act of Congress to issue a duplicate check if the amount exceeds $2,500.

Mr. McMILLIN. The reason I asked was, I wished to know whether this bond was adequate, inasmuch as the amount is not specified?

Mr. REYBURN. I understand it is required by a regulation of the Department.

Mr. LOUD. This check is to be paid under the usual statutory provision.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that. How can it be?

Mr. LOUD. Well, the bill provides that it shall be paid under the regulations prescribed in the statutes, except as to the amount of the check, of course.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then the statute requires that the bond shall be double the amount of the check lost?

Mr. LOUD. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. REYBURN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING, NEWARK, N. J.

Mr. ENGLISH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4796) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to authorize the purchase of additional ground in Newark, N. J., adjoining the custom-house and post-office building, and for the improvement thereon and the erection of additions thereto," approved March 1, 1888.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

PROPERTY LOST IN THE MILITARY SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 75) to extend the time for filing certain claims for compensation for horses and other property lost in the military service of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved January 9, 1883, or any statute of limitation heretofore enacted, shall not be deemed to prohibit the receiving or adjudication of a claim for compensation for property lost in the military service of the United States, whensoever filed, when such loss is matter of record in any official record in the custody of the War or Treasury Departments: Provided, however, That this act shall not be construed to extend to any classes of property other than those for the loss of which compensation has been authorized by now existing laws.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report can be read.

The report (by Mr. HERMANN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1759) to extend the time for filing certain claims for horses lost in the service, etc., report as follows:

This bill provides that the statutes of limitations enacted January 9, 1883, shall not be deemed to prohibit the receiving and adjudication of claims for compensation for property lost in the military service of the United States, when such loss is a matter of record in any official record in the custody of the War or Treasury Departments, which has been filed and certified to by the proper officer prior to January, 1870, provided that the classes of property referred to shall be such only as for which compensation has been authorized by now existing laws.

The first section of the act of January 9, 1883, which is referred to in the bill, extends the time for filing claims for horses and equipments lost by officers and enlisted men in the military service of the United States, which expired by limitation December 31, 1875, one year from the passage of the act; the second section of said act of January 9, 1883, extends the time for filing all claims arising under the act of March 3, 1849, entitled "An act providing for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States, and all acts amendatory thereof," one year from the passage of the act.

The committee are of opinion that the bill is just, especially as its provisions exclude all classes of property other than those for the loss of which compensation has been authorized by now existing laws. Your committee herewith append a report on the same subject made by the Committee on War Claims of the Forty-seventh Congress, which is full and exhaustive, and the reasoning of which the committee are of opinion is fully as applicable now as when the same was made. Your committee therefore report the bill to the House and recommend its passage.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have an explanation of that bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Oregon will be permitted to make a brief explanation.

Mr. HERMANN. I will state that this bill only applies to such claims as have been authorized by existing law, and as to which there is evidence on file in the Department, properly certified by the certifying officers. It is merely to complete the evidence of such claims as are now of record, but which the recent statute of limitations excludes.

Mr. SAYERS. I shall have to object to any bill of that kind.

Mr. HERMANN. It does not apply to any new claims whatever.

Mr. SAYERS. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCKAIG) there were—ayes 80, noes 13.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 15,000 copies of Public Act No. 227, "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes."

Mr. MANDERSON. I suggest that it be printed in document form rather than in bill form. The cost would be much less.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is the intention to have it printed in law form, just as the act will be printed when it becomes a law.

Mr. MANDERSON. It is to be printed simply in regular law form?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, that is the understanding. It will be "Public Act No." so and so.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

I. H. HATHAWAY & CO.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that House bill 7685 be laid before the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 7685) for the relief of I. H. Hathaway & Co. was read twice by its title.

Mr. QUAY. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read at length and considered as in Committee of the Whole. The preamble recites that Thomas H. Handbury, major Corps of Engineers, United States Army, on the 14th of June, 1894, issued a check numbered 269798 for $10,115.34 on the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York in favor of I. H. Hathaway & Co., in payment of contract work done at the mouth of St. Johns River, Florida, which check is alleged to have been lost in transmission through the United States mails between St. Augustine, Fla., and Philadelphia, Pa.; and that the act of February 16, 1885, amending section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing United States disbursing officers and agents to issue duplicates of lost checks, applies only to checks drawn to $2,500 or less.

The bill instructs Maj. Handbury to issue a duplicate of the original check under such regulations in regard to its issue and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of duplicate checks under the provisions of section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

It directs that the Annual Report of the Secretary of Agriculture for the year 1894 shall be printed. The report is hereafter to be submitted and printed in two parts, as follows: Part 1, which shall contain purely business and executive matter which it is necessary for the Secretary to submit to the President and Congress; part 2, which shall contain such reports from the different bureaus and divisions, and such papers prepared by their special agents, accompanied by suitable illustrations as shall, in the opinion of the Secretary, be specially suited to interest and instruct the farmers of the country, and to include a general report of the operations of the Department for their information. There shall be printed of part 1, 1,000 copies for the Senate, 2,000 copies for the House, and 3,000 copies for the Department of Agriculture; and of part 2, 110,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 360,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 30,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture, the illustrations for the same to be executed under the supervision of the Public Printer, in accordance with directions of the Joint Committee on Printing, the illustrations to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the claim of B. Campbell, without leaving copies.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. LAYTON, leave was granted to withdraw all papers heretofore filed in support of the bill (H. R. 4751) for the relief of Charles P. Wheeler, no action having been taken thereon.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted—

To Mr. DAVIS, to print remarks on financial and pension subjects.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to have leave to print in the RECORD some remarks upon the business of the session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD remarks touching the business of the present session.

Mr. McMILLIN. Within what time?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, I suppose within the same time that the others have.

The SPEAKER. The last copy of the daily RECORD will be published within a short time anyway.

Mr. SAYERS. In connection with that, I renew the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS]——

The SPEAKER. That has been granted.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suppose there will be no objection to limiting this leave which has been granted to various gentlemen to one week.

Mr. HOLMAN. Say ten days.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the last copy of the RECORD will be printed within a few days.

Mr. McMILLIN. But the law does not fix that time, and as it does not, I think it is proper that there should be some limit to the time within which the Public Printer can arrange this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the custom is to print the last copy of the daily RECORD one week after the session closes. If a gentleman does not get his speech in within that time his leave would be of no avail.

Mr. McMILLIN. With that statement I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, leave will be granted as stated.

There was no objection.

J. AND O. P. COBB & CO.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, it has been a great many years since I have asked the House to consider a private bill. [Laughter.] I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7992) for the relief of J. and O. P. Cobb & Co.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to J. and O. P. Cobb & Co., of Aurora, Ind., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,441.16, in full for barges and flatboats, the property of the said J. and O. P. Cobb & Co., which were taken possession of by the authority of the United States, on the Ohio River, at Vevay, Ind., in the month of July, 1863, and destroyed, the said barges and flatboats being at the time loaded with hay under contract between the said J. & O. P. Cobb & Co. and the United States, which hay has heretofore been paid for by the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments to explain the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the gentleman from Indiana will make a brief explanation of the bill. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOLMAN. Just a moment. The bill provides for the payment of something over $5,000 for these barges, destroyed on the Ohio River by the United States authorities in 1863. I have always admitted that if property was destroyed at the seat of war Congress could not fairly consider the claim for the damage. But never during the late war period was there an actual state of war in the section of country between Louisville and Cincinnati. Commerce was never interrupted. Vevay, where these barges were destroyed, is about halfway between these two cities of Louisville, Ky., and Cincinnati, Ohio.

In June, I think, 1863, these claimants were a part of a large company of men, but are now reduced, I think, to two in number, and they are now old and poor. They have been appealing to me for the past twelve years to ask Congress for justice. This company had a contract with the Government for the delivery of hay for the use of the army on the Mississippi River. Their boats were loaded at Vevay, Ind., at the time of the Morgan raid in 1863. That raid was never near Vevay, Ind. No portion of Morgan's army ever reached within 30 miles of the town of Vevay.

The Ohio River between Louisville and Cincinnati was never in any sense the seat of war. Gen. Boyle, anticipating that Morgan might attempt to cross the Ohio River, sent a gunboat up the river, and apparently finding that the only craft along the river between Louisville and Cincinnati that could be made available for crossing the river were these barges loaded with hay for the Government, they were destroyed by the gunboat. The proof is complete as to the value of the hay and the value of the barges. I introduced a bill in the House in the Thirty-eighth Congress to pay for the barges and the hay.

The measure passed the House by a unanimous vote, it was so clear a case. It went to the Senate. The Senate amended the bill so as to pay for the hay, but refused to pay for the barges. When that bill came back, I moved to lay it on the table, it seemed to me that the Senate amendment was so manifestly unjust. In the next Congress, the Thirty-ninth, the House again passed the bill by a unanimous vote, providing for payment of the barges and hay. It went to the Senate, and the Senate again struck out the pay for the barges, but made a provision to pay for the hay some $9,000. These men accepted the Senate bill under protest, as nothing better at the time could be obtained.

Now, in this interval of time these men, once a strong firm, are reduced to two in number. They are old and poor, and have been appealing to me to ask the House to consider their measure. Gentlemen will see at a glance that if it was proper to pay for the hay it was proper to pay for the barges. There are no questions as to the facts as to the value of the barges and the hay.

Reports have over and over again been made to the House establishing the facts, and the only question is whether or not the Senate will, if the House asks them to do so, pay for these barges. I do not know that they will; but there have been some measures passed within the last few years which justify me in the belief that if the House again passes this measure it will receive the approval of the Senate.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman state to the House how this property came to be destroyed?

Mr. HOLMAN. When Gen. Morgan, on his famous and disastrous raid, was going through Indiana, Gen. Boyle, in command at Louisville, Ky., sent a gunboat up the Ohio River from Louisville, Ky., to destroy the shipping, so as to prevent the use of the shipping in enabling Morgan to escape to the Kentucky side. That is all there was about it. These barges, loaded with hay, under contract with the Government, were burned by this gunboat. That is the whole case.

Mr. MARSH. Burned by whom?

Mr. HOLMAN. By a gunboat, under the order of Gen. Boyle.

Mr. MARSH. To prevent them being used by Morgan's army?

Mr. HOLMAN. That was the object.

Mr. MARSH. That was a military object.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was a military object, but not at the seat of war; for my friend will understand that Morgan was not within 30 miles of the place where these barges were. They were not in the track of Gen. Morgan. The commerce of the Ohio River between Louisville and Cincinnati was never interrupted during the late war.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. If those boats were destroyed by the fire of the gunboat, was not the injury done in the track of war, according to the intention of the law?

Mr. HOLMAN. By no possibility. There never was an hour's interruption of commerce on the Ohio between Louisville and Cincinnati during the war.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do you know any instance where such a claim as this has been allowed?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend must remember that the Senate consented to payment for the hay, and the claim for the barges stood and stands upon the same footing exactly. Can there be any question of that?

Mr. MARSH. Upon that point I want to ask the gentleman this question: Did not the Government pay for the hay on the ground that it had contracted for the hay?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes.

Mr. MARSH. The Government, having purchased this hay from the contractor and having destroyed it, felt under obligation to pay for it. Now, I do think there is a difference between the claim for the hay and the claim for the barges.

Mr. HOLMAN. I concede that the Senate put the case on that ground; but let me read a passage from the report made to the Fifty-first Congress on this bill:

If this hay loaded on the vessels had, in pursuance of the contract, reached Memphis and had been there taken possession of by the Government in pursuance of this contract and the vessels never returned—lost or destroyed while so held—under the law as it existed before the late war and during the war and ever since the war, the Government would pay for the vessels.

This has been the law for more than forty years. The Government took possession of these barges loaded with hay, for the purchase of which the Government had contracted, and destroyed the barges and the hay. The Government paid for the hay. Can there be a question of doubt of the obligations of the Government to pay for the barges?

Mr. MARSH. One other question. Will the gentleman state whether this bill has been reported by any committee of this House during this Congress?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; it has not. The claim, however, had been reported so often to the House and so unanimously that I hardly thought it was necessary to press the measure on the attention of the present committee.

Mr. MARSH. This is a bill to appropriate over $5,000 to pay an old claim—whether just or not, I do not know; but the case has not been submitted to a committee of this House for consideration, and notwithstanding the kindly feeling and the high opinion I entertain for my distinguished friend from Indiana, I must object to its consideration at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think my friend will recall that objection when he reflects a moment. Our time here has been pretty well occupied with public matters, and this matter has been before Congress after Congress for over twenty years, and has been reported favorably over and over again. It has been passed upon in the House favorably over and over again. The only difficulty has been between the House and the Senate as to whether the hay should be paid for alone, or the hay and the barges.

Mr. HERMANN. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana whether, during his Congressional experience in this body, he has ever objected to claims of like merit?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend knows that I never hesitate to object to a bill if on inquiry I find it without merit, but a claim like this has never been rejected to my knowledge, or objected to by a gentleman who fully understood the facts. I defy the gentleman to point to a single instance of a claim like this that has been finally defeated. I feel sure that my friend from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] will withdraw his objection after he reflects for a moment.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Yet I could not get just as good a claim as that out of your committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised to find the the gentleman from Indiana here, in the closing hours of this Congress, asking unanimous consent for an appropriation of over $5,000 of the peoples' money to pay a claim of a constituent of his, which claim has never even been submitted to a committee of this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, yes; it has been submitted to committees of the House over and over again. I have shown that it has twice passed the House by a unanimous vote. It has been submitted. I admit the Committee on War Claims wish to refer the bill to the Court of Claims. That would be fatal to the old claimants, so long useful and valuable citizens, now oppressed with years. The bill is at the mercy of a single member. The claim is entirely just and proper, and I feel confident that there will be no objection to its consideration at this time by any gentleman who understands its merits.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MARSH. Does the gentleman from Indiana say that the Court of Claims would reject this claim?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; the court would approve the claim; but sending the case to the court would involve time and expense, and my clients are too old and too poor to bear that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the consideration of this bill?

Mr. MARSH and Mr. ENGLISH of New Jersey objected.

COMPARATIVE EXHIBIT OF TARIFF LAWS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 60,000 copies of the comparison of the tariff laws of 1890 and 1894, prepared under the supervision of the Senate Committee on Finance; 25,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate and 35,000 for the use of members of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-third Congress.

The committee have considered the Senate concurrent resolution to print 60,000 of the comparison of the tariff laws of 1890 and 1894, and direct me to report the same with an amendment striking out "35,000" for the House and making it "40,000," and striking out "25,000" for the Senate and making it "20,000." This is the usual manner of distribution of documents between the two Houses. The estimated cost of the same is $11,760.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move the previous question on the amendment reported by the committee and on the resolution.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Before that is done, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is this the document already issued by the Senate committee——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is Senate Report No. 559——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Made about the 15th of August?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can not state accurately about that; but it is Senate Report No. 559, prepared by the Finance Committee of the Senate.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It includes the "Wilson bill" as well as the Senate bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I so understand.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have seen that compilation.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia rose.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I may not have seen the comparative statement to which the resolution called up by the gentleman from Tennessee refers. I wish to ask him whether in that comparative table the duty upon sugar as imposed by the House bill is put down at 39 per cent, as it was in some tables which were sent out, or whether sugar is put down as free.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have not had an opportunity to examine the report which this resolution proposes to print; but I am informed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAYES], who sits near me, that this statement puts sugar under the House bill as free. But I repeat I have not myself examined the statement, and therefore can not answer upon my own authority. This document has been prepared, I am informed, by the experts who have been at work for the Senate committee, and it is supposed to be as accurate as it can be made.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Of course a table of this kind, printed by authority of the two Houses, ought to have the highest possible authenticity; for it will be accepted by the country as an official statement, as nearly correct as it can possibly be made. I suppose every member of the House understands that it is impossible for even an accurate statistician to make these comparisons upon many of the schedules in these bills in such a way as to enlighten the taxpayers and the country at large. It is impossible, for instance, very often to make a comparison between a specific rate of duty and an ad advalorem rate of duty, because often a specific rate of duty is practically prohibitory, there being only a small importation of the highest priced articles. Hence a specific rate calculated upon this small importation of high-priced articles might show a very moderate ad valorem duty, while upon the great mass of commoner and cheaper articles the duty might be prohibitory.

Then, again, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the fact that in a comparison of rates of different tariff bills two items are always to be considered. As a rule, we consider simply the average ad valorem for a year as figured out upon the importations of that year; but quite as important, perhaps even more important than the average ad valorem rate of a particular year's importations, is the basis of taxation—the amount of imports subject to duty. Now, as I understand, the comparative statement referred to in this resolution shows a certain percentage upon the imports of 1893 subject to taxation under the McKinley law; it shows another rate upon the imports of that year upon the supposition of those imports being subject to taxation under the rates of the House bill; and then it shows another ad valorem rate of taxation based upon the imports of 1893, on the supposition of those imports being subject to taxation under the bill which has just passed both Houses.

Now, I repeat that it is quite as important, in my judgment it is far more important, in comparing these three bills, to consider the basis of taxation—the amount of imports of 1893 which would be taxed—than to consider the rates of taxation.

I believe, speaking entirely from memory, that under the Mc-

Kinley law there was an ad valorem duy on dutiable goods in 1893 amounting to forty-eight and some fraction per cent on something over $400,000,000 of importations for that year. If the House bill had been in operation only about $350,000,000 worth of these goods would have been taxed; and the rate of taxation would have been about 35 or 36 per cent, and the rest would have come in free.

Now, under the law which is expected to go into operation in the immediate future, the basis of taxation has been increased more than $100,000,000 over that fixed in the House bill, and, if I mistake not, quite fifty millions over the McKinley bill. That is a point to be taken into consideration in connection with this question of comparisons, as well as the ad valorem duties on dutiable goods, that the resolution now under consideration proposes to print.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to say——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How much time does my colleague want?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Only a minute.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield to my colleague for one minute.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think it would be entirely proper to state in this connection that of the one hundred millions of addition, of which the gentleman from West Virginia speaks, over the House bill, fifty millions of that sum is a revenue tax which has been put on sugar.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have only this to say——

Mr. BYNUM. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield to me for a minute.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana for one minute.

Mr. BYNUM. I desire simply to state, Mr. Speaker, that the comparison of rates to which this resolution refers is made in the same manner that every such comparison has been made heretofore. The comparison not only contains the specific duties as imposed by the different bills, but also a reduction of the specific to the ad valorem basis. Of course, the approximation of the amount of revenue is a mere mathematical calculation. Anyone can make it, based upon the previous year's importations, but no one can calculate exactly how much will be collected from imports under a new law.

These comparisons, however, are as nearly accurate as such comparisons can be made. They have been made precisely on the same basis that former comparisons have been made in preceding years. It is all the estimate that can be made; and so far as I have examined this comparison it contains all the data which have been contained in former tables of like character, and I think more, for it contains the specific rates reduced to an ad valorem basis.

I repeat, therefore, I think it is as near a correct comparison as can be made. I understand it has been made by the experts of the Treasury Department and the expert of the Finance Committee of the Senate in conjunction with the clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means, whom we all regard as the most accurate authority on statistical and tariff questions that has ever been in the employ of the House.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to ask the gentleman from West Virginia a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. May I ask the gentleman from West Virginia whether the matter proposed to be printed is, as he understands it, so made up as to give a fair and adequate comparison on the basis he suggested of the bills which it presumes to treat?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. As I have already said, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I have seen the tables which are now presented. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] is undoubtedly correct in stating that the clerks, who are merely arithmeticians, have probably made up this statement as other similar statements are made up. But I called the attention of the House to the fact, in connection with the matter, that it is impossible to compare accurately a specific rate with an ad valorem rate——

Mr. WARNER. If this table is made up on the basis you suggest, would it be subject to the grave errors or defects to which you call attention?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I wanted to call attention to the fact for this reason, that I do not know what the gentleman from Tennessee has sent up to the desk. I have here before me in the RECORD what I suppose is the statement, which is appended to a speech of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. COFFEEN]. I wanted the House to understand that, in my judgment, it would be unfair to undertake to institute a comparison in the manner suggested; for while the rates under the House bill—the average rates on dutiable goods—are about 35.51 per cent ad valorem, and in the Senate bill 38.68 per cent ad valorem, the House bill imposes 35 per cent on $351,000,000 of imported goods, leaving all the rest free, whereas the Senate bill imposes thirty-eight and a fraction per cent on $463,000,000 of goods, leaving the rest free; this, of course, calculated on the importation of 1893.

Mr. WARNER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether the explanation of the gentleman from West Virginia should not be added to the matter to be published in some shape or other?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In reply to the gentleman from New York, and also to the gentleman from West Virginia, I have no doubt that the statement the gentleman makes is literally true, and if it is desired that any such note may be appended by the editor of this comparison, such a thing can be added.

I want to say that I asked the gentleman from West Virginia to prepare the resolution providing for the printing of this comparison, and also asked to have the clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means to examine the comparison. All that I have endeavored to do is to get the matter before the House, so as to provide for the printing of the document.

Mr. WARNER. With the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think this document will be about as nearly what we want as any that can be prepared, possibly with the addition of the note or the information given by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

In order to get through with the matter, I think I will move the previous question.

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We can debate the tariff for the next three hours and not get through with it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not want to debate the tariff bill, but I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to ask the gentleman what the matter that is to be printed consists of?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The Senate Committee on Finance, or the experts mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], have prepared this comparison of the tariff law of 1890 and the present act, or the act now about to become a law.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is that all it contains?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not know. I have not seen it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it not a little singular that the chairman of the Committee on Printing should recommend the passage of this resolution calling for this printing without knowing what he is doing?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, it is not at all singular, because I do not know that the document is in print. Therefore, if you want——

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Let me answer the question, inasmuch as you have asked me if it is not singular that I should do this. If we wait until I can see that document it will be after this Congress adjourns, and then it will be too late for the chairman of the committee to offer a resolution to have the printing done.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it not true that that committee have had a resolution in their possession for several days, which resolution calls for the information that the House generally wants?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Iowa prepared a simple House resolution under which we could expend $500 and no more, and upon that resolution he is asking me now to give an opinion. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been utterly futile if we had reported it. It would have been absolutely worthless, for this House can not order to exceed $500 worth of printing without the passage of a concurrent resolution.

Mr. HEPBURN. Would it not have been competent for the committee to have amended that resolution so as to give us the information that we want?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Here is a resolution, which has passed the Senate, to give us the information we want. I think I will move the previous question.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withhold that motion just for a minute.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The only thing is, we shall never get through with this.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. We have nothing else to do. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], and I am up in the air as to the value of this statement. It seems to me that the various gentlemen protesting about its value and its correctness agree about as well as do the members of the Democratic party concerning proper tariff legislation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move the previous question. If we want this document, let us order it printed.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will yield for a question, but not for a speech. I yielded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] for a question, and instead of that he made an onslaught upon the Democratic party.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I understand that this is a concurrent resolution to print a tariff comparison. Now, as I understand, there are two comparisons, which are Senate documents. What we want, I suppose, is the last one that was printed, which contains all of the amendments offered in the Senate and ingrafted in the bill as it will become a law.

I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to say that he has not seen the comparison, and I wanted to call attention to that, and let it be understood that if this passes it is to cover the comparison embracing all of the amendments offered in the Senate and which are now embraced in the bill. There being two comparisons which have been printed from the Senate committee, the first one does not embrace all of the amendments, because it was printed before they were agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This is a comparison of the bill as it will become a law to-day. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 4.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. JOHNSON, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON.

The House again divided.

Before the announcement of the vote by tellers, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee said: I withdraw the resolution.

CORRECTION OF INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the joint resolution (S. R. 105) to change the initials of a name in the Indian appropriation bill.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the appropriation to pay "F. G." Niedringhaus for beef cows delivered at Fort Peck Agency be corrected to read "W. F." Niedringhaus.

The SPEAKER. This is a mere correction in the initials of a name.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

DEATH OF HON. GEORGE B. SHAW.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to announce to the members of this House the death, at 8.15 o'clock this morning, of our genial colleague, Hon. George B. Shaw of Wisconsin. Mr. Shaw left here about a month ago the very picture of health, and this sudden death reminds us that "in the midst of life we are in death." He died at his home in the city of Eau Claire, Wis. Mr. Shaw was a gentleman who recommended himself by his genial and courteous manner to his colleagues upon this floor and to all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. At some future time I shall ask this House to suspend its business in order to pay suitable tribute to his memory, his distinguished services, and his honorable life.

At present I will content myself with asking the House to adopt the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. George B. Shaw, late a Representative from the State of Wisconsin.

Resolved, That a committee of nine members of the House be appointed by the Speaker to act with such Senators as may be selected to attend the funeral of the deceased, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House shall take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased at his home; and the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of these resolutions.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the resolutions submitted by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the appointment of the following gentlemen under the resolutions: Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. BARWIG, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, Mr. SOMERS, Mr. BABCOCK, Mr. CANNON of Illinois, Mr. HEPBURN, Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota, and Mr. COUSINS.

In accordance with the terms of the resolutions just adopted, the Chair now declares the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock m.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 105) to change the initials of a name in the Indian appropriation bill.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 6122) authorizing the Kansas City, Oklahoma and Pacific Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 7685) for the relief of I. H. Hathaway & Co.; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 198) to print Agricultural Report for 1894.

MEMORIAL.

Mr. DUBOIS presented the memorial of John Stack and 157 other citizens of Idaho, remonstrating against the action of the Attorney-General of the United States in relation to the recent labor strikes in Illinois and other States; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. RANSOM submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of two members of the Senate be appointed to join a similar committee on the part of the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that unless he may have some further communication to make the two Houses are now ready to adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. RANSOM and Mr. MANDERSON as the committee on the part of the Senate.

PRINTING OF TARIFF COMPARISON.

Mr. COCKRELL. I submit a resolution, which simply authorizes the printing of 2,500 copies of the tariff law of 1894 in comparison with the law of 1890, prepared under the supervision of the Senate Finance Committee. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 2,500 copies of the comparison of the tariff law of 1890 and 1894, prepared under the supervision of the Senate Committee on Finance, for the use of the members of the United State Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON. In order that any force of the rule may be obviated, I suggest that upon inquiry it is ascertained that this number can be printed within the $500 limit. Let that appear of record.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; that is the calculation we made yesterday.

The resolution was agreed to.

FORD THEATER DISASTER INVESTIGATION.

Mr. HARRIS. I submit a resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Select Committee to Investigate the Ford Theater Disaster is hereby authorized and directed to continue the investigation provided for in the resolution of the Senate adopted December 14, 1893, with all the powers and authority conferred by said resolution. Said committee to sit during the recess, and to report to the Senate at the next regular session.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I will state the purpose of the resolution. The sufferers by the Ford Theater disaster are in number one hundred and twenty-odd. The various cases were distributed between the members of the select committee. Some members of the committee have had time and opportunity to enter upon and perhaps almost, if not quite, complete the investigation of the special cases. Other members of the committee, myself being one of that class, did not have the opportunity. I have not had a minute to devote to the special examination of the cases referred to myself as a subcommittee. I desire from about the middle of November until the meeting of Congress in December the opportunity to come here and conduct that investigation.

The sundry civil appropriation act is, I think, amply sufficient perhaps of itself, but to relieve all possible doubt I offer the resolution, because about the middle of November next I propose to continue the investigation of the cases in my own personal charge.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Tennessee whether it is not contemplated that the investigation shall be had hereafter by a joint committee.

Mr. HARRIS. The sundry civil appropriation act provides for the appointment of a similar committee on the part of the House, which, with the committee of the Senate, shall constitute a commission to sit in final judgment upon the cases. Whether the other House has or has not taken action I am not advised; but whether it has or has not, I deem it the duty of our committee, to which my friend from California [Mr. WHITE] and myself belong, to proceed with the investigation and develop all the material facts, being very glad to coöperate with or have the coöperation of such committee as the other House may appoint. Whether it will appoint during the present session I am not prepared to answer.

Mr. WHITE. I have no objection at all to the resolution. I was simply inquiring as to what has been done by the other House with reference to the appointment of a commission. I have no information upon the point myself, and I made the inquiry.

Mr. HARRIS. Up to yesterday no action had been taken. Probably action will be taken this morning, and, if so, of course our committee will invite the coöperation of such committee as the other House may appoint.

Mr. MANDERSON. While in full accord with the chairman of the select committee, of which I am a member, I think it would be well in the event that the House of Representatives should appoint the select committee provided for as a part of the joint commission in the sundry civil appropriation act that the resolution should give power to act in conjunction with such select committee of the other House.

Mr. HARRIS. I think there is force in the suggestion, and I should be glad if the Senator would incorporate such a provision in the resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have drawn an amendment. I move to add to the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee:

And with power to act in conjunction with any select committee that may be appointed by the House under the sundry civil appropriation act providing for the commission for such purpose.

Mr. HARRIS. I accept as a modification of my resolution the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska. I think it is wise and proper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. HARRIS (at 12 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess until fifteen minutes to 1 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had appointed a committee of three members of that body to join a similar committee on the part of the Senate to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses of Congress are ready to adjourn, and respectfully inquire if he has any further communication to make to them, and had appointed Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. HEPBURN the committee on the part of the House.

The message also communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. GEORGE B. SHAW, late a Representative from the State of Wisconsin, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 105) to change the initials of a name in the Indian appropriation bill, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE SHAW.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. George B. Shaw, late a Representative from the State of Wisconsin.

Resolved, That a committee of nine members of the House be appointed by the Speaker to act with such Senators as may be selected to attend the funeral of the deceased, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House shall take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased at his home; and the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of these resolutions.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The Speaker appointed Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. BARWIG, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, Mr. SOMERS, Mr. BABCOCK, Mr. CANNON of Illinois, Mr. HEPBURN,

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota, and Mr. COUSINS as the committee on the part of the House.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL] desired that I should present to the Senate for him certain resolutions relating to the death of his deceased colleague. As the Senator from Wisconsin has left the city to attend the funeral, I submit the resolutions and ask that they be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from California will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. George B. Shaw, late a Representative from the State of Wisconsin.

Resolved, That a committee consisting of five Senators be appointed by the Vice-President to attend, with the committee on the part of the House of Representatives, the funeral of the deceased at his late residence, in the State of Wisconsin.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives, and that he be further directed to send a copy of the same to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin, Mr. CULLOM, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. ROACH, and Mr. KYLE as the committee on the part of the Senate under the second resolution.

TARIFF BULLETINS.

Mr. HARRIS. From the Committee on Finance I report ten of the tariff bulletins that have not been printed, which will complete the series. I send them to the desk and ask that they be printed.

Mr. VEST. How many of these bulletins are there, I ask the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARRIS. Sixty-four in all, and fifty-four of them have already been printed.

Mr. VEST. These are ten more?

Mr. HARRIS. These are the last, ten more, and in bulk, as the Senator from Missouri can see by looking at the documents I have sent to the desk.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire what number of these documents have been printed?

Mr. HARRIS. My recollection is that only the usual number of copies have been printed. I do not remember that there has been any order to print extra copies.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the information of the Chair—that the usual number have been printed.

Mr. BUTLER. I am very little nearer the information I seek than I was before. How many copies comprise the usual number?

Mr. HARRIS. The usual number I believe is about 1,900.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bulletins will be printed.

RECESS.

Mr. COCKRELL (at 12 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess until half after 1 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. RANSOM and Mr. MANDERSON, of the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, appeared at the bar of the Senate, and

Mr. RANSOM said: Mr. President, the joint committee appointed by the two Houses to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses, having accomplished the business of the present session, are ready to adjourn, unless the President has some further communication to make to them, have performed that duty, and the President replied that he had no further communication to make.

PRINTING OF TARIFF COMPARISONS.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed 2,500 copies of the comparison of the tariff law of 1890 and 1894, prepared under the supervision of the Senate Committee on Finance, for the use of the members of the Senate of the United States.

THANKS TO THE VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. QUAY. I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk, the immediate consideration of which I desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Arkansas in the chair). The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are due, and are hereby tendered, to the Hon. ADLAI E. STEVENSON, Vice-President of the United States, for the ability, dignity, courtesy, and impartiality with which he has presided over its deliberations during the present session of Congress.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

THANKS TO THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. MANDERSON. I offer a resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are due, and are hereby tendered, to the Hon. ISHAM G. HARRIS, President of the Senate pro tempore, for the ability, dignity, courtesy, and impartiality with which he has discharged the duties of the chair during the present session.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. COCKRELL (at 1 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess until ten minutes to 2 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 1 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that, in accordance with the provisions of the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, "providing for a joint commission to investigate the Ford's Theater disaster, the Speaker of the House had appointed Mr. MADDOX, Mr. BROOKSHIRE, Mr. PIGOTT, Mr. DANIELS, and Mr. UPDEGRAFF members of the commission on the part of the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senators, the hour fixed by the concurrent resolution for the adjournment of the second session of the Fifty-third Congress has arrived.

Before making the formal announcement, I can not forbear giving expression of my grateful appreciation of the resolution personal to myself, just adopted by the Senate. For this manifestation of your confidence, as well as for the uniform courtesy, official and personal, extended me, I am profoundly grateful.

And now, wishing each of you a safe return to home and constituents, I declare the Senate adjourned without day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 28, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The following prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY:

O, Thou Infinite One, we adore Thee as the Father of comfort and the God of all consolation. As we bow in Thy presence this morning, we are mindful that since we were last here Thy providence has removed one of our number from the earth. May his death be sanctified to his family, to his friends, and to his associates in public life.

Now, Our Father, as our deliberations here are drawing to a close, we ask Thy blessings upon Thy servants, that as they shall separate and return to their homes, scattered far and wide over this land, they may carry with them kindly recollections of each other, and a consciousness that whatever errors they have committed they have tried to do their duty and to serve the best interests of their fellow-citizens. Though, O Lord, we shall part from each other, we shall not part from Thee. Be Thou our helper at all times, our portion in life and our hope in death, through the merits of Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as members on the part of the House Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. HEPBURN.

DIGEST AND MANUAL.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged report from the Committee on Printing I desire to submit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee presents a privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 2,600 copies of the Digest and Manual of the Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives for the second session of the Fifty-Third Congress, the same to be bound and distributed under direction of the Speaker and Clerk of the House, 100 copies thereof to be bound in paper covers.

The report (by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee) was read, as follows:

The committee have considered the House resolution to print the Digest and Manual of the Rules of the House of Representatives, second session Fifty-third Congress, and direct me to report the same with the recommendation that it do pass.

The estimated cost of same is $3,825.

The resolution was adopted.

COMPARATIVE TARIFF STATEMENT.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand the report which I presented yesterday, with a resolution to print 60,000 copies of the comparative tariff statement. Quite a number of gentlemen have asked me to bring the matter up this morning, realizing the necessity for the publication of this document, and I will add that the Senate are going forward, as the RECORD of this morning shows, to print it for their own use, so that it is simply for the House to decide whether we shall have copies of the statement or not.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 60,000 copies of the comparison of the tariff laws of 1890 and 1894, prepared under the supervision of the Senate Committee on Finance; 25,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate and 35,000 for the use of members of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-third Congress.

The report (by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee) was read, as follows:

The committee have considered the Senate concurrent resolution to print 60,000 copies of the comparison of the tariff laws of 1890 and 1894, and direct me to report the same with an amendment, striking out "35,000" for the House and making it "40,000," and striking out "25,000" for the Senate and making it "20,000." This is the usual manner of distribution of documents between the two Houses. The estimated cost of the same is $11,700.

The amendments recommended in the report were adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the amendments are designed simply to make the distribution in the usual proportion, giving the House twice as many copies of the document as the Senate.

The question being taken on the resolution as amended, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 3.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. JOHNSON, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Pending the count by tellers, a message from the Senate was received, which the Speaker laid before the House and directed the Clerk to read; and the Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of two members of the Senate be appointed, to join a similar committee on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that unless he may have some further communication to make the two Houses are now ready to adjourn.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I believe that a resolution similar to that was passed by the House a few moments ago.

The SPEAKER. Yes. This simply notifies the House of the action taken by the Senate on the subject.

COMPARATIVE TARIFF STATEMENT.

Mr. WARNER (pending the count by tellers). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to the description contained in the resolution now pending of the matter proposed to be printed there be added the words, "including such addition, explanation, or amendment as may be proposed or approved by the chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not object to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MAHON. I object.

Mr. LOUD. Take it straight.

Mr. DE ARMOND (pending the count by tellers). Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer a substitute for the pending resolution.

The SPEAKER. The trouble is that the point is made that there is no quorum voting on the pending proposition, and nothing can be done while that point is insisted upon.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I ask first to have my proposition read, and then I shall ask unanimous consent to have it considered as a substitute for the pending resolution, if that be in order.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Clerk will report the proposed substitute.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be prepared by the clerk of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the clerk of the Finance Committee of the Senate a comparative statement showing the rates of taxation, by items, under the McKinley act of 1890 and the tariff act of 1894, and that of such comparative statement, when approved by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House and the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, there be printed 60,000 copies; 40,000 for the use of the House and 20,000 for the use of the Senate.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of that as a substitute for the pending resolution.

Mr. HICKS. I object.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that nothing can be decided upon this question at present, and if there is to be any action it can be taken later. I ask unanimous consent that the House now take a recess until fifteen minutes to 2 o'clock.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The House accordingly took a recess until 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.

The recess having expired, the House at fifteen minutes before 2 o'clock resumed its session.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of withdrawing the resolution which I presented, unless the point of no quorum be withdrawn. I understand the gentleman from Ohio declines to withdraw the point.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. I do.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then I withdraw this resolution, with the statement that the Senate has just ordered 2,500 copies of this document printed, the same number having been ordered yesterday. Members desiring to procure copies of this document can do so by handing their order to the Public Printer, who will furnish them at 19 cents a copy; that is what they cost. Orders ought to be given at once, before the Senate order is executed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. HEPBURN appeared at the bar, when—

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia said: Mr. Speaker, the committee appointed on the part of the House, in conjunction with a like committee of the Senate, to wait upon the President and inform him that the two Houses of Congress are ready to adjourn, unless he has further communication to make, beg leave to report that they have discharged that duty, and have been directed by the President to say in response that he has no further communication to make, and also upon his part to congratulate the two Houses of Congress on the close of their labors, and to wish the individual members a pleasant and profitable vacation.

COMPARATIVE EXHIBIT OF TARIFF BILLS.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I now offer as a separate resolution the proposition which I undertook to offer as a substitute for the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be prepared by the clerk of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the clerk of the Finance Committee of the Senate a comparative statement showing the rates of taxation, by items, under the McKinley act of 1890 and the tariff act of 1894, and that of such comparative statement, when approved by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House and the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, there be printed 60,000 copies—40,000 for the use of the House and 20,000 for the use of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. HICKS. I renew the objection.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS ON PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. CAMINETTI. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, or a subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to visit and examine, during the recess of Congress, such works of river and harbor improvement on the Pacific coast, existing or proposed, as in its judgment the interests of commerce and protection of existing works and navigation facilities may demand; and that the actual expenses of said committee or subcommittee, properly incurred, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives in the usual manner.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman from California [Mr. CAMINETTI] will accept as a substitute the resolution which I hold in my hand I will offer no objection to the consideration of the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The resolution sent to the desk by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, through a subcommittee not exceeding five in number, is hereby authorized to visit and examine, during the recess of Congress, such works of river and harbor improvement on the Pacific coast, existing or proposed, as in its judgment the interests of commerce and protection of existing works and navigation facilities may demand: Provided, That no expense whatever shall be incurred or paid by the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. CAMINETTI]?

Mr. KILGORE. I object.

Subsequently Mr. KILGORE said: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from California is willing to accept as a substitute the resolution proposed by my colleague [Mr. SAYERS], to which I have no objection.

Mr. CAMINETTI. I accept the resolution suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. SAYERS].

I will state, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has reported that in its judgment an examination of the various projects now under way and those proposed would be proper, as it may lead to better facilities and more protection to navigation, as well as economy in future expenditures by the Government. I hope that no further objection will be made.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The report is very short.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the report will be read.

The report was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. ENGLISH of California. I object.

Mr. TERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1620) for the suppression of lottery traffic through national and interstate commerce and the postal service subject to the jurisdiction and laws of the United States.
